Dont Ya Tell Henry publications

instead of a preface

the collection you have just opened combines all the bob dylan interviews which i happened t come across over the last decade or so and have kept in the vaults of my haunted mansion. the main purpose of the booklet has been t prepare a corpus of interviews that allows lookin up a phrase or word that dylan is supposed to have said on one or the other occasion. ctrl and f do the trick dont take it too literal. naturally, not every mind pollutin word ever attributed t mr dylan in print is collected herein. of course not. there is a dedicated chapter at the end t show the reader what i know that is missin. undoubtedly, there are many more interviews, too, of which existence i am not aware at the time of writin over seven hundred thousand mind pollutin words total. you have all moral right then to burst into wild spasms of truly diabolic laughter the next time you read "bob dylan never gives any interviews." buaha ha ha ha for copyright reasons i feel compelled t tell you that all and any copyrighted material in the present publication is gathered here in fair use for the purpose of study, review or critical analysis only. remember how to act. you can have the best there is, but it's gonna cost you all your love. you won't get it for money every effort has been made t ensure highest quality of the texts. sadly, this booklet had no proofreader, so do accept my apologies for any typos &/or scannin cock-ups your keen eyes may stumble upon. if you find any, feel free t mail me & i'll fix em asap for the next update

i consider this very booklet as a draft version a-waitin t be perfected in due course. whenever that may be. should you, dear reader, find yourself in possession of any interview that's not been included here & you happen t be in a joyous mood t share at the same time, please waste a second & drop me a line at bobdylan at poczta dot onet dot pl thank you kindly in advance. as long as health allows, i'll try t issue updates dependin on what new material is available t me or how many corrections need t be applied. all subsequent releases shall be announced by regular channels. If yuh got t know 'bout this one, you'll know about all follow-ups, too

& dont forget to save some trees for the kids, read it on your sceen

since no man is an island, i'm no exception despite the best intentions. chapeau bas & deepest thanks go (alphabetically) to:

Dylan's bedroom with John Bucklen, Hibbing, Minnesota

BBC "Highway 61 Revisited" programme summary

Richard Williams in The Independent On Sunday (8th May 1993) writes of this programme...

> "Most valuably, we get John Bucklen, Dylan's childhood friend, who produces a bedroom tape of the two boys wailing and a song called "Hey Little Richard". Bucklen's memories, untapped and dew-fresh, add a valuable dimension to our knowledge of the great American artist; for these two boys, he says, life then was about "friendship and music"."

Tales Of Rock n' Roll is the title of a BBC Arena series which goes behind four famous rock songs – "Peggy Sue", "Walk On The Wild Side", "Heartbreak Hotel" and finally "Highway 61 Revisited". This film was first broadcast at 20:30 GMT on BBC2 8th May 1993. Duration: 60 minutes.

Recording of Bob Dylan (BD) and John Bucklen (JB)

> Little Richard.
> Oh, Little Richard.

BD: It's your turn to sing now...

BD: This is Little Richard... (fakes wild crowd noises into microphone) ...Little Richard's got a lot of expression.
JB: You think singing is just jumping around and screaming?
BD: You gotta have some kind of expression.
JB: Johnny Cash has got expression.
BD: There's no expression. (sings in boring, slow and monotone voice) "I met her at a dance St. Paul Minnesota... I walk the line, because you're mine, because you're mine..."
JB: You're doing it wrong, you're just –

[1958 Tape fades out.]

JB: What's the best king of music?
BD: Rhythm and Blues.
JB: State your reason in no less that twenty-five minutes.
BD: Ah, Rhythm and Blues you see is something that you really can't quite explain see. When you hear a song of Rhythm and Blues – when you hear it's a good Rhythm and Blues song chills go up your spine...
JB: Whoa-o-o!
BD: ...When you hear a song like that. But when you hear a song like Johnny Cash, whadaya wanna do? You wanna leave, you wanna, you – when you hear a song like some good Rhythm and Blues song you wanna cry when you hear one of those songs.

[1958 Tape fades out.]

Well, buzz buzz buzz honey bee
_____________I ever heard ____________________darling
And the sweetest sound I ever heard

Well____the beauty of the red red rose
The beauty of the skies of blue
The beauty of the evening sunset here
Ain't but the beauty of you-u-uuu (Dylan sings line solo)

Honey, honey, honey comb
The beauty of the grapes on the vine _____________________silence
And I woke up and said you was mine

[1958 Tape fades out.]

BD: (Indecipherable.)
JB: Listen, man you gotta to do it a little bit faster than that. I mean I'm trying to cut a fast record here, that's right –
BD: I can't help it.
JB: I know it ain't slow but it's not fast enough too.
BD: Whadaya talking about, man, that's plenty fast!
JB: No it isn't.
BD: That'll sell – that'll sell (snaps fingers) just like that – ten million in a week! Weeeeeeelllll! (plays first note on piano)
JB: What are you trying to do man, coming in with 'weeelll' like that? I mean –
BD: Well that's for the new song and I'm starting another one.

[1958 Tape fades out.]
[Music – Elvis singing "Blue Moon" – blends into the 1958 Tape of Bob Dylan and John Bucklen singing "We Belong Together".]

BD: Yeah, ah, Ricky Nelson. Now Ricky Nelson's another one of these guys. See Ricky Nelson, Ricky Nelson -
JB: Ricky Nelson is out of the question.
BD: Well he copies Elvis Presley! Yeaah, it's perfectly...
JB: He can't do like Elvis Presley.
BD: Well he can't sing at all, Ricky Nelson. So we may as well forget him. See I mean – I mean, ya know when you hear music like The Diamonds. For instance The Diamonds are really cool, they're out on the street really popular, really record [?], you know. So they're popular big stars but where, where do they get all the songs? You know they get all their songs, they get all their songs from little groups. They copy all the little groups. Same thing with Elvis Presley. Elvis Presley, who did he copy? He copied Clyde McPhatter, he copied Little Richard...
JB: Wait a minute, wait a minute!
BD: ...he copied the Drifters
JB: Wait a minute, name, name, name four songs that Elvis Presley's copied from those, from those little groups.
BD: He copied all the Richard songs -
JB: Like what? –
BD: "Rip It Up," "Long Tall Sally," "Ready Teddy," err – what's the other one...

JB: "Money Honey"?
BD: No, "Money Honey" he copied from Clyde McPhatter. He copied "I Was The One" – he copied that from the Coasters. He copied, ah, "I Gotta Woman" from Ray Charles.
JB: Er, listen that song was written for him.

[1958 Tape fades out.]

BD: Rhythm and Blues... When you hear a song like some good Rhythm and Blues song you wanna cry when you hear one of those songs.

Bob Dylan's postcard home

Source: ISIS #85, 6-7/99, p. 5; in: TWM #1458(4239)

On 28 April 1961, Bob Dylan sent a postcard of the United Nations Secretarial Building from New York to his parents. The message was as follows:

Dear Everybody – I've finished my time at Folk City now I am at the Gaslight in New York, too. My union costs were $128.00. It came out of my pay at Folk City. I am now making $100.00 a week for five nights playing – that's not bad, considering that three months ago I was unknown. I've already played the top place in New York for folk music... I will call home Sunday at Aunt Irene's house. I don't know if I can come home then (or when I expect to now)... I am clean and I am brushing my teeth. Say hello to everybody for me. Love, Bob

The postcard was addressed to Dylan's parents, c/o Uncle Vernon Stone in Las Vegas, whom Abe and Beatty were visiting at the time

October 1961
Billy James Interview, New York City, New York

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke pp. 1-6.

Supposedly, but disputably so, the very first Bob Dylan interview ever, conducted by Billy James (BJ) of Columbia Records in order to get information for the sleeve of Dylan's first album and for general promotional purposes. James, who was to become a close friend and adviser to Dylan in the early years and who appeared with Dylan at many press conferences was given the job of promoting Columbia's new rising star. James recalls the interview thus:

> "Hammond called me and said: 'Billy, I have a marvelous boy in the studio right now. Do you have a moment to come up? I knew that it was happening... right there! He had such an incredible blend of influences, and presented them with conviction. Bobby was reluctant to talk about his past. I had encountered that often before. I was really startled to hear of all the places he had been to. He spoke with knowledge of all those places, not like the traveling salesman who only knows the inside of his hotel room."

I have tried to reconstruct the interview, as far as possible, using the circulating tape (which is in poor quality and very fragmented), two articles by Barry Miles (New Musical Express 24 April 1976; 2 July 1977) the Miles book — In His Own Words and by reference to Stephen Pickering's Praxis One. In the first NME article Miles gives an interview date of August 1961 which he changes to October 1961 in the second NME article: Heylin gives a date of November of that year. Since Dylan didn't sign to CBS until October 26th 1961, the interview is most unlikely to have been before then and a suggested date based on available evidence is late October – early November

BD: Well let me say that I was born in Duluth, Minnesota – give that a little plug. That's where I was born and uh, out in the Midwest most of my life. Well, about three–quarters of my life around the Midwest and one quarter around the southwest – New Mexico. But then I lived in Kansas – Marysville, Kansas and, uh, Sioux Falls, South Dakota. I bounced around a lot as a kid.

BJ: Was that your choice?

BD: It was my choice partly. Partly it wasn't. I ran away a lot – stuff like that. I'd rather say just that.

BJ: When was the first time you ran away as you put it?

BD: I took off when I was in New Mexico. I lived in Gallup, New Mexico.

BJ: How old were you then?

BD: Uh, about seven. Seven – eight – something like that. For the most part my base has been in upper – way upper – Minnesota. Almost to the border. Can I mention the town? Hibbing, Minnesota – that's a mining town – lumber town. I was there off and on ever since I was about seven to seventeen.

BJ: You were in Gallup when you were seven and you took off? Were you alone?

BD: Yeah, well, I was with a carnival when I was about thirteen and I used to travel with a carnival – all kinds of shows.

BJ: Where did you go with the carnivals?

BD: All around the Midwest. Uh, Gallup, New Mexico, then to Texas, and then... Lived in Gallup, New Mexico and...

BJ: How far did you get when you were seven and left Gallup?

BD: Oh... Well, I was with an uncle and, uh, I was in Texas, then Kansas. But this stuff you see, I can't really remember so hot. All I remember is basic – base things. Where I could, uh, just base things, sort of like...

BJ: Did you go to school much?

BD: Yeah, I went to school. I graduated. I graduated from high school – that's where I graduated – Hibbing.

BJ: I see. Did you go to high school for four years in Hibbing?

BD: Well, I graduated. I skipped a grade.

BJ: How long were you with the carnival?

BD: I was with the carnival for a long time every year. I was with the carnival summers and even part–ways into the winters.

BJ: What did you do?

BD: Uh, roustabout. I sung around. I didn't sing for any money but I learned a lot of songs in the carnival. Lot of songs that people are singing today I learned in that carnival. That's why I know all these songs they do now – at least a folk song – I've heard a version of it or something like it before.

BJ: And you have a good memory?

BD: Yeah. I guess I've memorized a lot of what I've heard – things I can remember back. Well, I write a lot of songs and I forget them. As soon as after I write them or sing them out loud – to myself or something – and then I forget 'em. But a lot of times when I take the time to write them down I usually sing 'em once in a while. I just wrote a new song, about oh, last week about New York. I wish I would have recorded it. Some people are singing it now at the Blue Angel: Ian and Sylvia. I taught it to Ian.

BJ: What made you start singing?

BD: Uh, well, I just did it you know. It was a natural thing to do. I started a long time ago too. I started singing after I started writing. I started that when I was about ten. Ten or eleven – and started out just country and western – Hank Williams, Lefty Frizzell kind of things. Hank Williams had just about, had just died and I started playing sometime around there.

BJ: Was he one of your first influences?

BD: Yeah, I sang – I tried to sing everything he would sing.

BJ: What other influences have you had?

BD: Oh... I've had a lot of people that I tried to do things the way that they did. Ah, as it stands now, there's influence that maybe I've taken. I don't really know the extent of the influence that they have on what I do. Of Hank, Hank Williams was the first influence I would think. I guess for a longer period of time than anybody else influenced. Uh, nobody influenced what I wrote at that age because I didn't really see anything that anybody wrote.

BJ: Well, let's put it this way, did you have any idols when you first started writing?

BD: Yeah, well, sure, sure. Well not when I started writing, when I was singing. I never sang what I wrote until I got to be about eighteen or nineteen. I wrote songs when I was younger, fifteen, but they were songs. I wrote those. I never sang anything which I wanted to write. Y'understand? The songs I wrote at that age were just four chords rhythm and blues songs. Based on things that the Diamonds would sing, or the Crewcuts, or groups like this, the uh, the, you know, In The Still Of The Night kinda songs, you know. But I don't know, you know, whatever hit me.

BJ: What are your earliest memories of singing?

BD: Well, I've been singing for an awful long time. First guitar I ever had was a very old guitar and the strings were about an inch from the keyboard. That's why I use a flat pick when I play now – and I never got unused to using that flat pick – because I could never get those strings. They were heavy strings and my fingers hurt.

BJ: How old were you?

BD: About ten.

BJ: Who gave it to you?

BD: Down at uh, uh... I got it in Chicago on the South Side. I think from a street singer. I didn't get it from him, I got it from a friend of his – Aravella Grey. He was the singer and, uh, let's see – there's Sioux Falls, South Dakota. I learned a lot of songs there. I learned – not a lot, but I learned. I didn't learn songs, I just learned ways of singing. I learned the way of singing I do. I didn't really learn so many songs. There was this fellow there on a farm right in Sioux Falls, South Dakota – a little bit out – played autoharp. And he was just a farmhand there. He was from Kansas. I learned just ways of singing from people like that. But I never really heard any other way. I played piano when I was seventeen. I played piano for this rock n' roll singer. His name is Bobby Vee and he's a big star now, I guess.

BJ: Now where was this?

BD: That was in Fargo, North Dakota. Then we went all around the Midwest. Went to Wisconsin, Iowa, toured around there and then I left.

BJ: How long were you with him?

BD: I was with him for about, uh, every night – just about every night – for about a month or two. And then as soon as I left him he got on another recording label and then I saw his picture in big picture magazines and that kind of stuff not too long after that. So that was sort of a disappointment. But I always figured that – I just like to feel that I know where I'm at. Because if I know where I'm at, then I figure I got anybody beat. Because then if nothing happens that I expect to, then if I don't get some girl that I like, or if I don't get something like that, I always just figure that if I know where I'm at, then nothing will hurt me and then I'll never be disappointed. Then if something comes up, you know, then it's for the good. I mean, it's not really pessimistic or anything like that, but it's just that I like to feel that I know where I'm at.

BJ: Do you?

BD: Yeah, pretty sure I do. I'm at the stage now where I never thought I could sort of look back and see something but I knew I could sing better than all those people that are singing now. And I knew that I could sing the same songs much better if only I had the chance to and I'm just getting that chance to in New York. I had the chance to around the country – but I can't reach as many people around the country. And I've had the chance just breaking for me now in New York.

BD: Because my idol is really – like when I'm even on the stage – and not even on stage – my biggest idol goin' all through my head all the time is Charlie Chaplin. And, uh, it's, uh, well, it takes a while to explain it but I'd say he's one of the men!

BJ: When did you first see Chaplin?

BD: Ah, I seen some of his films. I just sort of knew who he was and that kind of stuff. Vaudeville type of thing. Will Rogers. And I never really met anything — I never really came across anything until... I never came across... I never lived in a big city until I lived in New York and, uh, I don't think it's got the best of me. At least I know it hasn't got the better part of me. In fact I don't think it's touched... It might've touched me a little bit. In fact it has touched me a little bit. But I never lived in a city that was more than 15,000 people and there's an awful lot of difficulty here...

Tape breaks.

BD: (Talking about first arriving in New York City) ...and I was very stupid at the time. I was with a friend of mine, and I played, and they flipped, and I figured...

BJ: Which Café?

BD: Café Wha. I didn't know anything. They were having a hootenanny and that kind of stuff and I asked if they would give me some money to play, and he looked at me and he said he would. "I'll give you a dollar." So he gave me a dollar to play in the hootenanny. No, in fact, it came to a dollar–fifty. And I played there and they flipped. They really did. I figured if they liked me so much that maybe someone would have a place to stay that night 'cause I didn't have a place to stay that night. So I asked from the stage and about four hands went up. So my buddy and I, we sort of went and checked 'em all and picked out a fellow. He was with a girl. And my buddy says to me, "You don't look so hot", that's what he said. He said, "He looks pretty gay", (James laughs). And I said, uh, I didn't really know anything about that kind of stuff. Well I knew, anyway, he was with a girl. And so we went up with him and the girl got off at 34th Street and we got off at 42nd street (Dylan laughs). Well, we went in a bar first before we went to find a place to stay and we met his friend Dora. Dora was his friend who stayed with him. And we all went to a party. And that was my first night in New York.

I sense they're liking me. Maybe not the music so much. Maybe they don't even like the music but I feel like, if they saw me in the street or playing someplace, I feel like they wouldn't be so friendly.

I like the land. The people are strange in the West. I like some of the people. Don't like some of the people. Hard, which I never could see. Very hard people. And down South it's worse than that. I can't stand city people from the South. I hate... I can't stand, anywhere they're thinking...

Tape breaks

BD: I'm not a folk singer. I just sing a certain place, that's all. And...
BJ: Is Woody a folk singer?
BD: Woody was a folk singer. Woody was a folk singer.
BJ: Why do you say you're not?
BD: Ah, Woody was a folk singer to the point. Woody was a glorified folk singer. Woody was a man that went back... Don't print this on the record.
BJ: No man, no.
BD: Well, you see, Woody was a man who dwelled on a simpleness because he was getting attention for it...

Tape breaks.

BD: I play the piano. I used to play the piano. I used to play great piano, very great. I used to play piano like Little Richard stuff only an octave higher. And everything came out... He played, he had a big mistake. His records were great records but could've been greater records. His mistake was he played too low. If he had played high everything would have compensated. Do you listen to Little Richard?
BJ: No.
BD: Well, Little Richard's something else. He's a preacher now. But I sort of played the piano in his style. And I played everything high and amplified it.

October 1961
Izzy Young Notebooks, Folklore Center, New York City, NY

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 971-977.

Izzy Young, proprietor of the Folklore Center at 110 MacDougal Street in New York City's Greenwich Village, kept copious notes of most of what went on around him. Some of those entries, particularly around October 1961, provide details of discussions with Bob Dylan. Some of this is "interview" material, carefully written down by Young and checked by Dylan, especially that part which would eventually appear as program notes for Bob's first concert on November 4, 1961. Other entries are just reasonably accurate paraphrasing of what Dylan had to say.

Notebook entry for October 20, 1961 and used for the Carnegie Recital Hall program.

Bob Dylan was born in Duluth, Minnesota in 1941. He was raised in Gallup, NM and before he came to New York earlier this year he lived in Iowa, South Dakota, North Dakota and Kansas. He started playing carnivals at the age of fourteen, accompanying himself on guitar and piano. He picked up harmonica about two years ago.

The University of Minnesota gave him a scholarship. He went there for some five months, attended a dozen lectures and then left. He learned many blues songs from a Chicago street singer named Arvella Gray. He also met a singer – Mance Lipscomb – from the Brazos River country of Texas, through a grandson that sang rock and roll. He listened a lot to Lipscomb and he heard Woody Guthrie's album of Dust Bowl ballads in South Dakota. In fact Bob Dylan has sung old jazz songs, sentimental cowboy songs and Top 40 hit parade stuff. He was always interested in singers and didn't know the term 'folk music' until he came to New York.

"It has to be called a name so they call it folk music. Very few people sing that way and it's being taken over by people who don't sing that way. It's all right but don't call it folk music. Stuff I do is nearer to folk music. Now I don't want to make a lot of money, want to get along. I want to reach more people and have a chance to sing the kind of music I sing. People have to be ready and have seen me once already. People often say first time that it isn't folk music. My songs aren't easy to listen to. My favorite singers are Dave van Ronk, Jack Elliott, Peter Stampfel, Jim Kweskin and Rick von Schmidt. I can offer songs that tell something of this America, no foreign songs. The songs of this land that aren't offered over TV and radio and very few records."

"Groups are easy to be in. I've always learned the hard way. I will now, too. I dress the way I do because I want to dress this way and not because it is cheaper or easier."

"I started writing my songs about four or five years ago. First song was to Brigitte Bardot, for piano. Thought if I wrote the song I'd sing it to her one day. Never met her. I've written some Hillbilly songs that Carl Perkins from Nashville sings. I write talking blues on topical things. California Brown-Eyed Baby has caught on. Noel Stookey gave me the idea for the Bear Mountain Song and I wrote it overnight but I wasn't there. Never sing it the same way twice because I never wrote it down."

"No one is really influencing me now – but actually everything does. Can't think of anyone in particular now."

Notebook entry for October 23

Played piano with Bobby Vee – would have been a millionaire if I'd stayed with him. Played piano Michigan Northwest to Montana. Sang for one dollar a day at Cafe Wha?, playing piano with Fred Neil. Bored stiff. It was warm and stayed a whole winter. Went to see Raisin' in the Sun – Lou Gosset was in it. Dead Man's Hand or Aces and Eights. I believe in them. Believe in cards. Play a lot of cards. It's time to cash in when you get Aces and Eights. The other things I believe in are logical – the length of ones hair – less hair on the head more hair inside the head & vice versa. Crew cut all hair cluttering around the brain. Let my hair grow long to be wise and free to think. I have no religion. Tried a bunch of different religions. Churches are divided. Can't make up their minds neither can I. Never seen a God – can't say till I see one...

Got a free ride to NY – came to see Woody Guthrie – Came to the Folklore Center -girl playing with banjo (Tony Mendell). O God, this is it, this is NY. Everyone's playing banjo faster than I've been playing guitar. Couldn't really play with them. Used to see Woody whenever I had enough money. Met him once before in California before I was really playing – think Jack Elliott was with him. I think Billy Faier was there, too. I was in Carmel, California – doing nothing. During the summer. Woody impressed me. Always made a point to see him again. Wrote a song to Woody in February of this year. Was going to sing all Woody songs – Jack and Cisco came out. Woody carries the paper I wrote the song on. Woody likes to hear his own songs. Woody likes my songs.

Haven't sung anything really funny. Woody doesn't like Joan Baez, or the Kingston Trio – Baez for her voice is too pretty and Trio because they can't be understood.

Sort of like NY, don't know really. I like to walk around, just walk around. Like to ride motorcycle – was a racer in North and South Dakota – Minnesota.

First guitar I had strings were 2 inches away from the board – had a flat pick but couldn't play it. Got a Martin for a present. 6 or 7 years. No one ever taught me to play guitar or harmonica, or piano. Used to play sort of boogy woogyish type of stuff, played with rock n' roll songs. Never knew the names of the songs, but 12 bar blues, played along with them. A few coffee houses refused to let me play when I came to NY. Bob Shelton helped by writing an article – talked around – someone from Elektra came down but nothing happened. Bob Shelton been like a friend for a long time. Friends are pretty hard to come by in NY. Dave Van Ronk has helped me along in card games because he's always losing. I've been with Jack – we have an Island upstate NY – we saw the Island out in the lake – we named the Island Delliott Isle and swam back. Jack hasn't taught me any songs. Jack doesn't know that many songs. He's had lots of chances. I went out to the Gleasons and stayed out there for a while in East Orange. They have a lot of tapes – his VD songs. Learned a bunch of those – sung them to Woody. Should get the rest from Harold Leventhal.

Met Jesse Fuller in Denver at the Exodus. I was playing in a stripper place. The Gilded Garter. Central City, a little mining town. Came down to Denver 2 summers ago – Jesse was playing downstairs. Upstairs was Don Crawford. Learned the way he does songs – mixed his style in with mine at the time. Before that there was a farmhand in Sioux Falls, S. D. who played the autoharp. Picked up his way of singing (Wilbur, never knew his last name).

Cowboy styles I learned from real cowboys. Can't remember their names. Met some in Cheyenne. Cowboys nowadays go to Cowboy movies and sit there and criticize. Wear their hat this way or that – pick up their way of walking from the movie. Some of them. In Central City Denver – the Tropics – played 20 minutes, strippers worked for 40 minutes with rock n' roll band. I'd play for 20 minutes again. Never stopped. One night I was about ready to strip myself. Only lasted a week and a half. Worst place I ever played. A full drag.

I have different ideas about folk music now. There's been no one around to cut records like the old Leadbelly, Houston & Guthrie. There are young people that are singing like that, but are being held back by commercial singers. People who have radio programs don't play. Jim Kweskin, Luke Faust aren't appreciated by enough people. Folkways is the only company that would record such stuff. Released Bill McAdoo's Can't Let Little Children Starve To Death. Liked title of song but hadn't heard it.

Went up to Folkways. I had written some songs. I says "Howdy, I've written some songs. Would you publish some songs" – wouldn't even look at them. I heard Folkways was good. Irwin Silber didn't even talk to me. Never got to see Moe Asch. They just about said "Go" and I heard that Sing Out! was supposed to be helpful and friendly. Big heart. Charitable. I thought it was the wrong place and Sing Out! was on the door. Whoever told me that was wrong. It seems ironic I'm on a big label. The article came out on Thursday night – Bruce Langhorne and I backed up by Carolyn Hester. Showed the article to John Hammond – Come in and see me. I did. And he is recording me. He asked me what I do. I've got about 20 songs I want to record. Some stuff I've written. Some stuff I've discovered and some stuff I stole. That's about it.

Used to see girls from the Bronx, at Chicago, Antioch, with their gutstring guitars, singing Pastures of Plenty, no lipstick, Brotherhood songs. Struck me funny, not clowns, opened up a whole new world of people. I like the NY kind of girl now. Can't remember what the old kind was like. Can always tell a New Yorker out of town – want everyone to know they're from NY. I've seen it happen – first 4 or 5 days people just stare at me. Down South it's bad to say you're from NYC.

We played the new Bill McAdoo recording on Folkways. Gonna Walk And Talk For My Freedom with Pete Seeger on banjo. Beatniks: 10 years ago a guy would get on a bus with a beard, long sideburns, a hat and people would say "look at the Rabbi". Some guy gets on a bus today. The same people say "look at the Beatnik". Played the Fifth Avenue Hotel for the Kiwanis Club. Got job through Kevin Krown – for no money (I don't like the McAdoo Record). A lot of different acts that night -dressed up like a clown – when someone would sing two clowns would perform. Jack just dropped in. Couldn't hear myself- a clown rolled up to pinch my cheek – kicked him in the nuts and no one saw. Rest of the clowns left me alone. Made Kevin Krown buy me 10 drinks. Met Krown in Denver, came through Chicago – never got back 75 cents owed him but stayed at his place.

OK but don't care for classical music. Don't go for any foreign music. I really like Irish music and Scottish music, too. Colleges are the best audiences, much better than nightclubs. NY is the best place for music.

School was too – lived on the Mississippi River – about 10 feet away under a great bridge. I took some theater course. Said I had to take Science. Average credits is about 12 – you can take 17 to 20. I enrolled with 26 credits. Narrowed it down to 20. Then down to 9. Couldn't even make that. Carnivals and fraternities – so much crap. So much phooey stuff. You might as well get out and live with some other people. A big hoax. Flunked out of anthropology – read a little, went to see the movies. One time I flunked out of English for teacher said I couldn't talk. Poetry we had to read, had to think about it for a long time. Poem should reach as many people as possible. I spent more time in Kansas City about 400 miles away. A girl friend was there. Went to High School in Upper Minnesota (Hibbing) a nothing little town.

Fargo in North Dakota – a lumberjack and mining town. Used to hop train. Big open pit. Lots of strikes there, lots of political stuff, a real mining town.

It's easy to criticize big money makers like Belafonte, Kingston Trio. Stuff he does is really like a popular singer – criticized by Jazz, Folk and Calypso people and he's making all the money. Won't criticize him until he sings one of my songs but then he'll make a lot of money for me. I liked Belafonte on the TV show.

Odetta: her and frustrated show singers – folk music is wide open for good voices. Instead of starting out at the bottom in Opera or Show or Jazz they start at the top in folk music.

Logan English – is one guy that if I don't have to see him – great – but the guy is just, Christ, everytime I see him, his failure, singing folk music for there is, still trying. Logan's singing is one big bash of phooey. He's terrible. Lots of people sing simple -but Logan dwells on this – but no better – doesn't have it. Kills him but he sings Jimmy Rodgers – Peter LaFarge is a great song writer.

Bruce Langhorne is great. Was at a party once, playing. Let me have a guitar, didn't have much fingers. I can't laugh. Read Bound for Glory twice. Book should he taught to College kids – his poetry should be taught in English classes.

Got a bad deal from Brother John Sellers.

Highway 77 – McKinley's bar in Kansas to the 5th Avenue Hotel in NYC.

We put on John Jacob Nile's new double record. I like him. Too much. Sort of. Niles is really great. I think he's a genius.

Notebook entry for Feb, 1, 1962

Wrote a song the other night Ballad of Emmett Till. After I wrote it someone said another song was written but not like it. I wrote it for CORE – I'm playing it Feb. 23. I think it's the best thing I've ever written. Only song I play with a capo. Stole the melody from Len Chandler – a song he wrote about a Colorado busdriver.

"born a black skinned boy and he was born to die"

"just a reminder to remind your fellow men that this kind of thing still lives today in the ghost robed Klu Klux Klan"

I bought an apartment cost 350 dollars. Rent is 80 dollars. 161 W. 4th St, c/o Walker. Getting some money from Columbia. I'm supposed to be making all kinds of money. I seem, I don't play guitar if I don't feel like playing. I'd rather get drunk. I hate coffeehouses to play at. People come down to see freaks. Sometimes I'm in a bad mood. I don't like the idea too much. Carnival was different for I was with the same people. Entertainers in coffeehouses just don't have that togetherness.

Hope to stay in NY for a while. Might go down to New Orleans for the Mardi Gras. I like New York. At one time I said – if it wasn't for New York I'd move there. And I sort of like the town.

42nd St. That's about all. I went to Brooklyn Hospital. Seeing him steady for a year. I met him when I was thirteen. He likes my songs. You have to see the notes by Stacey Williams (A pseudonym used by Bob Shelton when writing liner notes). Never figured I'd play with Belafonte. I practice piano at Bob's house. Next album I'll play piano, guitar and harmonica. Writing a song called The Death of Robert Johnson. Columbia's (recordings are: ed.) the greatest of his work. Don't like to go up to John Hammond. Ivy League kids treat me like a king. At first I liked it. It gets sickening after a while. I took Len Chandler just to see what would happen. He couldn't believe it. Leed's book comes out in April with 13 songs, 3 arrangements. Hammond isn't a manager – more an advisor. I'm sort of disconnecting myself from the folk music scene. I've got a lot of friends in for that play. Too many guys want to make a big entertainment out of it with jazz and comedians.

30 year old guy Buffalo Bill – looks older. Why isn't he recorded. Moe Asch has a tape – "We've got guys from the South" – almost saying "he's not dead yet". Gil Turner brought the tape to him. Curious to know how long the New Lost City Ramblers stayed at the Blue Angel.

Can't see the future. I hate to think about it. It's a drag to think about it.

How could anyone notice if I were drunk. I'm inconspicuous.

Notebook entry for February 17, 1962

Let Me Die In My Footsteps* written while Gil Turner and I were in Toronto in Dec. 1961. I set out to say something about fallout and bomb-testing but I didn't want it to be a slogan song. Too many of the protest songs are bad music. Exception being Which Side Are You On. Most of the mining songs are good. Especially the bomb songs – usually awkward and with bad music. Which takes a stand – no beating around the bush.

Came to NYC in 1960 – back to Oklahoma several times. Disastrous trip to California – no one liked me. Felt pretty low when I left. More than 20 songs.

Notebook entry for Feb. 22, 1962

Jesse Fuller – April 20, 21, 22 – at Ann Arbor. Just me and Jesse Fuller. Concert at Goddard College. Billy James from Columbia Records doesn't want me to sign for too many things so as not to interfere with their plans until the record comes out. Left my life there. Waiting for my book to come out – more than the record. Rambling Gambling Willy is in the book. Bear Mountain. Reminiscence Blues. Stand on the Highway. Poor Boy Blues. Talking NY. Song to Woody Guthrie.

I wanted to write a song about 1 and a half years ago on Fallout Shelters to tune So Long It's Been Good To Know You. Song I wrote isn't like the rest of them.

Carolyn Hester's record will be out in May or next September. Mine is coming out in two weeks and she recorded two months before me.

Emie Marrs is writing songs all over the place. I never even looked at them. To tell you the truth, except a few. They're pretty good, I guess.

I like Johnny Cash's songs. Because he's not trying to cover up. Writes real stuff. He writes a lot of songs. I think Woody Guthrie wrote better songs. I've seen some songs he never recorded.

Favorite Woody Guthrie Songs ? Jack Hammar John. At the Mound of Your Grave. Slip Knot. Hard Traveling. I like, them all really. Except some of them are absurd. Dirty Overalls that's really good.

I just pick the melody out of the air sometimes.

Prestige Records, one of their guys – if Columbia doesn't – give me a call.

Folkways asked me for contemporary songs for an album of my own songs.

Bill McAdoo's albums are terrible. Writes songs to hold up a banner. He's just another Leon Bibb – same kind of voice. Don't think there's anything traditional about it. He's a nice guy though.

Alan Lomax? I like him. He stuck around one night to hear me sing at the Bitter End. Ed McCurdy was MC. There was not time. I sang along with Bessy Jones at his house. We were sitting around eating apples.

Sure wish Cisco Houston was still alive. I really didn't know him. I liked him because he was real, just a singer.

Heard Bonny Dobson last night. She's OK, I guess. I heard Big Joe Williams when I was 9 or 10, in Chicago. I really didn't play so much. I just followed him around. I sung then. I got a cousin living in Chicago. He lives on the South Side. Funny thing. Big Joe Williams remembers it.

(After writing some lyrics about the Folklore Center.)

Good songwriter? I think Paul Anka is the worst songwriter. Saw some of his songs in the hit-parade book. I think Johnny Cash is the best songwriter.

Len Chandler – Ian and Sylvia have picked up some songs.

Strange Rain*? I don't understand it. Umbrella? Why can't he say – don't shoot off those bombs. You ought to go to Nevada where all the stuff is going on. Go out there – you'll find some strange rain. I think dentists and scientists are together on this. How can you like a song you can't understand? In a foreign language. But this is our language. I should be able to understand it. Said he wouldn't understand it if I didn't explain.

Notebook entry for March 14th, 1962

Life and Death of Don White*. Actually I wrote it a long time ago. I just finished it up. What's the story of the song? I'll sing it for you. Not a bunch of people suffering. One person. So it's justified. He was a common guy. No martyr or anything like that. But he had a right to be in an institution when he asked.

PM East (A New York weekly) in two weeks. No contract with Leeds exclusively. If I wrote to sell, I could do 20 a day. I'm just not. Can't see anything in it. Some of the songs passed off as songs! These are contemporary songs.

Oscar Brand Show, WNYC Radio, New York City, New York

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke pp. 7-8

According to Izzy Young's notebooks for 25th October 1961, he recalls "Oscar Brand walked into the store and I got Dylan on his programme this Sunday". Accordingly, Dylan appeared on Brand's WNYC Radio show Folksong Festival on October 29th, starting at 6 o'clock in the evening. This was his first ever solo radio spot. And, back to Izzy Young:

> "...and he sang two songs, his own songs and he was mumbling. You couldn't understand 'em. I was very embarrassed and Oscar was embarrassed. But, anyway, he put him on the radio."

Taken from tape source.

OB: Now, November the 4th, Saturday, Bob Dylan will be singing at the Carnegie Chapter Hall and that should be a very eventful occasion. Bob was born in Duluth, Minnesota but, uh, Bob, you weren't raised in Duluth, were you?
BD: I was raised in Gallup, New Mexico.
OB: Do you get many songs there?
BD: They gotta lot of cowboy songs there, Indian songs, carnival songs, that Vaudeville kinda stuff.
OB: Now where do you get your carnival songs from?
BD: Ah! People in the carnival.
OB: Did you travel with it or did you watch the carnival?
BD: I traveled with the carnival when I was about thirteen years old.
OB: For how long?
BD: All the way up to I was nineteen. Every year, off and on, I joined different carnivals.
OB: Well I'd like to hear one of the kinds of music that you've been singing and I know you've been doing quite well and I know you'll be singing at the Carnegie Chapter Hall. Do you wanna pick something out?
BD: Well, I'll pick out a carnival song that I learned... that I wrote there. Do you wanna hear one of them ?

Sally Gal plays

OB: Thank you Bob Dylan for Sally Gal and we'll expect you back before the end of tonights, Folksong Festival.

Intermission

OB: I'm Oscar Brand and I'm here at WNYC, New York. Now let's return to our guest this evening. His name is Bob Dylan and November 4th he will be at Carnegie Chapter Hall in a very exciting concert of songs that he's collected since his first days when he was born in Minnesota and then he went down to the South West, he traveled around the country with carnivals and as we heard earlier, he's collected a lot of many songs from many people. Bob, I know that that means when you travel that much that you hear a lot of songs but doesn't it also means... mean that you forget a lot of songs that way?
BD: Oh yeah, I learned... I forgot quite a few, I guess, and once when I forget them I usually heard the name of them and looked them up in some book and learned them again.
OB: Oh! Can you read music?

BD: No, I can't, but this here songs a good example. I learned it from a farmer in South Dakota and he played the autoharp. His name is Wilbur. Met him outside of Sioux Falls when I was there visiting people and him, and I heard him do it. I was looking through a book one time, I saw the same song and I remembered the way he did it so – this is the song.

The Girl I Left Behind plays

OB: Thank you very much Bob Dylan and very best of luck on your concert, November 4th at Carnegie Chapter Hall on which I know, that as your audience realizes, there'll be a lot of exciting material, new and beautifully presented. And thanks very much Israel Young and the Folklore Centre for bringing Bob Dylan and for sponsoring the concert he's going to have too.

"Bob Dylan" LP. liner notes

Source: Bob Dylan LP. liner notes (62022), also reprinted in the remastered CD (519891 2)

CBS is proud to introduce a major new figure in American folk music—Bob Dylan.

Excitement has been running high since the young man with a guitar ambled into a recording studio for two sessions in November, 1961. For at only 20, Dylan is the most unusual new talent in American folk music.

His talent takes many forms. He is one of the most compelling white blues singers ever recorded. He is a songwriter of exceptional facility and cleverness. He is an uncommonly skillful guitar player and harmonica player.

In less than one year in New York, Bob Dylan has thrown the folk crowd into an uproar. Ardent fans have been shouting his praises. Devotees have found in him the image of a singing rebel, a musical Chaplin tramp, a young Woody Guthrie, or a composite of some of the best country blues singers.

A good deal of Dylan's steel-string guitar work runs strongly in the blues vein, although he will vary it with country configurations, Merle Travis picking and other methods. Sometimes he frets his instrument with the back of a kitchen knife or even a metal lipstick holder, giving it the clangy virility of the primitive country blues men. His pungent, driving, witty harmonica is sometimes used in the manner of Walter Jacobs, who plays with the Muddy Waters' band in Chicago, or the evocative manner of Sonny Terry.

Another strong influence on Bob Dylan was not a musician primarily, although he has written music, but a comedian—Charlie Chaplin. After seeing many Chaplin films, Dylan found himself beginning to pick up some of the gestures of the classic tramp of silent films. Now as he appears on the stage in a humourous number, you can see Dylan nervously tapping his hat, adjusting it, using it as a prop, almost leaning on it, as the Chaplin tramp did before him.

Yet despite his comic flair, Bob Dylan has, for one so young, a curious preoccupation with songs about death. Although he is rarely inarticulate, Dylan can't explain the attraction of these songs, beyond the power and emotional wallop they give him, and which he passes on to his listeners. It may be that three years ago, when a serious illness struck him, that he got an indelible insight into what those death-haunted blues men were singing about.

His Life and Times

Bob Dylan was born in Duluth, Minnesota, on May 24, 1941. After living briefly in Sioux Falls, South Dakota, and Gallup, New Mexico, he graduated from high school in Hibbing, Minnesota "way up by the Canadian border."

For six troubled months, Bob attended the University of Minnesota on a scholarship. But like so many of the restless, questing students of his generation, the formal confines of college couldn't hold him.

"I didn't agree with school," he says. "I flunked out. I read a lot, but not the required readings."

He remembers staying up all night plowing through the philosophy of Kant instead of reading Living With the Birds for a science course.

"Mostly," he summarizes his college days, "I couldn't stay in one place long enough."

Bob Dylan first went East in February, 1961. His destination: the Greystone Hospital in New Jersey. His purpose: to visit the long-ailing Woody Guthrie, singer, ballad-maker and poet. It was the beginning of a deep friendship between the two. Although they were separated by thirty years and two generations, they were united by a love of music, a kindred sense of humour and a common view toward the world.

The young man from the provinces began to make friends quickly in New York, all the while continuing, as he has since he was ten, to assimilate musical ideas from everyone he met, every record he heard. He fell in with Dave Van Ronk and Jack Elliott, two of the most dedicated musicians then playing in Greenwich Village, and swapped songs, ideas and stylistic conceptions with them. He played at the Gaslight Coffee-house, and in April, 1961, appeared opposite John Lee Hooker, the blues singer, at Gerde's Folk City. Word of Dylan's talent began to grow, but in the surcharged atmosphere of rivalry that has crept into the folk-music world, so did envy. His Talkin' New York is a musical comment on his reception in New York.

Recalling his first professional music job, Bob says:

"I never thought I would shoot lightning through the sky in the entertainment world."

In 1959, in Central City, Colorado, he had that first job, in a rough and tumble striptease joint.

"I was onstage for just a few minutes with my folky songs. Then the strippers would come on. The crowd would yell for more stripping, but they went off, and I'd come bouncing back with my folky songs. As the night got longer, the air got heavier, the audience got drunker and nastier, and I got sicker and finally I got fired."

Bob Dylan started to sing and play guitar when he was ten. Five to six years later he wrote his first song, dedicated to Brigitte Bardot. All the time, he listened to everything with both ears—Hank Williams, the late Jimmie Rodgers, Jelly Roll Morton, Woody Guthrie, Carl Perkins, early Elvis Presley. A meeting with Mance Lipscomb, Texas songster, left its mark on his work, as did the blues recordings of Rabbit Brown and Big Joe Williams. He speaks worshipfully of the sense of pace and timing the great blues men had, and it has become a trademark of his work already. His speed at assimilating new styles and digesting them is not the least startling thing about Bob Dylan.

The future:

"I just want to keep on singing and writing songs like I am doing now. I just want to get along. I don't think about making a million dollars. If I had a lot of money what would I do?" he asked himself, closed his eyes, shifted the hat on his head and smiled:

"I would buy a couple of motorcycles, a few air-conditioners and four or five couches."

His Songs

The number that opens this album, You're No Good, was learned from Jesse Fuller, the West Coast singer. Its vaudeville flair and exaggeration are used to heighten the mock anger of the lyrics.

Talkin' New York is a diary note set to music. In May, 1961, Dylan started to hitch-hike West, not overwhelmingly pleased at what he had seen and experienced in New York. At a truck stop along the highway he started to scribble down a few impressions of the city he left behind. They were comic, but tinged with a certain sarcastic bite, very much in the Guthrie vein.

Dylan had never sung In My Time of Dyin' prior to this recording session. He does not recall where he first heard it. The guitar is fretted with the lipstick holder he borrowed from his girl, Susie Rotolo, who sat devotedly and wide-eyed through the recording session.

Man of Constant Sorrow is a traditional Southern mountain folk song of considerable popularity and age, but probably never sung quite in this fashion before.

Fixin' to Die, which echoes the spirit and some of the words of In My Time of Dyin', was learned from an old recording of Bukka White.

A traditional Scottish song is the bare bones on which Dylan hangs Pretty Peggy-O. But the song has lost its burr and acquired instead a Texas accent, and a few new verses and fillips by the singer.

A Diesel-tempoed Highway 51 is of a type sung by the Everly Brothers, partially rewritten by Dylan. His guitar is tuned to an open tuning and features a particularly compelling vamping figure. Similarly uptempo is his version of Gospel Plow, which turns the old spiritual into a virtually new song.

Ric Von Schmidt, a young artist and blues singer from Boston, was the source of Baby, Let Me Follow You Down. House of the Risin' Sun is a traditional lament of a New Orleans woman driven into prostitution by poverty. Dylan learned the song from the singing of Dave Van Ronk: "I'd always known Risin' Sun but never really knew I knew it until I heard Dave sing it." The singer's version of Freight Train Blues was adapted from an old disk by Roy Acuff.

Song to Woody, is another original by Bob Dylan, dedicated to one of his greatest inspirations, and written much in the musical language of his idol.

Ending this album is the surging power and tragedy of Blind Lemon Jefferson's blues—See That My Grave Is Kept Clean. The poignance and passion of this simple song reveals both the country blues tradition—and its newest voice, Bob Dylan—at their very finest.

Cynthia Gooding Interview, WBAI FM Radio, New York City, NY

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke pp. 9-17.

From the studios of the New York Radio Station WBAI -FM for the Folksingers Choice program. The interviewer and regular program presenter was Cynthia Gooding (CG). There is confusion about the exact date of the recording and even over whether the program was eventually broadcast. What we actually hear is the unedited version of the studio session. Dylan and Gooding chat between each of the 11 songs, a duration of around one hour. Dylan continues to expound his 'alternative biography' and his tall stories have become quite stereotyped. Gooding is a receptive listener and there's an obvious magic between the two. She had met Dylan on a number of occasions previously, going back to 1959 when they both attended a party after one of her concerts. Apparently Dylan sang to her and she was much impressed. Later, when she saw Dylan performing at the Folk City in New York, she commented.

> "People listen... he talks and he laughs and just when they are about to catch him in a lie, he takes out his harmonica and blows them down."

Was she fully aware of Bob's penchant for tall stories when she interviewed him?

Transcribed from tape source.

Lonesome Whistle Blues

CG: That was Bob Dylan. Just one man doing all that. Playing the... er... mouth harp and guitar because, well, when you do this you have to wear a little sort of, what another person might call a necklace.

BD: Yeah!

CG: And then it's got joints so that you can bring the mouth harp up to where you can reach it. To play it. Bob Dylan is, well, you must be twenty years old now aren't you?

BD: Yeah. I must be twenty. (laughs)

CG: (laughs) Are you?

BD: Yeah. I'm twenty, I'm twenty.

CG: When I first heard Bob Dylan it was, I think, about three years ago in Minneapolis, and at that time you were thinking of being a rock and roll singer weren't you?

BD: Well at that time I was just sort of doin' nothin'. I was there.

CG: Well, you were studying.

BD: I was working, I guess. I was making pretend I was going to school out there. I'd just come there from South Dakota. That was about three years ago?

CG: Yeah?

BD: Yeah, I'd come there from Sioux Falls. That was only about the place you didn't have to go too far to find the Mississippi River. It runs right through the town you know. (laughs).

CG: You've been singing... you've sung now at Gerde's here in town and have you sung at any of the coffee houses?

BD: Yeah, I've sung at the Gaslight. That was a long time ago though. I used to play down in the Wha too. You ever know where that place is?

CG: Yeah, I didn't know you sung there though.

BD: Yeah, I sung down there during the afternoons. I played my harmonica for this guy there who was singing. He used to give me a dollar to play every day with him, from 2 o'clock in the afternoon until 8.30 at night. He gave me a dollar plus a cheeseburger.

CG: Wow, a thin one or a thick one?

BD: I couldn't much tell in those days.

CG: Well, whatever got you off rock 'n roll and on to folk music?

BD: Well, I never really got onto this, they were just sort of, I dunno, I wasn't calling it anything then you know, I wasn't really singing rock 'n roll, I was singing Muddy Waters songs and I was writing songs, and I was singing Woody Guthrie songs and also I sung Hank Williams songs and Johnny Cash, I think.

CG: Yeah, I think the ones that I heard were a couple of the Johnny Cash songs.

BD: Yeah, this one I just sang for you is Hank Williams.

CG: It's a nice song too.

BD: Lonesome Whistle.

CG: Heartbreaking.

BD: Yeah.

CG: And you've been writing songs as long as you've been singing.

BD: Well no. Yeah. Actually, I guess you could say that. Are these, ah, these are French ones, yeah?

CG: No, they are healthy cigarettes. They're healthy because they've got a long filter and no tobacco.

BD: That's the kind I need.

CG: And now you're doing a record for Columbia?

BD: Yeah, I made it already. It's coming out next month. Or not next month, yeah, it's coming out in March.

CG: And what's it going to be called?

BD: Ah, Bob Dylan, I think.

CG: That's a novel title for a record.

BD: Yeah, it's really strange.

CG: Yeah and hmm this is one of the quickest rises in folk music wouldn't you say?

BD: Yeah, but I really don't think to myself as, a you know, a folk singer, er, folk singer thing, er, because I don't really much play across the country, in any of these places, you know? I'm not on a circuit or anything like that like those other folk singers so ah, I play once in a while you know. But I dunno I like more than just folk music too and I sing more than just folk music. I mean as such, a lot of people they're just folk music, folk music, folk music you know. I like folk music like Hobart Smith stuff an all that but I don't sing much of that and when I do it's probably a modified version of something. Not a modified version, I don't know how to explain it. It's just there's more to it, I think. Old time jazz things you know. Jelly Roll Morton, you know, stuff like that.

CG: Well, what I would like is for you to sing some songs, you know, from different parts of your short history. Short because you're only 20 now.

BD: Yeah, OK. Let's see. I'm looking for one.

CG: He has the, I gather, a small part of his repertoire, pasted to his guitar.

BD: Yeah. Well, this is you know actually, I don't even know some of these songs, this list I put on 'cause other people got it on, you know, and I copied the best songs I could find down here from all these guitar players list. So I don't know a lot of these, you know. It gives me something to do though on stage.

CG: Yeah, like something to look at.

BD: Yeah. I'll sing you, oh, you wanna hear a blues song?

CG: Sure.

BD: This one's called Fixin' To Die.

Fixin' To Die

CG: That's a great song. How much of it is yours?
BD: That's ah, I don't know. I can't remember. My hands are cold; it's a pretty cold studio.
CG: It s the coldest studio!
BD: Usually can do this (picking a few notes). There, I just wanted to do it once.
CG: You're a very good friend of John Lee Hookers, aren't you?
BD: Yeah, I'm a friend of his.
CG: Do you sing any of his songs at all?
BD: Well, no I don't sing any of his really. I sing one of Howlin' Wolf's. You wanna hear that one again?
CG: Well, first I wanna ask you, um, why you don't sing any of his because I know you like them.
BD: I play harmonica with him, and I sing with him. But I don't do, sing, any of his songs because, I might sing a version of one of them, but I don't sing any like he does, 'cause I don't think anybody sings any of his songs to tell you the truth. He's a funny guy to sing like.
CG: Hard guy to sing like too.
BD: This is, I'll see if I can find a key here and do this one. I heard this one a long time ago. This is one, I never do it.
CG: This is the Howlin' Wolf song
BD: Yeah.

Smokestack Lightning

BD: You like that?
CG: Yeah, I sure do. You're very brave to try and sing that kind of a howling song.
BD: Yeah, it's Howlin' Wolf.
CG: Yeah. Another of the singers that you're a very good friend of is, I know, Woody Guthrie.
BD: Yeah.
CG: Did you, you said, er, singing his songs, or rather his songs were some of the first ones that you sang.
BD: Yeah.
CG: Which ones did you sing of his?
BD: Well, I sing...
CG: Or which do you like the best perhaps I should say.
BD: Well, which ones you're gonna hear. Here, I'll sing you one, if I get it together here.
CG: In order for Bob to put on his necklace which is what he holds up the mouth harp with, he's gotta take his hat off. Then he puts on the necklace. Then he puts the hat back on.
BD: Yeah.
CG: Then he screws up the necklace so he can put the mouth harp in it. It's a complicated business.
BD: You know, the necklace gotta go round the collar.
CG: Also, in case any of you don't know, in order for Bob to decide what key he's gonna sing in, he gotta, well, first, he decides what key he s gonna sing in and then he's gotta find the mouth harp that's in that key. And, then he's gotta put the mouth harp in the necklace.
BD: Yeah. I'll sing you Hard Travelin'. How's that one? Everybody sings it, but he likes that one.

Hard Travelin'

CG: Nice, you started off slow but boy you ended up.
BD: Yeah, that's a thing of mine there.
CG: Tell me about the songs that you've sung, that you've written yourself that you sing.

BD: Oh those are... I don't claim to call them folk songs or anything. I just call them contemporary songs, I guess. You know, there's a lot of people paint, you know. If they've got something that they wanna say, you know, they paint. Or other people write. Well, I just, you know write a song it's the same thing. You wanna hear one?

CG: Why, yes. That's just what I had in mind Bob Dylan. Whatever made you think of that.

BD: Well, let me see. What kind do you wanna hear? I got a new one I wrote.

CG: Yeah. You said you were gonna play some of your new ones for me.

BD: Yeah, I got a new one, er. This one's called, em, Emmett Till. Oh, by the way, the melody here is, excuse me, the melody's, I stole the melody from Len Chandler. An' he's a funny guy. He's a, he's a folk singer guy. He uses a lot of funny chords you know when he plays and he's always getting to, want me, to use some of these chords, you know, trying to teach me new chords all the time. Well, he played me this one. Said don't those chords sound nice? An' I said they sure do, an' so I stole it, stole the whole thing.

CG: That was his first mistake.

BD: Yeah... Naughty tips.

Emmett Till

BD: You like that one?

CG: It's one of the greatest contemporary ballads I've ever heard. It s tremendous.

BD: You think so?

CG: Oh yes!

BD: Thanks!

CG: It's got some lines that are just make you stop breathing, great. Have you sung that for Woody Guthrie?

BD: No. I'm gonna sing that for him next time.

CG: Gonna sing that one for him?

BD: Yeah.

CG: Oh yeah.

BD: I just wrote that one about last week, I think.

CG: Pine song. It makes me very proud. It's uh, what's so magnificent about it to me, is that it doesn't have any sense of being written, you know. It sounds as if it just came out of... it doesn't have any of those little poetic contortions that mess up so many contemporary ballads, you know.

BD: Oh yeah, I try to keep it working.

CG: Yeah, and you sing it so straight. That's fine.

BD: Just wait 'til Len Chandler hears the melody though.

CG: He'll probably be very pleased with what you did to it. What song does he sing to it?

BD: He sings another one he wrote, you know. About some bus driver out in Colorado, that crashed a school bus with 27 kids. That's a good one too. It's a good song.

CG: What other songs are you gonna sing?

BD: You wanna hear another one?

CG: I wanna hear tons more.

BD: OK, I'll sing ya, I never get a chance to sing a lot of, let me sing you just a plain ordinary one.

CG: Fine.

BD: I'll tune this one. It's open E. Oh! I got one, I got two of 'em. I broke my fingernail so it might not be so, it might slip a few times.

Standing On The Highway

BD: You like that?

CG: Yes I do. You know the eight of diamonds is delay, and the ace of spades is death so that sort of goes in with the two roads, doesn't it?
BD: I learned that from the carnival.
CG: From who?
BD: Carnival, I used to travel with the carnival. I used to speak of those things all the time.
CG: Oh. You can read cards too?
BD: Humm, I can't read cards. I really believe in palm reading, but for a bunch of personal things, I don't, personal experiences, I don't believe too much in the cards. I like to think I don't believe too much in the cards, anyhow.
CG: So you go out of your way not to get em read, so you won't believe them. How long were you with the carnival?
BD: I was with the carnival off and on for about six years.
CG: What were you doing?
BD: Oh, just about everything. Uh, I was clean-up boy, I used to be on the main line, on the ferris wheel, uh, do just run rides. I used to do all kinds of stuff like that.
CG: Didn't that interfere with your schooling?
BD: Well, I skipped a bunch of things, and I didn't go to school a bunch of years and I skipped this and I skipped that.
CG: That's what I figured.
BD: All came out even though.
CG: What, you were gonna... you were gonna, sing another blues, you said.
BD: Oh yeah, I'll sing you this one. This is a nice slow one. I learned this... you know Ralph Rensler?
CG: Sure.
BD: I learned this sort of thing from him. A version of this, I got the idea from him. This isn't the blues, but, how much time we got?
CG: Oh, we got half an hour.
BD: Oh, good.

Roll On John

CG: That's a lonesome accompaniment too. Oh my!
BD: You like that one?
CG: It makes you feel even lonelier. How much of that last one was yours by the way?
BD: Well, I dunno, maybe one or two verses.
CG: Where'd the rest of it come from?
BD: Well, like I say, I got the idea for Roll On John from Ralph Rensler.
CG: Oh! I see.
BD: And then I got... the rest just sort of fell together. Here's one, I'll bet you'll remember. Yay, I bet you'll know this one.
CG: Take the hat off, put on the necklace, put the hat back on. Nobody's ever seen Bob Dylan without his hat excepting when he's putting on his necklace. Is there... is there a more dignified name for that thing?
BD: What, the, this?
CG: Yeah the brace, what's it called?
BD: Er, harmonica holder.
CG: Oh, I think necklace is better than that.
BD: Yeah, ha, ha. This one here's an old jug band song.

Stealin'

BD: Like that? That's called Stealin'.
CG: I figured. You haven't been playing the harmonica too long, have you?

BD: Oh yeah, oh yeah, yeah, yeah. I been playing the harmonica for a long time. I just have never had... couldn't play 'em at the same time. I used to play the smaller Hohners. I never knew harmonica holders existed, the real kind like this. I used to go ahead and play with the coat hanger. That never really held out so good. I used to put tape around it, you know, and then it would hold out pretty good. But then there were smaller harmonicas than these, you know, they're about this far an' I used to put them in my mouth. But I, but I got bad teeth, you know, and some kind of thing back there you know. Maybe there's... I don't know what it was, a filling or something. I don't know what it was in there but it used to magnify.

CG: Oh yes.

BD: Not magnified but magnet, you know. Man, this whole harmonica would go, you know, wham, drop from my mouth like that. So I couldn't hold it onto my teeth very much.

CG: Yeah, it's like, sometimes you get a piece of tin foil in your mouth and it goes wow. It's terrible. But let's not talk about that.

BD: No, I don't want to talk about that either.

CG: At the carnival did you learn songs?

BD: No, I learned how to sing though. That's more important.

CG: Yeah. You made up the songs even then.

BD: Er, actually, I wrote a song once. I'm trying to find, a real good song I wrote. An' it's about this lady I knew in the carnival. An' er, they had a side show, I only, I was, this was, Thomas show, Roy B Thomas shows, and there was, they had a freak show in it, you know, and all the midgets and all that kind of stuff. An' there was one lady in there really bad shape. Like her skin had been all burned when she was a little baby, you know, and it didn't grow right, and so she was like a freak. An' all these people would pay money, you know, to come and see and... er... that really sort of got to me, you know. They'd come and see, and I mean, she was very, she didn't really look like normal, she had this funny kind of skin and they passed her of as the elephant lady. And, er, like she was just burned completely since she was a little baby, er. And... er, it's a funny thing about them: I know how these people think, you know. Like when they wanna sell you stuff, you know, the spectators. And I don't see why people don't buy something, because, you know, like they sell little cards of themselves for, you know, like ten cents, you know. They got a picture on it and it's got some story, you know. And they've very funny thinking, like they get up there like, a lot of them are very smart, you know, because they've had to do this, I mean, still you can't. A lot of them are great people, you know. But like, they got a funny thing in their minds. Like they want to. Here they are on the stage, they wanna make you have two thoughts. Like, they wanna make you think that, er, they don't feel, er, bad about themselves. They want you to think that they just go on living everyday and they don't ever think about their, what's bothering them, they don't ever think about their condition. An' also they wanna make you feel sorry for them, an' they gotta do that two ways you see And er... they do it, a lot of them do it. And... er, it's er. I had a good friend, this woman who was like that, and I wrote a song for her, you know, a long time ago. An' lost it some place. It's just about, just speakin' from first person, like here I am, you know, and sort a like, talkin' to you, and trying, an' it was called, "Won't You Buy A Postcard". That's the name of the song I wrote. Can't remember that one though.

CG: There's a lot of circus literature about how freaks don't mind being freaks but it's very hard to believe.

BD: Oh yeah.

CG: You're absolutely right, that they would have to look at it two ways at the same time. Did you manage to get both ways into the song?

BD: Yeah. I lost the song.

CG: I hope you fond it and when you find it sing it for me.

BD: I got a verse here of some... You know Ian and Silvia?

CG: Oh sure. Ian and Silvia are at the Bitter End Club.
BD: I sort of borrowed this from them.
CG: He's looking for a harmonica.
BD: I don't have to take the necklace off; necklace as you call it. You might have heard them do it. This is the same song. I used to do this one.

Makes A Long Time Man Feel Bad

BD: Got sort of... You like that one?
CG: Boy it, when you...
BD: That's got them funny chords in it.
CG: :..really get going there's a tremendous sort of push that you give things that's wild.
BD: Oh, you really think so?
CG: No, I was just talking.
BD: I'll take off my necklace.
CG: Without taking off your hat.
BD: No.
CG: Well, then the thing is you see that...
BD: I'm getting good at this.
CG: Yah. After he takes off the necklace or puts it on he's gotta fluff up the hat again every time.
BD: Yeah. I got it cleaned and blocked last week.
CG: What did you wear on your head? (laughing)
BD: Stetson. You seen me wear that Stetson.
CG: Oh yeah, you were wearing somebody's Stetson.
BD: It was mine. I got that for a present.
CG: So why don't you wear it? 'Cause you like this one better?
BD: I like this one better. It's been with me longer.
CG: What happens when you take it off for any length of time? You go to sleep?
BD: Yeah.
CG: I see.
BD: Or else I'm in the bathroom or somethin'. Well actually just when I go to sleep. I wanted to sing Baby Please Don 't Go because I've wanted to hear how that sounded.

Baby Please Don't Go

CG: That's a nice song too. You said that you've written several new songs lately.
BD: Yeah.
CG: You've only sung one of them. You realize that? I know I'm working you very hard for this hour of the morning, but there it is.
BD: Yeah, this really isn't a new one but this is one of the ones. You'll like it. I wrote this one before I got this Columbia Records thing. Just about when I got it, you know. I like New York, but this is a song from one person's angle.

Hard Times In New York Town

CG: That's a very nice song, Bob Dylan. You've been listening to Bob Dylan playing some, playing and singing some of his songs and some of the songs that he's learned from other people. And thank you very, very much for coming down here and working so hard.
BD: It's my pleasure to come down.
CG: When you're rich and famous are you gonna wear the hat too?
BD: Oh, I'm never gonna become rich and famous.
CG: And you're never gonna take off the hat either.

BD: No.

CG: And this has been Folksingers Choice and I'm Cynthia Gooding. I'll be here next week at the same time.

Interviewer: Pete Seeger (PS)

PS: I'd like to see… I'd like to hear some of the songs that Bob Dylan has made up because of all the people I have heard in America, he seems to be the most prolific. I don't… I ????? make the song before breakfast everyday or before supper?

BD: Um… I don't make up the songs like that. Well, sometimes it can go [clears throat] about two weeks for that making up a song…

PS: I don't believe it.

BD: Oh, yeah. But then sometimes… well, these are the songs that I sing. I may go two weeks and make it up. I write a lotta stuff. In fact, I wrote five songs last night, but I gave all papers away… someplace. That was in a place called, um, Bitter End. And somewhere I was just about having 'em (left) on the stage, and I would never sing them any place. There were just for myself and for some other people. That might say, "write a song about that" and I do it, but I don't sorta run around and do with the newspapers like a lot of people do – spend newspapers all around… And pick something up to write a song about it. It is usually right there in my head before I start. That's how I write. I mean it might be a bad approach, but I don't even consider writing songs. I don't even wanna get written it. I don't even consider that I wrote it when I got it done.

PS: Put it together?

??F: You make up…

BD: Yeah, yeah. I just figure it out that I made it up or that I got it someplace I just sorta [clears throat]. The song was there before me, before I came along. I just sorta came down and I sorta took it down with a pencil that it was all there before I came around. That how I feel about it.

PS: That's how I feel about Bob Dylan songs very often that Bob is actually a folk mind. He represents all the people around. And all the ideas current are filtered down and they came out poetry and… For example, one song you wrote about that fellow that was put into an institution. What was his name… White?

BD: Oh yeah, Don. He's dead now.

PS: He's dead now? Umm… For example you put in in one line and say that institutions are overcrowded…

BD: Yeah.

PS: …but I just can't see that appearing on a traditional ballad then before you sang it. And it's precisely the first song that I can think of, a modern song that uses the idea ????? ????? psychology, and the idea of people being afraid of life. And actually of folk song…

??M: Instead of talking about it, let's hear it.

PS: Yeah, could we hear that song?

??F: That's what I wanted to say… Let him get tuned up while we're talking, anyway, we can… We can let him give us an example of how these songs just come to him and blow through him…

PS: Well, I think that this particular song is a ????? and in a sense it is the first psychological song of a modern generation that I've heard.

BD: I took it from a Bonnie Dobson's tune, "Peter Amberley" if the name of it is… [sings Ballad of Donald White]

My name is Donald White, you see, I stand before you all.
I was judged by you a murderer and the hangman's knot must fall.
I will die upon the gallows pole when the moon is* RIDING *clear,
And these are my final words that you will ever hear.

[I left my home in Kansas when I was very young.
I landed in the old Northwest; Seattle, Washington.
Although I'd a-traveled many miles, I never made a friend,
For I could never get along in life with people that I met.]

If I had some education to give me a decent start,
I might have been a doctor or a master in the arts.
But I used my hands for stealing when I was very young,
And they locked me down in jailhouse cells, that's how my life begun.

Oh, the inmates and the prisoners, I found they were my kind,
It was there inside the bars I found my peace of mind.
But the jails they were too crowded, institutions overflowed,
So they* SET me loose to walk upon life's WEARY *tangled road.

And there's danger on the ocean where the salt sea waves split high,
And there's danger on the battlefield where the shells of bullets fly,
And there's danger in this open world were men* FIGHT *to be free,
And for me the greatest danger was in society.

So I asked them to send me back to the institution home.
But they said they were too crowded, for me they had no room.
I got down on my knees and begged, 'Oh, please put me away,'
But they would not listen to my plea or nothing I would say.

And so it was on Christmas eve in the year of '59,
It was on that night I killed a man, I did not try to hide.
The jury found me guilty and I* DON'T *disagree,
For I knew that it would happen if I wasn't put away.

BUT I'm glad I've had no parents to care for me AND cry,
For now they will never know the horrible death* THAT *I die.
And I'm also glad I've had no friends to see me in disgrace,
For they'll never see that hangman's hood wrapped around my face.

Farewell* TO *the old north woods of which I used to roam,
Farewell* TO *the crowded bars of which have been my home,
Farewell to all you people* THAT *think the worst of me,
I guess you'll feel much better when I'm on that hanging tree.

But there's just one* MORE *question before they kill me dead,
I'm wondering just how much to you I really said
Concerning all the boys that* WALK a road JUST *like me,
Are they enemies or victims of your society?

PS: Thank you, Bob Dylan. I'd like to hear you Bob sing another of your songs.
BD: Okay.
PS: You've got a whole box of 'em. Bob, where were you raised?
BD: Um, Gallup, New Mexico and South Dakota.
PS: Holy ????

[cut in the tape]

PS: As we go farther we see less than anywhere else.
BD: We weren't here. ????? anything… I could see that Emmett Till was supposed to be here. It's not in Broadside, though.
PB: Yeah. That's the one you can place in Broadside.
??F: (unintelligible)
BD: Okay. This is a Len Chandler's tune. There's a funny thing about it. Len… you met Len when he plays and sings he uses a lot of chords, but he's really good. Y'know, he's can really get thing all kind of them… uh… uses fingers all over, but he's good. And he once tried to tell me to use more chords, and to sing a couple of song in minor key. Before I met him I never sung one song in minor key. And um… he taught me these chords and he sang me a song to these chords. I saw him do the chords and I stole it from him. And he heard me do it like that. … He was out of town... He didn't care, though. [sings The Death of Emmett Till]

'Twas down in Mississippi no so long ago,
When a young boy from Chicago town* WALKED *through a Southern door.
This boy's* FATEFUL tragedy YOU SHOULD ALL *remember well,
The color of his skin was black and his name was Emmett Till.

Some men they dragged him to a barn and there they beat him up.
They said they had a reason, but I* DISREMEBER *what.
They tortured him and did some things too evil to repeat.
There was screaming sounds inside the barn, there was laughing sounds out on the street.

Then they rolled his body down a gulf amidst a blood-red rain
And they threw him in the waters wide to cease his screaming pain.
The reason that they killed him there, and I'm sure it ain't no lie,
Was just for the fun of killin' him and to* SLOWLY WATCH *him die.

And then to stop the United States of yelling for a trial,
Two brothers they confessed that they had killed poor Emmett Till.
But on the jury there were men who helped the brothers commit this awful crime,
And so this trial was a mockery, but nobody seemed to mind.

I saw the morning papers but I could not bear
To see the smiling brothers walkin' down the courthouse stairs.
For the jury found them innocent and the brothers they went free,
While Emmett's body floats the foam of a Jim Crow southern sea.

If you can't speak out against this kind of thing, a crime that's so unjust,
Your eyes are filled with dead men's dirt,* AND *your mind is filled with dust.
Your arms and legs they must be in shackles and chains, and your blood it must refuse to flow,
For you let this human race fall down so God-awful low!

This song is just a reminder to remind your fellow man
That this kind of thing still lives today in that ghost-robed Ku Klux Klan.
But if all of us folks that thinks alike, if we gave all we could give,
We could make this great land of ours a greater place to live.

[tape cuts]

PS: Topical songs have been the topic of the program this afternoon. We've just about reached the end of the program. And I'd like Bob Dylan to sing the last song called, The Answer is Blowin' in the Wind.

BD: Oh? Yeah.

PS: I'm sorry?

BD: I was going to sing… Oh, is it The Answer is Blowin' in the Wind? That one? Oh! Okay…

PS: Because I think this song and… Bob, being a topical song is just filled with poetry that people of all kinds of ways are gonna like.

[Bob Dylan sings Blowin' in the Wind.]

How many roads must a man walk down before HE IS CALLED a man?
And how many seas must a white dove sail before HE sleeps in the sand?
And how many times must the cannon balls fly 'fore they're forever banned?
The answer, my friend, is blowin' in the wind,
The answer is blowin' in the wind.

And how many years can a mountain exist before it's washed IN the sea?
And how many years can some people exist before they're allowed to be free?
And how many times can a man turn his head, AND PRETEND THAT he just doesn't see?
The answer, my friend, is blowin' in the wind,
The answer is blowin' in the wind.

And how many times must a man look up before he can see the sky?
And how many ears must one man have before he can hear people cry?
And how many deaths will it take till he knows that too many people have died?
The answer, my friend, is blowin' in the wind,
The answer is blowin' in the wind.

PS: Thank you Bob Dylan, Gil Turner, Pete Seeger, Sis Cunningham, and Israel Young.

Gil Turner Interview For Sing Out! (Oct/Nov 1962 issue)

Source: Broadside liner notes (BR301, 1963)

There ain't too much I can say about this song except that the answer is blowing in the wind. It ain't in no book or movie or T.V. show or discussion group. Man, it's in the wind – and it's blowing in the wind. Too many of these hip people are telling me where the answer is but, oh, I won't believe that. I still say it's in the wind and just like a restless piece of paper it's got to come down some time... But the only trouble is that no one picks up the answer when it comes down so not too many people get to see and know it... and then it flies away again... I still say that some of the biggest criminals are those that turn their heads away when they see wrong and know it's wrong. I'm only 21 years old and I know that there's been too many wars... You people over 21, you're older and smarter.

September 1962
Edwin Miller Interview, New York City, New York

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke pp. 19-20.

One of the first magazine interviews with Dylan. Arranged by Billy James, Edwin Miller conducted this interview in June or July 1962 and it was published in the United States in the September 1962 issue of Seventeen magazine.

Bob Dylan sings in Washington Square
Quick Take

"What is a folk singer?" asks Bob Dylan, whose intense home-spun ballads sear the mind like a hot iron. His shoulders hunched up, he smokes cigarettes one after another down to the briefest wisp of moist brown tobacco, jiggling his body while he talks. "They call anybody a folk singer, they don't know what to call him. I sing some blues, some country music, some songs I write myself. My first song was dedicated to Brigitte Bardot. I saw her in a movie when I was fifteen, six years ago."

When he was ten, he ran away from Minnesota to Chicago. "I saw a Negro musician playing his guitar on the street, and I went up to him and began accompanying him on the spoons. I used to play the spoons when I was little," Bob explains, picking up two teas spoons with one hand, holding them back to back so the bottoms jingle against each other. Three months later he went home. "My folks didn't seem to mind because I don't remember them saying anything. Maybe I was happy when I was little or I was unhappy, a million other kids were the same way. What difference does it make?"

That year Bob began to pick on a guitar; by the time he was fifteen, he had taught himself to play the piano, the autoharp, and the harmonica. "I seem to draw into myself whatever comes my way, and it comes out me. Maybe I'm nothing but all these things I soak up. I don't know. I don't believe that I'm influenced by anybody else's style. If I thought that I'd stop singing."

After finishing high school, he worked as a roustabout with a traveling carnival. Gradually he turned toward professional singing. In February 1961 he hitchhiked to New York. Appearances in Greenwich Village cabarets spread ripples of excitement through the folk music world, and in September 1961 he was asked to accompany another folk singer who was taping an album for Columbia Records. "The producer asked me to make an album by myself. There was a violent, angry emotion running through me then; I don't know why. I just played guitar and harmonica – I've got a harmonica holder that goes around my neck so I don't have to hold it – and sang those songs and that was it. He asked me if I wanted to sing any of them over again but I said no. I can't see myself singing the same song twice in a row. That's terrible. I don't work regularly. I don't want to make a lot of money really. I wander around the city a lot, I take the ferry to Staten Island, or I walk down by the river. Or maybe I'll sit around all day with a painter I know. I hate playing night clubs. People don't want to listen to you, they just drink and talk. I can't go out after people. If they want what I've got, they always have to come to me with their hands out and they take from me. That's the way I am."

The Scene Interview, London, England

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 289-290.

Ronnie Gilbert (jazz columnist) conducted this interview around January 1st – 3rd. It originally appeared in the English 'performing arts' magazine Scene on January 26 1963.

It really would be a test of the assimilatory powers of Tin Pan Alley if folk music suddenly hit the charts in a big way. How for instance would the men in the sharp suits deal with Bob Dylan, the shambling boy genius of American Folk music?

Dylan does his very best to talk, act, dress and behave as much like a Tennessee mountain man as he can.

When I first met him he was talking vaguely about heading off for Rome, Paris or maybe New York. It worried him very little that he was halfway through the telerecording of the BBC play Madhouse on Castle St. and that high-level conferences were being held all over London because of an overtime squabble at the BBC which threatened to take the production time of the play some weeks beyond the time stipulated in Dylan's contract.

"They're paying me two thousand dollars to do this play." said Dylan. "If I got to stay another three weeks to finish it they'll probably have to pay the same money all over again.

"But to me two thousand, four thousand, I can't imagine the difference. It's too much money. And what's the money for three whole weeks of time? Three weeks is too long to lose."

Dylan is one of the biggest stars on the American folk circuit...

It was a lunchtime dawn for the tousled boy who opened the door, on which hung a "Do Not Disturb" notice. Thin-faced with a week's growth of boyish hair on his chin, he rubbed a floppy mass of hair out of his eyes and perched out on his bed, feet bare, legs crossed tailor fashion.

His guitar case stood in the centre of the floor, a pile of rolled up shirts erupted from an open suitcase and a large sheepskin jacket in dire need of cleaning lay beside the bed, where it had obviously been dropped the night before.

Dylan is the most exciting white folk and blues singer, the experts say, America has produced. He writes many of his own songs, sings them 'consciously trying to recapture the rude beauty of a southern farmhand musing in melody on his porch' and accompanies himself on guitar and harmonica (fixed round his neck).

Dylan talked like Brando imitating that southern farmhand. "I'm not in show-business," he said. "Money? I don't know how much I make. Sometimes I ask, sometimes I don't. I don't know what I spend it on, it just falls through holes in my pocket."

The curtains were still drawn in his room and they remained that way for three hours.

"I don't like singing to anybody but Americans. My songs say things. I sing them for people who know what I'm saying.

"Nowadays I just play at concerts," he said. "Clubs I don't play at. A few years ago when I needed the money they wouldn't pay me. Now they're writing all the time asking me to play. Sometimes I write back and tell them no, sometimes I just don't answer. But they keep right on asking, offering me percentages of the house and all."

Dylan dressed to go out to a local cafeteria for lunch with his manager, Mr. Albert Grossman.

Later that afternoon Mr. Grossman and Dylan decided they would finish the TV play, in which Dylan played a guitar-playing hobo.

A week or so after that I caught up with Mr. Grossman and Dylan in London again. Dylan was now wearing a black hat with a colored band and a curvy brim.

In the plush stalls of the new Prince Charles Theatre Dylan slumped in a seat...

[…tape starts with "Tomorrow Is a Long Time" last stanza…]

Only if she was lyin' by me,
I'd lie in my bed once again.
There's beauty in the silver, singin' river,
There's beauty in the sunrise in the sky,
But none of these and nothing else can MATCH the beauty
That I remember in my true love's eyes.
Yes, and only if my own true love was waitin',
If I could hear her heart a-softly poundin',
Only if she was lyin' by me,
I'd lie in my bed once again.

BD: Geez, that... [sniffs]
SW: That's a pretty song.
BD: Yes.
SW: That uh…
BD: It's a hard one to sing firsthand, though.
SW: Well, I don't ask you, just… What do you call it?
BD: It's called "Tomorrow's a Long, Long Time".
SW: Good enough, I'd say..
BD: [laughs] Well, I guess I should [pause] sing, umm, something.
[laughter in the studio]
SW: Incidentally…
BD: Is it…
SW: …Bobby Dylan plays a Gibson. We always identify guitars on this program.
BD: Oh, yeah. This is a Gibson.
SW: This is what it says up there.
BD: Yeah.
SW: So unless, unless it's a ???? going under false colors I guess it's a Gibson.
BD: Yeah, it's a Gibson. Here's a song for you

[Dylan plays Masters of War]

Come you masters of war, you that build all the guns
You that build the death planes, you that build the big bombs
You that hide behind walls, you that hide behind desks
I just want you to know I can see through your masks

I… You that never done nothin', but build to destroy
You play with my world like it's your little toy
You put a gun in my hand THEN you hide from my eyes
And you turn and run farther when the fast bullets fly

Like Judas of old you lie and deceive
A world war can be won, you want me to believe
But I see through your eyes and I see through your brain
Like I see through the water that runs down my drain

> You fasten the triggers for the others to fire
> Then you set back and watch when the death count gets higher
> You hide in your mansion* WHEN *young people's blood
> Flows out of their bodies and is buried in the mud
> You've thrown the worst fear that can ever be hurled
> Fear to bring children into the world
> For threatening my baby unborn and unnamed
> You ain't worth the blood that runs in your veins
> How much do I know to talk out of turn
> You might say that I'm young, you might say I'm unlearned
> But there's one thing I know though I'm younger than you
> Even Jesus would never forgive what you do
> Let me ask you one question, "Is your money that good?
> CAN *it buy you forgiveness? Do you think that it could?"
> I think you will find when your death takes its toll
> All the money you made* DON'T EVER *buy back your soul
> And I hope that you die and your death'll come soon
> I'll follow your casket in the pale afternoon
> And I'll watch while you're lowered down to your deathbed
> And I'll stand o'er your grave 'til I'm sure that you're dead

SW: That's a… pretty strong indictment.
BD: [laughs] What?
SW: I say a pretty strong indictment.

SW: Now that Bobby Dylan's found his way here and we've kind of broken the ice an hour ago, so I see he'll have to come back pretty soon. 'Think that'll be possible?
BD: Yeah. It's not snowing next time.
SW: Is it snowing now?
BD: I don't know. I really couldn't tell.
SW: Slushy?
BD: Yeah.
SW: Yeah. Music!

[Bob Dylan plays Bob Dylan's Blues]

> Well, the Lone Ranger and Tonto ridin' down the line
> Fixin' ev'rybody's troubles, ev'rybody's* BUT *mine
> Somebody musta told 'em I was doin' fine.
> [laughter in the studio]
> Well, look it here, buddy, you wanna be like me
> Pull out your six-shooter, rob every bank you can see
> Tell the judge I said it was all right.

BD: All right, I can't…
SW: We've run out of time anyhow. Irving Frank will be on in just a second, New Yorkers

Oscar Brand Show, WNBC Radio Studios, New York City, NY

Source: Circulating tape

OB: Hello, I'm Oscar Brand and talented young Bob Dylan is my guest today on "World of Folk Music".

OB: Now, one of the most exciting creative forces in the world of folk music is a fine young singer and writer named Bob Dylan. That's D-Y-L-A-N. Right? Right. Bob's with us today and is about to perform a Dylan original.

BD: Thank you, Oscar! And this one's called "North Country Girl" and it's dedicated to all the north country girls.

[Bob Dylan plays "Girl from the North Country"]

If you're travelin' in the north country fair,
Where the winds hit heavy on the borderline,
Remember me to one who lives there.
She* WAS ONCE *a true love of mine.

If you go when the snowflakes storm,
When the rivers freeze and summer ends,
MAKE SURE SHE HAS a coat so warm,
To keep her from the howlin' winds.

Please see for me if her hair* HANGIN' *long,
If it rolls and flows all down her breast.
Please see for me if her hair hangs long,
That's the way I remember her* THE *best.

I'm a-wonderin' if she remembers me at all.
Many times I've often prayed
In the darkness of my night,
In the brightness of my day.

So if you're travelin' in the north country fair,
Where the winds hit heavy on the borderline,
Remember me to one who lives there.
She* WAS ONCE *a true love of mine.

OB: And all the north country girls thank you, Bob Dylan.

[Social Security administration announcement]

OB: And now once again Mr Bob Dylan and another original called "Only A Hobo". A little background Bob?

BD: Well, I guess some people go out in the streets every day, you know. They look into their garage and they see their car and... Other people can go out in the street and see their lilac trees. And other people can go out to their porch and water their plants. And you can also go out in the street an see a hobo.

[Bob Dylan plays "Only a Hobo"]

> As I was out walking on a corner one day,
> I spied an old hobo, in a doorway he lay.
> His face was all grounded in the cold sidewalk floor
> And I guess he'd been there for the whole night or more.
> HE WAS *only a hobo, but one more is gone
> Leavin' nobody to sing his sad song
> Leavin' nobody to carry him home
> HE WAS o*nly a hobo, but one more is gone
> A blanket of newspaper covered his head,
> The* STEP *was his pillow, the street was his bed.
> One look at his face showed the hard road he'd come
> And a fistful of coins showed the money he bummed.
> HE WAS *only a hobo, but one more is gone
> Leavin' nobody to sing his sad song
> AN' *leavin' nobody to carry him home
> HE WAS *only a hobo, but one more is gone
> Does it take much of a man to see his whole life go down,
> To look up on the world from a hole in the ground,
> To wait for your future like a horse that's gone lame,
> To lie in the gutter and die with no name?
> HE WAS *only a hobo, but one more is gone
> Leavin' nobody to sing his sad song
> Leavin' nobody to carry him home
> HE WAS *only a hobo, but one more is gone

OB: Bob Dylan with his own song, "Only a Hobo". Thanks for coming by Bob.

BD: Thanks for inviting me here today and I also wanna take the opportunity, uh, to express my feelings. Thank you for myself and all my friends who where at your house the other night.

OB: I hope we get together soon.

26 April 1963
Studs Terkel Interview, Chicago, Illinois

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke pp. 21-33.

According to Heylin, this show was recorded on April 26th which is borne out during the interview when Terkel says that Dylan played the Bear Club the previous night. The announcer, however, actually states May. Krogsgaard in Twenty Years Of Recording gives May 1st and states that it was broadcast on WFMT Radio at a later date: probably May of that year. Whatever the date, Dylan recorded seven songs from the Wax Museum which was a regular feature on Chicago's WFMT Radio station, between 10 and 11 o'clock every weekday. Terkel was renowned as a social commentator. His shows attracted large audiences and Dylan needed this kind of exposure in the Midwest of the USA at this time. Dylan was interviewed by Studs Terkel (ST) between songs; the recording lasts for approximately one hour.

Transcribed from the circulating tape.

Announcer:
And now we welcome you to the Studs Terkel Wax Museum heard on WFMT each weekday from 10 am to 11. Stud's guest this morning is folksinger and songwriter Bob Dylan, an interview recorded in May of 1963. The program in just a moment.

Bob Dylan plays Fare Thee Well

ST: How can we describe you, Bob Dylan, rumpled trousers, curly hair. You know, Bob Shelton of the New York Times speaks of your writing some of the music to songs that you sing 'cause they can't be pigeon holed. The minute you have one characterized it flies away. His lyrics makes a sallow sermon out of Guthries, Woody Guthries, conversational folksay with a dash of Rimbaud's demonic imagery, even a bit of Yevtuchenko's social criticism. Whether his verse is free or rhymed, whether mood is somber, crusading, satiric, subject or fanciful, Mr Dylan's words and melodies spark with the light of an inspired poet. And I think Bob Shelton has something. After having heard you sing a number of songs and a couple of your albums, Bob, where are you from... beginning? Where did you come from?

BD: Well, the beginning, y'know, is there in Minnesota. But that was the beginning before the beginning. The beginning was not till about 3 or 4 years ago... five years ago really, or may be it was even before that.

ST: How did that happen – the five years ago – perhaps we can explore before that too a bit later. How did that five years ago happen and you came to songs – these kind of songs.

BD: I don't know how I come to songs, y'know, but doing what I'm doing, I'm doing, er... I mean, it's not up to me, y'know, I don't really go into myself that deep... I just go ahead and do it, yeah, I was sort of trying to find a place to pound my nails, y'know.

ST: And pounding your nails when you were... Did you hear songs when you were little? How did this come about? Did you hear records of Woody Guthrie because Woody, I know, is a factor in your life?

BD: Oh yeah, Woody, Woody's a big factor, Woody. I feel awful lucky, but, y'know, I feel lucky just to know Woody.

ST: Now you did something. You were in the Midwest and one day you took off and you went to the hospital, New Jersey, to visit Woody. Why'd you do that?

BD: Well, I didn't take off for the hospital there. I was around the country before that and I'd heard of Woody, I knew Woody, I saw Woody once a long, long time ago in Burbank, California, which, when I was just a little boy – I don't even remember seeing him; I heard him play.

ST: That's interesting, you say when you were a very little boy...

BD: Yeah, it was about... I think it must've been about ten.

ST: Who took you there, your parents?

BD: No, it was my uncle.

ST: Your uncle took you there? And you were very small and that was a memory. You remember though, don't you.

BD: Yeah, I remembered Woody that time.

ST: What was it stuck in your mind?

BD: That... it stuck in my mind that he was Woody and that everybody else that I could see around me was just everybody else. He was Woody.

ST: You mean there was no-one else but one.

BD: Yeah.

ST: And that was he, and I think that if I may venture an opinion there's no-one else but me to hear in you, Bob, and, though you've influenced... well, perhaps this'll come along as we're talking and singing too, now I'm asking about you, and it's hard to separate you from the songs you write and sing. You write most of your songs, don't you?

BD: Yeah, I write them all, now.

ST: What, what makes you write a song? Let's say there's one that I know Pete Seeger sings and Will Holt sings your songs. It's... only way I can describe it is a great tapestry. That's Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall.

BD: Oh yeah, that one.

ST: Well, before you tackle that, what made you write that?

BD: Well, I'll tell you how I came to write that.

ST: All right.

BD: That's just one of them kinds of songs, that's just one of those I wrote like that... that was, er... I wrote that 'cause, er, y'know, every line in that really is another song, y'know, it couldn't be used as a whole song, every single line, and I wrote that when I didn't figure... I didn't know how many other songs I could write. You see. That was during October of last year and I remember sitting up all night with much people, someplace, and, er, I wanted to get the most down that I knew about into one song as I possibly could. So I wrote that.

ST: It was October that... that night. What... it was during a crisis.

BD: Yeah, that was during the blockade; I guess it's the word.

ST: During Cuba, and you worried. So you put it to song.

BD: Yeah, I was a little worried; I can't say I was, er…

ST: You can't say you were elated.

BD: Yeah, I was a little worried, maybe that's the word, huh.

ST: So you wrote this song?

BD: Mm, mm.

ST: You know, could you sing this song?

BD: You've got it on disc there. I'd appreciate it if you could do it that way.

ST: Which would you prefer. The disc or you doing it?

BD: Yeah, if you take it off the disc. I could sing the song but it takes a long time to sing, and... if you'd like me to sing it, I guess...

ST: I would, oh well, if it isn't...

BD: Well, if you want me to, I guess...

ST: I would like you to sing it. I'll tell you why after you sing it.

BD: All right then.

ST: Because I think this is some song we could talk about. I don't mean so much the content itself as the form, the lyrics, the images. And you call this Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall and I know people will be listening to it as you sing it.

Bob Dylan plays A Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall

ST: Bob, as you sing that one it seems to be the whole world rolled into one. You said earlier before you began to sing it, each one of the lines, each one of the images, could be a song in itself.

BD: It's with the song, every line...

ST: You know why I asked you to sing that live rather than the disc, I had this letter from a kid who's your age, he's about 21, 22. This came about because he was asking, you know, on this programme, wondering about what this new generation is really thinking of: we hear so much and it's interesting. At the very end he says, you know, Americas heard the story of the bright straight A student, fraternity, leading a good-guy Charlie, a young victim of discrimination. But there's a quiet group that remains, one that has no overwhelming crusade that is outwardly to make but one that is uneasily discontent. Thoughtfully restless, young people of this sort may eventually be determined as to future directions. But there's something he said earlier, I can't find the sentence, "Outwardly we seem to be cool, outwardly, but there's a rage inside us you see". Now you were singing that outwardly, very easily and casually since I wanted to see you sing it – but, oh boy, the fire of the words that you sing.

BD: I got a friend who wrote a book called One Hundred Dollar Misunderstanding. I don't know if it's been around Chicago, but it's about this straight A college kid, y'know, fraternity guy and, er, a Negro prostitute and it's got two dialogues in the same book. One dialogue in one chapter and the other chapter follows with, er... this is exactly what he's thinking and what he does and the next chapter is her view of him, and then the whole book...

ST: Yeah, I heard of this book...

BD: This guy, Bob Goover wrote it and, er... that would explain a lot too... that's one of the hip, more hip things nowadays, I guess, besides, I mean, it actually comes out and states something that's actually true, you know, that everybody thinks about where, where, I don't know if the feller that wrote in this letter was thinking about the crusades in, er... this guy who wrote it, you can't label him, y'know, he's unlabelable. He's a, that's the word, you understand what I mean.

ST: I follow you. You know, back in the '30's, in the 1930's you know, there were young people feeling passionately, you know, under one label or another, do you see, but they, they were more or less pigeon-holed, but you stand for, it seems, the guy who wrote this letter and the guy who wrote that book – they belong to nobody but themselves but we know something is there, you know, outwardly we say cool, cool... I suppose you have to be that because the chips on the table are so blue.

BD: Well, maybe it's just the time. Now's the time you have to belong to yourself, you know. I think maybe in 1930, from talking with Woody and Pete and some other people that I know there, seems like everything then was good and bad and black and white and, er, easy to see and wherever... you're going to have one or two. When you stand on one side, you know, people are either for you or against you, with you, behind you or whatever you have, y'know. Nowadays, it just... I don't know how it got there really; it doesn't seem so simple – more than two sides, y'know, it's not black and white anymore.

ST: There's something you said earlier, something you wrote – you belong to yourself, that's true, at the same time you can't help but be connected with everybody else. Which I suppose is why you write these songs. Now take this one you've sang, this one that I think will be a classic, this Hard Rains Gonna Fall. Even though it may have come out of your feelings about atomic rain, at the same time...

BD: No, no, it wasn't atomic rain. No. Somebody else thought that too.

ST: Well, go ahead.

BD: It's not atomic rain, it's just a hard rain, it's not atomic rain, no. It's not the fall-out rain. It isn't that at all. Well, somebody else, I think, said that someplace, er...

ST: Er, well go ahead. When you say a hard rain, what do you mean?

BD: I just mean some sort of end that's just gotta happen, y'know. It's very easy to see but everybody doesn't really, uh, doesn't seem like, uh, isn't ever looking at... Well, it's bound to happen, you know, it's bound to happen... anything like this, well, although I don't know talking about the hard rain meaning the atomic rain, seems, y'know, like the bomb is a god in some sort of a way. More of a god that people worship but actually you have to be nice to it, y'know, you could, you have to be careful what you say about it, uh, y'know. People work on it. They go... er... six days a week and work on it, you have other people designing it, you know it's a home phone...

ST: And usually they're pretty good people too and everything like that.

BD: Yeah, yeah. I don't believe they're bad people, no. I don't. Well, just like the guy that killed this fellow hitchhiking through Alabama and with the guy that killed him, er, you know, you can ask me...

ST: It might be the start of what you're saying.

BD: Yeah, er, I figure I don't know his name.

ST: We don't know if he did, but he's the fellow who might well have been... might be, yeah.

BD: Yeah, who might be. I'm not even saying that I know who it is, yeah. Even if it's not him, if it's somebody else, y'know, the fellow that actually shot the bullet, you can't, before you say that, y'know, you can't ask me for something more awful. I mean shot in the back and, er, even that guy, y'know, er, when you see something like that, I think so many people before it got to New York, that are good people that maybe are poor, that maybe are a little poor and there are other people telling them, y'know, that er, why they're poor, y'know, and, and, who made it so that they are poor and to take their minds off it they are poor, they have to pick out, they have to pick a...

ST: But you do believe, Bob, in good and evil?

BD: Oh sure, oh yeah.

ST: There is a base of good in... obviously you do from the songs you write.

BD: Yeah. I think the evil doesn't really... evil is the cause you know.

ST: But, you know what I mean, one of the lines that got me, earlier you said things are not quite as simple as they were... "Executioners faces always well hidden" – that's one of the lines of your song... the song you sing.

BD: All over the place, it's not, it doesn't...

ST: What is that? Where so? Again this comes out... you know it's so impersonal, it's more impersonal today. But you keep on writing these songs. You don't believe... well, I'm asking you what you don't believe or do believe, you said it's going to happen: what's gonna happen?

BD: Well, I hate to think that anything is gonna happen, but at least I recognize that it could happen that, and, er, what's gonna happen... it's got to be, er... there's gotta be an explosion of some kind. The hard rain is gonna fall is in the last verse when I say "when the pellets of poison are flooding the waters". I mean, all the lies, you know, all the lies that people get told on their radios and their newspapers which, all you have to do is just think for a minute, y'know, try and take peoples brains away, y'know, which maybe's been done already. I dunno, maybe, I hate to think it's been done, but all the lies, which are considered poison, y'know, er...

ST: Well, certainly my generation, let's say, the one... I'm fifty, be fifty-one soon... my generation I think has had it and I think I'm talking about you now and your friends, all your friends who, many of the early 20's... 19, 20, 21... how many feel as you do?

BD: Oh! There's an awful lot of them. Well, I know, that I... well, I dunno, you just ask my friends, er my friends...

ST: I don't mean just your circle... you've traveled a good deal.

BD: Oh, I could tell you something about friends. I've got to tell you about, people that I've growed up with, that I've known, y'know, since I've been born five and, er, the same kind of people I knew when I was ten and twelve. It was a little small town, people, y'know and I grew up with...

ST: This was in Hibbing, Minnesota... iron ore country?

BD: Yeah, and some other places I lived in before I finally split for, y'know, good. But, er, these people were my friends. I went to school with them, I lived with them, I played with them, y'know, I ate with them, y'know, y'know, we did good things, bad things, we went through all kinds of things together... and, er, well, y'know... as I stand here right now, er, the last time I saw any of them was maybe 2 or 3 years ago and, er, y'know, neither me or them has changed, y'know.

ST: What's happened to them?

BD: Well, they still seem to be the same old way, y'know, like when they see me, they heard I was in New York, y'know, and they have words like, er... I can just tell by conversation, little conversation, er, that they still have a feeling that isn't really free, y'know. It's not a free feeling that they have. They still have a feeling tied up where it's tied up in the town, in their parents, in the newspapers that they read which go out to maybe five thousand people, er... they don't have to go out of town, the world's very small; you don't have to really. If you leave one town, in another town's the same thing.

ST: The same thing? So there's a kind of sameness too, that you see... that may not have been...

BD: Yeah. I don't put them down... my road and there's is different, it's not the same, like a lot of 'em are married, maybe some of 'em going to school, y'know, er, some are working, y'know, just working, and, er, they're just in a different... they're still there 'though. That's the whole thing.

ST: But what are they thinking, they want to be...

BD: No, they're not thinking, they're not thinking about the same things I'm thinking about.

ST: They're not thinking what you're thinking?

BD: Yeah, I guess...

ST: You've broken those pellets on the water, haven't you? Those poison pellets on the water where they've maybe hit them too, maybe. Or hasn't it?

BD: Oh yes, it has, it hit me. I just got out of it, y'know, I just got out of it, that's all.

ST: Well, as you're talkin', I think your songs as well as your words right now tell the story of your feelings, Bob, it's more of these one... ah... the... Don't Think Twice It's All Right.

BD: Ah, that's one, that's a, yeah.

ST: Now, which one...

BD: Yeah, that's a song I wrote. I wrote that.

ST: Yeah.

BD: Yeah. I lost a nail though. I can't, I don't think I can play...

ST: Ah, that's a difficult one to play.

BD: Not a difficult one to play... just lost this nail here and it's gonna bust off any minute when I might need it, which is why I won't play that.

ST: Well, which is one that, as we're talkin' right now, y'know, about your friends, about yourself.

BD: Oh, you wanna hear one like that.

ST: Yeah, is there a song that, in fact this could be sort of our pattern, I think, you know. You can make the song italicize what you're saying, you see, 'cause pretty much your song and your spoken word go hand in hand... or hand on string. We should point out that this is Friday morning and Bob is at a new place called The Bear, The Bear where L'Arglon once was, is that right, I think it was. You'll be playing there just Friday night. It was last night, then Friday night. No it wasn't. It was just one night. It was last night. However, we hope soon that there'll be a concert of Bob's in Chicago.

Bob sings Bob Dylan's Dream

ST: Bob, the song you just sung is so directly related to what we were just talking about. When did you write that song?

BD: Oh, I wrote that a little while ago. I left a verse or two out of that... it sort of slipped my mind.

ST: But, it seems that you can write about any, it seems, any subject under the sun.

BD: Yeah, anything worth thinking about.

ST: You say "worth thinking about". What do you mean?

BD: Well, it means about everything (laughs).

ST: About everything?

BD: Yeah!

ST: You were ten years old when you saw Woody and somehow the memory stuck in your mind and you were in Hibbing, Minnesota and you said, oh, it was about five years ago, really, that you took to the guitar and the singing.

BD: Oh, no. Oh, no. I took, I just five years ago I, no, yeah, about five years ago I just sorta never really did get... go back home, you know. Five, six, four years ago, it was.

ST: Where you been since?

BD: Well, I've been in New York City for the past almost two years. Before that I was just all around the country, er, the Southlands and I was in Mexico for a while.

ST: These are songs of your observations. Like you've been influenced not only by people like Woody, but Blues singers have influenced you.

BD: Oh yeah. Big Joe Williams. I think you might know him. He lives here, I guess.

ST: Yes, he does.

BD: Yeah. He's an old friend of mine.

ST: Big Joe. You sing... you also take songs, pick traditional songs and make them your own.

BD: Well, not any more.

ST: You did that with Man Of Constant Sorrow.

BD: Oh yeah, that one.

ST: The white spiritual. You took that and made that something wholly different. Well, that's an art in itself. But now... oh, not anymore you say.

BD: No, no. I used to do that for, y'know, for... I did it you know. I did it. I did all that. I was singing, you know, two, three, three years ago I was singing folk songs, y'know, that I learned. Now I don't sing any of them, anymore.

ST: Oh, you don't. Now, it's all your own compositions.

BD: Yeah, yeah.

ST: Well, has it occurred to you that your own songs might be folk songs? That is, we always had this big argument "what is a folk song" and really, in fact, I think your Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall certainly would be one, you know, if time was the test.

BD: Yeah, yeah. Time,... should be the test.

ST: What is one... you say any subject... a love song, let's say. Let's say a love song.

BD: Yeah, wanna hear a love song?

ST: Yeah. You see, here you're talkin' about Hard Rain's and this is something that involves all mankind. One you sang about old friends and changes and I could see them. And now boy meets girl. Here's Bob Dylan... boy meets girl.

BD: This is a girl leaves boy.

ST: Girl leaves boy?

BD: Yeah.

ST: I won't ask if this is autobiographical.

BD: This is called Boots Of Spanish Leather.

ST: Boots Of Spanish Leather... Gypsy Davey.

BD: Yeah.

ST: A line from it.

BD: Yeah... (strums)... No, not because of that... because I always wanted a pair of boots of Spanish leather.
ST: Ah!

Bob plays Boots Of Spanish Leather

ST: There we have a song of lovers farewell, as far, far removed from the June, moon, spoon theme and that way of writing. I suppose it's difficult for you to answer, Bob, what led you to the idea of writing these songs? Was it always with you?
BD: Well, no, er, yes it's always been with me. I can't really say what led me to... I can only say that I look to do a lot of things, y'know... er... er... I'm one of those people that thinks that everybody has certain gifts, y'know, when they're born and, er, get enough trouble trying to find out just what it is. I figured first it was... er... I used to play the guitar when I was ten, y'know, so I figured well maybe my thing is playing the guitar... maybe that's my little gift, y'know, like, like, somebody can make a cake, y'know or somebody else can saw a tree down and, y'know,, and, er, other people write and... nobody's really got the right to say that any of these gifts are any better than any other body's, y'know... 'cause they're all... you get 'em, y'know. That's just the way they're distributed out and everybody gets the same thing. And I'd say that this is exactly what my gift is. Maybe I got a better gift but as of right now I ain't found it.
ST: That's plenty good enough. Yeah, I'm thinking about this little piece of...
BD: I didn't call it a gift, y'know, I didn't call it a gift. That's only my way of trying to explain something that's very hard to explain.
ST: There's a piece you wrote called My Life In A Stolen Minute.
BD: Oh yeah.
ST: I assume a great deal of this is autobiographical. Is this all memories?
BD: Yeah. I wrote that for the Town Hall concert I gave in New York City.
ST: Hey, there's Duluth, an iron ore shipping town in Minnesota. That's where you came. And you say "I wrote my first song about my mother and I titled that Mother and I wrote that fifth grade and teacher gave me B+. I started eleven years old... I stopped once just to catch my breath. Now I don't remember my parents singing too much, at least I don't remember swapping any songs with them". And this, of course, is the opposite of what has been a type, let's say, a singer who has learned from parents... hasn't happened at all, there was no connection...
BD: Well, much, no... it's... I never... exactly as it says... I never really did.
ST: Somewhere along the line, man, you were playing guitar when you were ten and the writing of songs came out.
BD: Ahmm, I just write. I wrote for a long time. I've been writing for a long time.
ST: "I sat in a science class and flunked out for refusing to watch a rabbit die."
BD: Mmm, that's my college days. I only was there for about four months. I never really was registered, y'know, but I really did get to see it which... If I talk about colleges I ain't talkin' about them because I dislike them for anything people have told me. I was actually there and I see'd what was going on, y'know.
ST: But this is interesting, see, you did go, what, for a year or so?
BD: No I went for about three months.
ST: You went for three months. The reason I ask is, someone'll say "Well, listen to Bob Dylan, he's talkin' mountain talk now, though he's a highly literate and educated man", see.
BD: Oh yeah!
ST: Well, how would you answer that one?
BD: I don't think I am.
ST: How would you answer that when they say that?

BD: I got no answer. If they want to think I'm highly literate, yeah, that's okay by me... I don't...

ST: Now, the feeling is that you didn't have education. I thought the fact that you find it easier for you to... makes it, makes, there's no rule... it's probably just easier for you to express your feelings this way; just the way you're talking. Y'know, I suppose the influence of a great many of the singers...

BD: Woody.

ST: Woody, Woody perhaps. The fact that Woody more than college for three months was the big influence on you...

BD: Oh yeah. Woody Guthrie is perhaps the biggest influence on...

ST: Did Woody, er, did Woody hear you sing some of these songs?

BD: Well. Every time I go sing any songs I wrote for Woody, he always wants to hear Song For Woody.

ST: Y'know, there's no harm in that at all. A Song For Woody... now here's a case of a tribute of a young and, I use the term advisedly and properly I think, young folk poet in you, Bob Dylan, tribute to an older one who has meant so much to him. Do you remember the words of that Woody song?

BD: Yeah, I do, but I never sing it. I made that a point.

ST: You don't sing it?

BD: I only sing it to Woody. I've recorded it.

ST: I know you recorded it. You couldn't sing that now?

BD: No. I er...

ST: Well, we'll play, we'll play the recording of that at some other date then. But coming back to you, Bob, I asked you of that song deliberately, specifically to sing about daily endeavors, you know, as well as this big mural, this tapestry you put in the song... There's one that I heard you do called John Brown. It was not about John Brown, Gods' angry man... it's not... you wrote... you know... we think of John Brown, the original John Brown, saber down while fighting for the freedom of three million enslaved Americans.

BD: Mmm, no, no, that's not the fellow. This is true.

ST: I know, I know, I say. This is the other... now there's another John Brown you sing about, right?

BD: Yeah. That's the one that is a true guy.

ST: This is the true John Brown. Whether it's the John Brown you sing about.

BD: Yeah. The one I sing about is true actually.

ST: Oh, that's the one you knew?

BD: I didn't know him. I knew of him. Yeah, I knew of him.

ST: Do you remember that song? 'Cause that's a powerful one.

BD: Mmm, I guess I do remember...

ST: Will you try that one?

BD: I'll try.

ST: That's a powerful one. I know we're doing this program on the fly because it's, er... because you have to be elsewhere very soon, but, I think, in hearing you sing these songs, Bob, we know more about you as well as there is all of what you're saying too.

Bob sings John Brown.

ST: Bob, as you sing that, I think of some song of a wholly different world yet the same, you know, Johnny I Hardly Knew You...

BD: Yeah. I heard that one.

ST: Yet you're saying the same thing in your own way. I suppose in this hour program we can have just a few of the songs... How many have you written so far, Bob?

BD: Oh!

ST: In twenty-one years. In your twenty-one years?

BD: The ones I've got... out of the ones I've got, I could tell you, but the ones I actually have, the ones I've written down and the publishers have, must be about seventy five.

ST: Seventy five. What are you doin'? You're writing almost all of the time.

BD: Yeah. I'm writing a book now.

ST: You're writing a book?

BD: Yeah.

ST: And what would the book be, an autobiography?

BD: Yeah, it's about my first week in New York.

ST: What, your first week in New York?

BD: Yeah.

ST: Oh, that's a very funny song, it's a funny sad song that you sing called, it's a talking song isn't it, New York Town.

BD: Oh yeah; it's not that kind of, it's not, it's got more to it than that. It's got not too much music in it, except, maybe, y'know, a couple of chapters there... a couple of chapters maybe.

ST: But this book involves what, your observations about the Big City, erm?

BD: No, not even about the Big City. The Big City's got nothing to do with it. It's just about somebody who's come to the end of one road, y'know, and actually knows it's the end of one road and, er, knows there's another road there but doesn't exactly know where it is. He knows he can't go back on this one road.

ST: Er, it's due to a new birth then...

BD: Yeah, sort of.

ST: It was... he... that's one life; that's over and he, he knows there's something else.

BD: He knows there's, well... it's got all kinds of stuff in it which just doesn't add up, y'know, all kinds. It's got thoughts in my head, y'know, all about teachers and school, y'know, and all about hitchhikers around the county, y'know, all about, er, these are friends of mine too, y'know, er, college kids, y'know, going to college... it's got... and these are all people that I knew. Every one of them sort of called a symbol, I guess, maybe called symbol... for all kinds of 'em... people like that. And in New York, New York's like a different world, y'know, especially, I've never been in New York before and I'm still carrying them memories with me, so I decided I oughta write it all down.

ST: So it...

BD: It doesn't really concern... it's not about New York... it's like... it's like, more...

ST: But New York was the reason for your writing, was the cause of the writing it. But it's about, as you say, you're looking... when you say you're looking, you feel a great many of your contemporaries, is that it, fellows like you are looking for that road, they don't know quite what it is. Is that it?

BD: Yeah, that's... the road's very hard to find now. I guess it would be. Maybe sometimes I wish that, er, this was nineteen, er, something else.

ST: Thirty.

BD: Before that, when, seems like, y'know, like when I was talkin' of a nail in a board. Seems like there's a board there and, er, all the nails are pounded in all over the place, y'know, and, er, every new person that comes round that pounds in a nail finds that there's one less space, y'know, and, er, I hope we haven't got to the end of the space yet.

ST: You're looking for a fresh, er fresh piece of wood or something like that... I think.

BD: No. I'm content with the same ol' piece of wood. I just want to... er, find another place to pound in a nail.

ST: Place to pound the nail. Isn't that what most of them are looking for, a place to pound the nail?

BD: Yeah

ST: Well, I think, Bob, in your songs, you're saying this and I think in every one of the songs you write...

BD: Some of the people are the nails.
(Laughter obscures next piece of dialogue about people being nails)

ST: I think you point out that the new Columbia, it's a forthcoming Columbia album, isn't it, has people who are the nails, Oxford Town for one, that deals with the Meredith case. You have one called Masters Of War. That's a very hard living song.

BD: Yeah, well it deals with the Meredith case but then again it doesn't.

ST: It doesn't. You mean it's beyond that?

BD: Yeah, it's... you know, like music, like my writing and that, is nothing, like this guitar I don't consider sacred, y'know, like this guitar could bust and break. It's pretty old now. I could still get another one, y'know. It's a tool, that's all it is. It's just my tool, it's like anybody else has a tool. Some people saw the trees down, you know or some people spit tacks, y'know and I go to cut the tree down and I cut myself on the saw, y'know. I spit tacks an* I swallow the tacks, y'know. So I've just sort of got this here tool and that's all I use it as. It's a tool. My life is the street where I walk, y'know.

ST: Your life is the street where you walk?

BD: Yeah. That's my life, music... guitar, that's my tool, y'know.

ST: You said Oxford Town is not about the Meredith case but more than that.

BD: Oxford Town is not about the Meredith case. It's about, yeah, it's about, you could... I wrote that a long, long time... I wrote that, when was it... when that happened, and I could have written that yesterday. It's still the same. Why doesn't somebody investigate soon, y'know, that's a verse in the song. That's the last verse, y'know and, er... somebody had better investigate soon.

ST: It seems that all your songs are about more than the actual event that may have caused it. Do you know what I mean?

BD: I've got a song about Davey Moore.

ST: Davey Moore the fighter?

BD: Yeah. The guy that... I'll sing that one for you.

ST: Alright. This was the featherweight... was he featherweight champ? Davey Moore who was killed in the prize ring that night of the three championship fights and there's been this campaign...

BD: But then again, I, I'm not a topical song writer.

ST: I'll ask you about that after Davey Moore. Oh not, you're not, you're not a topical song writer?

BD: No. I don't even like that word.

ST: I mean, it's not a song about a certain event.

BD: It's not. No.

ST: Beyond that.

Bob sings Who Killed Davey Moore

ST: Oh boy, that's the story of mankind maybe you were talking about?

BD: I don't know about that.

ST: You know this is more than, more than about boxing. Remember way back you said that "the face of the executioner is always well hidden".

BD: Yeah.

ST: Here we come back to it again. Who killed Cock Robin, who killed Davey Moore. I think, Bob Dylan, we have just the touch of you now and I hope this is chapter one involving your visits to Chicago, er, singer, poet, songs and soon there will be a concert of his in town which we'll, of course, keep the audience informed about. What's one way to sign off? Remember you signed on, er, singing the song, sort of travelin'; anything that you feel like, just a signing off. We've heard about maybe half a dozen of the seventy five songs that are out of you and in you and part of you, Bob Dylan.

BD: Sign off, er, let's see... I hate to sing a song for signing off, y'know. I never...

ST: It's not much of a signing off. It's not a question of signing off. It's a question of, say, walking off for the moment. You need not. But I think that what I've been saying about you Bob is merely what some of the others, Bob Shelton of the New York Times, Barry Kittleson of Billboard, more than that, people who've seen you and whose opinions I respect – artists like Pete Seeger and Will Holt who sing your songs er, their way and point out where they come from. And you yourself can't tell exactly where they come from.

BD: No I can't. Pete can do it. Pete can do it.

ST: He can? Well the fact is, the source is there. Bob, thank you and even if you don't sing a song we'll be playing a record to sign you off.

BD: Thank you.

ST: But what is... I don't wanna leave him go just yet... I'm thinking of one, er, of the songs you sing, there's Tomorrow's A Long Time, there's, er...

BD: Oh, Blowin' In The Wind, there's one. I'll sing you that one.

ST: Oh! Of course! Isn't that one... isn't that a popular song. That's a popular song now I believe. Isn't it?

BD: God, I hope not.

ST: No, by popular I mean in a good sense; a lotta people are singing it, I mean to say.

BD: Oh yeah, that one.

ST: Blowin' In The Wind. I think this is one... Blowin' In The Wind. This is my way of saying to you right now, so long Bob Dylan, for now. To use a Woody phrase – "Take it easy but take it". I use that as a sign-off... A borrowing from Woody who would have since borrowed it from American history. So Blowin' Down The Wind... called Blowin' In... Blowin' In The Wind. Blowin' In The Wind. This is Bob Dylan. So long Bob.

Bob plays Blowin' In The Wind.

LET US NOW PRAISE LITTLE MEN

FOLK SINGERS

There he stands, and who can believe him? Black corduroy cap, green corduroy shirt, blue corduroy pants. Hard-lick guitar, whooping harmonica, skinny little voice. Beardless chin, shaggy sideburns, porcelain pussycat eyes. At 22, he looks 14, and his accent belongs to a jive Nebraskan, or maybe a Brooklyn hillbilly. He is a dime-store philosopher, a drugstore cowboy, a men's room conversationalist. And when he describes his young life, he declares himself dumfounded at the spectacle. "With my thumb out, my eyes asleep, my hat turned up an' my head turned on," says Bob Dylan, "I's driftin' and learnin' new lessons."

Something Unique. There is something faintly ridiculous about such a citybilly, yet Dylan is the newest hero of an art that has made a fetish out of authenticity. Last week he was on the road again, having survived a crucial audience of aficionados at the Monterey Folk Festival, competing with such champions of folk-and fakelore as The Weavers, Bill Monroe, Mance Lipscomb, and Peter, Paul and Mary. Nearly everyone sang better, and The Weavers drew more applause. But Bob Dylan was there with three of his songs, and when he sang them, a crowd of 5,200 rewarded him with earnest and ardent applause.

At its very best, his voice sounds as if it were drifting over the walls of a tuberculosis sanitarium—but that's part of the charm. Sometimes he lapses into a scrawny Presleyan growl, and sometimes his voice simply sinks into silence beneath the pile-driver chords he plays on his guitar. But he has something unique to say, and he says it in songs of his own invention that are the best songs of their style since Woody Guthrie's.

Kneed in the Guts. Dylan was born in Duluth but spent most of his youth in Hibbing, Minn. He started playing the guitar when he was ten, he says, adding that "the only trouble with playin' guitar is that you can't get the cheerleader girls." He ran away from home at 10, 12, 13, IS, 15½ 17 and 18; he was, as he says, "caught an' brought back all but once." In his self-portrait in verse, My Life in a Stolen Minute, he recalls the events of his youth:

> I started smoking at eleven years old an' only stopped once to catch my breath...
> I fell hard for an actress girl who kneed me in the guts...
> I rode freight trains for kicks
> An' got beat up for laughs.

A couple of years ago, he made a pilgrimage to New York to visit Woody Guthrie, his spiritual leader, lying ill of Huntington's chorea. Seeing Guthrie and sleeping in the subways became his twin pleasures, and he began to sing for money in Greenwich Village coffeehouses. "Man, I could whip anybody. I was at the high point of my life from seein' Woody. He ain't a folk singer—he's a genius genius genius genius."

Whole Lost Crowd. By careful standards, Dylan ain't a folk singer either, and he may not even be a genius genius. An atmosphere of the ersatz surrounds him, and his citified fans have an unhappy tendency to drop their g's when praisin' him —but only because they cannot resist imitatin' him.

But his mannerisms matter far less than the value of his honest complaints. He is an advocate of little men, and if he remains one himself, it only enriches the ring of his lyrics—as in his best song, Blowin' in the Wind, an anthem for the whole lost crowd he speaks for:

How many ears must one man have
Before he can hear people cry?
How many deaths will it take 'til he knows
That too many people have died?
The answer, my friend, is blowin' in the wind,
The answer is blowin' in the wind.

FREE WHEELING BOB DYLAN

Of all the precipitously emergent singers of folk songs in the continuing renascence of that self-assertive tradition, none has equalled Bob Dylan in singularity of impact. As Harry Jackson, a cowboy singer and a painter, has exclaimed: "He's so goddamned real, it's unbelievable!" The irrepressible reality of Bob Dylan is a compound of spontaneity, candour, slicing wit and an uncommonly perceptive eye and ear for the way many of us constrict our capacity for living while a few of us don't.

Not yet twenty-two at the time of this album's release, Dylan is growing at a swift, experience-hungry rate. In these performances, there is already a marked change from his first album ("Bob Dylan," BPG62022/SBPG62022 [Stereo]), and here will surely be many further dimensions of Dylan to come. What makes this collection particularly arresting is that it consists in large part of Dylan's own compositions. The resurgence of topical folk songs has become a pervasive part of the folk movement among city singers, but few of the young bards so far have demonstrated a knowledge of the difference between well-intentioned pamphleteering and the creation of a valid musical experience. Dylan has. As the highly critical editors of Little Sandy Review have noted, "...right now, he is certainly our finest contemporary folk song writer. Nobody else really ever comes close."

The details of Dylan's biography were summarised in the notes to his first CBS album; but to recapitulate briefly, he was born on May 24, 1941, in Duluth, Minnesota. His experience with adjusting himself to new sights and sounds started early. During his first nineteen years, he lived in Gallup, New Mexico; Cheyenne, South Dakota; Sioux Falls, South Dakota; Phillipsburg, Kansas; Hibbing, Minnesota (where he was graduated from high school), and Minneapolis (where he spent a restless six months at the University of Minnesota).

"Everywhere he went," Gil Turner wrote in his article on Dylan in Sing Out, "his ears were wide open for the music around him. He listened to blues singers, cowboy singers, pop singers and others—soaking up music styles with an uncanny memory and facility for assimilation. Gradually, his own preferences developed and became more clear, the strongest areas being Negro blues and country music. Among the musicians and singers who influenced him were Hank Williams, Muddy Waters, Jelly Roll Morton, Leadbelly, Manes Lipscombe and Big Joe Williams." And, above all others, Woody Guthrie. At ten he was playing guitar, and by the age of fifteen, Dylan had taught himself piano, harmonica and autoharp.

In February, 1961 Dylan came East, primarily to visit Woody Guthrie at the Greystone Hospital in New Jersey. The visits have continued, and Guthrie has expressed approval of Dylan's first album, being particularly fond of the "Song to Woody" in it. By September of 1961, Dylan's singing in Greenwich Village, especially at Gerdes Folk City, had ignited a nucleus of singers and a few critics (notably Bob Shelton of the New York Times) into exuberant appreciation of his work. Since then, Dylan has inexorably increased the scope of his American audiences while also performing briefly in London and Rome.

The first of Dylan's songs in this set is Blowin' in the Wind. In 1962, Dylan said of the song's background: "I still say that some of the biggest criminals are those that turn their heads away when they see wrong and know it's wrong. I'm only 21 years old and I know that there's been too many wars... You people over 21 should know better." All he prefers to add by way of commentary now is: "The first way to answer these questions in the song is by asking them. But lots of people have to first find the wind." On this track, and except when otherwise noted, Dylan is heard alone—accompanying himself on guitar and harmonica.

Girl from the North Country was first conceived by Bob Dylan about three years before he finally wrote it down in December, 1962. "That often happens," he explains. "I carry a song in my head for a long time and then it comes bursting out." The song—and Dylan's performance—reflect his particular kind of lyricism. The mood is a fusion of yearning, poignancy and simple appreciation of a beautiful girl. Dylan illuminates all these corners of his vision, but simultaneously retains his bristling sense of self. He's not about to go begging anything from this girl up north.

Masters of War startles Dylan himself. "I've never really written anything like that before," he recalls. "I don't sing songs which hope people will die, but couldn't help at in this one. The song is a sort of striking out, a reaction to the last straw, a feeling of what can you do?" The rage (which is as much anguish as it is anger) is a way of catharsis, a way of getting temporary relief from the heavy feeling of impotence that affects many who cannot understand a civilisation which juggles its own means for oblivion and calls that performance an act toward peace.

Down the Highway is a distillation of Dylan's feeling about the blues. "The way I think about the blues," he says, "comes from what I learned from Big Joe Williams. The blues is more than something to sit home and arrange. What made the real blues singers so great is that they were able to state all the problems they had; but at the same time, they were standing outside of them and could look at them. And in that way, they had them beat. What's depressing today is that many young singers are trying to get inside the blues, forgetting that those older singers used them to get outside their troubles."

Bob Dylan's Blues was composed spontaneously. It's one of what he calls his "really off-the-cuff songs, I start with an idea, and then I feel what follows. Best way I can describe this one is that it's sort of like walking by a side street. You gaze in and walk on."

A Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall represents to Dylan a maturation of his feelings on this subject since the earlier and almost as powerful Let Me Die in My Footsteps, which is not included here. Unlike most of his song-writing contemporaries among city singers, Dylan doesn't simply make a polemical point in his compositions. As in this song about the psycopathology of peace-through-balance-of-terror, Dylan's images are multiply (and sometimes horrifyingly) evocative. As a result, by transmuting his fierce convictions into what can only be called art, Dylan reaches basic emotions which few political statements or extrapolations of statistics have so far been able to touch. Whether a song or a singer can then convert others it something else again.

"Hard Rain," adds Dylan, "is a desperate kind of song." It was written during the Cuban missile crisis of October, 1962 when those who allowed themselves to think of the possible results of the Kennedy-Khrushchev confrontation were chilled by the imminence of oblivion. "Every line in it," says Dylan. "is actually the start of a whole song. But when I wrote it, I thought I wouldn't have enough time alive so write all those songs so I put all I could into this one."

Dylan treats Don't Think Twice, It's Alt Right differently from most city singers. "A lot of people," he says, "make it sort of a love song—slow and easy-going. But it isn't a love song.

It's a statement that maybe you can say to make yourself feel better. It's as if you were talking to yourself. It's a hard song to sing. I can sing it sometimes, but I ain't that good yet. I don't carry myself yet the way that Big Joe Williams, Woody Guthrie, Leadbelly and Lightnin' Hopkins have carried themselves. I hope to be able to someday, but they're older people. I sometimes am able to do it, but it happens, when it happens, unconsciously. You see, in time, with those older singers, music was a tool—a way to live more, a way to make themselves feel better at certain points. As for me, I can make myself feel better some times, but at other times, it's still hard to go to sleep at night." Dylan's accompaniment on this track includes Bruce Langhorne (guitar), George Barnes (bass guitar), Dick Wellstood (piano), Gene Ramey (bass), and Herb Lovelle (drums).

Bob Dylan's Dream is another of his songs which was transported for a time in his mind before being written down. It was initially set off after an all-night conversation between Dylan and Oscar Brown, Jr., in Greenwich Village. "Oscar," says Dylan, "is a groovy guy and the idea of this came from what we were talking about." The song slumbered, however, until Dylan went to England in the winter of 1962. There he heard a singer (whose name he recalls as Martin Carthy) perform Lord Franklin, and that old melody found a new adapted home in Bob Dylan's Dream. The song is a fond looking back at the easy camaraderie and idealism of the young when they are young. There is also in the Dream a wry but sad requiem for the friendships that have evaporated as different routes, geographical and otherwise, are taken.

Of Oxford Town, Dylan notes with laughter that "it's a banjo tune I play on the guitar." Otherwise, this account of the ordeal of James Meredith speaks grimly for itself.

Talking World War III Blues was about half formulated beforehand and half improvised at the recording session itself. The "talking blues" form is tempting to many young singers because it seems so pliable and yet so simple. However, the simpler a form, the more revealing it is of the essence of the performer. There's no place to hide in the talking blues. Because Bob Dylan is so hugely and quixotically himself, he is able to fill all the space the talking blues affords with unmistakable originality. In this piece, for example, he has singularly distilled the way we all wish away our end, thermo-nuclear or "natural." Or at least, the way we try to.

Corrina, Corrina has been considerably changed by Dylan. "I'm not one of those guys who goes around changing songs just for the sake of changing them. But I'd never heard Corrina, Corrina exactly the way it first was, so that this version lathe way it came out of me." As he indicates here, Dylan can be tender without being sentimental and his lyricism is laced with unabashed passion. The accompaniment a Dick Wellstood (piano), Howie Collins (guitar), Bruce Langhorne (guitar), Leonard Gaskin (bass) and Herb Lovelle (drums).

Honey, Just Allow Me One More Chance was first heard by Dylan from a recording by a now-dead Texas blues singer. Dylan can only remember that his first name was Henry. "What especially stayed with me," says Dylan, "was the plea in the title." Here Dylan distills the buoyant expectancy at the love search.

Unlike some of his contemporaries, Dylan isn't limited to one or two ways of feeling in music. He ran be poignant and mocking, angry and exultant, reflective and whoopingly joyful. The final I Shall Be Free is another of Dylan's off-the-cuff songs in which he demonstrates the vividness, unpredictability and cutting edge of his wit.

This album, in sum, is the protean Bob Dylan as of the time of the recording. By the next recording, there will be more new songs and insights and experiences. Dylan can't stop searching and looking and reflecting upon what he sees and hears. "Anything I can sing," he observes, "I call a song. Anything I can't sing, I call a poem. Anything I can't sing or anything that's too long to be a poem, I call a novel. But my novels don't have the usual story-lines. They're about my feelings at a certain place at a certain time."

In addition to his singing and song writing, Dylan is working on three "novels." One is about the week before he first came to New York and his initial week in that city. Another is about South Dakota people he knew. And the third is about New York and a trip from New York to New Orleans.

Throughout everything he writes and sings, there is the surge of a young man looking into as many diverse scenes and people as he can find ("Every once in a while I got to ramble around") and of a man looking into himself. "The most important thing I know I learned from Woody Guthrie," says Dylan. "I'm my own person. I've got basic common rights—whether I'm here in this country or any other place. I'll never finish saying everything I feel, but I'll be doing my part to make some sense out of the way we're living, and not living, now. All I'm doing is saying what's on my mind the best way I know how. And whatever else you say about me, everything I do and sing and write comes out of me."

It is this continuing explosion of a total individual, a young man growing free rather then absurd, that makes Bob Dylan so powerful and so personal and so important a singer. As you can bear in these performances.

NAT HENTOFF

"Outtake" paragraphs from the withdrawn album release follow. The "" indicate words trimmed in* The Telegraph.

Solid Rock ("Rocks and Gravel") is partly due to Big Joe Williams. "I learned one verse of this from him," says Dylan, "and the rest I put together out of lines that seemed to go with the story." Dylan has known Big Joe Williams from the time he ran away from Minnesota to Chicago at the age of ten. He saw Big Joe Williams on the street and was soon accompanying him with two teaspoons. Dylan was back home within three months, but he wandered again; and his odyssey with Big Joe Williams and other experiences of his young traveling, years will undoubtedly form one of the books he is writing and planning. This performance further demonstrates how forcefully Dylan has been able to assimilate influences and then shape a style and thrust that in compellingly his own. The accompaniment here includes: Bruce Langhorne (guitar), George Barnes (bass guitar), Dick Wellstood (piano), Art Davis (bass), Herb Lovelle (drums).

Different spelling of the song underlined and an extra sentence in italics:

Hard Rain Gonna Fall represents to Dylan a maturation of his feelings on this subject since the earlier ~~(and almost as powerful)~~ Let Me Die in My Footsteps~~(, which is not included here)~~. (Hard Rain was recorded on December 6, 1962, while Let Me Die was cut on April 26 of the same year). Unlike most of his song-writing contemporaries among city singers, Dylan doesn't simply make a polemical point in his compositions. As in this song about the psycopathology of peace-through-balance-of-terror, Dylan's images are multiply (and sometimes horrifyingly) evocative. As a result, by transmuting his fierce convictions into what can only be called art, Dylan reaches basic emotions which few political statements or extrapolations of statistics have so far been able to touch. Whether a song or a singer can then convert others it something else again.

Let Me Die In My Footsteps is, for this listener, one of Dylan's more mesmeric songs. In May, 1962, Dylan wrote:

> This song has been on my mind for about two years. I was in Kansas. Phillipsburg or Marysville, I think. I was going through some town out there and they were making this bomb shelter right outside town, one of those sort of Coliseum-type things and there were construction workers and everything. I was there for about an hour, just looking at them build and I guess I just wrote the song in my head back then, but I carried it with me for two years until I finally wrote it down.
> As I watched them building, it struck me sort of funny that they would concentrate so much on digging a hole underground when there were so many other things they should do in life. If nothing else, they could look at the sky, and walk around and live a little bit instead of doing this immoral thing. I guess that it's just that you can lead a lot of people by the hand. They don't even really know what they're scared of.
> I'd like to say that here is one song that I am really glad I made a record of. I don't consider anything that I write political. But even if I couldn't hardly sing a note, or even if I couldn't stand on my feet, this is one song that people won't have to look at me or even listen closely or even like me, to understand.

Dylan treats Don't Think Twice, It's Alt Right differently from most city singers. "A lot of people," he says, "make it sort of a love song—slow and easy-going. But it isn't a love song. It's a statement that maybe you can say to make yourself feel better. It's as if you were talking to yourself. It's a hard song to sing. I can sing it sometimes, but I ain't that good yet. I don't carry myself yet the way that Big Joe Williams, Woody Guthrie, Leadbelly and Lightnin' Hopkins have carried themselves. I hope to be able to someday, but they're older people. I sometimes am able to do it, but it happens, when it happens, unconsciously. You see, in time, with those older singers, music was a tool—a way to live more, a way to make themselves feel better at certain points. As for me, I can make myself feel better some times, but at other times, it's still hard to go to sleep at night." Dylan's accompaniment on this ~~track includes Bruce Langhorne (guitar), George Barnes (bass guitar), Dick Wellstood (piano), Gene Ramey (bass), and Herb Lovelle (drums)~~ is the same as on Solid Rock, except that Gene Ramey, the bassist.

Gamblin' Willie is about an uncle of Dylan's. A major po* pop music tried to get Dylan to make changes in the song so that it might become more commercial. Dylan refused in sho* could have been asked. "After all," he says, "this was about a person, and this is the way it was. Every place has its own Willies, and I'm sure everybody knows some Gamblin' Willies." On this track and on Talkin' John Birch Society Blues, Dylan is accompanied by bassist Rill Lee.

The wry puncturing of contemporary demonology in Talkin' John Birch Society Blues requires no additional commentary.

ONLY HUMAN
DRIFTIN' AND LEARNIN'

All things that once churned inside Bob Dylan when he was knocking about America are pouring from him now.

These past six years he's written over a hundred songs, with rare perception, covering everything from nuclear fallout and integration to lover's lament or his own loneliness.

Some like Hard Rains Are Going To Fall are in his current best-selling album, The Free Wheelin' Bob Dylan. Others, like Blowin' In The Wind and Don't Think Twice, It's All Right are hits by Peter, Paul And Mary, and Bobby Darin.

Dylan is twenty-one, wears faded dungarees, uncut hair, an assumed hillbilly accent, and has been on and off resident in Greenwich Village (where else?) for over two years. Before that he was trying to cover every highroad and by way of the country.

"The itch to move, to see, and hear, was always there," he says. "But I didn't want to see the atomic bathrooms and electronic bedrooms and souped up can-openers; I wanted to watch and feel the people and the dust and ditches and the fields and fences."

His parents and a younger brother are still in Hibbing, Minnesota, where he first tried to leave when he was ten, with his guitar and harmonica. He got 900 miles away before police picked him up and sent him home by train.

"I got walloped, but not hard enough to make me stay," Dylan says, "I took off again at 12 and five times after that, getting caught and walloped each time. But when I was 18 I made it."

He touched about every state, trying to earn his keep by telling stories of what he saw, but eating more regularly when he trimmed hedges, mowed lawns, or any work he could get. His first New York job earned him $2 for a one-night stand in a village coffee joint. When another folk singer made a record for Columbia he was asked to accompany her on the harmonica. Columbia signed him. He made his first album and was given a Town Hall debut.

The program notes about himself came from My Life In A Stolen Minute a long autobiographical poem. Part of it goes: "With my thumb out, my eyes asleep, my hat turned up an' my head turned on, I'se driftin' an' learnin' new lessons."

His voice is small, but telling, and what he sings in his own penetrating way has all the bright rhythm of a poet aware of the world.

Since his Town Hall appearance he has appeared at colleges and folk festivals, coast-to-coast, and in London and Rome. He has been on the Ed Sullivan Show; on stage at Carnegie Hall. He gives a second Carnegie Hall concert next October 27. Of late he has shown up on the same stage with Joan Baez in "impromptu-on-purpose."

After his first album, titled simply Bob Dylan, he concluded "That's not me. There was only a couple of my stories on it." He was happier with his second: "I wrote all the stories except for one or two songs."

His songs always start as stories. When he was on the road he became a fine teller of other people's stories. But he quit that.

"Because Dickens and Dostoyevsky and Woody Guthrie were telling their stories much better than I ever could," Bob Dylan says, "I decided to stick to my own mind."

4 November 1963
Andrea Svedburg Interview, New York City, New York

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke pp. 35-37

Seeking favorable publicity for Dylan, Billy James and John Kurland of Columbia Records approached Newsweek to run a cover story. Their researcher, Andrea Svedburg, was appointed to this task. She interviewed Dylan on October 23rd or 24th 1963. Her article, published on November 4th turned out to be anything other than good publicity for Dylan. To use Robert Shelton's words:

> "The story, on November 4, 1963, turned into a hatchet job that threw Dylan into depression, ruptured his contact with his family, interrupted his relationship with Billy James for almost two years, drove Grossman further into distrust of the Press, embarrassed Newsweek, and led to a new era of tortuous relations between the musician and the media. Dylan turned from an accessible subject into a cagey game-player who toyed with interview questions, who developed the outrageous 'anti-interview', saying shocking, even deleterious things, things he often didn't believe. He became dubious that even the emerging underground press could understand him... The article was illustrated with a photo of Dylan recording, above the caption 'Bob Dylan: What's in a Name?' The imputation that he had stolen Blowin' In The Wind was the Coup de Grace."

The Newsweek article angered Dylan intensely. To quote Spitz, Dylan was "feeling deflated and very pissed-off". This experience certainly affected his subsequent relationship with the Press and helped to develop his "party-game" approach to future interviews and press-conferences. Dylan did not publicly retaliate but he did respond with Epitaph 9 of Eleven Outlined Epitaphs, written as liner notes to accompany The Times They Are A-Changin'. It is also believed that the last verse of Restless Farewell was a direct response to the Newsweek article:

> "Oh a false clock tries to tick out my time
> To disgrace, distract and bother me.
> And the dirt of gossip blows into my face,
> And the dust of rumors covers me."

I Am My Words

He popped out of nowhere, another unknown, unscrubbed face in Greenwich Village, and now, only two years later, he sits in the pantheon of the folk-music movement. His name is Bob Dylan, he is 22 years old, and his bewildered brown hair trails off into uneven sideburns. He sticks his skinny frame into blue jeans and wrinkled shirts, and he talks hip talk, punctuated with obscenities. His singing voice scratches and shouts so jarringly that his success, at first, seems incredible. Yet his knack for stirring audiences is unmistakable, and it stems, mainly, from the words of the some 200 songs he has written, simple words that pounce upon the obvious – the inequalities, dangers and deceits of the 1960's – and hammer them home.

> How many years can some people exist
> Before they're allowed to be free?...
> The answer, my friend, is blowin' in the wind,
> The answer is blowin' in the wind...

His Blowin' in the Wind is a huge hit, and his concerts – last week at Town Hall in Philadelphia and at Carnegie Hall – draw sellout crowds, mostly high-school and college students to whom Dylan is practically a religion. He has suffered; he has been hung up, man, without bread, without a chick, with twisted wires growing inside him. His audiences share his pain, and seem jealous because they grew up in conventional homes and conventional schools.

The ironic thing is that Bob Dylan, too, grew up in a conventional home, and went to conventional schools. He shrouds his past in contradictions, but he is the elder son of a Hibbing, Minn. appliance dealer named Abe Zimmerman, and, as Robert Zimmerman, he attended Hibbing High School, then briefly the University of Minnesota.

'Dig It, Man': Dylan admits he was born in Duluth and raised in Hibbing, but as he sat in a New York restaurant one day last week, after a recording session with Columbia Records, he denied that Bob Dylan was ever Bobby Zimmerman. "Dig my draft card, man," he said. "Bob Dylan". (He changed his name legally on Aug. 9, 1962)

His parents? "I don't know my parents", he said. "They don't know me. I've lost contact with them for years."

A few blocks away, in one of New York's motor inns, Mr. and Mrs. Abe Zimmerman of Hibbing, Minn., were looking forward to seeing their son sing at Carnegie Hall. Bobby had paid their way east and had sent them tickets, they had told friends in Minnesota. "He was home a few days in August", said David Zimmerman, Bobby's 17 year-old brother. "We were kind of close. We're both kind of ambitious. When we set out to do something, we usually get it done. He set out to become what he is."

"My past is so complicated you wouldn't believe it, man," said Dylan.

"Bobby is hard to understand," said David Zimmerman.

The Image: Why Dylan – he picked the name in admiration for Dylan Thomas – should bother to deny his past is a mystery. Perhaps he feels it would spoil the image he works so hard to cultivate – with his dress, with his talk, with the deliberately atrocious grammar and pronunciation in his songs. He says he hates the commercial side of folk music, but he has two agents who hover about him, guarding his words and fattening his contracts. He scorn's the press's interest in him, but he wants to know how long a story about him will run and if there will be a photograph. He is a complicated young man, surrounded now by complicated rumors.

There is even a rumor circulating that Dylan did not write Blowin' in the Wind, that it was written by a Millburn (N. J.) High student named Loire Wyatt, who sold it to the singer. Dylan says he did write the song and Wyatt denies authorship, but several Millburn students claim they heard the song from Wyatt before Dylan ever sang it.

Dylan says he is writing a book that will explain everything. But, he insists, the explanations are irrelevant. "I am my words," he says. Maybe this is enough. "There's a lot about Bobby I don't understand," says Joan Baez, who plays princess to his prince among young folk fans. "But I don't care. I understand his words. That's all that matters."

Bob Dylan's speech at the NECLC Dinner

Source: Internet

The National Emergency Civil Liberties Committee (NECLC), founded in 1951 and known for many years simply as the Emergency Civil Liberties Committee (ECLC), annually held a Bill of Rights Dinner which gathered together members and friends of the organization and provided a setting for the presentation of the group's Tom Paine Award, given once yearly since 1958 in recognition of distinguished service in the fight for civil liberty. The recipient of the 1963 award was singer/songwriter Bob Dylan who accepted the award on December 13 at the Dinner in New York, which also featured noted author James Baldwin.

TRANSCRIPT OF BOB DYLAN'S REMARKS AT THE BILL OF RIGHTS DINNER
at the Americana Hotel on December 13th 1963

I haven't got any guitar, I can talk though. I want to thank you for the Tom Paine award in behalf everybody that went down to Cuba. First of all because they're all young and it's took me a long time to get young and now I consider myself young. And I'm proud of it. I'm proud that I'm young. And I only wish that all you people who are sitting out here today or tonight weren't here and I could see all kinds of faces with hair on their head – and everything like that, everything leading to youngness, celebrating the anniversary when we overthrew the House Un-American Activities just yesterday, – Because you people should be at the beach. You should be out there and you should be swimming and you should be just relaxing in the time you have to relax. (Laughter) It is not an old peoples' world. It is not an old peoples' world. It has nothing to do with old people. Old people when their hair grows out, they should go out. (Laughter) And I look down to see the people that are governing me and making my rules – and they haven't got any hair on their head – I get very uptight about it. (Laughter)

And they talk about Negroes, and they talk about black and white. And they talk about colors of red and blue and yellow. Man, I just don't see any colors at all when I look out. I don't see any colors at all and if people have taught through the years to look at colors – I've read history books, I've never seen one history book that tells how anybody feels. I've found facts about our history, I've found out what people know about what goes on but I never found anything about anybody feels about anything happens. It's all just plain facts. And it don't help me one little bit to look back.

I wish sometimes I could have come in here in the 1930's like my first idol – used to have an idol, Woody Guthrie, who came in the 1930's (Applause). But it has sure changed in the time Woody's been here and the time I've been here. It's not that easy any more. People seem to have more fears.

I get different presents from people that I play for and they bring presents to me backstage – very weird, weird presents – presents that I couldn't buy. They buy – they bring me presents that – I've got George Lincoln Rockwell's tie clip that somebody robbed for me. (Laughter) I have General Walker's car trunk keys – keys to his trunk that somebody robbed for me. Now these are my presents. I have fallout shelter signs that people robbed for me from Philadelphia and these are the little signs. There's no black and white, left and right to me anymore; there's only up and down and down is very close to the ground. And I'm trying to go up without thinking about anything trivial such as politics. They has got nothing to do with it. I'm thinking about the general people and when they get hurt.

I want to accept this award, the Tom Paine Award, from the Emergency Civil Liberties Committee. I want to accept it in my name but I'm not really accepting it in my name and I'm not accepting it in any kind of group's name, any Negro group or any other kind of group. There are Negroes – I was on the march on Washington up on the platform and I looked around at all the Negroes there and I didn't see any Negroes that looked like none of my friends. My friends don't wear suits. My friends don't have to wear suits. My friends don't have to wear any kind of thing to prove that they're respectable Negroes. My friends are my friends, and they're kind, gentle people if they're my friends. And I'm not going to try to push nothing over. So, I accept this reward – not reward, (Laughter) award in behalf of Phillip Luce who led the group to Cuba which all people should go down to Cuba. I don't see why anybody can't go to Cuba. I don't see what's going to hurt by going any place. I don't know what's going to hurt anybody's eyes to see anything. On the other hand, Phillip is a friend of mine who went to Cuba. I'll stand up and to get uncompromisable about it, which I have to be to be honest, I just got to be, as I got to admit that the man who shot President Kennedy, Lee Oswald, I don't know exactly where --what he thought he was doing, but I got to admit honestly that I too – I saw some of myself in him. I don't think it would have gone – I don't think it could go that far. But I got to stand up and say I saw things that he felt, in me – not to go that far and shoot. (Boos and hisses) You can boo but booing's got nothing to do with it. It's a – I just a – I've got to tell you, man, it's Bill of Rights is free speech and I just want to admit that I accept this Tom Paine Award in behalf of James Forman of the Students Non-Violent Coordinating Committee and on behalf of the people who went to Cuba. (Boos and Applause)

25 February 1964
Steve Allen Interview, Hollywood California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 979-980.

An early television appearance by Bob, this time on the Steve Allen Show, broadcast nationally from the Hollywood studios of CBS. The show was recorded on February 25th 1964. Transcribed from an audio tape of the broadcast.

The introduction is from Allen:

This young man was born in Duluth, Minnesota, but spent most of his early years in Hibbing. He started playing the guitar when he was just a child often but, er, he says it didn't do him too much good in High School. He says the only trouble with playing guitars is you don't get the cheer-leader girls. He is now one of the most sought after folk artists of the present day. I'll show you two of his albums. Here is one title, as you can see, The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan and he's one of those performers who seems to somehow be taken to the hearts of the young people who see him... the High School age, College age people. They somehow seem to identify with him or with parts of him or part of what he does. Here's another one of his albums titled, as you see, The Times They Are A-Changin'. Bob Dylan. I'll introduce you to this young man, this very interesting young man, personally. We'll come back in 120 seconds.

...I thought it would be instructive, in this instance, to tell you a bit about this young man. I've already told you he's from Minnesota. He's primarily a poet. He's a very popular entertainer now, but I think one of the reasons for his popularity is that he has the mind of a poet. I'm going to quote a few words about him by Ralph Gleason, music – jazz critic. Mr. Gleason is not an easy man to please, but he says this about Bob Dylan... he talks about a particular concert up in Berkley, California area, a concert in which Joan Baez appeared with Bob Dylan, he says together the two sang a group of songs including With God On Our Side and Blowin' In The Wind and for the first time the true message of the latter song came through to this listener. This makes it's own rules and Dylan is a genius, a singing conscience and moral referee as well as a preacher... he's also a very embarrassed young man. It's always embarrassing to sit there with your feet in cement while somebody compliments you either casually or lavishly but, I've been reading a number of stories about Bob this afternoon and they are all of that order... a comment in Billboard, the trade publication, says Dylan's poetry is born of a painful awareness of the tragedy that underlies the contemporary human condition.

SA: Bob, you sing partly your own songs, partly other people's. Where do you get your material?
BD: They're all mine now.
SA: You sing all your own material... and how long have you been writing your own music?
BD: Er, about two years.
SA: Just two years?
BD: And seven years before that when I quit writing and I started copying for about two or three years between.
SA: What do you mean by the word 'copying' in this context?
BD: Well, I quit writing and started singing, you know, er... what other people had written.
SA: Oh, I see. I think it might be interesting for the audience if I quote a word or two of one of your poems. I'm reading from the back of the jacket from one of Bob's albums – The town I was born in holds no memories but for the honking foghorns, the rainy mist and the rocky cliffs. I'd carried no feelings up past the Lake Superior hills. The town I grew up in is the one that's left me with my legacy visions. It was not a rich town. My parents were not rich. It was not a poor town. My parents were not poor. It was a dying town... it was a dying town. The train line cuts the ground showing where the fathers and mothers of me and my friends had picked up and moved from North Hibbing to South Hibbing. Old North Hibbing deserted, already dead. Its old stone court-house decaying in the wind – long abandoned, windows crashed out. The breadth of its broken walls being smothered in clinging moss. Just a few lines of poetry written by Bob Dylan. Bob, what are you going to sing for us?

BD: A song that's on there – The Lonesome Death Of Hattie Carroll.

SA: The Lonesome Death Of Hattie Carroll. What's the story of this song?

BD: The story I took out of the newspaper and I only changed the words. It's, er...

SA: Changed the words?

BD: Yeah, changed the words

SA: I don't understand. You took a story out of the newspaper...

BD: It's a true story.

SA: Oh. I see.

BD: And it happened in Maryland.

SA: What words did you change? I still don't know what you mean by that.

BD: Well, I changed, er... the reporters view into... I used it I used it for something I wanted to say, er, and I used his view, the Maryland reporters view to get at what I wanted to say and turn it that way. And I used a true story, that's all. I could have used a made-up story.

SA: Was the story... I mean the actual incident... did it concern someone named Hattie Carroll?

BD: Yeah.

SA: I see. Do you want to tell us about that incident or would you rather do that by means of the song?

BD: Well, I could tell you about it I could sing about it I could do anything. If I talked about it, I would talk about it for a very long time... if I sang about it, it would only take as long as the song lasts.

SA: I see. Well, I imagine the song tells its own story. Here it is.

Bob sings The Lonesome Death Of Hattie Carroll

SA: Thank you very much Bob Dylan; the party continues in 120 seconds.

Mr. Allen was not exactly impressed. His views on the show – "He sang so very softly and his attitude was so off-hand and unprofessional that he seemed rather more a mystery to our studio audience than as a blazing new talent."

March 1964
Chris Welles Interview

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 773-775.

This interview was conducted some time during March 1964 and appeared in the April 10 1964 issue of Life. To quote Heylin (A Life In Stolen Moments) "Chris Welles, after repeated efforts, finally manages to get Dylan to sit down for a five page profile". Most of those five pages are photos and their captions.

THE ANGRY YOUNG FOLK SINGER

Bob Dylan, who is quite possibly your children's favorite singer, is not exactly the image of the clean-cut boy you'd like your daughter to bring home to dinner. He is sloppy, disheveled, unshaven. He talks angrily and irreverently. But he is the most important writer of folk songs in the last 20 years. His biting protests against poverty, injustice, segregation and war are revitalizing a folk movement which was bogging down in dying cowboys and blue-tail flies. And Dylan has become one of the three or four best-selling folk singers around.

Unlike the new crop of well-scrubbed collegiate folk groups, Dylan scorns clothes, baths and razors. "I come on stage the same way I go anywhere," he says. "I mean, are all those people paying to see me look neat?"

Dylan, who is 22, took up folk singing after he flunked out of college four years ago. He bummed around the country, picked up a guitar along the way, began singing his songs in bars and coffeehouses. Last year's Newport Festival made him famous and now he does not know how to cope with success. "My records are selling and I'm making money," he says. "But it makes me think I'm not doing right. Man, I'm going through a weird time."

'I ain't scared to step out, man'

"The teachers in school taught me everything was fine," says Bob Dylan. "That was the accepted thing to think. It was in all the books. But it ain't fine, man. There are so many lies that have been told, so many things that are kept back. Kids have a feeling like me, but they ain't hearin' it no place. They're scared to step out. But I ain't scared to do it, man."

Dylan's first exposure to things not being fine was in his home town of Hibbing, Minn. Having prospered from its iron mines, Hibbing fell into decay and neglect as the rich ores gave out. "I was born with death around me," Dylan says. "I was raised in a town that was dying. There weren't no need for that town to die. It was a perfectly valid town."

He sings about a town like Hibbing in North Country Blues, the lament of a mother:

> The summer is gone
> The ground's turning cold
> The stars one by one they're a-foldin'
> My children will go, as soon as they grow
> Well, there ain't nothing here now to hold them

After he left Hibbing and wandered around the country, Dylan was drawn to songs written by Woody Guthrie. "Woody was my god," he says. "I was writing like I thought Woody would write."

Three years ago Dylan came to New York to visit Guthrie who is ill with Parkinson's disease in a Brooklyn hospital. "After I talked to him I realized he wasn't a god," says Dylan. "He was a man and he taught me that men have reasons for what they do. Now I just write what I feel."

Though he has long since ceased imitating Guthrie, Dylan still has Woody's freewheeling outspokenness and concern with social injustices. His villains are the people he calls the "Masters of War" who profit from the manufacture of weapons; the hypocrites who claim that "with God on our side" they can justify whatever evil they want to commit; the professional anti-communists; the segregationists who caused the deaths of people like Medgar Evers, Hattie Carroll and Emmett Till. Dylan sings:

While Emmett 's body floats the foam
Of a Jim Crow Southern sea
If you can't speak out against this thing
A crime that's so unjust
Your eyes are filled with dead men's dirt
Your mind is filled with dust.

Dylan hits at man's brutality in Who Killed Davey Moore? – the boxer who last year died of brain damage after a fight. "Why did he die and what's the reason for?" the song doggedly asks crowd, referee, press, manager, who slough off the blame. Finally the song asks Moore's opponent, who shrugs:

I hit him, yes, it's true
But that 's what I was paid to do.
Don't say murder, don't say kill It was Destiny, it was God's will.

Dylan has been more and more caught up in writing verses which he never expects to sing. The back of his third album is covered with free-verse poems called 11 Outlined Epitaphs. He is working on two plays and a book, "a rambling travelogue," which will be published by Macmillan. He recently traveled gathering material for his book and his songs. "We hit 46 pool halls from Augusta, Ga. to Berkeley, Calif. We talked to people in bars, miners-talking to people – that's where it's at, man."

In his songs Dylan talks most compellingly to young people. They are drawn by his rhythmic blues style, his rough voice, the stories his verses tell. But there is something more that attracts them, a feeling that Dylan is on their side. This comes out in his song The Times They Are A-Changin':

Come Mothers and Fathers throughout the land
And don't criticise what you can't understand
Your sons and your daughters are beyond your command
Your old rules are rapidly ageing.
Please get out on a new one if you can't lend your hand
For the times they are a-changin'.

Bob Dylan.. 'Most important folk singer around to-day'

BOB DYLAN has been described as the most important folk singer today.

Not, that is, if we look for folk singers to tell us something, from a personal viewpoint, about what is happening today, as well as to sing the epics of other times.

The trusty old songs are all very well, but you need a change of diet. With Bob Dylan you get it His repertoire is stuffed with original material which gives a really individual slant on the way we are living and, as he puts it, not living.

"All I'm doing is saying what's on my mind the best way I know how," Dylan explains. "And whatever else you say about me, everything I do and sing and write comes out of me."

Dylan certainly says what's on his mind, and though his inspiration quite obviously came from the great Woody Guthrie, he composes and delivers his songs in his own way.

The influence of Guthrie goes deep. When Dylan does a talking blues, you hear it often in voice and guitar. The sardonic asides and introductions remind me of Woody, and so do the completely outspoken lyrics of many of his ballads.

I don't know what songs he'll be doing on his live British shows. But they are bound to he rich.

He lashes out hard in such songs as "Masters of war" and "With God on our side", enters fantasy in "Hard rain," and is amusingly topical.—Max Jones.

Max Jones Interview, London. England

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke pp. 39-42

This interview took place at lunchtime on May 17th 1964 in Dylan's Mayfair hotel room. This was the day of the Royal Festival Hall concert. The interview appeared in Melody Maker on May 23rd 1964. Max Jones had met Dylan on his previous trip to the U.K. and was afforded better treatment by Dylan than other contemporary journalists, some of whom were to receive fairly dismissive treatment from Dylan.

BOB DYLAN TALKS TO MAX JONES

One lunchtime, before his sell-out concert at the Royal Festival Hall, I called to see Bob Dylan. A twenty-three year old American singer, guitarist, harmonica player and writer of songs which go a few fathoms deeper than the 'yeah, yeah, yeah' stage, received me with cordiality and a bottle of Beaujolais. It was incongruous, in view of the blistering social criticism in many of his songs, to meet him in the gentle surroundings of a hotel in Mayfair. Particularly as he was dressed in jeans and boots and leather jacket. He was aware of the incongruity, we discussed it, his singing and songwriting, plays, books and the British folk Scene. This is some of what he had to say...

I don't know anything about the folk scene here, nothing at all. I went to one of the clubs when I was in London in 1962 but didn't stop long. I know some of your writers and actors. Who in particular? Ewan McColl. I like his writing very much.

I like writing and I like writers. Len Chandler, a friend of mine who writes, he's fine. I might sing some of his songs one of these days. But I don't know all of the words to them. At the moment, I only sing my own songs. And a few traditional things.

You ask if I have any difficulty producing songs. You know, they come up and stay in my mind sometimes – sometimes a long time. I just write them out when the right time comes. The words come first. Then I fit a tune or just strum the chords. Really I'm not a tune writer. The songs for me are very confining, or something. I'm not writing that many songs.

I've written a lot of things with no structure, written them only because I like to sing them. 'Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall'... I wrote the words of it on a piece of paper. But there was just no tune that really fit to it, so I just sort of play chords without a tune. If all this comes under the heading of a definition, then I don't care really to define what I do. Other people seem to have a hard time doing that.

Writing, yes I do like writing. That's mainly what I do, is just writing... you know, it keeps me awake. I've written a play, well, I'm working on it when I have time, but I haven't got it down yet. I've written a couple already but I'm not satisfied with them. They haven't been performed. Do I want them to be? Not right now.

This one I'm writing, I can't tell you much about it. it's like some kind of maze. Just a bunch of people who play act, really act, try to act you know, for each other, talk to you, about you, above you, below you.

Meanwhile, they're all out trying to survive by being concerned about things, having something to do with people. A lot of it is just unconscious writing. It doesn't have a title.

Did you know I was doing three books with a photographer? He's Barry Feinstein, husband of Mary, of Peter, Paul and Mary. He's been taking pictures for ten years. The first one's supposed to have been done a while ago but may not be finished til the fall. It's just pictures and the words I'm going to write that coincide with the photographers, but somehow fall into the same direction or mood.

All the pictures were shot in Hollywood: shots of everything, a whole picture of Hollywood from the beautiful sign on the hill to Marlon Brando speaking while someone holds up a sign saying "Nigger-Lover". Yeah, I dig this photographer, and I dig taking pictures myself.

Now this thing you ask me about singing traditional songs: well, I did. I sang the folk songs and country music, and I played rock 'n roll piano once. Oh yeah, I played in R and B bands. The time I changed was when I landed in New York... you know, New York for me! You have to go there and sort of surrender to New York. That's how I changed, just dug it all. It taught me to dig it all, to keep digging it all.

There's nothing that's not worth listening to, that's not worth thinking about, that's not worth singing. I learned that. I met people there, I was conscious of people and somehow come out of it very unconscious and not feeling guilty about anything. I don't have any guilt, and then again, saying that is like saying I'm completely guilty. If someone gets killed, who's to say who fired the gun? And why? He fired just because he was uptight.

Everybody reacts to what he knows, to what he's been taught and has come in contact with. He's been taught there's only one way; he's been sheltered. He's gonna get uptight about it when he sees something different. We have to ask why these people have sheltered him and taught him this. They have reasons too.

About this hotel: I was booked in here. It isn't bad really. But apart from these rooms, the bar is the only place I'm allowed in without a tie, no deep philosophical reason for not wearing one. I just don't have a tie.

No, I don't have a Ferrari either.

I don't bother myself about thoughts of success. I'd get a Ferrari if I had the urge, and the money.

One thing I know is that you can't please everybody. You know somebody's going to pick on you for something. They're going to find something wrong.

I'm good, kind, gentle, I think – I mean no harm to anybody; but people pick me apart. Either they like me or else they slam me. I get put down a lot, but I dig it when they slam me for some odd reason.

This question of British singers doing foreign songs, Blues and so on: I think that if somebody from England wants to sing a Southern Blues, it's great. If you want to do it, do it. Who's to put rules to it? Who's to say you can't do it? Who's to know, if you can't try it? You have to try many things to find out who you are. It would be like closing a book on you.

It's the people who don't do it, who live by the rules, who cause all the trouble. Life is too small – it's too much one world – to worry about if a man sings something his grandfather couldn't have sung. If an English singer is happy singing a Southern US ballad, I'd rather see him happy than see him doing something else and being unhappy. I don't like seeing people unhappy.

Authenticity? I know authentic folk music when I hear it, know it for myself, but what difference does it make?

Nat Hentoff Interview, New York

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 777-788.

This article was published in the New Yorker of October 24th 1964. It was written by staff writer Nat Hentoff under the banner -

THE CRACKIN', SHAKIN', BREAKIN' SOUNDS

It also appears in Craig McGregor's Bob Dylan: a retrospective. In the first part, Hentoff is mainly observing Dylan at the recording session on June 9th where Bob records the entire Another Side Of album in one sitting. Hentoff and Dylan met up again on June 16th to complete the interview.

The word "FOLK" in the term "folk music" used to connote a rural, homogeneous community that carried on a tradition of anonymously created music. No one person composed a piece; it evolved through generations of communal care.

In recent years, however, folk music has increasingly become the quite personal – and copyrighted-product of specific creators. More and more of them, in fact, are neither rural nor representative of centuries-old family and regional traditions. They are often city-bred converts to the folk style; and, after an apprenticeship during which they try to imitate rural models from the older approach to folk music, they write and perform their own songs out of their own concerns and pre-occupations The restless young, who have been the primary support of the rise of this kind of folk music over the past five years, regard two performers as their pre-eminent spokesmen.

One is twenty-three-year-old Joan Baez. She does not write her own material and she includes a considerable proportion of traditional, communally-created songs in her programs. But Miss Baez does speak out explicitly against racial prejudice and militarism, and she does sing some of the best of the new topical songs. Moreover, her pure, penetrating voice and her open, honest manner symbolize for her admirers a cool island of integrity in a society that the folk-song writer Malvina Reynolds has characterised in one of her songs as consisting of "little boxes." (And the boys go into business/And marry and raise a family/In boxes made of ticky tacky/And they all look the same)

The second – and more influential-demiurge of the folk-music microcosm is Bob Dylan, also twenty-three. Dylan's impact has been the greater because he is a writer of songs as well as a performer. Such compositions of his as Blowin' in the Wind, Masters of War, Don't Think Twice, It's All Right, and Only a Pawn in Their Game have become part of the repertoire of many other performers, including Miss Baez, who has explained: "Bobby is expressing what I – and many other young people – feel, what we want to say. Most of the 'protest' songs about the bomb and race prejudice and conformity are stupid. They have no beauty. But Bobby's songs are powerful as poetry and powerful as music. And, oh, my God, how that boy can sing!"

Another reason for Dylan's impact is the singular force of his personality. Wiry, tense, and boyish, Dylan looks and acts like a fusion of Huck Finn and a young Woody Guthrie. Both onstage and off, he appears to be just barely able to contain his prodigious energy. Pete Seeger, who, at forty-five, is one of the elders of American folk music, recently observed: "Dylan may well become the country's most creative troubadour – if he doesn't explode."

Dylan is always dressed informally – the possibility that he will ever be seen in a tie is as remote as the possibility that Miss Baez will perform in an evening gown – and his possessions are few, the weightiest of them being a motorcycle. A wanderer, Dylan is often on the road in search of more experience. "You can find out a lot about a small town by hanging around its poolroom," he says. Like Miss Baez, he prefers to keep most of his time for himself. He works only occasionally, and during the rest of the year he travels or briefly stays in a house owned by his manager, Albert Grossman, in Bearsville, New York – a small town adjacent to Woodstock and about a hundred miles north of New York. There Dylan writes songs, works on poetry, plays and novels, rides his motorcycle, and talks with his friends. From time to time, he comes to New York to record for Columbia Records.

A few weeks ago, Dylan invited me to a recording session that was to begin at seven in the evening in a Columbia studio on Seventh Avenue near Fifty-second Street. Before he arrived, a tall, lean, relaxed man in his early thirties came in and introduced himself to me as Tom Wilson, Dylan's recording producer. He was joined by two engineers and we all went into the control room. Wilson took up a post at a long broad table, between the engineers, from which he looked out into a spacious studio with a tall thicket of microphones to the left and, directly in front, an enclave containing a music stand, two microphones and an upright piano, and set off by a large screen, which would partly shield Dylan as he sang, for the purpose of improving the quality of the sound. "I have no idea what he's going to record tonight," Wilson told me. "It's all to be stuff he's written in the last couple of months."

I asked if Dylan presented any particular problems to a recording director. "My main difficulty has been pounding mike technique into him," Wilson said. "He used to get excited and move around a lot and then lean in too far, so that the mike popped. Aside from that, my basic problem with him has been to create the kind of setting in which he's relaxed. For instance, if that screen should bother him, I'd take it away, even if we have to lose a little quality in the sound." Wilson looked toward the door. "I'm somewhat concerned about tonight. We're going to do a whole album in one session. Usually, we're not in such a rush, but this album has to he ready for Columbia's fall sales convention. Except for special occasions like this, Bob has no set schedule of recording dates. We think he's important enough to record whenever he wants to come to the studio."

Five minutes after seven, Dylan walked into the studio, carrying a battered guitar case. He had on dark glasses, and his hair, dark-blond and curly, had obviously not been cut for some weeks, he was dressed in blue jeans, a black jersey, and desert boots. With him were half a dozen friends, among them Jack Elliott, a folk singer in the Woody Guthrie tradition, who was also dressed in blue jeans and desert boots, plus a brown corduroy shirt and a jaunty cowboy hat. Elliott had been carrying two bottles of Beaujolais, which he now handed to Dylan, who carefully put them on a table near the screen. Dylan opened the guitar case, took out a looped-wire harmonica holder, hung it around his neck, and then walked over to the piano and began to play in a rolling, honky-tonk style.

"He's got a wider range of talents than he shows," Wilson told me. "He kind of hoards them. You go back to his three albums. Each time there's a big leap from one to the next – in material, in performance, in everything."

Dylan came into the control room, smiling. Although he is fiercely accusatory toward society at large while he is performing, his most marked offstage characteristic is gentleness. He speaks swiftly but softly, and appears persistently anxious to make himself clear. "We're going to make a good one tonight," he said to Wilson, "I promise." He turned to me and continued: "There aren't any finger-pointing songs. Those records I've made, I'll stand behind them, but some of that was jumping into the scene to be heard and a lot of it was because I didn't see anybody else doing that kind of thing. Now a lot of people are doing finger-pointing songs. You know-pointing to all the things that are wrong. Me, I don't want to write for people anymore. You know – be a spokesman. Like I once wrote about Emmett Till in the first person, pretending I was him. From now on, I want to write them inside me, and to do that I'm going to have to get back to writing like I used to when I was ten – having everything come out naturally. The way I like to write is for it to come out the way I walk or talk." Dylan frowned. "Not that I even walk or talk yet like I'd like to. I don't carry myself yet the way Woody, Big Joe Williams, and Lightnin' Hopkins have carried themselves. I hope to some day, but they're older. They got to where music was a tool for them, a way to live more, a way to make themselves feel better. Sometimes I can make myself feel better with music, but other times it's still hard to go to sleep at night."

A friend strolled in, and Dylan began to grumble about an interview that had been arranged for him later in the week. "I hate to say no because after all, these guys have a job to do," he said shaking his head impatiently. "But it bugs me that the first question usually turns out to be 'Are you going down South to take part in any of the civil-rights projects?' They try to fit you into things. Now, I've been down there, but I'm not going down just to hold a picket sign so they can shoot a picture of me. I know a lot of the kids in SNCC – you know, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. That's the only organisation I feel a part of spiritually. The NAACP is a bunch of old guys. I found that out by coming directly in contact with some of the people in it. They didn't understand me. They were looking to use me for something. Man, everybody's hung-up. You sometimes don't know if somebody wants you to do something because he's hung-up or because he really digs who you are. It's awful complicated, and the best thing you can do is admit it."

Returning to the studio, Dylan stood in front of the piano and pounded out an accompaniment as he sang from one of his own new songs:

"Are you for real, baby, or are you just on the shelf?
I'm looking deep into your eyes, but all I can see is myself
If you're trying to throw me, I've already been tossed.
If you're trying to lose me, I've already been lost..."

Another friend of Dylan's arrived with three children, ranging in age from four to ten. The children raced around the studio until Wilson insisted that they be relatively confined to the control room. By ten minutes to eight, Wilson had checked out the sound balance to his satisfaction, Dylan's friends had found seats along the studio walls, and Dylan had expressed his readiness – in fact, eagerness – to begin. Wilson, in the control room, leaned forward, a stopwatch in his hand. Dylan took a deep breath, threw his head back, and plunged into a song in which he accompanied himself on guitar and harmonica. The first take was ragged; the second was both more relaxed and more vivid. At that point, Dylan, smiling, clearly appeared to be confident of his ability to do an entire album in one night. As he moved into succeeding numbers, he relied principally on the guitar for support, except for exclamatory punctuations on the harmonica.

Having glanced through a copy of Dylan's new lyrics that he had handed to Wilson, I observed to Wilson that there were indeed hardly any songs of social protest in the collection.

"Those early albums gave people the wrong idea," Wilson said. "Basically, he's in the tradition of all lasting folk music. I mean he's not a singer of protest so much as he is a singer of concern about people. He doesn't have to be talking about Medgar Evers all the time to be effective. He can just tell a simple little story of a guy who ran off from a woman."

After three takes of one number, one of the engineers said to Wilson – "If you want to try another, we can get a better take."

"No." Wilson shook his head. "With Dylan, you have to take what you can get."

Out in the studio, Dylan, his slight form bent forward, was standing just outside the screen and listening to a playback through earphones. He began to take the earphones off during an instrumental passage, but then his voice came on, and he grinned and replaced them.

The engineer muttered again that he might get a better take if Dylan ran through the number once more.

"Forget it," Wilson said. "You don't think in terms of orthodox recording techniques when you're dealing with Dylan. You have to learn to be as free on this side of the glass as he is out there."

Dylan went on to record a song about a man leaving a girl because he was not prepared to be the kind of invincible hero and all-encompassing provider she wanted. "It ain't me you're looking for, babe," he sang with finality.

During the playback, I joined Dylan in the studio. "The songs so far sound as if there were real people in them," I said.

Dylan seemed surprised that I had considered it necessary to make the comment. "There are. That's what makes them so scary. If I haven't been through what I write about, the songs aren't worth anything." He went on, via one of his songs, to offer a complicated account of a turbulent love affair in Spanish Harlem, and at the end asked a friend: "Did you understand it?" The friend nodded enthusiastically. "Well, I didn't." Dylan said, with a laugh, and then became somber. "It's hard being free in a song – getting it all in. Songs are so confining. Woody Guthrie told me once that songs don't have to do anything like that. But it's not true. A song has to have some kind of form to fit into the music. You can bend the words and the meter, but it still has to fit somehow. I've been getting freer in the songs I write, but I still feel confined. That's why I write a lot of poetry – if that's the word. Poetry can make it's own form."

As Wilson signaled for the start of the next number Dylan put up his hand. "I just want to light a cigarette, so I can see it there while I'm singing," he said, and grinned. "I'm very neurotic. I need to be secure."

By ten-thirty, seven songs had been recorded.

"This is the fastest Dylan date yet," Wilson said. "He used to be all hung up with the microphones. Now he's a pro."

Several more friends of Dylan's had arrived during the recording of the seven songs, and at this point four of them were seated in the control room behind Wilson and the engineers. The others were scattered around the studio, using the table that held the bottles of Beaujolais as their base. They opened the bottles, and every once in a while poured out a drink in a paper cup. The three children were still irrepressibly present, and once the smallest burst suddenly into the studio, ruining a take. Dylan turned on the youngster in mock anger. "I m gonna rub you out," he said. "I'll track you down and turn you to dust." The boy giggled and ran back into the control room.

As the evening went on, Dylan's voice became more acrid. The dynamics of his singing grew more pronounced, soft, intimate passages being abruptly followed by fierce surges in volume. The relentless, driving beat of his guitar was more often supplemented by the whooping thrusts of the harmonica.

"Intensity, that's what he's got," Wilson said, apparently to himself. "By now, this kid is out-selling Thelonious Monk and Miles Davis," he went on, to me. "He's speaking to a whole new generation. And not only here. He's just been in England. He had standing room only in Royal Festival Hall."

Dylan had begun a song called Chimes of Freedom. One of his four friends in the control room – a lean, bearded man – proclaimed: "Bobby's talking for every hung-up person in the whole wide universe." His three companions nodded gravely.

The next composition, Motorpsycho Nitemare, was a mordantly satirical version of the vintage tale of the farmer, his daughter, and the traveling salesman. There were several false starts, apparently because Dylan was having trouble reading the lyrics.

"Man, dim the lights," the bearded friend counseled Wilson. "He'll get more relaxed."

"Atmosphere is not what we need,"Wilson answered, without turning around. "Legibility is what we need."

During the playback, Dylan listened intently, his lips moving, and a cigarette cocked in his right hand. A short break followed, during which Dylan shouted: "Hey, we're gonna need some more wine!" Two of his friends in the studio nodded and left.

After the recording session resumed, Dylan continued to work hard and conscientiously. When he was preparing for a take or listening to a playback, he seemed able to cut himself off completely from the eddies of conversation and humorous by play stirred up by his friends in the studio. Occasionally, when a line particularly pleased him, he burst into laughter, but he swiftly got back to business.

Dylan started a talking blues – a wry narrative in a sardonic recitative style, which had been developed by Woody Guthrie. "Now I'm liberal, but to a degree," Dylan was drawling halfway through the song. "I want everybody to be free. But if you think I'll let Barry Goldwater move in next door and marry my daughter, you must think: I'm crazy. I wouldn't let him do it for all the farms in Cuba." He was smiling broadly, and Wilson and the engineers were laughing. It was a long song, and toward the end Dylan faltered. He tried it twice more and each time he stumbled before the close.

"Let me do another song," he said to Wilson. "I'll come back to this".

"No." Wilson said. "Finish up this one. You'll hang us up on the order, and if I'm not here to edit, the other cat will get mixed up. Just do an insert of the last part."

"Let him start from the beginning, man," said one of the four friends sitting behind Wilson.

Wilson turned around, looking annoyed. "Why, man?"

"You don't start telling a story with Chapter Eight, man," the friend said.

"Oh, man," said Wilson, "what kind of philosophy is that? We're recording, not writing a biography."

As an obligato of protest continued behind Wilson, Dylan accepting Wilson's advice, sang the insert. His bearded friend rose silently and drew a square in the air behind Wilson's head.

Other songs, mostly of love lost or misunderstood, followed. Dylan was now tired, but he retained his good humor. "This last one is called My Back Pages," he announced to Wilson. It appeared to express current desire to get away from finger-pointing and acutely personal material. "Oh, but I was so much older then" he sang as a refrain, "I'm younger than that now."

By one-thirty, the session was over. Dylan had recorded fourteen new songs. He agreed to meet me again in a week or so and fill me in on his background. "My background's not all that important, though," he said as we left the studio. "It's what I am now that counts."

Dylan was born in Duluth, on May 24, 1941, and grew up in Hibbing, Minnesota, a mining town near the Canadian border. He does not discuss his parents preferring to let his songs tell whatever he wants to say about his personal history. "You can stand at one end of Hibbing on the main drag an' see clear past the city limits on the other end," Dylan once noted in a poem, My Life in a Stolen Moment, printed in the program of a 1963 Town Hall concert he gave. Like Dylan's parents, it appears, the town was neither rich nor poor, but it was, Dylan has said, "a dyin' town." He ran away from home seventeen times – at ten, twelve, thirteen, fifteen, fifteen-and-a-half, seventeen and eighteen. His travels included South Dakota, New Mexico, Kansas and California. In between flights he taught himself the guitar, which he had begun playing at the age often. At fifteen he was playing the harmonica and the autoharp and had written his first song, a ballad dedicated to Brigitte Bardot. In the spring of 1960, Dylan entered the University of Minnesota, in Minneapolis, which he attended for something under six months. In My Life in a Stolen Moment, Dylan has summarised his college career dourly: "I sat in science class an' flunked out for refusin' to watch a rabbit die. I got expelled from English class for using four-letter words in a paper describing the English teacher. I also failed out of communication class for callin' up every day and sayin' I couldn't come... I was kept around for kicks at a fraternity house. They let me live there, an' I did until they wanted me to join". Paul Nelson and Jon Pankake, who edit the Little Sandy Review, a quarterly magazine published in Minneapolis that is devoted to critical articles on folk music and performers, remember meeting Dylan at the University of Minnesota in the summer of 1960, while he was part of a group of singers who performed at The Scholar, a coffee-house near the university. Nelson and Pankake, who were students at the university then, have since noted in their publication. "We recall Bob as a soft-spoken, rather unprepossessing youngster... well-groomed and neat in the standard campus costume of slacks, sweater, white oxford sneakers, poplin raincoat and dark glasses."

Before Dylan arrived at the university, his singing had been strongly influenced by such Negro folk interpreters as Leadbelly and Big Joe Williams. He had met Williams in Evanston, Illinois, during his break from home at the age of twelve. Dylan had also been attracted to several urban-style rhythm-and-blues performers, notably Bo Diddley and Chuck Berry. Other shaping forces were white country music figures – particularly Hank Williams, Hank Snow, and Jimmie Rodgers. During his brief stay at the university Dylan became especially absorbed in the recordings of Woody Guthrie, the Oklahoma-born traveler who had created the most distinctive body of American topical folk material to come to light in this century. Since 1954 Guthrie, ill with Huntington's chorea, a progressive disease of the nervous system, had not been able to perform, but he was allowed to receive visitors. In the autumn of 1960, Dylan quit university and decided to visit Guthrie at Greystone Hospital in New Jersey. Dylan returned briefly to Minnesota the following May, to sing at a university hootenanny, and Nelson and Pankake saw him again on that occasion. "In a mere half year," they have recalled in the Little Sandy Review, "he had learned to churn up exciting, bluesy, hard-driving harmonica-and-guitar music, and had absorbed during his visits with Guthrie not only the great Okie musician's unpredictable syntax but his very vocal color diction, and inflection. Dylan's performance that spring evening of a selection of Guthrie songs was hectic and shaky, but it contained all the elements of the now-perfected performing style that has made him the most original newcomer to folk music."

The winter Dylan visited Guthrie was otherwise bleak. He spent most of it in New York, where he found it difficult to get steady work singing. In Talkin' New York, a caustic song describing his first months in the city, Dylan tells of having been turned away by a coffeehouse owner, who told him scornfully: "You sound like a hillbilly. We want folk singers here." There were nights when he slept in the subway but eventually he found friends and a place to stay on the lower East Side, and after he had returned from the spring hootenanny he began getting more frequent engagements in New York. John Hammond at Columbia Records, who has discovered a sizeable number of important jazz and folk performers during the past thirty years heard Dylan that summer while attending a rehearsal of another folk singer Hammond was about to record for Columbia. Impressed by the young man's raw force and by the vivid lyrics of his songs Hammond auditioned him and immediately signed him to a recording contract. Then, in September, 1961, while Dylan was appearing at Gerde's Folk City, a casual refuge for 'citybillies' (as the young city singers and musicians are now called in the trade) on West Fourth Street in Greenwich Village, he was heard by Robert Shelton, folk-music critic for the New York Times, who wrote of him enthusiastically.

Dylan began to prosper. He enlarged his following by appearing at the Newport and Monterey Folk Festivals and giving concerts through out the country. There have been a few snags, as when he walked off the Ed Sullivan television show in the spring of 1963 because the Columbia Broadcasting System would not permit him to sing a tart appraisal of the John Birch Society, but on the whole, he has experienced accelerating success. His first three Columbia albums – Bob Dylan, The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan, and The Times They Are A-Changin' – have by now reached a cumulative sales figure of nearly four hundred thousand. In addition, he has received large royalties as the composer of songs that have become hits through recordings by Peter, Paul and Mary, the Kingston Trio, and other performers. At present, Dylan's fees for a concert appearance range from two thousand to three thousand dollars a night. He has sometimes agreed to sing at a nominal fee for new, non-profit folk societies, however, and has often performed without charge at civil-rights rallies.

Musically, Dylan has transcended most of his early influences and developed an incisively personal style. His vocal sound is most often characterised by flaying harshness. Mitch Jayne, a member of the Dillards, a folk group from Missouri, has described Dylan's sound as "very much like a dog with his leg caught in barbed wire." Yet Dylan's admirers come to accept and even delight in the harshness, because of the vitality and wit at its core, And they point out that in intimate ballads he is capable of a fragile lyricism that does not slip into bathos. It is Dylan's work as a composer, however, that has won him a wider audience than his singing alone might have. Whether concerned with cosmic specters or personal conundrums, Dylan's lyrics are pungently idiomatic. He has a superb ear for speech rhythms, a generally astute sense of selective detail, and a natural storyteller's command of narrative pacing. His songs sound as if they were being created out of oral street history rather than carefully written in tranquility. On a stage, Dylan performs his songs as if he had an urgent story to tell. In his work there is little of the polished grace of such carefully trained contemporary minstrels as Richard Dyer-Bennet. Nor, on the other hand, do his performances reflect the calculated showmanship of a Harry Belafonte or of Peter, Paul, and Mary. Dylan off the stage is very much the same as Dylan the performer – restless, insatiably hungry for experience, idealistic, but sceptical of neatly defined causes.

In the past year, as his renown has increased, Dylan has become more elusive. He felt so strongly threatened by his initial fame that he welcomed the chance to use the Bearsville home of his manager as a refuge between concerts, and he still spends most of his time there when he's not travelling. A week after the recording session, he telephoned me from Bearsville, and we agreed to meet the next evening at the Keneret, a restaurant on lower Seventh Avenue, in the Village. It specialises in Middle Eastern food, one of Dylan's preferences, but does not have a liquor license. Upon keeping our rendezvous, therefore, we went next door for a few bottles of Beaujolais and then returned to the Keneret. Dylan was as restless as usual, and as he talked, his hands moved constantly and his voice sounded as if he were never quite able to catch his breath.

I asked him what he had meant, exactly, when he spoke at the recording session of abandoning "finger-pointing" songs, and he took a sip of wine, leaned forward, and said: "I looked around and saw all those people pointing fingers at the bomb. But the bomb is getting boring, because what's wrong goes much deeper than the bomb. What's wrong is how few people are free. Most people walking around are tied down to something that doesn't let them really speak, so they just add their confusion to the mess. I mean, they have some kind of vested interest in the way things are now. Me, I'm cool." He smiled. "You know, Joanie – Joanie Baez – worries about me. She worries about whether people will get control over me and exploit me. But I'm cool. I'm in control, because I don't care about money, and all that. I'm cool in myself, because I've gone through enough changes so that I know what's real to me and what isn't. Like this fame. It's done something to me. It's OK in the Village here. People don't pay attention to me. But in other towns it's funny knowing that people you don't know figure they know you. I mean, they think they know everything about you. One thing is groovy, though. I got birthday cards this year from people I'd never heard of. It's weird, isn't it? There are people I've really touched whom I'll never know."

He lit a cigarette. "But in other ways being noticed can be a weight. So I disappear a lot. I go to places where I'm not going to be noticed. And I can." He laughed. "I have no work to do. I have no job. I'm not committed to anything except making a few records and playing a few concerts. I'm weird that way. Most people, when they get up in a morning, have to do what they have to do. I could pretend there were all kinds of things I had to do every day. But why? So I do whatever I feel like. I might make movies of my friends around Woodstock, one day. I write a lot. I get involved in scenes with people. A lot of scenes are going on with me all the time here in the Village, in Paris during my trips to Europe, in lots of places."

I asked Dylan how far ahead he planned. "I don't look past right now," he said "Now there's this fame business. I know it s going to go away. It has to. This so-called mass fame comes from people who get caught up in a thing for a while and buy the records. Then they stop. And when they stop, I won't be famous anymore."

We became aware that a young waitress was standing by diffidently. Dylan turned to her and she asked him for his autograph. He signed his name with gusto and signed again when she asked if he would give her an autograph for a friend. "I'm sorry to have interrupted your dinner," she said, smiling. "But I'm really not."

"I get letters from people – young people – all the time," Dylan continued when she left us. "I wonder if they write letters like those to other people they don't know. They just want to tell me things, and sometimes they go into their personal hang-ups. Some send poetry. I like getting them – read them all and answer some. But I don't mean I give any of the people who write to me any answers to their problems." He leaned forward and talked more rapidly. "It's like when somebody wants to tell me what the 'moral' thing is to do, I want them to show me. If they have anything to say about morals, I want to know what it is they do. Same with me. All I can do is show people who ask me questions how I live. All I can do is be me. I can't tell them how to change things, because there's only one way to change things, and that's to cut yourself off from all the chains. That's hard for most people to do."

I had Dylan's The Times They Are A-Changin' album with me, and I pointed out to him a section of his notes on the cover in which he spoke of how he had always been running when he was a boy – running away from Hibbing and from his parents.

Dylan took a sip of wine. "I kept running because I wasn't free," he said. "I was constantly on guard. Somehow, way back then, I already knew that parents do what they do because they're up tight. They're concerned with their kids in relation to themselves. I mean, they want their kids to please them, not to embarrass them – so they can be proud of them. They want you to be what they want you to be. So I started running when I was ten. But always I'd get picked up and sent home. When I was thirteen, I was traveling with a carnival through upper Minnesota and North and South Dakota, and I got picked up again. I tried again and again, and when I was eighteen I cut out for good. I was still running when I came to New York. Just because you're free to move doesn't mean you're free. Finally, I got so far out I was cut off from everybody and everything. It was then I decided there was no sense in running so far and so fast when there was no longer anybody there. It was fake. It was running for the sake of running. So I stopped. I've got no place to run from. I don't have to be any place I don't want to be. But I am by no means an example for any kid wanting to strike out. I mean. I wouldn't want a young kid to leave home because I did it and then have to go through a lot of the things I went through. Everybody has to find his own way to be free. There isn't anybody who can help you in that sense. Nobody was able to help me. Like seeing Woody Guthrie was one of the main reasons I came east. He was an idol to me. A couple of years ago, after I'd gotten to know him, I was going through some very bad changes and I went to see Woody, like I'd go to somebody to confess to. But I couldn't confess to him. It was silly. I did go and talk with him – as much as he could talk – and the talking helped. But basically he wasn't able to help me at all. I finally realised that. So Woody was my last idol."

There was a pause. "I've learned a lot in these past few years," Dylan said softly. "Like about beauty".

I reminded him of what he had said about his changing criteria of beauty in some notes he did for a Joan Baez album. There he had written in that when he first heard her voice, before he knew her, his reaction had been:

> "I hate that kind a sound," said I
> The only beauty's ugly, man
> The crackin', shakin', breakin' sounds're
> The only beauty I understand."

Dylan laughed. "Yeah," he said. "I was wrong. My hang-up was that I used to try to define beauty. Now I take it as it is, however it is. That's why I like Hemingway. I don't read much. Usually I read what people put in my hands. But I do read Hemingway. He didn't have to use adjectives. He didn't really have to define what he was saying. He just said It. I can't do that yet, but that's what I want to be able to do."

A young actor from Julian Beck's and Judith Malina's Living Theatre troupe stopped by the table and Dylan shook hands with him enthusiastically. "We're leaving for Europe soon," the actor said. "But when we come back we're going out on the street. We're going to put on plays right on the street, for anyone who wants to watch."

"Hey!" said Dylan, bouncing in his seat. "Tell Julian and Judith that I want to be in on that."

The actor said he would and took Dylan's telephone number. Then he said: "Bob, are you doing only your own songs now – none of the old folk songs at all?"

"Have to," Dylan answered. "When I'm up tight and it's raining outside and nobody's around and somebody I want is a long way from me – and with someone else besides – I can't sing 'Ain't Got No Use For Your Red Apple Juice.' I don't care how great an old song it is or what its tradition is. I have to make a new song out of what I know and out of what I'm feeling."

The conversation turned to civil rights and the actor used the term "the movement" to signify the work of the civil-rights activists. Dylan looked at him quizzically. "I agree with everything that's happening", he said, "but I'm not part of no movement. If I was, I wouldn't be able to do anything else but be in 'the movement' I just can't have people sit around and make rules for me. I do a lot of things no movement would allow." He took a long drink of Beaujolais. "It's like politics," he went on. "I just can't make it with any organisation. I fell into a trap once – last December – when I agreed to accept the Tom Paine Award from the Emergency Civil Liberties Committee. At the Americana Hotel! In the Grand Ballroom! As soon as I got there, I felt up tight. First of all, the people with me couldn't get in. They looked even funkier than I did, I guess. They weren't dressed right, or something. Inside the ballroom, I really got up tight. I began to drink. I looked down from the platform and saw a bunch of people who had nothing to do with my kind of politics. I looked down and I got scared. They were supposed to be on my side, but I didn't feel any connection with them. Here were these people who'd been all involved with the left in the Thirties, and now they were supporting civil rights drives. That's groovy, but they also had minks and jewels, and it was like they were giving the money out of guilt. I got up to leave and they followed me and caught me. They told me I had to accept the award. When I got up to make my speech, I couldn't say anything by that time but what was passing through my mind. They'd been talking about Kennedy being killed, and Bill Moore and Medgar Evers and the Buddhist monks in Vietnam being killed. I had to say something about Lee Oswald. I told them I'd read a lot of his feelings in the papers and I knew he was up tight. Said I'd been up tight, too, so I'd got a lot of his feelings. I saw a lot of myself in Oswald, I said, and I saw in him a lot of the times we're all living in. And, you know, they started booing. They looked at me like I was an animal. They actually thought I was saying it was a good thing Kennedy had been killed. That's how far out they are. I was talking about Oswald. And then I started talking about some friends of mine in Harlem – some of them junkies, all of them poor. And I said they need freedom as much as anybody else, and what's anybody doing for them? The chairman was kicking my leg under the table, and I told him: 'Get out of here. ' Now, what I was supposed to be was a nice cat. I was supposed to say: 'I appreciate your award and I'm a great singer and I'm a great believer in liberals, and you buy my records and I'll support your cause. ' But I didn't, and so I wasn't accepted that night. That's the cause of a lot of those chains I was talking about – people wanting to be accepted, people not wanting to be alone. But, after all, what is it to be alone? I've been alone sometimes in front of three thousand people. I was alone that night."

The actor nodded sympathetically. Dylan snapped his fingers. "I almost forgot," he said. "You know, they were talking about freedom fighters that night. I've been in Mississippi, man. I know those people on another level besides civil rights campaigns. I know them as friends. Like Jim Forman, one of the heads of SNCC. I'll stand on his side any time. But those people that night were actually getting me to look at colored people as colored people. I tell you, I'm never going to have anything to do with any political organisation again in my life. Oh, I might help a friend if he was campaigning for office. But I'm not going to be part of any organisation. Those people at that dinner were the same as everybody else. They're doing their time. They're chained to what we're doing. The only thing is, they're trying to put morals and great deeds on their chains, but basically they don't want to jeopardise their positions. They got their jobs to keep. There's nothing there for me, and there's nothing there for the kind of people I hang around with. The only thing I'm sorry about is that I guess I hurt the collection at the dinner. I didn't know they were going to try to collect money after my speech. I guess I lost them a lot of money. Well, I offered to pay them whatever it was they figured they'd lost because of the way I talked. I told them I didn't care how much it was. I hate debt, especially moral debts. They're worse than money debts."

Exhausted by his monologue, Dylan sank back and poured more Beaujolais. "People talk about trying to change society," he said. "All I know is that so long as people stay so concerned about protecting their status and protecting what they have, ain't nothing going to be done. Oh, there may be some change of levels inside the circle, but nobody's going to learn anything."

The actor left, and it was time for Dylan to head back up-state. "Come up and visit next week," he said to me, "and I'll give you a ride on my motorcycle." He hunched his shoulders and walked off quickly.

Comments after Show at Princeton University

A DYLAN CONCERT FORTY YEARS AGO

At the beginning of June 1969, a loved one bought me Bob Dylan by Daniel Kramer; at that time, I'd not heard of the book and found it fascinating. One of the more memorable scenes is on page 37. Kramer reported that, following a concert at Princeton, Dylan granted a couple of interviews. A young college reporter asked Dylan if he believed in the words he wrote. Dylan replied, "I believe in every breath I take!", embraced the young reporter and added, "And I believe in every breath you take!" at which point Allen Ginsberg joined in the group hug. This came back to me not so long ago.

The dating of this Princeton concert has always been a bit uncertain, with September 1964 being suggested. In fact, it seems that the show took place at McCarter Theatre on Saturday, 7 November. An article in The Daily Princetonian in 2000 referred back an earlier report in the same publication. This appeared to be dated 9 November 1964 and, in turn, referred to "a SRO audience Saturday night", which would have been 7 November 1964.

7 Nov 64 Princeton, NJ McCarter Theatre, Princeton University

The name of the interviewer is not given. Asked about With God On Our Side after the show, Dylan said, "There must be some people somewhere that don't believe God is on their side. Do communists believe in God? How could He be on their side if they don't believe in Him?". The article goes on to say that Dylan believes in "every breath he breathes" and "in every breath anyone else breathes, too". This is clearly the incident recalled by Kramer.

The article starts with a quote from Dylan: "It doesn't matter whether the song has come down from a thousand years or you wrote it yesterday sitting on the toilet". In respect of the themes of love and death, Dylan commented, "I only met death once, but next time, I'll be ready, yes, I'll be ready". The article also says that, rather than songs, he would prefer to write "those things without any form, whatever you want to call them, poetry if you like". This very much fits with our view of the artistic restlessness expressed by Dylan during this period of time. After the interview, Dylan & Co. left in search of a "respectable bar, with nice wide booths, that looks like it's just out of Russia, you know, just right for us".

As to the content of the show, little information is given in the article. There is a reference to Talking John Birch Society Paranoid Blues but it isn't clear if it was performed at this concert but that seems likely. Similarly, there is a passing reference to With God On Our Side but nothing definite. And that's all, folks, I'm afraid.

The article also says that this was the second year that Dylan had played to a sold-out audience at Princeton. Therefore, there was a concert in 1963.

The Les Crane Show, New York City, New York

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke pp. 43-51.

Broadcast live by WABC-TV on February 17 1965. Odetta (OD) and Tommy Sands (TS) make the odd contribution. Bruce Langhorn provides back-up for Dylan on electric guitar. The non-Dylan sections have been cut or trimmed.

In Behind The Shades, Clinton Heylin says that Dylan "demolished Crane on air" and how "he neatly ducked each and every question". That's not at all fair. Dylan is in high humor, and so is Les Crane and together they have a marvelous time making entertainment for a very receptive audience. This is a fun interview, not one of those "put-down" sessions that Bob was in the frequent habit of performing... This is an interview where you really have to listen to the tape to get a feeling for the humorous atmosphere.

LC: There are important people in their fields and there are some fields of importance that when you're good in them you affect the entire move – by move I mean the social move of a country. I think, er, a lot of America and a lot about America has been and will continue to be told in music, music created by true American folk artists and probably one of the most highly acclaimed and highest regarded true American folk composers and performers is Mr Bob Dylan, ladies and gentlemen! (wild applause) Hello Bobby!
BD: I'm alright! Are you plugged in?
LC: All right.

Bob Dylan sings It's All Over Now Baby Blue

LC: Thank you, Bob and I'll be right back.

Program break

LC: How'd it feel?
BD: Fine.
LC: Did it feel good?
BD: Felt good.
LC: Yeah, you were groovy. What'cha doin' with that? (pointing to the harmonica holder)
BD: Oh, I'm just trying to get it down so it doesn't fall in the way of my voice you know.
LC: We had... looking at that harmonica, have you ever met Jesse Fuller?
BD: Sure.
LC: Jessie was on the show a couple of weeks ago. We didn't get a chance to talk much but next time he comes back, I want to because he looks like an amazing gentleman. Talking about amazing gentlemen, how old are you?
BD: Twenty-three!
LC: Twenty-three years old!
BD: Yeah, I'll be 24 in May!
LC: Yeah. A lot's happened to you in just 23 years hasn't it?
BD: Yeah, yeah, fantastic!
LC: Are you happy about it?
BD: Oh, yeah, yeah.
LC: You oughta be. Because you're successful at doing, I think, what you want to do more than anything else.

BD: Yeah, yeah, I don't have much to think about.
LC: You don't have much to think about? I think you must be thinking about an awful lot of things to write the kind of things you do.
BD: Yeah, yeah.
LC: Tell 'em!
BD: Yeah.
LC: Tell 'em, just for those out there in the audience that might not know all of the songs that you've written. Just name a few of the big ones!
BD: Oh.
LC: This is the composer of...
BD: Subterranean Homesick Blues!
LC: No! That ain't one of the big ones! (audience laughter)
BD: No?
LC: No.
BD: Let's see, One Too Many Mornings.
LC: How about Blowin' In The Wind?
BD: Yeah? (applause)
LC: Do you folks, maybe you remember the night that Judy Collins..., and I kept saying "You gotta sing this song, you gotta sing this song" and Judy Collins came out and sang the full original version of Hard Rain's Gonna Fall? Well, Bob wrote that!
BD: Yeah, I wrote that (applause).
LC: Who are you waving at?
BD: Odetta!
LC: Odetta! (To audience) Do you know who Odetta is? (lots of applause). Put a light on that lady!! How are you darling? ... Talk about great artists! That's one of them! (To Odetta) You are going to be on show in a while aren't you?
OD: Next month.
LC: Next month. Yeah, Odetta is all booked... she's gonna come out here and sing sometime. When did you first start pickin' and singin', Bob?
BD: Oh... When I was about ten, eleven.
LC: Always a guitar? Did you start out with a guitar or did you start out playing something else, or what?
BD: Piano. Piano and guitar.
LC: Where are you from? Where were you born?
BD: Minnesota.
LC: Did you go to school there?
BD: Yeah.
LC: How far did you get through school?
BD: Oh, I got all the way.
LC: Did you? High school?
BD: Yeah.
LC: Did you go to college and all?
BD: No, not really, no.
LC: Then, you kinda got on the road.
BD: I wouldn't call it a road, I got on, you know (audience laughter). I did it! (giggles) Whatever.
LC: When did you start writing original tunes?
BD: Well, I started writing, y'know, a long time ago. You know how you write when you write these insane things down, y'know, when you really don't know what else to do. That's when I started writing. I started writing songs... that's a different story, you know... I started writing songs after I heard Hank Williams.
LC: Hank Williams? Did he really inspired you?
BD: Yeah.

LC: Cold Cold Heart? Jambalaya? Things like that?
BD: Yeah. Cole Porter.
LC: Cole Porter??
BD: Yeah.
LC: Now you're putting me on!
BD: No. (audience laughter).
LC: Yeah, you are!
BD: No, I'm not!
LC: Did you see Judy Collins sing Hard Rain?
BD: I did. I saw that!
LC: You watch the show.
BD: All the time. Yeah I do.
LC: Where do you see it mostly?
BD: I saw it last time I was in New York City. I was there to make another record. I saw the show. I saw her singing.
LC: Where were you when you watched the show? You remember the last time?
BD: Somebody's house.
LC: They told me you were in a pool hall last time you saw it.
BD: Oh, I did see the show from a pool hall. Your show goes into the pool halls! (audience laughter)
LC: Yeah?
BD: Because, it goes right in and it stays on ... and ... not even the late movie can get it out.
LC: We're very big in the pool halls.
BD: Very big in the pool halls (audience laughter) and... around... south side bars (audience laughter).
LC: South side bars? Yeah? (audience laughter)
BD: Right there. Down that East End.
LC: You think that means anything?
BD: No, no (audience laughter).
LC: You think we're gonna make it with this show?
BD: I think so!
LC: Yeah?
BD: Yeah! I think so! (giggles) (audience laughter) Despite, y'know, whatever.
LC: What's the matter?
BD: Oh, nothin'! (audience laughter)
LC: Are you nervous?
BD: I'm not nervous, no! I'm... eh... the carpet!
LC: The carpet??
BD: Yellow... you know...
LC: Yeah?
BD: I've never seen.., eh... I never reflected before when I've seen the show that it was so yellow. (audience laughter)
LC: The floor. I assume he's... you're referring to the floor?
BD: Yeah.
LC: Did you get the painting crew in here? (audience laughter)
BD: No.
LC: I mean, is it good or bad?
BD: It's fine, It's fine! Just, you know, it's... I did see the show and it's so... tight! That's all. It seems like it's very big, y'know.
LC: Everybody says that. Apparently it looks bigger on the television than it does here in the studio. But it's a pretty big studio. We have one of the largest studios audiences of any television... What do you think about it, do you watch much television?
BD: Oh, I do once in a while you know.

LC: What kind of shows do you like mostly?
BD: Oh, I like the movies.
LC: Yeah.
BD: Like the movies... I see good movies on television. Best place to see good movies these days, on television!
LC: Yeah... We'll be right back, Bob Dylan and I in just about a minute from right now.

Break in the program.

LC: Bob, when you hear other people do your stuff, do you enjoy listening to Peter Paul And Mary do all your things.
BD: Sure, yeah.
LC: Yeah?
BD: Yeah!
LC: I think that's a real compliment to have so many people recording your things. Besides, you get all that money, too.
BD: Yeah.
LC: What are you doing with all that money by the way?
BD: Oh, buying boots, bananas, fruit, pears.
LC: Boots, bananas, fruit, pears ...
BD: Bought some very fancy ashtrays the other day.
LC: Did you really? Well, where do you keep all that? I understand you don't have a place to keep all that... You travel all the time.
BD: I do, yeah.
LC: What, you strap it all on the motorcycle.
BD: No, I don't really ride my motorcycle that much. I have one though.
LC: You do.
BD: Yeah. I'm thinking of getting a car.
LC: A car!
BD: But I don't know what kind to get.
LC: Yeah.
BD: Yeah, I'm thinking about a Maserati; You ever heard of one of those?
LC: Yeah.
BD: Well, I never saw one, but I like the name.
LC: Mas-er-rati!
BD: Yeah. Maserati. Bob Dylan and his Maserati.
LC: Because it's Italian? Bob Dylan and his swinging Maserati. No, I don't want you in a Maserati.
BD: No?
LC: No, I don't. I ... you know I shouldn't say this because I ...
BD: He wants me in one! (referring to someone shouting 'yeah' from the audience).
LC: Well, that's because he didn't get the same kind of chilling thought I just got which I probably shouldn't bring up.
BD: What?
LC: But I will anyway.
BD: Yeah?
LC: I think you represent to America and to American youth something very very vital and the last guy that had this kind of impact on the youth of this country was James Dean ...
BD: Ah.
LC: And I don't want you riding around in any hot sports cars.
BD: OK! I won't. I won't, Les! (audience laughter).
LC: OK?
BD: Well, you know.

LC: It's Volkswagen time for you! (audience laughter)
BD: That's what I've been told.
LC: A detuned Volkswagen.
BD: What about one of those little three wheeled jobs? You know those little...
LC: Yeah, a Messerschmidt they call those. Did I say that right? Yes I did. We're still on so apparently I did (audience laughter). Listen, how does it feel, Bob, when you're 22 years old and you go out on the stage at the Lincoln Center ...
BD: Old?
LC: Well, you were 22 then.
BD: Oh, yeah.
LC: And there are thousands of people jamming that place, paying top dollar, and according you one of the greatest ovations that... What does it feel like when you're getting this kind of ovation at this kind of an age when you have the kind of respect and adulation you have? That's a tough question.
BD: Yeah.
LC: But answer it.
BD: Well... well, I'll tell ya Les (Bob and audience laugh)... I can't answer that.
LC: Yes, you can.
BD: Oh. Well it feels just delicious, y'know, wonderful. It feels... marvelous, splendid, swinging, groovy, fantastic
LC: Groovy, marvelous, splendid, fantastic
BD: Bobby Neuwirth (laughs)
LC: Yeah, I'll buy. I'll buy all those things. What do you do mostly, you travel a lot don't you?
BD: I do yes.
LC: Give a lot of concerts?
BD: Ah. I do, yes. Yeah.
LC: Where mostly.
BD: Oh, it really ranges, you know. Everyplace from college theaters to Vaudeville halls.
LC: Yeah. What kind of crowds, mostly young people or are the older people starting to get your message?
BD: Oh, good crowds, good crowds. I don't really know, uh, I don't really know what... young people, or old people, but they're all right people. You know. They're all right.
LC: Yeah.
BD: Yeah.
LC: Most of your songs... I don't want to hang you up with corny questions, but it's true that most of your songs say something...
BD: Uh-hum.
LC: There is a message...
BD: Yeah.
LC: ...in almost everything you say. What is your main message?
BD: Eat?
LC: No, I don't think that's it. And that's a cute answer but that's not the message.
BD: Yeah. Ah. My main message is, ah, you know (giggles), you want it in one word (Bob and audience laugh), one word!
LC: No.
BD: Well, I'll tell ya Les.
LC: Yeah, Bob.
BD: One word message. It's just, ah, 'Be', you know.
LC: Be?
BD: Be. Be period. Is.
LC: How about love?
BD: Love? That's an okay word, yeah. That's all right I guess, but it's been used a lot, it's been used a lot.

LC: But that's part of your message, isn't it?
BD: Love? Well, yeah, but everybody says that.
LC: That doesn't make it anything wrong with it.
BD: No, yeah, anybody can say it.
LC: What about 'swing'?
BD: Swing? That's a good message.
LC: Is that part of your message?
BD: Swing. Swing. Love. Be. Is. Was. Were. Double.
LC: Double?
BD: Double up, once in a while.
LC: Yeah (audience laughter). You're gonna sit there and I, I put on these duds for you tonight.
BD: You did?
LC: In a tribute to you and you're gonna sit there and put me on, right?
BD: No, I'm not putting you on, everybody always thinks that (audience laughter).
LC: Everybody always thinks you're putting them...
BD: Yeah, yeah, it's weird, weird. That's a nice tie though.
LC: You like that tie?
BD: Yeah. Like the tie.
LC: You never wear a tie.
BD: No. Once in a while I do. I watch television in a tie (applause). Hey, that's okay. I work, hey! You gonna gimme that tie?
LC: Swing! Love!
BD: Thank you very much! fantastic. What about those boots Les? (audience roars with laughter). You got a buckle on...
LC: What size are yours?
BD: 8 1/2.
LC: You couldn't get in... it's the same boots! You know that?
BD: They are?
LC: It's the same boots.
BD: Yours are a little shinier than mine though.
LC: Hey Bob, that's a nice harmonica.
BD: It is.
LC: (plays some tune on it) We'll be back right after this brief message...

Break in the program.

LC: We're back! Tommy Sands, Caterina Valente, Bob Dylan, Cy Pulman...

Talk with Tommy Sands; break

BD: No, no. I'm not married.
LC: You say that as though you don't approve of it.
BD: Oh, I approve.
LC: You just haven't found the lady yet? Is that it?
BD: Oh, that's not true either. I just am not married you know (audience laughter).
LC: (to part of the audience) What are you breaking up about over there? You're really cracking up.

Talk with Caterina Valente

LC: (to Dylan) What did you do when I looked over there?
BD: Nothing, Les. (audience laughter). I didn't do anything.

LC: You are really cracking up this audience!
BD: Nah, nah, I'm not.

Tommy Sands makes an impromptu speech saying how Dylan resembles James Dean and what a great future he has as an actor,

LC: How do you like that Bobby?
BD: Well, thank you very much (audience laughter).
LC: Have you ever given any thought to acting. Think you might enjoy acting?
BD: Well, I'm gonna try to make a movie this summer. Which Allen Ginsberg is writing. I'm rewriting...
LC: Allen Ginsberg, the poet?
BD: Yeah, yeah.
LC: He was on this program you know.
BD: Yeah.
LC: Extolling the virtues of marijuana one night.
BD: Really? Allen? (audience laughter). Sounds like a lie to me (audience laughter).
LC: That's really ... You think I'm lying?
BD: No, I didn't mean that.
LC: Allen Ginsberg was sitting in that chair where Caterina Valente is sitting right now and he said that he thought that we ought to legalize pot.
BD: He said that?
LC: Right on the television.
BD: Phew!
LC: Can you imagine that?
BD: Nah. Allen is a little funny sometimes (audience roars with laughter).
LC: Allen's funny sometimes, huh? Yes... what is this movie going to be about?
BD: Oh it's a, sort of a horror cowboy movie (audience laughter). Takes place on the New York Thruway.
LC: A horror cowboy movie that takes place... I don't think that's exactly what Tommy Sands had in mind.
BD: No, well, it's, that's the kind of movie it's gonna be though. You know.
LC: It's gonna be one of those underground pictures, right?
BD: No. It's gonna be all straight. On the up and up.
LC: Yeah? Are you gonna star in it?
BD: Yeah, yeah, I'm a hero.
LC: You're the hero? You play the horrible cowboy?
BD: I play my mother (audience laughter).
LC: You play your mother? In the movie?
BD: In the movie. You gotta see the movie (audience laughter).
LC: He's quite the put on artist, isn't he?
BD: Nah, God.
LC: You're terrible.
BD: Nah. Don't want to be categorized.

Tommy Sands (TS) interjects:

TS: Hey, can I ask you a question? may I ask you a question, Bob?
BD: Sure.
TS: ...so many of the present artists seem to do the same thing as the country artists, yet they seem to have a wider appeal. Why is that?
BD: I Don't know. No. No.

LC: I'll tell you why. It's because the country artists haven't had the kind of exposure, lately, that the folk artists have had. They travel in different circles...

Session continues with Caterina Valente & others.

Bob Dylan sings It's Alright, Ma (I'm Only Bleeding)

Press Conference, Greenwich Village, New York City, New York

DYLAN MEETS THE PRESS

This was a "press conference" that never took place, being simply a script concocted jointly by Dylan and J. R. Goddard of the Village Voice. They were known to each other since Goddard had reviewed Dylan's first album in 1962. This was one of the first of a series of spoof interviews that Dylan was involved with over the years and especially around this time. It was published in the Village Voice on March 25th 1965

Dylan had consented to answer all those deep, meaningful, searching questions he's been bombarded with for years! The following took place between Dylan and the large number of newsmen on hand:

Bobby, We know you changed your name. Come on now, what's your real name?

BD: Philip Ochs. I'm gonna change it back when I see it pays.

Who did you write songs like before?

BD: Ever heard of Gene Vincent, Buddy Holly?

Then you had a rock n' roll band in high school?

BD: I had a banana band in high school.

Then you heard of Guthrie and he changed your life.

BD: Then I heard of Josh White.

Then you heard of Guthrie.

BD: Then I heard about those riots in San Francisco.

The HUAC riots?

BD: And I missed out on meeting James Dean so I decided to meet Woody Guthrie.

Was Woody Guthrie your greatest influence?

BD: I don't know that I'd say that, but for a spell, the idea of him affected me quite much.

How about Brecht? Read much of him?

BD: No. But I've read him.

Rimbaud?

BD: I've read his tiny little book 'Evil Flowers'.

You're thinking of Baudelaire.

BD: Yes, I've read his tiny little book, too.

How about Hank Williams? Do you consider him an influence?

BD: Hey look, I consider Hank Williams, Captain Marvel, Marlon Brando, The Tennessee Stud, Clark Kent, Walter Cronkite and J. Carrol Neish all influences. Now what is it—please—what is it exactly you people want to know?

Tell us about your movie.

BD: It's gonna be in black and white.

Will it be in the Andy Warhol style?

BD: Who's Andy Warhol? Listen, my movie will be – I can say definitely – it will be in the style of the early Puerto Rican films.

Who's writing it?

BD: Allen Ginsberg. I'm going to rewrite it.

Who will you play in the film?

BD: The hero.

Who is it that you're going to be?

BD: My mother.

Bob, do you have any philosophy about life and death? About death?

BD: How do I know, I haven't died yet. Hey, you're insulting me all to shit...

What goes on between you and Baez that doesn't meet the eye?

BD: She's my fortune teller.

What about your friends The Beatles? Did you see them when you were there?

BD: John Lennon and I came down to the Village early one morning. They wouldn't let us in The Figaro or The Hip Bagel or The Feenjon. This time I'm going to England. This April. I'll see 'em if they're there.

Bob, what about the situation of American poets? Kenneth Roxroth has estimated that since 1900 about thirty American poets have committed suicide.

BD: Thirty poets! What about American housewives, mailmen, street cleaners, miners? Jesus Christ, what's so special about thirty people that are called poets? I've known some very good people that have committed suicide. One didn't do nothing but work in a gas station all his life. Nobody referred to him as poet, but if you're gonna call people like Robert Frost a poet, then I got to say this gas station boy was a poet, too.

Bob, we understand you're writing a book.

BD: Yeah, it's a funny book. I think it's coming out by spring.

What's it about?

BD: Angels.

Bob, to sum up – don't you have any important philosophy for the world?

BD: I don't drink hard liquor, if that's what you mean.

No. The world in general. You and the world?

BD: Are you kidding? The world don't need me. Christ, I'm only five feet ten. The world could get along fine without me. Don'cha know, everybody dies. It don't matter how important you think you are. Look at Shakespeare, Napoleon, Edgar Allan Poe, for that matter. They are all dead, right?

Well, Bob, in your opinion, then, is there one man who can save the world?

BD: Al Aronowitz.

Maura Davis Interview, Woodstock, New York (Published 1966)

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 293-295.

Composed at Woodstock in March 1965, published in the men's magazine Cavalier in February 1966 and reprinted in the booklet Positively Tie Dream. Some sources write this up as a genuine interview but Paul Williams (Performing Artist: The Music Of Bob Dylan) credits this as a concocted interview, ghosted by Dylan and I really don't think you can fail to agree.

MD: Mr. Dye-lan, I'm from the New Buffalo Consolidated High School, and... uh... the question that... all the students want to know is, well, what's the most important thing in the world for you?

BD: Oh, my God! Do they really want to know that?

MD: Yes! They really want to know!

BD: Well, I'd say... uh... I'd say this tie I'm wearing right now.

MD: The WHAT?

BD: This tie I'm wearing right now. It's very important.

MD: Yee-e-es? Yes, yes!

BD: Because. For obvious reasons.

MD: Oh?

BD: Uh-huh. What would your students say if I said that all the students should wear a tie like this?

MD: Well... well, I think some of them would go right out and buy one. Where did you buy that tie, Mr Dye-lan?

BD: I got this in Buffalo.

MD: In Buffalo?

BD: Yes, in Buffalo, right down by the school.

MD: Oh, oh! Uh, well... this is NEW Buffalo.

BD: Oh, NEW Buffalo.

MD: In Michigan.

BD: Oh, this is Michigan! Excuse me!

MD: Not New York.

BD: I must have the wrong town.

Photographer interrupts:
Excuse me Mr Dylan, I don't want to lose this tie.

BD: Oh, are you losing your tie?

Photographer:
Mr. Dylan, I'd like to get your tie.

MD: (to Photographer) Dye-lan!

BD: (to Photographer) Dye-lan, if you please!

Photographer: (to Dylan)
Oh, I am sorry. Thank you very much sir.

BD: (to Photographer) That's quite all right. Don't get that cloth over your head, I mean over the lens.

MD: And the next thing I suppose they would want to know – I mean after I tell them this is... uh... just let me ask one question. They'll probably want to know, even though it's rude of me to ask. WHY is that the most important thing in the world that tie?

BD: Well. President Johnson used to wear a tie like this – before he got to be president.
MD: Ooooh!
BD: It's a sign of the common man, and I'm a common man.
MD: I see! I see!
BD: So I wear a tie like this – just to get involved.
MD: Ummmmm. Do you wear that tie when you write – when you're writing your songs?
BD: When I write? No, I usually wear this after I get done – after I finish something very good. To make myself really feel good, I put on the tie, and then I feel much better about it – and usually I have a hit.
MD: Really? Oh really? Oh, that's great! What songs did you write...
BD: Oh, I wrote... uh... I wrote... well, let's see. Well, after I wrote Hard Rain's Gonna Fall I wasn't sure if it was any good. So I put on the tie and I KNEW I had no problems from there on in. And it was a hit!
MD: Gosh!
BD: Yeah! Pete Seeger recorded it, yeah, and that was a hit.
MD: Yeah? Well, what are your plans for the future, Mr Dye-lan?
BD: Oh, I...
MD: Can I call you Bob?
BD: I'd appreciate it if you'd call me Mr Dye-lan.
MD: Oh, Okay.
BD: Most high school students do.
MD: All right.
BD: What was the question?
MD: Uh.. uh... oh yes, what are your plans for the future?
BD: Well, I'm gonna take off this tie.
MD: Yes.
BD: That's the immediate future, take off the tie.
MD: Oh, did you just finish writing something?
BD: I just finished writing something just before you came.
MD: I see.
BD: I just finished writing something, and you know that's why I got the tie on.
MD: Oh, I'm so glad! I might never have seen you in a tie if I hadn't come just when you finished writing something.
BD: Yeah, most people NEVER get to see me in this tie.
MD: Really? Really?
BD: Yeah, and I have some more ties.
MD: Different ones? I mean do you have different ones for different kind of songs?
BD: Oh, I have a whole lot of ties in my bedroom.
MD: Yeaaah?
BD: Would you like to go in my bedroom and see some more?
MD: Oh... more what?
BD: More TIES!
MD: Oh, oh! Are you going to write some songs?
BD: Oh, just might write a song – write a song RIGHT IN FRONT OF YOU!
MD: You mean – wee that is, uh, with your tie off?
BD: With my tie off – and I'll put it right back on when I'm done. You'll be very safe.
MD: Oh, well, well, okay.

March 1965
Robert Shelton interview for Cavalier, New York City, NY

Source: Cavalier July 1965, reprinted in the Royal Alber Hall 1966 UK Tour program.

BOB DYLAN
This appraisal is reproduced from the July 1965 Issue of 'Cavalier' magazine with the gracious permission of the Editor and Mr. Robert Shelton, who wrote it.

A FEW OF US sensed, four years ago, when we first encountered him that he was going to be big. How big, none of us knew. Nor had any of us had much contact with genius before. We didn't know how difficult it is, sometimes, to get along with a genius poet, a young genius poet.

Even in those first days he couldn't sit still for more than fifteen minutes. Something was always going on, inside him. Outside, too. His leg would shake with nervous energy, almost like a spastic's. He would move in a chair just the way he later moved on stage, a sort of rhythmic bobbing from the waist up. He used to laugh a lot then, and we all called him Bobby. We figured, although he said he would have to leave, that he would be around for a long time. The scene is different since he left.

About four years ago a kid with a guitar floated into Manhattan from somewhere out West. There have been kids riding guitars into Greenwich Village for years, but this kid was special. In the four years since Bob Dylan "got off the subway from Hibbing, Minnesota," to borrow Jack Goddard's phrase, he has become the most widely sung, talked-about, written-about, argued-about figure in American folk music.

He shambled into town, ramblin' and tumblin' like a paperback edition of Woody Guthrie. Now, he's on his way to England, where people are getting as cultish about him as they were here two years ago. The Beatles have given him their public blessing. So now he rambles and tumbles like a hard-cover edition of Bob Dylan, with a preface by John Lennon, a foreword by Allen Ginsberg, footnotes by Chuck Berry, and a copyright by M. Witmark and Sons.

Dylan still speaks as mystifyingly about himself as he did four years ago, in nervous little packets of words that don't always hang together. I had supper with him at The Lion's Head in the Village, then we went to hear the Paul Butterfield blues band at the Village Gate. Leaving him, the impression persisted that after four years he was the last person in the world to reveal what he is thinking.

"All I do is write songs and sing them," Dylan said. "I can't dig a ditch. I can't splice an electric wire. I'm no carpenter. All I do is write songs and sing them." Opening a second bottle of Riesling, he went on, "I'm lucky. Not because I make a lot of bread. But because I can be around groovy people. I don't have to fear anything and nobody around me has to fear anything. That's where it's at: bread, freedom and no fear."

This was new for Bobby. In a certain sense he's always been afraid—of fame, of mediocrity, of demands on him, of being stereotyped or pigeonholed, of people with questions he wasn't ready to answer. That's one of the inconsistencies about him—the more courageous he is in his songs or his actions, the more he is privately afraid. For all his commitments to people and causes and philosophies, he finds it next to impossible to commit himself conversationally. A line in his new song, Outlaw Blues, typifies his attitude about questions he isn't ready to answer: "Don't ask me nothin' about nothin', I jes' might tell you the truth." [Copyright © 1965 by M. Witmark and Sons. Used with permission.]

Dylan is the sort of eccentric, quirky, offbeat personality writers love to encapsulate in a phrase: ragamuffin minstrel, the American Yevtushenko, Jimmie Dean with a guitar, beatnik bard, the hippie's Homer. But these catchwords don't indicate how his fiercely penetrating words have etched themselves on to the consciousness of a whole generation.

For those who take folk music seriously, Dylan is the most important new writer since Woody Guthrie. For those who don't, Dylan is more important than the folk revival. For a time, before it weighed too heavily on him, he was regarded by his audience as a leader of a campus religion who preached a sermon of anger, protest, nihilism, hope, anti-convention. For a time, his every word and action was weighed as if all were part of a charismatic catechism.

In four years, Dylan's songs, records and concert appearances have earned him nearly a million dollars. This complex, tortured, brilliant, overwrought, under-fed word-fountain has made friends in high places and influenced people he never met. He has alienated many with the corkscrew turns of his personal eccentricities.

Just turned 24, Dylan is contracted to write two books for Macmillan, is writing a play, and considering acting in a movie or two. He has been written up in The New Yorker, written down in Newsweek, been praised in Vogue, pictured in Life, covered by Esquire, "exposed" as a citybilly by Little Sandy Review, lectured to by Sing Out!, and alternately deified and villified by the campus press.

He has been censored off the Ed Sullivan Show over a song, and spent a brilliant hour on the Les Crane Show pulling the master of ceremony's leg. His songs have been recorded by dozens of persons from Marlene Dietrich to Stan Getz. His lyrics to Blowin' in the Wind have all but entered the language of the integration movement. He won an award that Bertrand Russell received the year before, but turned around and castigated the civil libertarians who presented the honor. He'd been holding, among other things, a bullwhip at a folk festival, enjoyed the "patronage" of Joan Baez, received the gift of a guitar from Johnny Cash. He attained some sort of Greenwich Village immortality by two scribblings on the walls of the construction site for the Brevoort East: "Bob Dylan doesn't know his ethno-musicology" and "Bob Dylan has acne."

As the object of more jealousy, envy, and partisanship than any singer-poet in memory, Dylan has spent two years under almost unbearable pressures. He has had to grow up in the fishbowl gaze of a national audience. He has had to do what few poets do—lead simultaneously a life as a stage performer. Partly because of this, his rise to fame was something less than graceful. It has taken him a few years to learn "to stand naked under unknowing eyes." It has taken him a few years to learn how to cope with what he regarded as "the dirt of gossip blowing into my face... and the dust of rumors covering me..." [from Outlaw Blues].

By and large, most of his detractors have ultimately undergone a conversion. One reviewer changed his position completely, saying, "I was deaf," when he knocked a Dylan performance. Others have begrudgingly begun to see what the Dylan craze is all about. Although Allen Ginsberg has called Dylan "the most influential poet of his generation" and Henry Miller has befriended him, Dylan has yet to get his due from the literary community.

Most of his writing is designed for the stage and for either a declamatory or musical delivery, which may account for the indifference of the literary community, which similarly ignored the large corpus of writing by Woody Guthrie. One day, it can be predicted, the John Cialdis, the Louis Untermeyers, the Maxwell Geismars will address themselves to the topical-protest-poetic movement of the last five years when they attempt to estimate "the poetic situation." If and when they do, it is also predictable that they will find Dylan as the most important poetic voice of the time, a voice that helped stimulate a whole chorus of others who took to song-writing as their chief method of self-expression.

In the absence of such literary evaluations, the music commentators have stretched their own horizons to evaluate Dylan. One of the most articulate has been Ralph Gleason of The San Francisco Chronicle, who wrote:

"All of our values and all of our concepts and definitions and priorities are being challenged by the Miles Davises, the Bob Dylans and the rest of the poets and prophesiers of the new generation. I believe that Dylan's popularity is a very significant thing. I am convinced that Malvina Reynolds uttered a profound observation when she pointed out that the youth has been betrayed by good voices. And I am further convinced that a hard core of reality connects the music of Dylan, the beat of jazz, of contemporary poetry, painting, all the arts, in fact, with the social revolution that has resulted in core and SNCC, Dick Gregory, James Baldwin and the rest."

For a poet capable of stunning unsettling imagery, for a moralizer capable of pointing fingers at the victimizers and miscreants, Dylan is curiously unable, in person, to hold up a mirror to himself. Strangely inarticulate in conversation, he has more to say if he can wrap it in humor or be purposefully outrageous: "I'm in the show business now. I'm not in the folk-music business. That's where it's at. So is Roscoe Holcomb, Jean Ritchie, Little Orphan Annie, Dick Tracy, all the way up to President Johnson..."

When he was still in the folk-music business, in February of 1961, he arrived in New York, partly to visit an early idol, Guthrie, and partly to make the Village scene. He was only 19 then, looking, with his thin pale face, as if parts of a choirboy and parts of a beatnik had gone astray in one of the tunnels from Jersey and been hastily reassembled before the Manhattan exit.

Dylan haunted the Village bars, coffeehouses and hootenannies. He got a pad on West Fourth Street. He did a few sets at the Gaslight, the Cafe Wha?, and an initial booking at Folk City in April. He was a green performer then, but something about his black Huck Finn corduroy cap and his tousled hair and ingenuous manner brought out the parent in many persons. Jack Elliott and Dave Van Ronk were happy to pass along their songs and their styles to this charming kid who drifted in from who knows where.

Of his background, he said virtually nothing. Later in a programme note, My Life in a Stolen Moment, he gave his personal history since leaving a Minnesota town:

"You can stand at one end of Hibbing on the main drag an' see clear past the city limits on the other end.

"Hibbing's a good ol' town.

"I ran away from it when I was 10, 12, 13, 15, 15½, 17 an' 18.

"I been caught and brought back all but once..." [Copyright ® 1963 by Bob Dylan. Used with permission.]

Dylan, and many another rebellious city folk singer, had tired of seeing their city limits. Restless and questing, they found a classroom's confines stifling, as did Dylan at the University of Minnesota—"I sat in science class an' flunked out for refusin' to watch a rabbit die..." [from My Life in a Stolen Moment].

He visited the ailing Guthrie. Despite the elder folk poet's illness and the 30 years that stood between them, ego and alter ego somehow managed to communicate. Besides the closeness with Van Ronk and Elliott, Dylan was befriended by another city intellectual who had "gone country," Harry Jackson, the painter. Jackson felt Dylan was a superb transplant of the Italian street musician. He tried to paint Dylan, but the latter kept moving and bobbing and shaking so much the portrait had to be finished without the model.

In the Village clubs, Dylan touched his audiences occasionally with his bluesy songs and his emerging poetic statements, but mostly he made them laugh. He had a curious set of Charlie Chaplin tramp mannerisms that were irresistible. His shamble would send him away past the target of the microphone, and there was a lot of stage business with his hat, his hair, his harmonica.

Dylan made his listeners laugh, and think, with some of his satirical "talking blues" monologues. Talking New York relieved his anger at coffeehouse owners who scorned his "hillbilly" sound. His Talking John Birch Society Blues ridiculed the paranoia of the ultraright. (Both Columbia Records and the Columbia Broadcasting System censored it.)

Dylan had been signed by Columbia's John Hammond in September 1961 after his third appearance at Folk City. Hammond, who had heard his son, also a musician, rave about Dylan, listened to Dylan at a studio session accompanying Carolyn Hester on his harmonica. After hearing only a few harmonica phrases and carefully appraising Dylan's appearance, Hammond went up to Dylan and shook his hand. In Dylan's other hand he carried his first newspaper review. Gambling on his years as a discoverer of great talent, Hammond offered to record Dylan without even hearing him sing.

Although there was a lot of early animosity toward Dylan, his coterie was strongly aware of how important he was. Suzy and Carla Rotolo fussed over him. The McGowans saw that he got a drink now and then. Mike Porco of Folk City offered to treat him to a haircut and some new clothes. Izzy Young sponsored his first concert, at Carnegie Recital Hall, which was attended by 53 persons. (In March 1965, Dylan and Joan Baez gave a concert in Philadelphia that attracted a record audience of 14,000.) Gil Turner and Mikki Isaacson saw that he ate enough. Van Ronk turned him on to François Villon. Barry Kornfeld had some music insights to share. Jean Redpath gave him a book of Yevtushenko's poems. Someone else introduced him to Lorca and Brecht. Albert Grossman bought him some books by Martin Buber.

Grossman, the portly soft-spoken personal manager, was the only manager to view Dylan's potential and to act on it. A prodigious star maker, Grossman has clients who swear by him and recording officials and club managers who swear at him. In the fall of 1963, when fame and some personal crises nearly undid Dylan, Grossman helped keep the singer going. "If it wasn't for Albert," Dylan says today, "I could be on the Bowery now. Albert's the greatest manager that ever lived in the whole century (sic) of the world."

Despite the enthusiasm over his first recording, it barely caused a ripple on the mass audience. Dylan spent most of 1962 writing songs, getting to know many of the people in the Southern integration movement, and working with the members of the Broadside magazine topical-song movement. He made a brief appearance at Carnegie Hall in the fall of 1962 on a "hoot" sponsored by Sing Out!.

The big change occurred in the spring of 1963. At the suggestion of Pete Seeger, Harold Leventhal put Dylan on in a solo concert at Town Hall. Reviews in Billboard magazine and The New York Times were ecstatic. He appeared at the Monterey (California) Folk Festival, and Joan Baez became a Dylan convert. She invited him to her Carmel home. ("I feel it," she said later. "But Dylan can say it. He's phenomenal." As their mutual admiration society grew, he said, "She sings for me," and she said, "He speaks for me.")

This buildup was cumulative, but the turning point was the Peter, Paul and Mary recording of Blowin' in the Wind and the Newport Folk Festival. Partially of conviction and partially of an astute public relations sense, Grossman's clients, Peter, Paul and Mary, introduced the song at concerts as being written by "the most important folk singer in America today. He has his finger on the pulse of his generation."

By the time of the Newport Festival that July, Dylan's name was on everyone's lips. He became restless with photographers and reporters who wanted him to pose and speak. ("You want my time," he snapped impatiently. "There isn't time to give you my time.") A Channel 5 telecast on freedom songs and a series of unannounced appearances at Baez concerts in the East kept the momentum rolling. A solo concert at Carnegie Hall that fall attracted a young audience that acted as if they were going to church, eating up the words of the charisma kid as if he were Jesus in denim and suede. But even older listeners were impressed. "Such passion!" Ronnie Gilbert of The Weavers remarked after the concert.

If Dylan's voice has been a source of controversy (it has been likened to a bear's, to a tubercular patient's wail over a sanitarium wall, to the sound of a dog with its leg in barbed wire), its homely plaintiveness tends to grow on most listeners. His songs have been controversial every step of the circuitous road he travels. The traditionalists objected to his being so socially conscious. Then the social-determinists became irritated when he turned to personal statement wrapped in murky symbolism. The jockey crowd criticised him for losing his sense of humor, and the serious crowd objected to his fantasy satires. Now that he is part of the Beatles' backlash, using electrical background instruments and reworking the rhythm and blues tunes of Chuck Berry, non-rock 'n' roll fans are annoyed.

For a little while, Dylan tried to defend his musical approaches. He wrote of his then-predominantly topical approach a credo that will stand up no matter where he goes musically:

I'm singin' and writin'
        what's on my mind now
What's in my own head and what's in my own heart

I'm singin' for me an'
a million other me's that've been forced t'gether by the same feelin'—
I'm writin' an' singin' for me
An' I'm writin' an' singin' for you...

Probably the biggest storm over Dylan's songs was predicated by an ill-founded hatchet job by Newsweek that implied he might be a song-stealer. Actually, only occasionally did he compose his own melodies but would build, in the perfectly acceptable folk process, on other melodies. Thus Blowin' in the Wind is his reworking of Dolores Dixon's arrangement of the traditional spiritual, No More Auction Block for Me. Hollis Brown is set to the traditional Pretty Polly. Fare Thee Well is set to The Leaving of Liverpool, and Masters of War is built on the melody of Nottamun Town. With God on Our Side is a revamping of Dominic Behan's Patriot Game, in itself a rehash of the traditional Merry Month of May.

Although Dylan has borrowed, adapted, or originated some striking melodies, it is as a lyricist-poet that he bears the most import. Despite many rumors, the only litigation he has gone through was a friendly suit by his close friend and admirer, Paul Clayton, over the melody of Don't Think Twice, which Clayton had already adapted from tradition.

Some of Dylan's most powerful works are almost chants against guitar-strumming. Who Killed Davey Moore, A Hard Rain's A'Gonna Fall, and It's All Right Ma are among his best works despite their lack of melodic profiles. Never will I forget the steaming summer afternoon when Dylan pulled out of his pocket the poem inspired by the shooting of Medgar Evers, the Mississippi NAACP leader. Here was a concise, eloquent tribute to a fallen Negro martyr that simultaneously explained how the white Southerner was also being victimized. He called it Only a Pawn in Their Game.

The hubbub about the origins of some Dylan melodies would never have gone so far if he had been able to say something in his own defence about his working methods. But, here again, a curious inarticulateness crept over him. As in his dealings with the press, he almost invites animosity as if he knows he is right and can't expect a fair break from anything that resembles authority or the Establishment. Two highly sympathetic writer friends, Al Aronowitz and Pete Karmon, dropped articles they were writing on Dylan because of his expressed contempt for much of what is written about him.

This truculence toward authority is firmly rooted in the irreverence of The Beatles and the Dead End Kids before them. Much as some of the adults around the folk movement find this thumb-at-the-nose attitude of post-adolescent revolt hard to take, it is just there that the movement gets much of its motive power. Thus the rebels and the disbelievers in authority have found in Dylan a practicing rebel disbeliever with whom they can identify.

Despite the various turns and detours that Dylan has taken in his song writing, nothing seems likely to halt his creative flood, unless it be his own self-destructiveness. Like other poets, from Rimbaud to Dylan Thomas to Hank Williams to Charlie Parker, Dylan has a kindred genius for afflicting his body and health. At 24, he already has a prematurely tired wizened look.

He'll brush aside the concern of his friends, indicating that everybody dies sometime. So, the charisma kid is just going to keep going his own way, no matter what anyone says about him or his songs. He'll just keep ramblin' and tumblin' down the road, looking for his own compass points before he tries to lead anyone else down his paths.

DYLAN v. DONOVAN

DOUBLE EXPOSURE ON THE FOLK SCENE

FOLK is busting out in all directions—and in particular into the Pop 50. And the two spearheads of the folk invasion into pop fields is being led by Bob Dylan in America and Donovan in Britain.

The Box Office for Dylan's London concert at the Royal Albert Hall on May 10, opened on Saturday. By Monday, his agent Tito Burns, was telling the MM: "There has been a tremendous rush for tickets and I predict they will all have gone by the end of this week.

"And remember there are 5,000 seats with a top price of £1."

IS HE GOOD?

Dylan's first single, "Times They Are A Changing", reaches the shops tomorrow (Friday). Donovan's first record, "Catch The Wind" was released last Friday and has already jumped into the Pop 50 at 36. He has just signed a contract that could earn him £25,000 this year.

The MM spoke to both stars this week. Dylan was forced to admit he had never heard of Donovan. "Is he good?" asked the American star.

Donovan has certainly heard of Dylan. "It should be good when Dylan comes over," he enthused. "I've bought my ticket to see him. It will be great to see him splashed across the papers.

"Dylan's record should be big, I have heard it, of course—it's off his LP and it's a great number.

"I think the bit about me imitating Dylan is beginning to pass over—although there are probably some fierce folkers still on about it."

Is Dylan worried at the thought of being copied by other artists?

"It doesn't bother me" he told the MM.

We put to him a question from Donovan: "Do they credit you with as little intelligence as they credit me with in Britain?"

Said Dylan: "In the USA, I don't think they credit me with having any intelligence, whatever that word means, but I think they do in England."

Donovan is still regarded with suspicion by the British folk world. Does he plan to work any folk clubs?

"They can't afford me" he laughed. "I would like to do a few of them to show there are no hard feelings."

What difference has success made to their lives?

"None" says Dylan. "I stay out of it."

"None, really" says Donovan, "I'm not buying a car or anything like that. But I am planning to get a flat."

Donovan has now written some 50 songs and is in demand by other recording artists, Dylan isn't interested in writing for other people.

"I don't really write for other people at all" says Bob. "I did 12 or 13 new songs for the album that's just coming out. And I guess I have another four or five new ones about recorded for the next record."

Dylan has fast finished writing a book on Hollywood with photographer Barry Feinstein.

"It will be out in the Fall," he told the MM. "I'm down in the country now, working on another book. I'm putting it together. It's not really a novel, just bits of information. It's called 'Bob Dylan Off The Record'."

"I'm also doing some concerts with Joan Baez before I get over to Britain. And would you please say hello to Martin and Dorothy Carthy."

Is there going to be a folk boom?

"I don't know what that is really, a boom," hedged Dylan.

"I don't think there is really a chance yet," said Donovan. "It could happen this year but it will come through slowly, not in a sudden, big way. But there are certainly some interesting developments in the pop charts."

Dylan said be didn't know "Times They Are A Changing" was being released in Britain. Does be hope for a hit with it?

"Not really" he says. "I don't really have my connection with it now."

Whatever they say, a great deal more is going to be heard of both folk D's during 1965. —BOB DAWBARN and MAX JONES.

Paul J Robbins Interview, Santa Monica, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 55-62.

This is a most unusual interview for the time. This is a very open and straightforward Dylan answering the questions at a time when other interviewers were being treated to Bob's more surreal approach. At the same time, Bob was also up to manufacturing interviews (Hentoff, Goddard and Maura Davis) and for these and other reasons some considered this interview not to be genuine for a while.

Paul Jay Robbins, a Los Angeles Free Press journalist met Dylan at a party given by Columbia records on March 26th 1965, the day before the Santa Monica Civic Auditorium concert. According to Heylin "They jointly compose a brief absurdist interview which includes such profound statements as 'I know a lot of people that are really President Johnson in a crash helmet when they say they're really Mickey Rooney in a jock strap'. They agree to meet the next afternoon for a proper interview." Note below how the interview proper starts off with – "I don't know whether to do a serious interview or carry on in that absurdist way we talked last night."

The interview appeared in three parts in the Los Angeles Free Press on September 10th, 17th and 24th. In Pickering's A Commemoration this is referred to as a two-part interview omitting the 10th, but Praxis-One lists all three dates. It has been re-printed a number of times, appearing in Detroit's Fifth Estate in July 1966, soon to be reprinted in In-Beat in August 1966 and in Hullabaloo the following year. A tape is rumored.

PR: I don't know whether to do a serious interview or carry on in that absurdist way we talked last night.

BD: It'll be the same thing anyway, man.

PR: Yeah, Okay... If you are a poet and write words arranged in some sort of rhythm, why do you switch at some point and write lyrics in a song so that you're singing the words as part of a Gestalt presence?

BD: Well, I can't define that word poetry, I wouldn't even attempt it. At one time I thought that Robert Frost was poetry, other times I thought that Allen Ginsberg was poetry, sometimes I thought Francois Villon was poetry – but poetry isn't really confined to the printed page. Hey, then again, I don't believe in saying "Look at that girl walking! Isn't that poetry?" I'm not going to get insane about it. The lyrics to the songs... just so happens that it might be a little stranger than in most songs. I find it easy to write songs. I been writing songs for a long time and the words to the songs aren't written out just for the paper; they're written as you can read it, you dig. If you take whatever there is to the song away – the beat, the melody – I could still recite it. I see nothing wrong with songs you can't do that with either – songs that, if you took the beat and the melody away, they wouldn't stand up. Because they're not supposed to do that, you know. Songs are songs... I don't believe in expecting too much out of any one thing.

PR: Whatever happened to Blind Boy Grunt?

BD: I was doing that four years ago. Now there's a lot of people writing songs on protest subjects. But it's taken some kind of a weird step. Hey, I'd rather listen to Jimmy Reed or Howlin' Wolf, man, or the Beatles, or Francois Hardy, than I would listen to any protest song singers – although I haven't heard all the protest song singers there are. But the ones I've heard – there's this very emptiness which is like a song written "Let's hold hands and everything will be grand". I see no more to it than that. Just because someone mentions the word "bomb", I'm not going to go "Aaiee!" and start clapping.

PR: Is it that they just don't work any more?

BD: It's not that it don't work, it's that there are a lot of people afraid of the bomb, right. But there are a lot of other people who're afraid to be seen carrying a Modern Screen magazine down the street, you know. Lot of people afraid to admit that they like Marlon Brando movies... Hey, it's not that they don't work anymore but have you ever thought of a place where they do work? What exactly does work?

PR: They give a groovy feeling to the people who sing them, I guess that's about it. But what does work is the attitude, not the song. And there's just another attitude called for.

BD: Yeah, but you have to be very hip to the fact about that attitude – you have to be hip to communication. Sure, you can make all sorts of protest songs and put them on a Folkways record. But who hears them? The people that do hear them are going to be agreeing with you anyway. You aren't going to get somebody to hear it who doesn't dig it. People don't listen to things they don't dig. If you can find a cat that can actually say "Okay, I'm a changed man because I heard this one thing – or I just saw this one thing...". Hey, it don't necessarily happen that way all the time. It happens with a collage of experience which somebody can actually know by instinct what's right and wrong for him to do. Where he doesn't actually have to feel guilty about anything. A lot of people can act out of guilt. They act because they think somebody's looking at them. No matter what it is. There's people who do anything because of guilt...

PR: And you don't want to be guilty?

BD: It's not that I'm not guilty. I'm not any more guilty than you are. Like, I don't consider any elder generation guilty. I mean, they're having these trials at Nuremberg, right? Look at that and you can place it out. Cats say "I had to kill all those people or else they'd kill me" Now, who's to try them for that? Who are these judges that have got the right to try a cat? How do you know they wouldn't do the same thing?

PR: This may be a side trip, but this thing about the Statute of Limitations running out and everybody wants to extend it? You remember, in Animal Farm, what they wrote on the wall? "All animals are equal." But later they added "...but some are more equal than others." It's the same thing in reverse. That some are less equal than others. Like nazis are really criminals, so let's really get them; change any law just to nail them all.

BD: Yeah, all that shit runs in the same category. Nobody digs revenge, right? But you have these cats from Israel who, after twenty years, are still trying to catch these cats, who're old cats, man, who have escaped. God knows they aren't going to go anywhere, they're not going to do anything. And you have these cats from Israel running around catching them. Spending twenty years out of their lives. You take that job away from them and they're no more or less than a baker. He's got his whole life tied up in one thing. It's a one-thought thing, without anything between: "That's what it is, and I'm going to get it". Anything between gets wiped all away. I can't make that, but I can't really put it down. Hey: I can't put anything down, because I don't have to be around any of it. I don't have to put people down which I don't like, because I don't have to be around any of those people. Of course there is the giant great contradiction of What Do You Do. Hey, I don't know what you do, but all I can do is cast aside all the things not to do. I don't know where it's at once in a while, all I know is where it's not at. And as long as I know that, I don't really have to know, myself, where's it at. Everybody knows where it's at once in a while, but nobody can walk around all the time in a complete Utopia. Dig poetry. You were asking about poetry? Man, poetry is just bullshit, you know? I don't know about other countries, but in this one it's a total massacre. It's not poetry at all. People don't read poetry in this country – if they do, it offends them; they don't dig it. You go to school, man, and what kind of poetry do you read? You read Robert Frost's "The Two Roads", you read T. S. Eliot – you read all that bullshit and that's just bad, man, It's not good. It's not anything hard, it's just soft-boiled egg shit. And then, on top of it, they throw Shakespeare at some kid who can't read Shakespeare in high school, right? Who digs reading, Hamlet, man? All they give you is Ivanhoe, Silas Marner, Tale of Two Cities – and they keep you away from things which you should do. You shouldn't even be there in school. You should find out from people. Dig! That's where it all starts. In the beginning – like from 13 to 19 – that's where all the corruption is. These people all just overlook it, right? There's more V. D. in people 13 to 19 than there is in any other group, but they ain't ever going to say so. They're never going to go into the schools and give shots. But that's where it's at. It's all a hype, man.

PR: Relating all this: if you put it in lyrics instead of poetry, you have a higher chance of hitting the people who have to be hit?

BD: I do, but I don't expect anything from it, you dig? All I can do is be me – whoever that is – for those people that I do play to, and not come on with them, tell them I'm something I'm not. I'm not going to tell them I'm the Great Cause Fighter or the Great Lover or the Great Boy Genius or whatever. Because I'm not, man. Why mislead them? That's all just Madison Avenue selling me, but it's not really selling me, 'cause I was hip to it before I got there.

PR: Which brings up another thing. All the folk magazines and many folk people are down on you. Do they put you down because you changed or...

BD: It's that I'm successful and they want to be successful, man. It's jealousy. Hey, anybody, with any kind of knowledge at all would know by instinct what's happening here. Somebody who doesn't know that, is still hung up with success and failure and good and bad... maybe he doesn't have a chick all the time... stuff like that. But I can't use comments, man. I don't take nothing like that seriously. If somebody praises me and says "How groovy you are!", it doesn't mean nothing to me, because I can usually sense where that person's at. And it's no compliment if someone who's a total freak comes up and says "How groovy you are!" And it's the same if they don't dig me. Other kinds of people don't have to say anything because, when you come down to it, it's all what's happening in the moment which counts. Who cares about tomorrow and yesterday? People don't live there, they live now.

PR: I have a theory, which I've been picking up and shaking out every so often. When I spoke with the Byrds, they were saying the same thing as I am saying – a lot of people are saying – you're talking it. It's why we have new so-called rock n' roll sound emerging, it's a synthesis of all things a...

BD: It's further than that, man. people know nowadays more than before. They've had so much to look at by now and know the bullshit of everything. People now don't even care about going to jail. So what? You're still with yourself as much as if you're out on the streets. There's still those who don't care about anything, but I got to think that anybody who doesn't hurt anybody, you can't put that person down, you dig, if that person's happy doing that.

PR: But what if they freeze themselves into apathy? What if they don't care about anything at all anymore?

BD: Whose problem is that? Your problem or theirs? No, it's not that, it's that nobody can learn by somebody else showing them or teaching them. People got to learn by themselves, going through something which relates. Sure, you say how do you make somebody know something... people know it by themselves; they can go through some kind of scene with other people and themselves which somehow will come out somewhere and it's grind into them and be them. And all that just comes out of them somehow when they're faced up to the next thing.

PR: It's like taking in until the time comes to put out, right. But people who don't care don't put anything out. It's a whole frozen thing where nothing's happening anywhere; it's just like the maintenance of status quo, of existing circumstances, whatever they are...

BD: People who don't care? Are you talking about gas station attendants or a Zen doctor, man? Hey, there's a lot of people who don't care; a lot don't care for different reasons.

A lot care about some things and not about others, and some who don't care about anything – it's just up to me not to let them bring me down and not to bring them down. It's like the whole world has a little thing: it's being taught that when you get up in the morning, you have to go out and bring somebody down. You walk down the street and, unless you've brought somebody down, don't come home today, right? It's a circus world.

PR: So who is it that you write and sing for?

BD: Not writing and singing for anybody, to tell you the truth. Hey, really, I don't care what people say. I don't care what they make me seem to be or what they tell other people I am. If I did care about that, I'd tell you; I really have no concern with it. I don't even come in contact with these people. Hey, I dig people, though. But if somebody's going to come up to me and ask me some questions which have been on his mind for such a long time, all I can think of is "Wow, man, what else can be in that person's head besides me? Am I that important, man, to be in a person's head for such a long time he's got to know this answer?" I mean, can that really straighten him out – if I tell him something? Hey, come on...

PR: A local disc jockey, Les Claypool, went through a whole thing on you one night, just couldn't get out of it. For maybe 45 minutes, he'd play a side of yours and then an ethnic side in which it was demonstrated that both melodies were the same. After each pair he'd say, "Well, you see what's happening... This kid is taking other people's melodies; he's not all that original. Not only that", he'd say, "but his songs are totally depressing and have no hope".

BD: Who's Les Claypool?

PR: A folk jockey out here who has a long talk show on Saturday nights and an hour one each night, during which he plays highly ethnic sides?

BD: He played those songs? He didn't play something hopeful?

PR: No, he was loading it to make his point. Anyway, it brings up an expected question: why do you use melodies that are already written?

BD: I used to do that when I was more or less in folk. I knew the melodies; they were already there. I did it because I liked the melodies. I did it when I really wasn't that popular and the songs weren't reaching that many people, and everybody around dug it. Man. I never introduced a song, "Here's the song I've stole the melody from, someplace". For me it wasn't that important; still isn't that important. I don't care about the melodies, man, the melodies are all traditional anyway. And if anybody wants to pick that out and say "That's Bob Dylan", that's their thing, not mine. I mean if they want to think that. Anybody with any sense at all, man, he says that I haven't any hope... Hey, I got faith. I know that there are people who're going to know that's total bullshit. I know the cat is just up tight. He hasn't really gotten into a good day and he has to pick on something. Groovy. He has to pick on me? Hey, if he can't pick on me, he picks on someone else, it don't matter. He doesn't step on me, 'cause I don't care. He's not coming up to me on the street and stepping on my head, man. Hey, I've only done that with very few of my songs, anyway. And then when I don't do it, everybody says they're rock & roll melodies. You can't satisfy the people -you just can't. You got to know, man; they just don't care about it.

PR: Why is rock & roll coming in and folk music going out?

BD: Folk music destroyed itself. Nobody destroyed it. Folk music is still here, if you want to dig it. It's not that it's going in or out. It's all the soft mellow shit, man, that's just being replaced by something that people know there is now. Hey, you must've heard rock n' roll long before the Beatles, you must've discarded rock n' roll around 1960. I did that in 1957. I couldn't make it as a rock & roll singer then. There were too many groups. I used to play piano. I made some records, too.

PR: Okay, you got a lot of bread now. And your way of life isn't like it was four or five years ago. It's much grander. Does that kind of thing tend to throw you off?

BD: Well, the transition never came from working at it. I left where I'm from because there's nothing there. I come from Minnesota, there was nothing there. I'm not going to fake it and say I went out to see the world. Hey when I left there, man, I knew one thing: I had to get out of there and not come back. Just from my senses I knew there was something more than Walt Disney movies. I was never turned on or off by money. I never considered the fact of money as really that important. I could always play the guitar, you dig, and make friends – or fake friends. A lot of other people do other things and get to eat and sleep that way. Lot of people do a lot of things just to get around. You can find cats who get very scarred, right? Who get married and settle down. But, after somebody's got something and sees it all around him, so he doesn't have to sleep out in the cold at night, that's all. The only thing is he don't die. But is he happy? There's nowhere to go. Okay, so I get the money, right? First of all, I had to move out of New York. Because everybody was coming down to see me – people which I didn't really dig. People coming in from weird-ass places. And I would think, for some reason, that I had to give them someplace to stay and all that. I found myself not really being by myself but just staying out of things I wanted to go to because people I knew would go there.

PR: Do you find friends – real friends – are they recognizable anymore?

BD: Oh, sure, man, I can tell somebody I dig right away. I don't have to go through anything with anybody. I'm just lucky that way.

PR: Back to protest songs. The IWW's work is over now and the unions are pretty well established. What about the civil rights movement?

BD: Well, it's okay. It's proper. It's not "Commie" anymore. Harper's Bazaar can feature it, you can find it on the cover of Life. But when you get beneath it, like anything, you find there's bullshit tied up in it. The Negro Civil Rights Movement is proper now, but there's more to it than what's in Harper's Bazaar. There's more to it than picketing in Selma, right? There's people living in utter poverty in New York. And then again, you have this big Right to Vote. Which is groovy. You want all these Negroes to vote? Okay, I can't go over the boat and shout "Hallelujah" only because they want to vote. Who are they going to vote for? Just politicians; same as the white people put in their politicians. Anybody that gets into politics is a little greaky anyway. Hey, they're just going to vote, that's all they're going to do. I hate to say it like that, make it sound hard, but it's going to boil down to that.

PR: What about the drive for education?

BD: Education? They're going to school and learn about all the things the white private schools teach. The catechism, the whole thing. What're they going to learn? What's this education? Hey, the cat's much better off never going to school. The only thing against him is he can't be a doctor or a judge. Or he can't get a good job with the salesman's company. But that's the only thing wrong. If you want to say it's good that he gets an education and goes out and gets a job like that, groovy. I'm not going to do it.

PR: In other words, the formal intake of factual knowledge...

BD: Hey, I have no respect for factual knowledge, man. I don't care what anybody knows, I don't care if somebody's a walking encyclopedia. Does that make him nice to talk to? Who cares if Washington was even the first president of the United States? You think anybody has actually ever been helped with this kind of knowledge?

PR: Maybe through a test. Well, what's the answer?

BD: There aren't any answers, man. Or any questions. You must read my book... there's a little part in there about that. It evolves into a thing where it mentions words like "Answer". I couldn't possibly rattle off the words for these, because you'd have to read the whole book to see these specific words or Question and Answer. We'll have another interview after you read the book.

PR: Yeah, you have a book coming out. What about it? The title?

BD: Tentatively, Bob Dylan Off the Record. But they tell me there's already books out with that off the record title. The book can't really be titled, that's the kind of book it is. I'm also going to write the reviews for it.

PR: Why write a book instead of lyrics?

BD: I've written some songs which are kind of far out, a long continuation of verses, stuff like that – but I haven't really gotten into writing a completely free song. Hey, you dig something like cut-ups? I mean, like William Burroughs?

PR: Yeah, there's a cat in Paris who published a book with no pagination. The book comes in a box and you throw it in the air and, however it lands, you read it like that.

BD: Yeah, that's where it's at. Because that's what it means, anyway. Okay, I wrote the book because there's a lot of stuff in there I can't possibly sing... all the collages. I can't sing it because it gets too long or it goes too far out. I can only do it around a few people who would know. Because the majority of the audience – I don't care where they're from, how hip they are – I think it would just get totally lost. Something that had no rhyme, all cut up, no nothing, except something happening, which is words.

PR: You wrote the book to say something?

BD: Yeah, but certainly not any kind of profound statement. The book don't begin or end.

PR: But you had something to say. And you wanted to say it to somebody.

BD: Yeah, I said it to myself. Only, I'm lucky, because I could put it into a book. Now somebody else is going to be allowed to see what I said to myself.

PR: You have four albums out now, with a fifth any day. Are these albums sequential in the way that you composed and sung them?

BD: Yeah, I've got about two or three albums that I've never recorded, which are lost songs. They're old songs; I'll never record them. Some very groovy songs. Some old songs which I've written and sung maybe once in a concert and nobody else ever heard them. There are a lot of songs which would fill in between the records. It was growing from the first record to the second, then a head change on the third. And the fourth. The fifth I can't even tell you about.

PR: So if I started with Album One, Side One, Band One, I could truthfully watch Bob Dylan grow?

BD: No, you could watch Bob Dylan laughing to himself. Or you could see Bob Dylan going through changes. That's really the most.

PR: What do you think of the Byrds? Do you think they're doing something different?

BD: Yeah, they could. They're doing something really new now. It's like a danceable Bach sound. Like Bells of Rhymney. They're cutting across all kinds of barriers which most people who sing aren't even hip to. They know it all. If they don't close their minds, they'll come up with something pretty fantastic.

DYLAN: FASTEST SELL-OUT YET
MM, 27 March 1965, page 7

Signs are that Bob Dylan's coming British tour will be among the quickest sell outs known to local promoters, a healthy omen for those many who believe Dylan to be one of the most creative talents to appear on the folk scene in years. Only two box offices have opened so far. Both sold all their tickets in double quick time. London's Albert Hall started selling on the Saturday. By mid-day Monday, they had standing room only, and by four o'clock, they had sold out completely. Tickets for Manchester's Free Trade Hall were snapped up almost as swiftly.

The next box offices to open are at Sheffield City Hall and Leicester's De Montfort Hall. Readers in those parts anxious to see Dylan are advised not to hang about. In view of this current commotion, it is ironical to consider that Bob Dylan was here in 1962 – doing a play – when he visited the Troubadour and other London folk clubs without apparently making much of an impression. Dylan is in many ways a fantastic figure – a good deal of fantasy creeps into a song like 'A Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall' – and fantastic figures attract legends and fanciful notions. My telephone conversation with him went like this:

MJ: I hear you have a very successful record out there?
BD: Oh, do I?
MJ: Yes, I'm told it's a tremendous success called 'Subterranean Homesick Blues'. What's it about?
BD: It's just a little story really. It's not about anything.
MJ: Has this single made any difference yet?
BD: No.
MJ: Do you realise that you've started something of a cult and The Beatles have been praising your work?
BD: Not really.
MJ: Did you notice George Harrison's comment that they admire "the Dylan way of life?"
BD: No, I didn't. I think that's kind of weird.
MJ: What do you think of The Beatles, as artists and people?
BD: Oh, I think they're the best. They're artists and they're people.

Late April 1965
Fred Billany Interview, London, England

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 297-299.

Dylan arrived at London Airport by flight TWA 702 on April 26th to commence his 1965 UK Tour. He was chauffeured to the Savoy Hotel London by Austin Princess, arriving there at around 11:00 p.m. He stayed in his £70 per week (a lot of money in those days) suite (Room 208) through to the morning of April 30th when he left for Sheffield. Throughout this time he gave a succession of interviews and press conferences one of which was to Fred Billany of the Newcastle Evening Chronicle. The interview was published in Newcastle Upon Tyne on May 4th.

A WANDERING TROUBADOUR – WITH NO MESSAGE FOR ANYONE...

BOB DYLAN is the folk singer whose exotic songs, mostly written by himself, carry a plea for freedom in the widest possible sense.

The support he commands from millions of young people both here and in America has developed into a cult which challenged the ecstatic admiration accorded to the Beatles.

Twenty-three-year-old Bob Dylan – he appears in Newcastle on Thursday – is the symbol of a restless age, a 1965 phenomenon, who has described himself as a wondering troubadour linking the poetry of his songs with times of disillusionment.

He says he has no philosophy about anything. I talked to this shambling, tousle-haired young man at the Savoy Hotel, London. He wore jeans, boots, an open-necked shirt, the colors of which rival anything a rainbow can produce.

There seemed never to be a second when a cigarette was not between his lips and he cheerfully admitted that he smokes at least 80 a day.

"I have no message for anyone," he told me. "My songs are only me talking to myself."

NERVOUS

As he spoke he moved nervously from foot to foot, as if he were starting the first steps of a jig. "I don't want to influence people in any way. It is other people who influence me about life."

He is conscious of the fact that he is a performer who is not without his critics, of whom he declares: "They would lose their jobs if they did not criticize something."

But he came to Britain last week knowing that he has filled the Albert Hall with his supporters on two consecutive nights. There was almost a public riot to get tickets to hear him and it is the youngsters who will pack this vast and historic hall when Dylan walks on stage to sing.

Bob Dylan has a thin and pale face with sad blue eyes. He was born on May 24, 1941, in Duluth, a former mining town in Minnesota.

He ran away from home at least seven times and eventually went to live in South Dakota and New Mexico. He studied at Minnesota University but it was an uneasy relationship with his tutors.

IN NEW YORK

After six months he left going to New York to see his lifelong idol Woody Herman (sic), the notable American musician and lyricist.

Dylan sang in Greenwich Village and then someone at the BBC heard about him and brought him to London to appear in the television production of Mad House in Castle Street.

He also appeared in London clubs, later returning to Britain to sing at a Festival Hall concert which is almost scorned by his admirers.

What makes Dylan tick? What is his appeal?

There is a hint of foreboding in his songs which give them a strange appealing note. However, some of his words to my mind at least, can be a little incomprehensible. But there is little to puzzle anybody in the song, The Times They Are A-Changin'. Dylan sings:

> "the order is rapidly changing, > the first one now will later be last."

He has the power to make an audience listen. They do not scream and yell while he is singing. His very presence disciplines them into silence and the cheers and applause come only at the end of each number.

Dylan's voice has a dry and bitter quality. He has been identified as a champion of civil rights (some of his songs are about this subject) but ask him to talk about politics and he gives a short sharp reply which indicates in no uncertain manner that he is not very fond of the subject.

Some of his songs tell of the world after the atom bomb and he has written one about boxers who get killed while fighting in "the square ring."

Yet Dylan now says he is "bored by the atom bomb" and also with the American Government.

He told me that one of this main aims in life is "to get a glimpse of everything, the good things and the bad things."

Does he ever worry and if so what about? "I worry about keeping my sanity but my idea of sanity maybe different to that of other people."

Later Dylan said: "I'm on my own. I don't want to hurt anybody. I just go along. I'm not going anywhere but I'm changing."

For a second or two I thought he was quoting from one of his new songs.

Dylan may be best summed up in his own words: "You either love or hate me."

One thing is certain: you can't ignore him. He is a remarkable fellow.

Taken initially from D.A. Pennebaker's book Dont Look Back (Ballantine Books).

Do you think that a lot of young people who buy your records understand a single word of what you're singing?

BD: Sure.

You reckon they do?

BD: Sure.

Why do you say they do?

How can you be so sure? They're quite complicated songs aren't they?

BD: Yeah, but they understand them.

How do you know they understand them? Have they told you that they do?

BD: They told me. Haven't you ever heard that song She Said So...

You've got it wrong (Laughing)

Do you think that they understand you because they don't want to see you?

Dylan ignores the question.

Would you say that you cared about people particularly?

BD: Well, yeah, but you know... I mean, we all have our own definitions of all those words... care and people.

Well, but surely we know what people are.

BD: Do we?

You sound angry in your songs. I mean, are you protesting against certain things you're angry about?

BD: I'm not angry. I'm a delightful sort of person.

I see, thank you very much.

BD: Okay.

Do you ever read the Bible?

BD: What about the Bible?

Do you ever read the Bible?

BD: Um... no.

Have you read it?

BD: Have I ever? I've glanced through it...

Because you see, a lot of the things you say.

BD: I've glanced through it. I haven't read it.

BD: This is the part where I don't write. You know, anything that happens I'll just remember, you know. When I'm Jiving my own thing, doing what I do, this is never around me. I mean, I accept everything. I accept this, you know, I'll accept...

Why?

BD: Well, because it's here, 'cause it's real, 'cause it exists just as much as the busses outside exist. I mean, I can't turn myself off to it because if I try to fight it you know, I'm just going to end up going insane faster than I eventually will go insane... if I do go insane... when and if the time comes for me to... go... in... sane.

In a waiting room at London Airport.

BD: Well, what's happening here? What are we going to do?
How long is it since you were last in London?
BD: About a year.
What's the lightbulb for?
Dylan holds up an enormous industrial lightbulb.
BD: What's the lightbulb for? I thought you would ask me that. No, I usually carry a lightbulb. Somebody gave it to me, you know.
Sorry, I didn't quite catch the answer.
BD: Someone gave it to me... a very affectionate friend.
Oh, I see.

To Bob Neuwirth.
Are you folk?
BN: Who, am I folk? No, not me. I'm not folk.

To Dylan.
What is your real message?
BD: My real message? Keep a good head and always carry a lightbulb.
Have you tried it?
BD: Well, I plugged it into my socket and the house exploded.

DYLAN FETED, BUT REMAINS UNMOVED!

Dylan's here! The world's most talked about folk singer flew into London Airport on Monday for his sell-out tour. And somebody who looks less like a star than he does I've yet to meet.

DYLAN – small, hardly noticed when first he came in, shielding his eyes from photographers' flashlights. Dark glasses go on and off with every flash.

DYLAN – evading more questions than he answers, but more diplomatic than President Johnson's Press Secretary.

DYLAN – above all looking bored and strangely out of place against the luxury that surrounds him. Almost the little boy lost. Until you speak to him.

"I don't give the impression of being a star," he drawls, "because I don't think of myself as one."

This isn't the talk of a naive person. He believes it. Like when he says: "I've seen all these crazes come and go, and I don't think I'm more than a craze. In a couple years time I shall be right back where I started – an unknown."

A lot of today's stars secretly think this... none of them would dream of saying it! I go along with Dylan and ask him if he'll be sorry when it's over.

"Nope!"

Wouldn't he even miss the money?

"Nope! I spend most of what I get now, anyway – and how I spend it is my business. Not on material things. I don't need ten cars, a mansion and a yacht. Of course, I'd be a fool to say money means nothing to me, but I don't really care."

A battery of cameras fire. Dylan looks as it he's been hit, replaces his dark glasses. "All I'm really interested in," he says, "is singing to people who want to listen to me. And I don't care how many that is." Fortunately if not for Dylan, for somebody, thousands of people want to listen.

Born in Duluth, May 24, 1941, Dylan lived for the first 17 years of his life in Hibbing, Minnesota. By the winter of 1961 Dylan, still only 20, had sung his way through one half of the American States.

He later wrote: "I's driftin' an' learning new lessons. I was making my own depression. I rode freight trains for kicks. An' got beat up for laughs."

Finally though, Dylan reached the Columbia Records studios and cut his first album called simply enough 'Bob Dylan'. That was the start. A lot of authorities state that Dylan's been greatly influenced by that other folk great, Woody Guthrie. I shouldered into the throng to ask about it.

"My eyes and ears have been my great influence," he says. "Nothing or nobody else really. People who have tried to influence me have been so wrong. I don't know why – they just have been. And the same goes for me. I'm not trying to influence people. In fact I don't want to."

A voice, well in the background, asks him if he hasn't been influenced by Donovan! His press officer winces!

But Dylan's expression doesn't change. "Who is this Donovan? I'd never even heard of him until yesterday," he says. And he means it.

As more and more people squeezed into the room to welcome Dylan to Britain, he became more and more surprised at this acknowledgement of his popularity. Not that his face displayed much emotion.

"I seem to be more popular here than I am at home," he muses. "You could call me a Top Ten artist here but in America I'm only Top Forty."

With chart successes and a sell-out tour Dylan means big business and big money. And it's usually at this stage that the pressure to become intentionally commercial is applied.

But Dylan assured me it won't happen to him. "The only difference success has brought is that I now feel I must make my records even better. Before I made records to please myself and though I still do that I'm now also conscious that the public deserve the best I can give. This I owe them."

Even before it starts, Dylan's tour is one of the biggest successes an American artist has had for quite a while, but this apparently leaves him unmoved. But even if he gives the appearance of living in a world of his own, bored with the outside, he can't go wrong. To his fans he represents the rebel, the man who believes in the things they do. And acts the way they'd like to. I must admit that I liked him personally – if only because of his courage in remaining completely detached while being so lionised.

If he appears onstage and decides to stand on his head and not play a note during his entire tour, he'll still be loved. His fans will probably read something into it.

SCREAMS FOR DYLAN

Bob Dylan got the full star treatment at London Airport on Monday night. A mainly young crowd of about 150 created chaos as the 24-year-old "folk poet" left the customs hall.

Some wore Bob Dylan hats; some showed CND badges; they carried autograph books and copies of his newest hit, 'Subterranean Homesick Blues'. They carried him – pulling at his hair and tugging at his clothes – into a press conference. He looked a bit white and shaken, but he laughed it off. "It was OK – they didn't hurt me. They just gave me a haircut. I'm ready to get drunk now!"

Looking round through a mob of police and TV and radio men, Dylan said: "I want to make sure my friends got through." These included Joan Baez, his manager Al Grossman, and publicist Ken Pitt – nursing a bleeding hand after the melée.

Mocking

Earlier, baggage had been sent flying in the airport foyer; a pane of glass smashed; and Lena Horne went by totally unnoticed.

Wearing sunglasses, black jacket, open-necked blue denim shirt, jeans and black leather boots, Dylan was in mocking mood as he faced the journalists' questions.

He parried queries about his friendship with Joan Baez – and asked if he would marry her, Bob said, "I might marry her arm."

A few minutes earlier, Joan Baez stood a few feet from him, Dylan was asked if she was over here with him.

"Yes I think she came along," he said.

Then the press asked these questions.

Q: Are The Beatles on the way out?
BD: They will never be on the way out – you know that.
Q: Have you ever heard of Donovan?
BD: Donovan what?
Q: How long will your British concert last?
BD: About an hour and a half.
Q: What numbers will you include?
BD: I don't know yet.
Q: Have you written any songs about Britain since you were last here?
BD: No not about that, I didn't write 'Mrs Brown You Have A Lovely Cheese' (Smiles).
Q: Have you ever written anything about Vietnam?
BD: No, I don't write about anything.
Q: Did you play amplified guitar on 'Subterranean Homesick Blues'?
BD: No. I played my own guitar. I just fool around with amplified sometimes.
Q: How much do you think The Beatles contributed to your wide success here?
BD: I find it very hard to understand the meaning of the word success. I don't understand commercial success either. I like The Beatles – I think they are the best. I don't know what they said about me, or anything.
Q: Which pop singers do you like?
BD: I don't really know too many other pop singers. I've just got my own things to do.
Q: Did you write any songs on the plane?

BD: I made a few notes – I call it stabbing the paper.
Q: What is your message?
BD: Keep a good head and always carry a light bulb. (Dylan sat throughout the conference brandishing an outsize electric light bulb. He refused to be drawn on its significance.)

Bob then had a question to put to us.

Where's Christine Keeler?

Someone asked if he wanted to write a song about her. "No, I just want to meet her," said Dylan.

Truth

But why had so many young people made the long journey out to the airport on a miserable wet night, to meet Dylan?

Said Roy Wiffin, aged 20, of Hounslow West: "I think he has great quality in his songs – and I don't think he needs The Beatles as his publicists. He isn't a great singer at all – but he does sing the truth."

Pamela Barron, record shop assistant of Swanley, Kent: "I know all his records but I've never seen him."

What did she think of his 'Subterranean...' single? "No – a mistake," she said.

Back in the conference room, Dylan was still being prodded about Donovan. "Where is he, this Donovan?" said Dylan. "Let's get him out of here – put him on the wall!"

And before making a fan-evading sprint to the car taking him to London's Savoy Hotel, Dylan shrugged. "Oh, to be a simple folk singer again."

BUT HE DIDN'T LOOK AS IF HE MEANT IT.

Mike Hurst Interview, London, England

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 573-574.

In between his Press Conference at London Airport and his second Press Conference at the Savoy Hotel, i.e. within hours of his arrival in the U.K., Dylan provides a telephone interview for Mike Hurst (MH) of BBC's Light Service for the regular Monday night programme Teen Scene. The programme was broadcast that very night. With thanks to Harald Muller for drawing this to my attention.

MH: Well, perhaps it will be third time lucky, but, well, I am trying Bob Dylan again – Bob, can you hear me this time?

BD: Yes.

MH: Oh you can, great. This is Mike Hurst of Teen Scene on behalf of everyone here and the people listening, I would like to say welcome to Britain.

BD: Thank you very much.

MH: Well, what have you seen of it so far. About 200 yards of tarmac?

BD: Yes. 300 or 400 yards.

MH: What was the journey like over?

BD: Oh, it was fine, it was fine.

MH: A lot of kids at the airport to meet you?

BD: Yes, there were some.

MH: Just some? Oh, probably I think you are being modest. I think. Are you surprised by your success in this country?

BD: Yes, yes. I was.

MH: Did you think it would ever happen or did you think it would never happen?

BD: I didn't think one way or the other about it.

MH: Would you say, this is a point that has been brought up over here, would you say the Beatles are your biggest unofficial press agents in this country?

BD: Gee, I don't know. I hope so.

MH: They have done an awful lot of good, Bob, over here in the last nine months. Talking an awful lot about you to the trade press and so on. There is one thing I've heard that has often been reported over here, have you ever heard of Donovan?

BD: No. Somebody else just asked me that.

MH: You haven't heard of Donovan?

BD: No.

MH: Well, Donovan is your sort-of counterpart over here. What do you think of someone being your opposite number in this country and doing your style of act? Flattered or not?

BD: I guess so. I just haven't heard of him, though.

MH: He dresses an awful lot like you. Are you still wearing denims?

BD: Me?

MH: Yeah.

BD: No, my clothes are always usually stolen about every two months and I have to get new clothes all the time. Right now I am wearing a shirt and pants and things.

MH: Not a suit?

BD: No.

MH: I wouldn't believe it if Bob Dylan wore a suit. (Laughter) Well, I tell you, a lot of the purists over here – by that, I mean people who like folk music – when they say they like folk music, you know what I mean – a lot of them say it is almost disgusting that a Bob Dylan record sort of gets into the common or garden pop charts. What do you think of that? I mean, do you think it's disgusting? I don't for a start.

BD: Well, I don't know "disgusting".

MH: Well, I think it's a bit of a snobbish attitude, you know.

BD: Yeah, well, I guess.

(laughter)

MH: Your new record, by the way, I was very surprised when I heard because, to my mind, it is very much like the early rock style, country rock 'n' roll. What do you think? Do you agree or not?

BD: I used to play rock n' roll, you know, a long time ago but, uh, I don't know, this has got rhythm. I mean, it's drums and electric guitars, you know, and it's called rock n' roll. I guess it's rock n' roll.

MH: You are going to hate me for saying this. It sounds like early Presley discs.

BD: I don't think it's rock 'n' roll. I think it is early, authentic folk music myself, you know.

MH: Yes, that is the new point that has often been dragged up over here, you know, as to what your music actually is.

BD: I have no idea what it is. I have absolutely no idea.

MH: It just comes out of your head, just like that.

BD: Yeah. A lot is in my head.

MH: Well, it comes out of your head and goes on to paper very well, because it has succeeded tremendously. Well, people like to think that you are unaffected by success, Bob. Is it true? Do you have a luxury flat like other pop singers, or do you just live quiet?

BD: I don't know too many other pop singers. I don't, I am not really involved in...

MH: Do you like to think you are apart from them or not?

BD: Well, not apart. I guess I have just got my own things to do, you know, and I do them in my own kind of way.

MH: Well, we'll leave you, Bob. Would you just like to send a message to the fans in this country who you are probably going to meet within the next few weeks.

BD: Yeah, I would just like to sing for whoever wants to hear. It's about all I wanna do.

MH: I think it's probably the best ambition a singer can probably have. Well, thank you very much and now we are going to play your latest release now.

BD: Subterranean – are you going to play the other side?

MH: Yes, that is great, I heard it this evening. It's really good. But, I'll think we'll stick with Subterranean because that is the hit over here. OK?

BD: See you later, now.

MH: See you soon, 'Bye now.

Subterranean Homesick Blues plays

MH: Well, I think you will agree with me that it's pretty great to hear from Bob Dylan and, after that, I certainly got a really good impression of him. He is a very nice person indeed.

Jack De Manio Interview, London, England

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke pp. 63-64.

Dylan met with Jack de Manio (DM) of the BBC on the 27th April 1965 and the resulting interview was broadcast the following morning on BBC Radio's Home Service on the Today program. De Manio's no-nonsense attitude almost has Dylan admitting he's been lying his head off over those childhood escapee stories but Dylan recovers and his credibility remains intact... just. Note the angst about wearing ties and consider whether this prompted the 1966 Maura Davis interview.

Taken from the circulating tape.

DM: I can't understand. If you're so anti-establishment, why choose the Savoy Hotel to stay in?

BD: Y'know, I'm not anti-anything... I don't have anything to do with the establishment. If other people want something to do with it, that's fine. First of all, I didn't pick this hotel and it's not going to bring me down just because I'm there, er... to sleep in the streets and find some, y'know, rat hotel. I mean, I could do that too, if I wanted to. I just don't feel like that. It's easier here.

DM: Now, this question... You're also reported in the papers to have said that you'll never wear a tie because you don't own one. Why's that?

BD: What difference does it make if I wear a tie or not? A tie's not going to make me feel any better... No... I'm just not going to wear one. I'm not hung up on not wearing a tie. I just don't take it that deep. Strapping around my neck just doesn't appeal to me. It's fine for other people if they want to do that. I'm certainly not saying all you people who are wearing ties, take them off and the world's going to be a better world. I don't care if somebody wears a tie.

DM: It's also reported that, and I think it's hard to believe, because here you said that you ran away from home when you were 10, 12, 13, 15, 15 ½, 17 and 18. I can't believe that...

BD: Yes, it's true.

DM: It's a load of nonsense.

BD: No. Well, it's true to an extent, y'know. First of all, I wrote this – this is from a thing I wrote which, God knows, I don't even know why it got over here in this country, but this is from a thing I wrote. I wrote this in 1960.

DM: Yes.

BD: It's 1965 now. That's when I wrote it. I wrote it in 1960. In 1960, I was five years younger than now. And, er...

DM: What, you were about 19 or 20?

BD: Yeah, I was 19, I guess. So I wrote this. That's just after I got away, y'know, from...

DM: Why did you write it, because you obviously aren't like that? Because you're really rather a gentle person.

BD: Well, I did do this. This is really true. I mean I did run away at 10, 12,...

DM: Did you?

BD: Well, 8, 10 ½, y'know, this is, this is true. If somebody wants to believe it, that's fine. If somebody doesn't want to believe it, that's OK. I mean, it's not such an important thing. I don't care about it, y'know.

(Two verses of The Times They Are A-Changin')

DM: The times certainly are a-changin'.

I asked the allegedly unconventional Dylan to name the wildest task he had ever performed.

"Well, see, there was this song I was writing once. I put all the words down in their correct order on the paper, then I tore it in four.

"Then I rearranged the quarters to see if I got a better song out of the jumble."

And did he? "No, I guess the rhyming didn't work out right. But it was pretty wild wondering if I was going to get a great song out of it."

John Wells interview for New Musical Express, England

Source: New Musical Express, 30 April 1965

BOB DYLAN INTERVIEWED BY JOHN WELLS

"I don't give the impression of being a star," he drawls, "because I don't think of myself as one."

This isn't the talk of a naïve person. He believes it. Like when he says: "I've sat back and seen all these crazes come and go, and I don't think I'm more than a craze. In a couple of years I shall be right back where I started—an unknown."

A lot of today's stars secretly think this… none of them would dream of saying it! I go along with Dylan and ask him if he'll be sorry when it's over.

"Nope!"

Wouldn't he even miss the money?

"Nope! I spend most of what I get now, anyway—and ho… I spend it is my business. Not on material things. I don't need ten cars, a mansion and a yacht.

"Of course, I'd be a fool to say money means nothing to me, but I don't REALLY care."

A battery of cameras fire. Dylan looks as if he's been hit, replaces his dark glasses. "All I'm really interested in," he says, "is singing to people who want to listen to me. I don't care how many that is."

Fortunately, if not for Dylan, for somebody, thousands of people want to listen…

…I shouldered my way back into the throng to ask about Dylan's first record.

"My eyes and ears have been my great influence," he says. "Nothing or nobody else really." He shrugged his shoulders. "People who have tried to influence me have been so wrong. I don't know why—they just have been. They aren't with what I'm trying to do.

"And the same goes for me. I'm not trying to influence people. In fact I don't want to."

A voice, well in the background, asked him if he hasn't been influenced by Donovan!

His press officer winces! But Dylan's expression doesn't change.

"Who is this Donovan? I'd never even heard of him until yesterday," he says. And he means it.

Hastily I get back to "influence".

"No," he tells me. "I don't write finger-pointing songs (his term for message) because I think I can put the world to rights. I don't think I can and I don't really care if I can or not.

"I just write what I feel. If other people think it has a message it's up to them, but I'm not deliberately trying to put one across."

As more and more people squeezed into the room at the Savoy to welcome Dylan to Britain, he became more and more surprised at this acknowledgement of his popularity. Not that his face displayed much emotion.

"I seem to be more popular here than I am at home," he muses. "I reckon you could call me a top ten artist here but in America I'm only top forty."

Someone asked him if there was a massive welcome from the fans at London Airport when he flew in the day before.

"Don't remember," he says.

Someone prompted him by saying: "Surely you must remember?"

He admits: "Yeah, there were some people there."

He's really bored by now. He brightens when I talk about his latest record 'Subterranean Homesick Blues' and tell him it's in the NME charts giving him two side by side in the list.

But he doesn't greet the news with abandoned anthusiasm. It's just: "Nice to hear that."

I say I found 'Subterranean' a little different from his usual records. I wonder, in fact, if it had been cut for some time.

"About six months ago," he says. "I just make them as I feel at the time."

With chart successes and a sell-out tour Dylan means big business and big money. And it's usually at this stage that the pressure to become internationally commercial is applied. But Dylan assured me it won't happen to him.

"As far as my records are concerned the only difference success has brought is that I now feel I must make my records even better.

"Before I made records to please myself and though I still do this I'm now also conscious that the public deserves the best I can give. This I owe them."

This article was accompanied by a photograph of Bob Dylan saluting with the caption: 'Bob Dylan salutes England? Or is he getting in the mood to write a new Civil War song? Actually he said: "I was trying to attract a passing bird."

30 April 1965
Jenny De Yong And Peter Roche Interview, Sheffield, England

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 301-304.

Dylan gave a concert at Sheffield City Hall on April 30th 1965. After the show he was interviewed by Jenny De Yong and Peter Roche, a couple of reporters from the Sheffield University newspaper Darts. Obviously they asked the right questions because Dylan gave them an unusually trouble-free interview compared with others conducted during his 1965 UK Tour. The article was published in the May issue of Darts.

The article has been modified to make it more readable but the words have not been changed.

"I try to harmonize with songs the lonesome sparrow sings," sang Bob Dylan, alone on the stage at a packed City Hall last Friday: Dylan is himself sparrow-like – a thin, faded, ruffled sparrow – but one that sings to the tune of £2,000 per concert.

His dark-circled eyes seemed to peer above the conglomeration surrounding him (two microphones, a table with two glasses of much-needed water and a harmonica cradle round his polo-sweatered neck), while his penetrating songs convinced even the most cynical that Bob Dylan is worthy of the mound of superlatives which has been heaped upon him and under which his earlier followers feared he might suffocate.

An essential part of the popular image is the loneliness of Bob Dylan. He sings about it, in haunting symbols. He sings too about bitterness, of "The flesh-coloured Christs that glow in the dark". Make no mistakes though – Dylan can write in glowing images about war and violence but he can write with equal insight, and strictly for laughs, about the things that are reality to a greater part of his audience, like the boy trying to persuade his girl to stay for the night.

Dylan has been set up as everything from a blue-denim god to a guitar-playing Socrates, corrupting youth by opening the door on hooliganism, warning the universal parent: "Your sons and your daughters are beyond your command". It was for this reason that we approached him with some trepidation (and considerable difficulty, owing to positive festoons of red tape). We anticipated meeting the "sullen, bored Mr. Dylan" about whom so much has been written in the Press lately – and found instead an individual who was very tired but very willing to talk. He answered our questions in his room at the Grand Hotel, perched on the edge of a couch, a cup of black coffee in one hand, a cigarette (Player's, untipped) in the other. Around him his entourage: a tough, voluble manager with flowing grey hair; a hip-talking young man with glasses and a lovely jacket; a tall negro with an engaging chin; a dark, chatty girl hitching a plastic iris.

Dylan talks rapidly – his voice very soft – even when discussing topics about which he obviously feels strongly (the Press, for example) his tone remains quiet, matter-of-fact. His thin, pale face has a fragile, almost transparent quality – although this was probably due in part to lack of sleep ("He's had no proper sleep for three days," Joan Baez had told us earlier). Miss Baez, who plans to tour Britain herself some time in the Autumn, sat quietly in a corner of the room, watching Dylan intently as he talked.

To start with the obvious question: what do you think of Donovan and Catch the Wind?

BD: Well, I quite like that song, and he sings it quite well. He's very young though, and people might like to try to make him into something that he isn't; that's something he'll have to watch. But the song is O.K.

Isn't the tune a lot like your Chimes of Freedom?

BD: Oh, I don't care what he takes from me; I don't care what other singers do to my songs either, they can't hurt me any. Like with the Animals and Baby Let Me Follow You Down, I didn't worry none about that. I met the Animals over in New York, and we all went out and got scoused. Is that what you say? (Someone behind him suggests "sloshed".) Oh yeah, that's it, sloshed. Anyway, the Animals are O.K., I liked their last one, Don't Let Me Be Misunderstood, that was a good one.

Coming on to your latest single, Subterranean Homesick Blues, many people seem worried about the electric guitars and drums.

BD: Yeah, well we had a lot of swinging cats on that track, real hip musicians, not just some cats I picked up off the street, and we all got together and we just had a ball. Anyway, that's just one track off the album.

So why release it as a single?

BD: That's not me, that's the Company. The Company says to me "It's time to do your next album", so I go along and record the tracks for the album. What we do with the songs then, we leave it up to them. But I record... I wouldn't record a single.

Aren't you afraid though that they'll turn you into a pop star?

BD: They can't turn me into anything; I just write my songs and that's it. They can't change me any, and they can't change my songs. Subterranean sounds a bit different because of the backing, but I've had backing on my songs before, I had some backing on Corrina.

What are your own favourite songs?

BD: You mean the ones I've written? Well, it depends on how I'm feeling; I think to be really good a song has to hit you at the right moment. But I like most of the ones on my new album, and on my last album I guess the one I liked best was I Don't Believe You.

Your songs have changed a lot over the last couple of years. Are you consciously trying to change your style, or would you say that this was a natural development?

BD: Oh, it's a natural one, I think. The big difference is that the songs I was writing last year, songs like Ballad in Plain D, they were what I call one-dimensional songs, but my new songs I'm trying to make more three-dimensional, you know, there's more symbolism, they're written on more than one level.

How long does it take you to write a song? Say a song like Hard Rain?

BD: Well, I wrote Hard Rain while I was still on the streets, I guess that was the first three-dimension song I wrote. It took me about – oh, about two days.

Is that normal?

BD: No, that was kind of long; usually I write them a lot quicker, sometimes in a couple of hours.

Would you say that your songs contain sufficient poetry to be able to stand by themselves, without music?

BD: If they can't do that, then they're not what I want them to be. Basically, I guess I'm more interested in writing than in performing.

Does that explain all those poems on the backs of your albums?

BD: Oh, those (laughing) – well they were kind of written out of terror, I used to get scared that I wouldn't be around much longer, so I'd write my poems down on anything I could find – the backs of my albums, the backs of Joan's albums, you know, anywhere I could find.

Why do you suppose that the national press tries to make you out to be angry and bored and all the rest?

BD: That's because they ask the wrong questions, like, 'What did you have for breakfast', 'What's your favourite colour', stuff like that. Newspaper reporters, man, they're just hung-up writers, frustrated novelists, they don't hurt me none by putting fancy labels on me. They got all these preconceived ideas about me, so I just play up to them.

How do you feel about being labelled as the voice of your generation?

BD: Well, I don't know. I mean, I'm 24, how can I speak for people of 17 or 18, I can't be anyone else's voice. If they can associate with me that's O.K., but I can't give a voice to people who have no voice. Would you say that I was your voice?

Well you manage to say a lot of things that I'd like to say, only I don't have the words.

BD: Yeah, but that's not the same as being your voice.

No, but it's something.

Someone mentions food and at once Dylan and followers remember that they haven't eaten for hours. Not much is said but it becomes increasingly obvious that food has the edge on aesthetics... We took that as our cue to leave.

Dylan's Blind Date, London, England

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 307-308.

Whilst at the Savoy Hotel, Dylan is persuaded to review the latest single releases for the Melody Maker, Blind Date column (published 8th May 1965)

THAT'S TOM JONES! I'D BUY IT – IF I BOUGHT RECORDS

Sandie Shaw: Long Live Love (Pye)
English – to take a guess. Is it Millie? I like the backing. I know who it is – it's Dusty Springfield. No, I give up. I like that singing. I don't care about the song though.

Tom Jones: Little Lonely One (Columbia)
That's Tom Jones! I like that record – I like him. Hit? Do you mean will it sell a lot of records? Oh yeah. I don't know where it will sell a lot of records, but it will do. I'd buy it – if I bought records.

Larry Williams: Sweet Little Baby (Decca)
Is that called My Little Baby? I don't know who's singing it. Is it the Searchers? It's NOT Manfred Mann, and it's NOT The Beatles. I don't like saxophones – I just like Ornette Coleman who plays it. No, I don't like this a lot.

Joe Turner: Midnight Cannonball (Atlantic)
Yeh – I like that, but it could be a million people. Yeh – I like the words too.

Carolyn Hester: Ain't That Rain (Dot)
Pretty good if you're catching a ship someplace. I like the way she sings though – I like her voice. I like the record actually. I'd take that ship.

Freewheelers: Why Do You Treat Me Like A Fool (HMV). (Song written by Donovan).
Oh – that's so good. Oh I like that. I've had no sleep for three nights, but I do like that record and that sound. I see songs in pictures, and I like the picture of that. I can imagine someone better singing it, though, but the song's a real song. I like it.

Ikettes: Peaches And Cream (Stateside)
This must be called Peaches And Cream. This is all right. That's the Ikettes, right? Very stuffy harmonica, yeh. The night that harmonica man was playing, he had a cold. It's good.

Bachelors: Marie (Decca)
I thought this was a song about Murray the K. I wouldn't have liked the record. No, I don't like this record at all. I wouldn't have any great objection to it, if it was playing somewhere. But I certainly don't like it.

Carolyn Carter: It Hurts (London)
Mary Wells? It's not Brenda Lee and it's not Ann-Margret. I think she's from Chicago – she's got that accent. Well, either from Chicago, Detroit or Liverpool. I did that. I don't think she'd go out with someone who wore glasses, though.

Otis Redding: Mr. Pitiful (Atlantic)

This is a good record when you're driving through the Hudson Tunnel. Will it sell a lot? Well, it will reach number one if everyone drives through the Hudson Tunnel. Oh – I like the ending – it's fantastic. I think this one ends differently from the one in the States. That was better. I like this record, yeh.

Four Tops: Ask The Lonely (Tamla Motown)
I like that record. I've heard it before – can't remember where. It was on the radio. I don't know who it is, but I like it. I like all the climaxes, y'know?

Mia Lewis: Wish I Didn't Love Him (Decca)
I think she's singing in a pool of water. And she's got a thermometer in her ear. Soon, she'll get a bout of pneumonia, if she's not careful, and they'll have to put her out of the record business! I like her, though. I don't go for those kinda songs, with lines like that. It might get better as it goes on. No, I didn't hate it.

QUESTION-TIME WITH BOB DYLAN
Compiled by Derek Johnson

As mentioned later, a composite of questions raised and answers given during Bob's tour of the UK in May 1965. Some of these were used to produce this article by Johnson which appeared in the New Musical Express of October 15th 1965.

A profound and deep-thinking young man, sincerely believing in the philosophy and the protests he utters, unlike some self-styled folk singers, who are merely in the game for its commercial value. A complex and, at times, controversial character, who originated and leads one of the most powerful cults of the days – and in consequence has earned himself a permanent niche in the annals of pop music. That's Bob Dylan, a man with plenty to say and has a unique way of saying it.

Although many of his beliefs and messages are contained in song, Dylan can be equally verbose in conversation. He talks freely and it is a rarity for him to give the same answer to a stock question.
During his recent British tour, he was bombarded with hundreds of questions (QQ) and we have selected a few of his answers which we feel are of particular interest.

They are a composite of what he told the NME and the replies he gave to Sheffield University reporters Jenny De Yong and Peter Roche for their student's paper "Darts".

QQ: You must have been questioned many times about your attitude to Donovan. What, in fact, do you think of him?
BD: I specially liked his record of Catch The Wind. It was a good song and he sang it well. But he's still very young and people might try to make him into something that he isn't. He'll have to watch that!

QQ: Would you agree that Catch The Wind was a bit like your own composition Chimes Of Freedom?
BD: Oh, I don't care what he takes from me! Frankly, I don't care what other singers do to my songs, either. They can't hurt me any. Like with the Animals. "Baby, Let Me Follow You Down". I didn't worry about that. I met the Animals in New York and we all went out and had a ball together. Yep, the Animals are OK in my book. I liked their "Don't Let Me Be Misunderstood".

QQ: How do you choose which of your titles will be released as singles?
BD: I don't. That's up to the record company. They say to me, "It's time to do your next album", so I go along and record enough tracks for the LP. What they do with the songs then – well, that's their decisions. But I record albums. I wouldn't and couldn't record a single.

QQ: Do you think there's a move afoot to turn you into a pop star?
BD: They can't turn me into anything. I just write my songs and that's that! Nobody can change me and by the same token, they can't change my songs. Of course I vary things once in a while, like with the different backing I had on Subterranean Homesick Blues. But that was entirely my own doing. Nobody talked me into it. Just so happened we had a lot of swinging cats on that track, real hip musicians.

QQ: What are your own favorite songs?
BD: You mean of the ones I've written? It depends on how I'm feeling. To be a really good song I think it has to be good at the right moment. But one of my own favorite songs is I Don't Believe You.

QQ: Would you say that your style is changing?
BD: Certainly my work as a writer has changed over the last couple of years. The big difference is that the songs I was writing last year were what I call one-dimensional songs. But I'm trying to make my new songs more three-dimensional. There's more symbolism and they're written on more than one level. And I guess that's affected my work as an artist, too...

QQ: How long does it take you to write a song?
BD: Sometimes a couple of days. Sometimes a couple of hours. Depends on my mood.

QQ: Would you say that your songs contain sufficient poetry to be able to stand by themselves, without music?
BD: If they can't do that then they're not what I want them to be. Basically, I guess I'm more interested in writing than in performing.

QQ: How about those poems on the back of your albums?
BD: Well, they were written out of a kind of terror! I used to get scared I wouldn't be around much longer, so I'd write my poems down on anything I could find – and that included my albums!

QQ: Why do you think the national press tries to label you as angry, bored and disinterested?
BD: That's because they ask the wrong questions, like "What's your favorite color?" and "What did you have for breakfast?"... stuff like that. So who cares? Newspaper reporters are just hung-up writers, frustrated novelists. They don't hurt me by putting fancy labels on me. They've got all these pre-conceived ideas about me, and I just play up to them.

QQ: How do you feel about being called the voice of your generation?
BD: I don't know really. I mean, I'm 24. How can I speak for someone who's 17? I can't be anyone else's voice. If they care to identify themselves with me, that's okay – but I can't give a voice to people who have no voice, can I?

QQ: Do you think there are too many protest songs around just now?
BD: Yes, Half of them don't understand what they're trying to say. I'm all for protest songs if they're sincere. But how many of them are?

During Dylan's stay in England in May '66, he was asked by NME to complete a questionnaire. This was a standard proforma used to 'interview' many artists. As the Editor states, most replies were much more straightforward, but who would expect a clear and unequivocal response from Bob?

From New Musical Express, May 21, 1965.

WHEN A POET FILLS IN A FORM YOU CAN EXPECT ANYTHING!

It was probably idiotic of us to ask a poet like Bob Dylan to contribute to our Life-Lines feature. You can't expect an idyllic dreamer to do it – as you or I might do it.

However, back came the form with two of the four pages of questions answered, five of which are on the left (at the extreme bottom, in this case) and others printed below:

First important public appearance: Closet at O'Henry's Squire Shop.

Other discs in best-sellers: I Lost My Love In San Francisco, But She Appeared Again In Honduras And We Took A Trip To Hong Kong And Stayed Awhile in Reno But I Lost Her Again In Oklahoma.

Current Hit: None I know of.

Latest Release: The Queens Are Coming.

Albums: Yes

EPs: None

Favourite food: Turkish Mervin (a form of egg plant coming from Nebraska)

Favourite drink: Frozen tabbacco.

Favourite bands/instrumentalists: Corky the Kid (Sombreros).

Favourite composers: Brown Bumpkin and Sidney Ciggy.

Favourite groups: The Fab Clocks.

Miscellaneous likes: Trucks with no wheels, French telephones, anything with a stewed prune in the middle.

Miscellaneous dislikes: Hairy firemen, toe-nails, glass Mober forks, birds with ears.

Best friend: Porky the Wild Elephant Shooter.

Most thrilling experience: Getting my birthday cake stomped on by Norman Mailer.

Tastes in music: Sort of peanut butter.

Pets: My friend Lampa.

Personal ambition: To be a waitress.

Professional ambition: To be a stewardess.

Present disc label: See the Dog.

Other labels in past: Many dogs.

Recording manager: Lost dog.

Personal manager: Dog Jones.

Musical director: Big Dog.

6 May 1965
Eldon's Gossip Column, Newcastle Upon Tyne, England

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 305-306.

A reporter from the Newcastle Evening Chronicle interviews Dylan for the gossip column on the afternoon of the Newcastle City Hall concert. To quote Heylin (Stolen Moments) – "Clearly wholly sick of the obvious and pointless questions which he is being repeatedly subjected to, Dylan interviews with the English National Press have become a stream of verbal put-ons. Interviewed in the afternoon by a reporter from the Newcastle Evening Chronicle, he at one point retorts, "why should you want to know about me, I don't want to know about you"."

A TALK WITH MR. DYLAN WAS SO BAFFLING AND BEWILDERING.

His name is Bob Dylan. He's 24. The king of the folk-song world – crowned with a mop of hair like a badly-trimmed hedge.

Apart from that I can tell you little. Except that my interview with him will go down as the toughest 20 minutes in my working life.

I left the City Hotel where he was staying on his one-night stand in Newcastle feeling baffled and brainwashed.

Intellectual surrealism or way-out gibberish – I'm still not sure which Mr. Dylan treated me to.

Fairly innocuous start, I thought; I asked him about his education. No answer. "It's so far in the past that I have no motive for recalling it. It does not mean anything to me," he said.

It didn't mean much to me either. But drawing on some slight knowledge of the star, I asked him why he had run away from home seven times.

NO DIFFERENT

A shrug of the shoulders. Silence. Then: "Where I come from everyone runs away from home. I'm no different from anyone else in that respect."

I wiped my brow. Took a look at the six people with whom he had been sitting as I came into the room. "How many people are travelling with you," I asked, tamely. "Just one," he said.

It was about this time that the tic in my eyelid began working overtime.

His companion's name, it transpired, was Taco Pronto. I queried the name. Dylan: "This is what we call him. It's his name."

What do you feel about your burst to fame, I asked a slightly hysterical note beginning to creep into my voice.

"I don't know. I don't read many English newspapers".

For the next few minutes we argued about whether or not people should want to know about him.

"Why should you want to know about me I don't want to know about you," he said.

A BOOK

He is writing a book which, he says, people can read if they want to learn about him. Alternatively, they can attend his concerts: "That is me – I am presenting myself when I sing."

Is the book an autobiography? Grin. "I am only 24, what is there to write about? No, it's a book of confusion, tiny little sayings. It's like a splash on the wall."

My ace card now – Donovan. But Mr. Dylan beat me to it by suggesting we take his picture holding a magazine featuring on Donovan.

"A nice guy. He came to see me in my hotel. I have heard him sing. Sure he sings like me. Just coincidence."

Some character. Some interview. Personally, after that gruelling experience I felt like... well, a splash on the wall.

Terry Ellis Interview, Newcastle Upon Tyne, England

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 309-314

In the dressing room of Newcastle Upon Tyne City Hall, science student and Newcastle University Social Secretary, Terry Ellis (TE) takes his turn at pot-lock with Dylan's put-on approach and ends up very much the worst for wear. This interview was filmed for and partially broadcast in Dont Look Back. Terry Ellis's article for the Newcastle Student Newspaper The Courier is presented below and, as it hardly seems to reflect the real events, you'll find the Dont Look Back session transcribed beneath it.
AP = Alan Price.

Dylan Talks

"I've never been insincere in my whole life." So spake the bard, or at least the modern equivalent, the folksinger.

And when I say folksinger, I mean just that. This genius appeared at the City Hall last Thursday, the man who is said by his fans to "have the message"; the man who claims, paradoxically, "I have never tried to communicate to people. There isn't any point, it is impossible to make anyone understand what I think."

I had a long conversation with Dylan, during which I was never sure who was doing the interviewing, me, Dylan or Alan Price of the Animals.

Communication.

TE: OK., it's impossible for most people to understand but some may, and you must communicate to find out which they are.
BD: Do you think we have an adequate means of communication?
TE: No, but it's the best we have and we must use it.
BD: What would we do if we couldn't communicate?
TE: Oh, I'm sure... who's doing the interview, me or you?
AP: Well, you haven't asked any questions yet.

And so it went on, all three interviewing each other, till Dylan at last came out with something telling, "I have my friends, I know who they are, I don't need any more. I don't see what you have to gain spiritually from talking to someone for a few minutes."

Insight.

Well, I didn't talk for just a few minutes, but rather for over half an hour. I didn't gain spiritually, but I think I caught an insight into the man who wrote

"How many times must the cannon balls fly, before too many people have died?
The answer my friend is blowin' in the wind, the answer is blowin' in the wind."

And now for reality – a transcript of that part of the interview that appears in Dont Look Back.

BD: Do you think it would bother me one little bit if you disliked me?
TE: No, no. But with some people it might bother you.

BD: No, no, you know. I've got my friends. I mean, you know, I'm well situated.
TE: But what about before you had any friends, did you... were you worried then?
BD: Was I worried?... I wasn't worried about it. No, I was lucky. Weren't you?
TE: (Comments obscured by Dylan's guitar strumming)
BD: Weren't you lucky when you didn't have any friends?
TE: I can't remember having any friends.
BD: No? Do you have many friends now?
TE: No. Because, because, I reached a stage when I suddenly realized what a friend was and then I probably had one or two. Before that I didn't understand what a friend was anyway.
BD: Did you talk to your friends?
TE: I didn't know who they were then.
BD: Well, now who your friends are... do you talk to your friends?
TE: Yeah. There are one or two people who I believe I can talk to.
BD: That's why they're your friends, because you can talk to them?
TE: I think a friend is a friend because...
BD: Do you communicate with them?
TE: Ah, to a certain extent. They can understand me more than anybody else.
BD: Ah, well, you see, we're different. We come from two different worlds. You come from England, I come from the United States.
TE: Yeah, it's true, but, I mean, we're still human beings, so there's some sort of connection between us.
BD: No. I'm just a guitar player, that's all.
TE: Man, you're trying to knock me.
BD: Man, believe me, I'm not trying to do that.
TE: I mean, what, I mean, if somebody comes in to interview you, normally, what's your attitude?
BD: Oh, you've just read those interviews that we, a couple, the first few days that I was here.
TE: Erm, yeah, yeah.
BD: Those weren't right, you know, you know that, you know. You know that they were all lies, lies, rubbish, you know that.
TE: Well... I don't know. I got through the first few lines and didn't read much more. Why I came in here I don't know. I'm being regaled by all this...
BD: Are you going to the concert?
TE: Yeah. I'm going to watch. I'm going to watch. I mean, I... well, this is what I came to see mostly.
BD: Well, just listen.
TE: Came to see you, but I thought I'd like to have a word with you first. I mean what is your whole attitude to life and when you meet someone what is your attitude towards them?
BD: I don't like them.
TE: You don't like them?
BD: No!
TE: I mean, I come in here, what's your attitude towards me?
BD: Oh, I've got no attitude towards you at all. Why should I have an attitude towards you? I don't even know you.
TE: No, but, I mean, it would be an attitude if you wanted to know me or didn't want to know me.
BD: Why should I want to know you?
TE: I don't know. That's why I'm asking.
BD: Well, I don't know.
TE: Eh!
BD: Ask me another question. You give me a reason why I should want to know you.

TE: Erm. I might be worth knowing.
BD: Why?
TE: Eh!
BD: Why? Tell me why? What good is it going to be for me to know you? Name me one thing I'm going to gain.
TE: Well, you might learn something from my attitude to life.
BD: Well, what is your attitude to life?
TE: I can't explain that in two minutes.
BD: Well, what are you asking me to explain in two minutes? 'Cause that's all your getting is two minutes. You're asking me too explain something in two minutes too.
TE: You're the artist. You're supposed to be able to explain in two minutes.
BD: I am?
TE: Yeah!
BD: Hey, wow. What about you? Aren't you an artist?
TE: Oh no.
BD: What are you?
TE: I'm a science student.
BD: Well, let's hear it again, what are you? A science student?
TE: A science student, of mathematics.
BD: Now what does that mean? Just what does that mean?
TE: Erm?
BD: What does that mean? What do you do? What's your purpose in the world?
TE: Erm. What's my purpose?
BD: Yeah.
TE: What's my purpose?
BD: How do you help? You, know. What do you do in the world?
TE: I'm a, er... I'm in the world for me I guess. A bit like everybody else.
BD: Just like me.
TE: Yeah. Yeah.
BD: So we're just alike. Aren't we?
TE: I guess so.
BD: We don't come from two different worlds. We both come from, er... Prussia.
TE: You were wrong, you were wrong. I was right, all the time. Now, but, this is interesting. Now I go, I go to interview some groups... if I go to interview Alan's mob, I don't think they're... they couldn't care less about me, you know?
BD: Uh, you know why, don'tcha, you know, can't you ever stop to wonder why?
TE: Um!
(Laughter from Price)
BD: There's gotta be some reason, doesn't there?
TE: Yeah, yeah, but it's nothing to do with me because they don't want to know me before I go in.
BD: Uh, well what do you want from them? Why do you want them? Can you write them up in a paper? That's something...
TE: No, I don't think of myself as a... necessarily as a journalist... I'm a person, you know.
BD: ...As a scientist. Well, so what, there's a million, thousand billion, so many persons outside.
TE: Yeah, I agree. Absolutely.
BD: Well, you can't know them all can you?
TE: No, no, but if I meet somebody and I speak with them for a few minutes, I think that guy might be able to give me something.
BD: Well that... oh, ho... wooooah! (laughter all round) Now we're getting down to it, huh, yeah. What is it that you want?

TE: Um, everyone wants... everyone is out for what they can get. Well, I might be able to get something material...

BD: You wanna get a chick... might be able to get a chick. Maybe it'll come better. (laughter all round)

(Ellis is offered a harmonica)

BD: You've got it.

TE: I don't want it. I can't play the thing.

BD: We don't want it either.

TE: I can't play it. You know what I meant when I said give me something material, but I'm not necessarily interested.

BD: Well, what can I give you spiritually?

TE: I might learn something.

BD: What?

TE: Uh?

BD: What don't you know?

AP: You get a kick out of interviewing people?

TE: Well, I don't know if I don't try... to find out, will I?

BD: Do you ever just be quiet, silent, just watch and you don't say one word?

TE: Yeah, the whole thing that gets me about... about you and about Alan is the fact that you're knocking from the minute I come in.

BD: Knocking?

TE: Yeah!

BD: I don't think you know when you're liked, that's all. If we, you know, if we want to knock you we can put you on.

TE: Yeah, but I mean, but, he's just said that I'm talking a load of rubbish (referring to something inaudible in the background), you know, and...

AP: I never said that, you're misquoting me already: you see that's another journalist...

TE: Oh no, I didn't misquote you, I interpreted you.

BD: You interpreted him to your own thing, right? To your own rules of your own, your own images.

TE: You have to give some answer.

BD: Why?

AP: Why?

TE: Well, to satisfy you.

BD: You don't have to satisfy me, besides, that's impossible.

TE: Well, if you'd said you didn't want an answer I wouldn't have given one.

BD: You don't try to satisfy everybody.

TE: No.

BD: Do you ever once in a while? Do you ever once in a while try to satisfy somebody?

TE: Somebody, yeah, but not everybody.

BD: A few people.

TE: Some people I can't satisfy, because that's the way I'm made. No matter how hard I tried I couldn't satisfy them.

BD: Well, how do you know that?

TE: Hmm.

BD: How do you know that?

TE: Erm, I can, well, if you get to know somebody for a little while you can guess, just, erm.

BD: Are you still friends with them even though you can't satisfy them?

TE: Yeah. Friends, not deep friends. You find a field in which you can communicate.

BD: What's a deep friend and what's not?

TE: Someone that you're almost exactly on the same plane with them... you can communicate with them very well.

BD: Somebody that's just like you... looks like you...?

TE: No!
BD: No?
TE: No!
BD: Talks like you?
TE: Erm.
BD: Well, how do you like somebody...?
TE: Thinks the same way.
BD: Thinks the same way?
TE: Thinks the same way.
BD: Like what? Like they both think that... both are happy about a green door?
TE: No. Thinking the same language.
BD: Thinking the same language?
TE: Yeah!
BD: Uh, huh.
TE: And so you can understand each other and you know what each other...
BD: Well, let's try to understand each other, shall we?
TE: That wouldn't be a bad idea. That wouldn't be a bad idea and how are we going to set about understanding...?
BD: Well, you can ask your first question.
TE: Erm?
BD: You can ask your first question. Oh yeah. Have you got a question to ask? Come on. You haven't got a question?

Knock on door

BD: I think somebody's calling for you.

Interview interrupted by arrival of the Sheriff's lady.

Melody Maker interview, London, England

Dylan on Donovan and Catch The Wind

On Donovan—"He played some songs to me… I like him. He's a nice guy."

Backstage, after singing Talkin' World War III Blues in which he referred to Donovan, Dylan said,

"I didn't mean to put the guy down in my songs. I just did it for a joke, that's all."

"Let's hear it." Catch The Wind is played. "I think it's recorded too good—that's one thing. He does sound a bit like he's holding onto a tree trunk, wearing a patch over one eye.

"But it's a great record. I didn't care for the de-de-de-de parts. But I did like the way he said the word "Uncertainty". You know there's this guy in the States who sounds exactly like him. He's got an imitator, I'm telling you."

"This guy doesn't play guitar like me—he plays cowboy style guitar.

"The song's a real song. It's a very pointed, very gentle record."

After hearing it again, he nodded and said, "The other side." After hearing Why Do You Treat Me Like You Do—

"I liked the other side better. That guy plays like he's heard of Jack Elliot—he doesn't play guitar like me.

"Where is he? Can I meet him? Does he live in a railway station?"

Donovan later visited Bob at his hotel. "He played some songs to me," Bob said later.

Horace Judson Interview, London, England

Source: Bob Dylan Dont Look Back by D.A. Pennebaker, Ballantine Books, Inc., 1968, pp. 122-131.
The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 579-582.

An "interview" conducted (if that's the right word) by Horace Judson (HJ), referred to elsewhere as Judson Manning the London correspondent for Time magazine, in a deserted restaurant area at the Royal Albert Hall, London. Dylan gives Judson a very hard ride – he is still very hurt by previously unfavorable articles by Time.

An amazing demonstration of Dylan's power. To quote Anthea Joseph re Judson:

> "The man was such a prat. And Bob was being absolutely appalling, but so brilliant. By this time I'd learnt that he could pull strips of skin off people, verbally... [Judson] was quite abusive as well. He was extremely upset, he really was; and in a way I suppose it was not really his fault, not properly briefed, treating Bob as some sort of curiosity, not as a serious artist. "

But Judson was not some young novice. He was a highly experienced newsman who'd been the Times UK correspondent throughout the second World War, who was renowned as a fearless interviewer and who had interviewed many famous people including Adolf Hitler.

There's the odd interjection from Bob Neuwirth (BN).
This interview can be seen on Dont Look Back.

BD: Are you going to see the concert tonight?
HJ: Yes.
BD: Are you going to hear it?
HJ: Yes.
BD: Okay, you hear and see it and it's going to happen fast. Now, you're not going to get it all, and you might hear the wrong words, and then afterwards, see I can't... I won't be able to talk to you afterwards. I got nothing to say about these things I write, I mean, I just write them. I got nothing to say anything about them, I don't write 'em for any reason. There's no great message. I mean, if, you know, if you wanna tell other people that, you know, go ahead and tell them but I'm not going to have to answer to it. And, they're just going to think, you know, what's this Time Magazine telling us? But that, you couldn't care less about that either. You don't know the people that read you.
HJ: Ah...
BD: 'Cause you know, I've never been in Time Magazine and yet this hall's filled twice, you know, and I've never been in Time Magazine. I don't need Time Magazine... and I don't think I'm a folk singer. You'll probably call me a folk singer but, you know, the other people know better 'cause the people, you know, that buy my records, listen to me, don't necessarily read Time Magazine. You know, the audience that subscribe to Time Magazine? The audience of the people that want to know what's happening in the world week by week. The people that work during the day and can read it small, right? And it's concise, and there's pictures in it.
I mean, those kind of, you know, those... a certain class of people. It's a class of people that take the magazine seriously. I mean, sure I could read it, you know, I read it. I read it on the airplanes but I don't take it seriously. If I want to find out anything I'm not going to read Time Magazine. I'm not gonna read Newsweek. I'm not gonna read any of these magazines, I mean, 'cause they just got too much to lose by printing the truth, you know that.

HJ: What kind of truths do they leave out?

BD: On anything! Even on a world-wide basis. They'd just go off the stands in a day if they printed really the truth.

HJ: What is really the truth?

BD: Really the truth is just a plain picture.

HJ: Of what? Particularly

BD: Of, you know, a plain picture of, let's say, a tramp vomiting, man, into the sewer You know, and next door to the picture, you know, Mr Rockefeller, you know, or Mr C.W. Jones, you know, on the subway going to work, you know, any kind of picture. Just make some sort of collage of pictures which they don't do. They don't do. There's no ideas in Time Magazine, there's just these facts. Well, you know, which too are switched because even the article which you are doing, the way it's gonna come out, don't you see, it can't be a good article. Because, the guy that's writing the article is sitting in a desk in New York, he's not, he is not even going out of his office. He's just going to get, all these, ah, 15, you know, reporters and they're gonna send him a quota you know

HJ: That's not me...

BD: No, he's going to put himself on, he's going to put all his readers on, and you know, in another week we have some space in the magazine. But that's all, it means nothing to anybody else. I'm not putting that down because people have gotta eat and live, you know, but let's at least be honest about it. You know, I mean sure, let's say, let's say...

HJ: I just don't, I don't know that you are giving me...

BD: I know more about what you do and you don't even have to ask me how or why or anything, just by looking, you know, than you'll ever know about me, ever. I mean, I could tell you, I could tell you I'm not a folk singer and explain to you why, but you wouldn't really understand. All you could do, you could nod your head, you would nod your head.

HJ: You could be willing to try, and...

BD: No, I couldn't even be willing to try because, it is, you know, it would be, it's, you know, there're certain things which... every word, every word has its little letter and big letter.

HJ: Your friend had the right word – pigeonhole.

BN: No, no, it's not important...

BD: No, it's not pigeonhole, it's not the word at all. You know, every word has its little letter and big letter, like the word "know."

HJ: Yeah.

BD: You know, the word know, "k-n-o-w?"

HJ: Yeah.

BD: Okay, then you know the word know, capital "K-N-O-W"?

HJ: Yeah.

BD: Like, each of us really "knows" nothing.

HJ: Yeah.

BD: Right? but we all think we know things.

HJ: Right.

BD: And, we really know nothing.

HJ: But you're saying you know more about what I do...

BD: No, I'm saying, I'm saying, I'm saying...

BN: No, no, no.

BD: I'm saying that you're going to die, and you're gonna go off the earth, you're gonna be dead. Man, it could be, you know, twenty years, it could be tomorrow, any time, so am I. I mean, we're just gonna be gone. The world's going to go on without us.

HJ: Right.
BD: All right now, you do your job in the face of that and how seriously you take yourself, you decide for yourself.
HJ: Right.
BD: Okay, now I'll decide for myself. Now, you're not going to make me feel unhappy by anything you print about me or anything, you know, or anything like that. It's just, it couldn't, you know, you couldn't offend me. And, I'm sure you know I couldn't offend you. And so all I can hope for you to do is, uh, all your ideas in your own head, somehow, wherever they are...
HJ: Do you care about what you sing?
BD: How could I answer that if you've got the nerve to ask me?
HJ: Well then you, how could you...
BD: I mean, you've got a lot a lot of nerve asking me a question like that.
HJ: I have to ask that.
BD: Do you ask The Beatles that?
HJ: I have to ask you that because you have the nerve to question whether I can.
BD: I'm not questioning you because I don't expect any answer from you. Do you think somebody wouldn't go see somebody if they didn't want entertainment?
HJ: Of course not.
BD: Who, now who wants to go get whipped, you know, and if you do wanna go get whipped, hey, aren't you really being entertained?
HJ: All right... So fine.
BD: Right.
HJ: It's all right.
BD: Okay. So, if you think anybody that comes to see me is coming for any other reason except entertainment, really.
HJ: They'll tell you they're all coming for different reasons.
BD: Well, who cares what they tell you. Who cares what anybody tells you.
HJ: Well, they think they, they think they know why they're doing it.
BD: Well, do you know why they're doing it?
HJ: I know some of the things they say...
BD: People say all kinds of things...
HJ: Uh hummm.
BD: And you have to sort of... to weed it out. Can you weed it out?
HJ: Well, that's what I'm trying to do.
BD: Yeah, well, you see, you have to learn but I can't teach you how to weed it out.
HJ: Yeah, I didn't say that I couldn't do that, I said I don't mean that.
BD: Yeah, well you know, I have no idea. First of all, I'm not even a pop singer.
HJ: You think you have a big audience?
BD: I don't know. I have no idea.
HJ: Well, you appeal to your audiences in some sense as a pop singer. Well, you know, even if it's Caruso he's, uh, you know, appealing to a popular, you know, this is a...
BD: But, he's a pop singer... and I'm just as good a singer as Caruso... Have you heard me sing? Have you ever heard me sing?
HJ: I like Caruso better.
BD: Ohhh... well, you see right there now, right there we have a little disagreement. I happen to be just as good as him... (laughter) a good singer, have to listen closely... (laughter) but I hit all those notes and I can hold my breath three times as long if I want to.

Ray Coleman Interview, London, England

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 983-989.

This, the longest interview of the tour, between Ray Coleman and Dylan appeared in the Melody Maker of May 22nd 1965.

DYLAN IN DEPTH
By Ray Coleman

Bob Dylan talks like an abstract painting. He says he sees his songs in pictures – "It's kinda hard to explain them away in just a few words."

"It's hard for me to accept the silent audiences. Ah, they're quiet in the United States too. I've been doing concerts over there for two and a half years. But I don't know why – I feel somewhat bored by the audiences there."

"Silent audiences don't exactly worry me, but I think a lot more about what I'm singing and saying when they're so quiet you know, I was thrown into this situation. In the States there are different levels you work on. I work concerts and also coffee-houses and bars. People talk when you're singing. It's kinda different."

Had Dylan been nervous on British stages?

"Not nervous. Thoughtful. If I appeared nervous or tense, that was because I was kinda inhibited, y'know – standing there listening to everything I was doing. And I don't like to do that much."

"It's different what you hear on stage and what the audience hears. And – well, I was very glad they clapped! I'd like to thank them all individually."

How did Dylan feel about the 'cult' charges? He sat in his room and lit a cigarette. He wore an orange and white shirt and blue jeans. He was barefoot. He gazed at the floor.

"The image – there's nothing to it. If someone wants to believe something about me they can. It doesn't matter a little bit to me."

"At one time it did. That was some years ago when I was on the streets and trying to make some impression. Right now I don't care what people think – the cult is something OTHER people talk about, not me."

"Everybody is motivated to act in a certain way. I don't try to prove anything about myself. I just don't ask people to study me. I don't know what my image is now. I could change my clothes and look different couldn't I?"

"It's all a question of pictures. People may have had a picture of me when I used to wear that hat. I don't work for an image though. I wore that hat when I came to New York City four or five years ago. I'd come from the mid-west where things are not the same."

"People don't grow up the same way, y' know. I find that here in England they are more ready, the young people. They don't have so much as they do have in the United States, where they take things for granted. I mean materially."

"I'm not saying which is better or worse."

"But there's one thing that I can say about the United States that wouldn't happen in this country, England. Over there you could get killed for having long hair, if you're from the wrong part of the country. Or if there's something you said people don't like. You could actually get killed for saying something out of place."

Dylan was clearly now in a more expansive mood.

"Also a lot of people who are teaching other people in the United States – they're teaching, but they don't want people to know more than they know, really."

"I've even heard of people being prevented from going to a place to learn more than other people do."

"It's a form of jealousy, but more serious."

"Now your Liverpool – it looks like the whole of New York's West Side, or Greenwich Village. But somehow I got the feeling that here, I wasn't playing to that sort of people. Well, I think England's more open-minded, y'know."

The usually withdrawn Dylan – he'll be twenty four on May 24th – was thinking hard by now. His forehead was creased in thought.

"So a lot of people like me because it's the thing to do, right. I don't believe that. I don't think my British audiences were phoneys. Anyone who actually went to the concert will know that."

"I can't see a phoney audience being forced to accept a song like Gates Of Eden. I don't believe THAT song could be accepted as a 'thing to do'."

"And if they can TAKE a song like that, there's hope for them, whatever sort of people they are, right?"

Right. Bob was equally as strong on the subject of his hit parade successes.

"If they attack me because I have some success with records, then they're entitled to. But I'm equally entitled to disagree with them."

"Popular music – a lot of it – is fantastically great music. Are those people trying to hate pop music, or what? I don't hate pop music."

"Oh man, somebody's got to be a little bit whacky to say: 'I don't like electric guitar'. What's wrong with electrified guitar? And drums? I was playing with drums before I ever got anywhere. People say how can it be folk music when you've got electrified guitar and drums! Ha!"

"These instruments are real. I like them. Aren't they the things everybody uses when they start out? You don't start singing by yourself- you sometimes have drums."

How did Bob write his songs? What exactly provoked strong messages in songs like The Times They Are A-Changin' and Masters Of War?

"The message isn't in the words," Dylan replied. "I don't do anything with a sort of message. I'm just transferring my thoughts into music. Nobody can give you a message like that."

"All I can hope to do is sing what I'm thinking, and maybe remind you of something. Don't put me down as a man with a message."

"My songs are just me talking to myself. Maybe that's an egotistical thing to say, but that's what it is."

"I have no responsibility to anybody except myself. If people like me – fine. If they don't, then maybe I'll do something else."

"Songs are just pictures of what I'm seeing – glimpses of things – life, maybe, as it's going on around. They're not confined to words you hear."

"They are scattered between different things, and the lead for the listener will lie in the title of the song."

"Y'know, every one of my songs could be written better. This used to bother me, but it doesn't anymore. There's nothing perfect anywhere, so I shouldn't expect myself to be perfect."

Exactly where and when did he write Times?

"I can't remember the exact mood I was in when I wrote it," said Bob, "I seem to recall myself looking at this gigantic park or canyon. No, I was on 42nd Street."

"People were moving. There was a bitterness about at that time. People were getting the wrong idea."

Dylan shrugged when asked what they were getting the wrong idea about.

"It was nothing to do with age or parents, this song," he said, searching for words to express himself.

"But this is what it was maybe – a bitterness towards authority – the type of person who sticks his nose down and doesn't take you seriously, but expects YOU to take HIM seriously."

"Another thing about Times They Are A-Changin' – I wanted to say in it that if you have something that you don't want to lose, and people threaten you, you are not really free."

"That's one thing I wanted to get in the song. Well, I don't know if the song is true, but the feeling's true. Oh yeah. It's no good saying there's no answer to things – It's freedom of expression I want. And it's nothing to do with a political party or religion. It's in yourself."

What about Subterranean?

"Don't know what to say about that song. I feel bad about it. I can understand every word because I wrote it, but it isn't recorded as good as it ought to have been recorded."

"The words are rather squeezed together. You could call it an unconscious poem set to music. I'm not going to write anything or sing anything I don't want to do. That song's NOT a put-on, like somebody said."

"Nobody's going to push me into writing rock and roll songs. That's something I don't want to do."

Which of his songs are his favourites?

"Oh, I guess It's All Over Now, Baby Blue, She Belongs To Me, and right now Maggie's Farm. Cynthia Lennon likes that best."

Bob has struck up a close friendship with John Lennon and Dylan said they had thought about swapping ideas for songs.

"I sent John these pictures – two pictures we had fixed to the roof of my car, but you know, he didn't get them. I got John's address wrong. These pictures we used to look at, if anybody got brought down. They were just ideas."

"But now I've got his address and I'm going to send him some things if anything comes into my mind."

"I dig John. As a writer, a singer, and a Beatle. There are very few people I dig every time I meet them, but him I dig. He doesn't take things so seriously as so many guys do. I like that."

Now the Dylan-Donovan saga has passed its peak what did Bob think of the British boy who has been accused of copying him?

"I heard his LP. I like Catch The Wind. I like him. He's young, you know I think some time, if he keeps on going, he'll be okay. He's got to keep going, he mustn't get stuck – I mean I don't think anybody could get hold of his head. He might get stuck bad if someone gets hold of his head."

"He's got to get into something terribly new. He can't play and sing as well as a lot of people in the United States. But he does have everything they don't have. He's groovy. Yeah, but does he KNOW? There are two kinds of know. With a small k and a capital K and I hope he knows with a capital one."

Dylan on money:

"I don't depend on money. I don't take any interest in it. It goes into some kind of bank. I contribute to some organisation called S.N.C.C. – the Student's Non-violent Coordinating Committee. That's a group in the States helping the Negroes down south. They're young people – not frustrated leaders or anything, they're good people."

"I buy anything I want to buy, but that's not much. I have to buy clothes all the time because I leave them around wherever I go."

"I could buy a Cadillac. I have a motorcycle, and that is all. There's a station wagon we used to transport things around. I have a little car – a Chevy, but it's a wreck. That's all I need, y'know. I have the money thing clearly sorted out in my mind."

"My mind works in – er, kinda strange ways."

Dylan on politics:

"No politics. It would be just impossible for me to stand up and be associated with any political party. They're all crap – every single one of them is crap. They all think they are better than the next one. Huh."

"It's OK for someone who wants to be in a political party, but not me. They stand up there trying to tell what is good and what's bad and what ought to be done."

"They've got a commodity to sell and that commodity is themselves. Politics is just a commercial bandwagon."

Dylan on his future:

"I have these things ready – plays and things. Nothing's finished. I live in the present. It's hard for me to look beyond today. Every time I try to do otherwise and plan for the future, it doesn't pay off. I know I write a lot of stuff, but exactly what shape it'll take has yet to be decided."

Dylan on being called a poet:

"Everybody has their own idea of what's a poet. Robert Frost, President Johnson, T.S. Eliot, Rudolph Valentino – they're all poets. I like to think of myself as the one who carried the lightbulb."

On why he shuns convention:

"I have nothing to say against suits, and nothing to say in their favor either. Why should I wear a suit? To go and eat supper? I have nothing against ties. It never struck me before people asked questions that I never wore a tie."

"MUST I wear a tie? It's nice of people to show their concern and interest in what I wear. I don't share it."

Dylan having the last word on his fans:

"I don't think they were going to any cult meeting. It is downgrading those people to say that. Those people who say it's a cult are just searching for some kind of a reply to me."

On his brilliantly pertinent song Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall:

"I wrote it at the time of the Cuban crisis. I was in Bleeker street in New York. We just hung around at night – people sat around wondering if it was the end, and so did I. Would ten o'clock the next day ever come? What was going to happen?"

"Well I wrote that song to the tune of Buffalo Skinner. An old cowboy song. It was a song of desperation. What would we do? Could we control men on the verge of wiping us out?"

"The words came fast. Very fast. It was a song of terror. Line after line after line, trying to capture the feeling of nothingness."

"Repetition – I kept repeating things I feared. I don't know what it was like here at the time of Cuba, but – well, we who thought about it felt – er, sore. Just sore."

On Russia:

"I'd like to go out of curiosity. I don't have any great expectations of Russia, Cuba or France. I don't have any heroes."

On Religion:

"I don't think religion can show anybody how to live. I don't have any religion."

On Death:

"I used to be afraid of it, but no more. Great men die – Shakespeare died. Napoleon died. We all die. I used to worry about the world, but there ought to be enough other people worried about it to let me free."

On Life:

"If anything influences my songs, life does. I could write songs called Where's My Baby Gone? I'm not putting them down, but I want to say things different. I guess my songs are really about love – love of life."

"I don't want to be regarded as a threat. I just hope that if people do listen they'll think harder. I just want to see people happy."

Laurie Henshaw Interview, London, England

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 583-585.
Disc Weekly, 22 May 1965, page 6.

Laurie Henshaw was a reporter for the Disc & Music Weekly. This interview was printed in Disc Weekly on May 22 1965 under the title Mr. Send Up. According to Heylin (Behind The Shades) Henshaw encountered a Dylan if anything ruder than he was to Judson, However, his stream of put-ons delighted Henshaw who published the interview as it was claiming he had secured Dylan's most outrageous interview to date. And indeed he probably had.

LH: Can you tell me when and where you were born?

BD: No, you can go and find out. There's many biographies and you can look to that. You don't ask me where I was born, where I lived. Don't ask me those questions. You find out from other papers.

LH: I'd rather hear it from you.

BD: I'm not going to tell you.

LH: Can you tell me exactly when you entered the profession? When you first started writing songs?

BD: When I was 12.

LH: And you were writing poetry at the time? And you are writing a book now?

BD: I've got a book done.

LH: Is it already published?

BD: It's going to be published in the fall.

LH: What's it called?

BD: I'm not going to tell you.

LH: Can you give me an idea what it is about?

BD: No.

LH: Can you tell me your favorite song among the ones you've written?

BD: I don't have any. I've no personal songs that I wouldn't consider apart from any other.

LH: You must obviously make a lot of money nowadays?

BD: I spend it all. I have six Cadillacs. I have four houses. I have a plantation in Georgia. Oh, I'm also working on a rocket. A little rocket. Not a big rocket. Not the kind of rocket they have in Cape Canaveral. I don't know about those kind of rockets.

LH: Do you have personal things – cameras, watches and that sort of thing?

BD: No, I don't. I buy cars. I have a lot of cars, the Cadillacs. I also have a few Oldsmobiles, about three.

LH: Do you have fears about anything political.

BD: No.

LH: Of course your songs have a very strong content...

BD: Have you heard ray songs?

LH: I have. 'Masters Of War'. 'Blowin' In The Wind'.

BD: What about 'Spanish Lover"! (sic) Have you heard that? Why don't you listen to that? Listen, I couldn't care less what your paper writes about me. Your paper can write anything, don't you realize? The people that listen to me don't read your paper, you know, to listen to me. I'm not going to be known from your paper.

LH: You're already known. Why be so hostile?

BD: Because you're hostile to me. You're using me. I'm an object to you. I went through this before in the United States, you know. There's nothing personal. I've nothing against you at all. I just don't want to be bothered with your paper, that's all. I just don't want to be a part of it. Why should I have to go along with something just so that somebody else can eat? Why don't you just say that my name is Kissenovitch. You know, and I, er, come from Acapulco, Mexico. That my father was an escaped thief from South Africa. OK. You can say anything you want to say.

LH: Let's talk about you. Your clothes for instance. Are your taste in clothes changing at all?

BD: I like clothes. I don't have any particular interests at all. I like to wear drapes, umbrellas, hats.

LH: You're not going to tell me you carry an umbrella.

BD: I most certainly do carry an umbrella. Where I come from everybody carries an umbrella. Have you ever been to South Dakota? Well, I come from South Dakota, and in South Dakota people carry umbrellas.

LH: What would you say has been the greatest influence in your life?

BD: You! Your paper happens to influence me a lot. I'm going to go out and write a song after I've seen you – you know – what I'm used for. I feel what I'm doing and I feel what your paper does. And you have the nerve and gall to ask me what influences me and why do I think I'm so accepted. I don't want to be interviewed by your paper. I don't need it. You don't need it either. You can build up your own star. Why don't you just get a lot of money and bring some kid out here from the north of England and say "We're gonna make you a star! You just comply with everything, everything we do. Every time you want an interview you can just sign a paper that means we can have an interview and write what we want to write. And you'll be a star and make money!" Why don't you just do that? I'm not going to do it for you.

LH: Why should we bother to interview you if we didn't think you were worth interviewing?

BD: Because I'm news. That's why I don't blame you, you have a job to do. I know that. There's nothing personal here. But don't try to pick up too much you know.

LH: When did you start making records?

BD: I started making records in 1947, that was my first recording. A race record. I made it down south. Actually the first record I made was in 1935. John Hammond came and recorded me. Discovered me in 1935, sitting on a farm. The man who discovered Benny Goodman saw me down the street. He had me in to do a session. It happened just like that. Otherwise I wouldn't be here.

LH: Do you have a favorite guitar?

BD: Favorite guitar? I have 33 guitars! How can you have one favorite? I'm going to quit playing the guitar anyway. I'm playing the banjo.

LH: Have you heard Manfred Mann doing 'With God On Our Side'?

BD: No, I haven't heard it. I've only heard about it.

LH: It was sung on "Ready Steady Goes Live" and it made quite an impact.

BD: I would like to have seen it.

LH: How do you feel about other groups doing your songs?

BD: Well, how would you feel about other groups doing your songs?

LH: I'd be complemented.

BD: I'd feel the same as you.

LH: What sort of people do you like? What type do you cultivate?

BD: I would cultivate the kind of person that sticks to his job. Sticks to his job and gets his job done. And is not too nervous. But nervous enough not to come back!

LH: What kind of people do you take an instant dislike to?

BD: I take an instant dislike to people that shake a lot. An instant dislike – wham! Most of the time I throw them against a wall. I have a body guard, Toppo. (Dylan here puts his hands to his mouth and calls to the next room) TOPPO! Is Toppo in there? I have a bodyguard to get rid of people like that. He comes out and wipes them out. He wiped out three people last week.

LH: Do you paint?

BD: Yeah, sure.

LH: What sort of painting.

BD: I painted my house

At this point, Dylan abruptly ended the interview.

Sales Messages, Levy's Recording Studio, London, England

Record Mirror, 22nd May 1965; published in Positively Tie Dream, pp. 11-13.

Hi! Thank you very much for selling so many of my records. I'll see you next year in New York. God bless you.

More?

Hi! This is Bob. Thank you very much for selling so many of my records. I wish I could be there with you right now this minute but unfortunately I'm all tied up. I'll see you when you come around to see me next time. God bless you all and keep selling a lot of records.

Here's a bit coloured report of the session as printed in Positively Tie Dream:

DYLAN'S LONDON ALBUM

The following article is taken from RECORD MIRROR 22nd May 1965.

Wednesday, May 11th was the date fixed. The place – Levy's Recording Studios in London's New Bond Street. The time, 7. 30. all this was classified information, for the artiste – to be recorded in the kind of secrecy normally reserved for sessions by the Beatles – was Bob Dylan.

Tom Wilson, Dylan's personal recording manager was checking through the array of switches and dials and monster tape reels. Tom is an impressive figure, six feet six in all, who radiates efficiency from his twinkling spectacles and gleaming smile down to his size 12 chukka boots. "Hiya feller," he beamed, shaking hands. "Welcome to the session." He waved towards the grand piano and the two electric pianos. "We're gonna try a little experimental stuff tonight – some new material Bobby wants to get on tape. Maybe we'll get an album out of it, maybe not. Anyway it should be interesting."

At five to eight the door opened. Albert Grossman, Dylan's manager, and his attractive wife Sally entered, followed by two musicians bearing guitars, three pretty girls who made up, later in the evening, a backing chorus, and then the famous, slight figure of Dylan himself. The fluffy, tousled hair, cigarette in the corner of his mouth, the dark shades.

Dylan, Grossman and Wilson consulted with each other. More people arrived. Jamaican folk-singer Nadia Catouse, English songwriter Sidney Carter, Paul Jones of the Manfred Mann group, rhythm and blues man John Mayall.

Wilson entered his control room. Bob went to sit in a little sound-proof booth with a couple of mikes in front of him. "OK" Wilson's amplified voice came over the studio speakers. "Do the announcement. You know, the Miami one."

"Hello there folks!" Dylan grinned sheepishly and ruffled his hair as he spoke into the mike. "Great to be here in Miami and I sure wish I could really be with all you folks now but I'm kinda tied up. Anyway, God bless y'all and thanks for buyin' ma records." "And again" said Wilson, booming through the speaker. "Hello, folks," said Bob, shifting from foot to foot. "This is Bob here, Bob Dylan. I', I'm really sorry I can't be with you..."

Mr. Grossman, Dylan's manager, moved silently through the studio. "There's wine out the back," he announced softly. "Bob always has wine."

People went to get wine.

At 8.30, Bob moved to the grand piano. Technicians placed screens strategically around him, testing for the right acoustics. A session drummer in the corner gave a tentative roll on his snare drum.

A guitarist next to Dylan and his piano did a couple of riffs in time with the boogie beat Bob was churning out. Bob turned to the three girls who were to be his chorus. "Er, kin you kinda go 'um, um' or somethin behind this one. Huh?" They all nodded and began to go "um".

"I've really enjoyed this trip, seeing Britain and the British music scene you know." Al Grossman, paper cup full of wine in hand, was talking in a corner with Sidney Carter. "Last night we met some ordinary cats in a coffee house you know. We talked to them, they talked to us. It's great – the first time we've managed to really contact people who are not connected with the business."

Dylan, across the studio, finished his second number and picked up an electric guitar. He made no announcements, and his singing was inaudible in the soundproofed room. Only the accompaniment, the driving guitar and drums backing first heard on 'Subterranean' came across.

"We're going to play around and try and can something tonight," said Grossman. "We'll finish around eleven, I guess. Then we are flying out to the continent at one o'clock. We'll be back next week to tape this TV show of Bobbie's before he can go home."

Dylan had picked up a harmonica and was blowing blues. "Say," he said, "this is a strange harmonica! Ain't played one like this before. Anybody got another one?" Someone had. He launched into another blusey number. Half a dozen bottles of wine had disappeared.

It was after ten. Clutching paper cups, four or five people clustered around the control room door, listening to the sound of Dylan as it went down on tape. One of the huge tape reels, revolving slowly, was almost filled. Tom Wilson, for once unsmiling, sat intently over his mike and his switches. "Come on Dylan," he said over the loudspeaker. "Try it again the way you wrote it." Bob obliged.

Nine bottles of wine had disappeared. "Try some of this stuff," said Sally Grossman – the girl in the red dress featured on the cover of Bob's latest album – "it's sweet stuff, but it'll do. But leave some for the artiste."

As it happened, the artiste didn't need it. For while ev'ryone was talking, and the recording technicians were discussing takes, and there were no eyes on him, Bob Dylan and his barber artiste friend opened the studio door and slipped quietly away.

INTO the Pop 50 at 37 this week flew Hollywood's Byrds. They're friends of Bob Dylan, seen here sitting in with them during a West Coast concert. And the song that has seen them "home" is a Dylan favourite, "Mr Tambourine Man". Says Bob of the Byrds: "They are good musicians—they know what they are doing."

KRLA Beat Interview

According to Heylin (A Life In Stolen Moments), this interview took place sometime mid to late June 1965. It appeared in the July 7th edition of Britain's KRLA Beat magazine. This has been taken from a reprint in Heylin's booklet The Bob Dylan Interviews – A List.

FAMOUS SONGWRITER BOB DYLAN MYSTERY MAN TO MOST AMERICANS

Who is Bob Dylan, the man who is causing such a sensation on today's pop scene?

Since he has been relatively ignored by the American Press he is kind of a mystery man here, despite the records, concerts and dozens of hit songs he has written for other entertainers.

Most people are familiar with the name, but not with the man. Who is this eccentric-looking song writer? What does he possess? What does he believe in? Or does he believe in anything at all?

Because he is the hottest American artist in England, because his album Bring It All Back Home is riding high in the American charts, and because he has made some rather interesting and controversial comments about today's world, we feel it is time for the BEAT to introduce you to the man Bob Dylan.

Is there a Dylan cult?

The image – there's nothing to it. If someone wants to believe something about me, they can. It doesn't matter a little bit to me. At one time it did, That was some years ago when I was on the streets and trying to make some impression. Right now, I don't care what people think – the cult is something other people talk about. Not me.

Do his songs contain some kind of message?

The message isn't in the words. I don't do anything with a sort of message. I'm just transferring my thoughts into music. All I can hope to do is sing what I'm thinking, and maybe remind you of something. Don't put me down as a man with a message. My songs are just me talking to myself.

John Lennon has sung Dylan's praises all over England, but what does Dylan think of Lennon?

I dig John. As a writer, a singer and a Beatle. I dig everytime I meet them, but him I dig. He doesn't take things seriously as so many guys do. I like that.

What does Dylan think about money?

I don't depend on the money. I don't take any interest in it. It goes into some kinda bank. I buy anything I want to buy, but that's not much. I have to buy clothes all the time because I leave them around wherever I go, I have a little car – a Chevy, but it's a wreck. That's all I need, y'know? I have the money thing clearly sorted out in my mind..

What about politics?

No politics. Politics is just a commercial bandwagon.

What about his clothes, how comes he never wears a suit and tie?

I have nothing to say against suits and nothing to say in their favor either. Why should I wear a suit? To go and eat supper? I have nothing against ties. It never struck me before people asked questions that I never wore a tie. Must I wear a tie? It's nice of people to show their concern in what I wear. I don't share it.

How does Dylan feel about religion?

I don't think religion can show anybody how to live. I don't have any religion.

What about death?

I used to be afraid of it, but no more. Great men die – Shakespeare died, Napoleon died. We all die.

Well then what does he think about life?

If anything influences my songs, life does. I could write songs called Where's My Baby Gone? I'm not putting them down, but I want to say things different. I guess catastrophe and confusion are the basis of my songs. But basically my songs are really about love – love of life.

This is Bob Dylan, folksinger and poet, the most successful writer of folk songs in the world today. You may like him or dislike him, agree with him or disagree with him. He doesn't particularly care. Despite his outstanding commercial success he seems to be looking for something else. And perhaps he has found it.

DYNAMIC DYLAN!
Now millions of people can see what he is really like on two special BBC TV performances

On Tuesday of last week Bob Dylan taped his two shows for BBC TV. The previous session had been cancelled because of his illness and the programmes – at least half an hour each – are now scheduled to go out on June 19 at 10. 50 and June 26 at 10. 30. Both shows are different, and in both he is entirely on his own. In fact, they will be just like his concert performances and that means DYNAMIC! as reporter Penny Valentine and Phil May of The Pretty Things discovered when they went to the taping.

It is a quarter to eight at the BBC studios in London. There is an audience of 300 but the place is very quiet as everyone waits for Dylan.

Mrs Al Grossman, Dylan's manager's wife, sits in the front row wearing a suit and leather boots. A fat man with a bald patch sits further along with a sketch pad. The Pretty Things sit in a line with intent faces.

Just past eight Dylan appears at the side of the studio. He wears a black leather jacket, dark sweater and trousers, his harmonica harness round his neck. He looks pale and tired after his illness. He ambles out round a camera to the applause and stops next to a bright red leather stool. He stands by the mic, tuning up. On the monitor screens above our heads appears the picture of a girl on a beach. Dylan adjusts his harness and plays the guitar softly as the cameras angle up.

Cue card

"Hey wait a minute," he mumbles, and a young man in a super-smart corduroy jacket suddenly appears from nowhere. "I can't see those cue cards," Dylan explains. "You'll have to bring them right up – I've got bad eyes."

They bring the cue cards nearer and he fixes another harmonica into his harness. The hot lights have affected the strings on his guitar again and he turns away from the audience, listening intently as he runs through the chords.

The young man in the jacket says that sounds fine to him.

"It doesn't to me," says Dylan. "I've got bad ears too!"

Some sort of magic seems suddenly to have hit the entire proceedings with Dylan's grin and joke. We all laugh.

The red stool is unused by Dylan throughout the two shows. He stands, feet slightly apart, head a little back. He makes no attempt at introducing the songs. His attitude is the same as he adopts at his concerts – that his audience should know his work without explanation.

The only time he does offer an introduction is on 'It's Alright, Ma (I'm Only Bleeding)' when he says the title and adds: "This is a funny song, ho, ho, ho."

Striking

The stool carries his extra harmonica and a crumpled piece of paper on which Dylan has written down the titles of the songs he will do. On the screens the face of Dylan alternates between hatred and love. He comes over strikingly well. In the first show he sings effortlessly through songs including 'One Too Many Mornings' and 'She Belongs to Me'. In the studios he has a 15-minute break.

At rehearsals he did 'Maggie's Farm' and then decided not to sing it after all. His second show includes the very funny 'If You Gotta Go, Go Now' and 'Mr Tambourine Man'.

Inserts

On 'Mr Tambourine Man' there are filmed inserts of a fairground shown over Dylan on his guitar. At the end of the tapings Dylan crouches, his chin cupped in his hands, watching the credits coming over the monitor sets. As the last glimpse of a now static Dylan face is shown on the set he stands up and looks satisfied. He says his thanks to the camera crew and once more to the audience and then quietly walks away.

Jeffrey Jones Interview, Newport Folk Festival 1965
(Published 18 December 1975)

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 187-190

Is this the real Mr. Jones, of Ballad fame?

July 25th 1965, Jeffrey Jones, then a part-time reporter for Time magazine, conducted a rather trite interview with Dylan at the Newport Folk Festival. Subsequently he began to ponder on whether he was the enigmatic Mr. Jones in Ballad Of A Thin Man. His 1975 article in Rolling Stone shows why.

It happened in the summer of 1965 at the Newport Folk Festival. Dylan's version of the encounter goes like this: (Here he quotes the first verse of the song). Mr. Jones – the rational fool, the geek gawker, the college-educated babe-in-the-woods, the quintessential square, the anti-hero of the sixties. Even now it is like owning up to a war crime to suggest that... I am Mr. Jones.

I can't prove it, but I am convinced that Dylan used me as the unwitting model for his Mr. Jones.

As a college student with a summer job in the New York bureau of Time magazine, I concocted a story idea on the rebirth of harmonica in popular music. The article was to be built around a then obscure harp player from Chicago named Paul Butterfield who, I had heard, was going to make a big splash at the upcoming folk festival in Newport. I sent the suggestion to Times music editor, and to my surprise, back came a memo advising me to go ahead. Attached to the memo was a yellow sheet of paper called a "query", listing the questions that my reporting should answer and directing me to "get quotes" from celebrities to support the story.

A week later I pirouetted slowly in the dust of a Newport, Rhode Island field, dazzled by the high sun of a July morning. In my pocket was the yellow query sheet. I'd interviewed Butterfield and things were going fine.

Suddenly I saw Joan Baez. She was radiant, more beautiful than any picture of her I had ever studied. Bearing a saintly smile, she glided like a prophet, with a clutch of young girls as her train. They reached out but did not quite touch her, and cried ecstatically, "Oh, Joan!" I saw then that my job was impossible. How was I, an awed college kid, to write anything authoritative?

"Hey, Mr. Tambourine Man, play a song for me..."

Bob Dylan's flat tenor rose above a throng seated at the perimeter of the storm fenced festival arena. I walked toward the crowd, noting on my program that he was part of an informal "workshop" session.

Near the workshop stage, next to a van filled with sound equipment I met a high-cheeked woman with silver-blonde hair. It was Mary Travers, then of Peter, Paul and Mary. I asked her questions prepared by Time. She asked if I would like to talk with Dylan. I nodded stiffly.

"Wait here," she said.

Dylan had finished his set and was surrounded by chattering fans. Mary Travers grabbed his hand and led him to me.

We were engulfed by a swelling group of mostly teenage girls. Dylan pointed to the open side of the van. We climbed in and took seats amid hot amplifiers. Dylan's fans surrounded the vehicle, squealing his name, pounding the sides of the truck. The van began to rock.

"Yeah?" said Dylan.

As I opened my mouth to speak, he waved out of a window, then blocked the glass with a curtain and assumed a bored slouch.

"I'm doing this story for Time on the harmonica," I said, "and it seems to be, like, very important in folk music. I mean, after the guitar, probably the second-most-played instrument. They wanted me to find out what you think."

"Yeah, man," he said, half laughing, "the harmonica is really big."

The van rocked again.

"Well," I asked, nearly choking on the crushing banality of every word, "is it because of your influence?"

"No, man, the harmonica is just a good instrument, and it's been around a long while, you know what I mean?"

Dylan was polite, but impatient. I plunged on.

"Time has this way of doing stories where they use what they call a "peg", which is some person they build a story around. Paul Butterfield is the peg in this story, because they say he's going to be big. What do you think?"

Pause

"Butterfield is great, man, great." There was exasperation in his voice. "Look," he said, "for me right now there are three groups: Butterfield, The Byrds and the Sir Douglas Quintet." I couldn't tell if he was putting me on.

Dylan shot me a glance and I was rocked by a strange beauty in his ferret face, and by his eyes, which were alive and as maddeningly impenetrable as a cat's.

Dylan seized the silence.

"Is that all, man?" he said.

"Yeah, thanks a lot for your time." I smiled wanly and extended a shaking hand. He took it limply. Then he climbed out the van door amid the fans, who swallowed him as he walked to a waiting car.

That evening, in the hotel dining room, I pleaded with Butterfield to give me some more time alone.

Then I heard laughing and a raucous shuffling of chairs behind me. Dylan – with an entourage that included Donovan, Bob Neuwirth and several slinky women – was being seated at the next table. I raised my hand in a tentative salute. Dylan hailed me with hollow delight.

"Mr. Jones," Dylan shouted from the chair he'd taken, "Gettin' it all down, Mr. Jones?"

There was laughter at his table.

"Time magazine," he called with mock enthusiasm. "You going to write a story for Time magazine, Mr. Jones?"

More laughter and jibes. I smiled and nodded, feeling like the village idiot, flattered by attention and defensively dumbstruck.

Later, in the lobby, I spied the elfin figure of Donovan. My multi-purpose query had instructed me also to keep an eye on Donovan. I approached him without hesitation. Already humiliated, I now felt recklessly brash. I followed at Donovan's side as he moved out the front door of the hotel and across an asphalt parking lot towards a motel-like annex.

"Okay if I walk with you?" I asked cheerily.

"Well, there's this party, you see..."

I stuck by him anyway, until we arrived at a room on the second floor of the annex. Music and loud voices came through the door.

"Well, see ya now," Donovan said as he knocked. The door opened and, as Donovan slipped in, I saw Dylan sitting on the edge of a couch, a girl by his side. The door closed quickly. I waited five seconds, then knocked.

Five more seconds passed.

The door flew open. Bob Neuwirth came crashing out and fell flat on his back at my feet, staring at the ceiling. Dylan bounced up and down on the edge of the couch, laughing. Neuwirth suddenly scrambled to his feet, gave me a frantic look, then sprang back through the open door and slammed it, as though he were locking out a demon. I walked away.

The next day Butterfield's scheduled big splash was postponed by rain. Later, part of the Butterfield band backed Dylan during his famous electric-axe inaugural. The audience wanted to hear Baby Blue and booed when it got Subterranean Homesick Blues instead. It was a stormy coming out party for what Time later called "folk-rock" and I had missed the point totally.

Highway 61 Revisited appeared the following Autumn. When I heard Ballad Of A Thin Man, I knew right then who Mr. Jones was. I was thrilled – in the tainted way I suppose a felon is thrilled to see his name in the newspaper. I was awed too that Dylan had so accurately read my mind. I resented the caricature but had to admit that there was something happening there at Newport in the summer of 1965, and I didn't know what it was.

In retrospect, it has occurred to me that Dylan might not have known either.

Late Summer 1965
Nora Ephron & Susan Edmiston Interview, Forest Hills, New York

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 795-800.

This interview took place late August to early September 1965 in the office of Dylan's manager Albert Grossman and was intended for an article in the New York Post. Dylan had just been booed in the historic Forest Hills concert where he abandoned folk purity to the use of electric accompaniment. He was wearing a red-and-navy op-art shirt, a navy blazer and pointy high-heeled boots. His face, so sharp and harsh when translated through the media, was then infinitely soft and delicate. His hair was not bushy or electric or Afro; it was fine-spun soft froth like the foam of a wave. He looked like an underfed angel with a nose from the land of the Chosen People. (Ephron and Edmiston's own introduction).

E/E = Ephron / Edmiston

E/E: Some American folk singers – Carolyn Hester, for example – say that what you're now doing, the new sound, "folk rock", is liberating them.

BD: Did Carolyn say that? You tell her she can come around and see me any time now that she's liberated.

E/E: Does labeling, using the term "folk rock", tend to obscure what's happening?

BD: Yes.

E/E: It's like "pop gospel". What does the term mean to you?

BD: Yeah, classical gospel could be the next trend. There's country rock, rockabilly. What does it mean to me? Folk rock. I've never even said that word. It has a hard, gutter sound. Circussy atmosphere. It's nose-thumbing. Sound like you're looking down on what is... fantastic, great music.

E/E: The definition most often given of folk rock is the combination of the electronic sound of rock and roll with the meaningful lyrics of folk music. Does that sum up what you're doing?

BD: Yes. It's very complicated to play with electricity. You play with other people. You're dealing with other people. Most people don't like to work with other people, it's more difficult. It takes a lot. Most people who don't like rock and roll can't relate to other people.

E/E: You mention the Apollo Theatre in Harlem on one of your album covers. Do you go there often?

BD: Oh, I couldn't go up there. I used to go up there a lot about four years ago. I even wanted to play in one of the amateur nights, but I got scared. Bad things can happen to you. I saw what the audience did to a couple of guys they didn't like. And I would have had a couple of things against me right away when I stepped out on the stage.

E/E: Who is Mr. Jones, in Ballad Of A Thin Man?

BD: He's a real person, you know him, but not by that name.

E/E: Like Mr. Charlie?

BD: No. He's more than Mr. Charlie. He's actually a person. Like I saw him come into the room one night and he looked like a camel. He proceeded to put his eyes in his pocket. I asked this guy who he was and he said: "That's Mr. Jones." Then I asked this cat: "Doesn't he do anything but put his eyes in his pocket?" And he told me: "He puts his nose on the ground." It's all there. It's a true story.

E/E: Where did you get that shirt?

BD: California. Do you like it? You should see my others. You can't get clothes like that here. There are a lot of things out there we haven't got here.

E/E: Isn't California on the way here?

BD: It's uptight here compared to there. Hollywood, I mean. It's not really breathable here. It's like there's air out there. The Sunset Strip can't be compared to anything here, like Forty-second Street. The people there look different, they look more like... you want to kiss them out there.

E/E: Do you spend a lot of time out there?

BD: I don't have much time to spend anywhere. The same thing in England. In England everybody looks very hip East Side. They wear things... they don't wear things that bore you. They've got other hang-ups in other directions.

E/E: Do you consider yourself primarily a poet?

BD: No. We have our ideas about poets. The word doesn't mean any more than the word "house". There are people who write *po*ems and people who write po*ems*. Other people write poems. Everybody who writes poems do you call them a poet? There's a certain kind of rhythm in some kind of way that's visible. You don't necessarily have to write to be a poet. Some people work in gas stations and they're poets. I don't call myself a poet because I don't like the word. I'm a trapeze artist.

E/E: What I meant was, do you think your words stand without the music?

BD: They would stand but I don't read them. I'd rather sing them. I write things that aren't songs – I have a book coming out.

E/E: What is it?

BD: It's a book of words.

E/E: Is it like the back of your albums? It seemed to me that the album copy you write is a lot like the writing of William Burroughs. Some of the accidental sentences –

BD: Cut-ups.

E/E: Yes, and some of the imagery and anecdotes. I wondered if you had read anything by him.

BD: I haven't read Naked Lunch but I have read some of his shorter things in little magazines, foreign magazines. I read one in Rome. I know him. I don't really know him – I just met him once. I think he's a great man.

E/E: Burroughs keeps an album, a collection of photographs that illustrate his writing. Do you have anything similar to that?

BD: I do that, too. I have photographs of Gates Of Eden and It's All Over Now, Baby Blue. I saw them after I wrote the songs. People send me a lot of things and a lot of the things are pictures, so other people must have that idea too. I gotta admit, maybe I wouldn't have chosen them, but I can see what it is about the pictures.

E/E: I heard you used to play the piano for Buddy Holly.

BD: No. I used to play the rock and roll piano, but I don't want to say who it was for because the cat will try to get hold of me. I don't want to see the cat. He'll try to reclaim the friendship. I did it a long time ago, when I was seventeen years old. I used to play a country piano too.

E/E: This was before you became interested in folk music?

BD: Yes. I became interested in folk music because I had to make it somehow. Obviously I'm not a hard-working cat. I played the guitar, that was all I did. I thought it was great music. Certainly I haven't turned my back on it or anything like that. There is – and I'm sure nobody realises this, all the authorities who write about what it is and what it should be, when they say keep things simple, they should be easily understood – folk music is the only music where it isn't simple. It's weird, man, full of legend, myth, bible and ghosts. I've never written anything hard to understand, not in my head, anyway, and nothing as far out as some of the old songs. They were out of sight.

E/E: Like what songs?

BD: Little Brown Dog, "I bought a little brown dog, its face is all gray. Now I'm going to Turkey flying on my bottle." And Nottemun Town, that's like a herd of ghosts passing through on the way to Tangiers. Lord Edward, Barbara Allen, they're full of myth.

E/E: And contradictions?

BD: Yeah, contradictions.
E/E: And chaos?
BD: Chaos, watermelon, clocks, everything.
E/E: You wrote on the back of one album: "I accept chaos but does chaos accept me?"
BD: Chaos is a friend of mine. It's like I accept him, does he accept me?
E/E: Do you see the world as chaos?
BD: Truth is chaos. Maybe beauty is chaos.
E/E: Poets like Eliot and Yeats -
BD: I haven't read Yeats.
E/E: They saw the world as chaos, accepted it as chaos and attempted to bring order from it. Are you trying to do that?
BD: No. It exists and that's all there is to it. It's been here longer than I have. What can I do about it? I don't know what the songs I write are. That's all I do is write songs, right? Write. I collect things too.
E/E: Monkey wrenches?
BD: Where did you read about that? Has that been in print? I told this guy out on the coast that I collected monkey wrenches, all sizes and shapes of monkey wrenches, and he didn't believe me. I don't think you believe me either. And I collect the pictures, too. Have you talked to Sonny and Cher?
E/E: No.
BD: They're a drag. A cat gets kicked out of a restaurant and he went home and wrote a song about it.
E/E: They say your fan mail has radically increased since you switched sounds.
BD: Yeah. I don't have time to read all of it, but I want you to put that I answer half of it. I don't really. A girl does that for me.
E/E: Does she save any for you – any particularly interesting letters?
BD: She knows my head. Not the ones that just ask for pictures, there's a file for them. Not the ones that say, I want to make it with you, they go in another file. She saves two kinds. The violently put-down -
E/E: The ones that call you a sell-out?
BD: Yeah. Sell-out, fink, fascist, red, everything in the book. I really dig those. And ones from old friends.
E/E: Like: "You don't remember me but I was in the fourth grade with you"?
BD: No, I never had any friends then. These are letters from people who knew me in New York five, six years ago. My first fans. Not the people who call themselves my first fans. They came in three years ago, two years ago. They aren't really my first fans.
E/E: How do you feel about being booed at your concert at Forest Hills?
BD: I thought it was great, I really did. If I said anything else I 'd be a liar.
E/E: And at the Newport Folk Festival?
BD: That was different. They twisted the sound. They didn't like what I was going to play and they twisted the sound on me before I began.
E/E: I hear you were wearing a sell-out jacket.
BD: What kind of a jacket is a sell-out jacket?
E/E: Black leather.
BD: I've had black leather jackets since I was five years old. I've been wearing black leather all my life.
E/E: I wonder if we could talk about electronic music and what made you decide to use it.
BD: I was doing fine, singing and playing my guitar. It was a sure thing, don't you understand, it was a sure thing. I was getting very bored with that. I couldn't go out and play like that. I was thinking of quitting. Out front it was a sure thing. I knew what the audience was gonna do, how they would react. It was very automatic. Your mind just drifts unless you can find some way to get in there and remain totally there. It's so much of a fight remaining totally there all by yourself. It takes too much. I'm not ready to cut that much out of my life, you can't have nobody around. You can't be bothered with anybody else's world. And I like people. What I'm doing now – it's a whole other thing. We're not playing rock music. It's not a hard sound. These people call it folk rock – if they want to call it that, something that simple, it's good for selling records. As far as it being what it is, I don't know what it is. I can't call it folk rock. It's a whole way of doing things. It has been picked up on, I've heard songs on the radio that have picked it up. I'm not talking about words. It's a certain feeling, and it's been on every single record I've made. That has not changed. I know it hasn't changed. As far as what I was totally, before, maybe I was pushing it a little then. I'm not pushing things now. I know it. I know very well how to do it. The problem of how I want to play something – I know it in front. I know what I'm going to say, what I'm going to do. I don't have to work it out. The band I work with – they wouldn't be playing with me if they didn't play like I want them to. I have this song, Queen Jane Approximately -

E/E: Who is Queen Jane?

BD: Queen Jane is a man.

E/E: Was there something that made you decide to change sounds? Your trip to England?

BD: I like the sound. I like what I'm doing now. I would have done it before. It wasn't practical to do it before. I spent most of my time writing. I wouldn't have had the time. I had to get where I was going all alone. I don't know what I'm going to do next. I probably will record with strings sometime, but it doesn't necessarily change. It's just a different color. And I know that it's real. No matter what anybody says. They can boo till the end of time. I know that music is real, more real than the boos.

E/E: How do you work?

BD: Most of the time I work at night. I don't really like to think of it as work. I don't know how important it is. It's not important to the average cat who works eight hours a day. What does he care? The world can get along very well without it. I'm hip to that.

E/E: Sure, but the world can get along without any number of things.

BD: I'll give you a comparison. Rudy Valee. Now that was a lie, that was a downright lie. Rudy Valee being popular. What kind of people could have dug him? You know, your grandmothers and mothers. But what kind of people were they? He was so sexless. If you want to find out about those times and you listen to his music you're not going to find out anything about the times. His music was a pipe dream. All escapes. There are no more escapes. If you want to find out anything that's happening now, you have to listen to the music. I don't mean the words, although Eve Of Destruction will tell you something about it. The words are not really gonna tell it, not really. You gotta listen to the Staples Singers, Smokey and the Miracles, Martha and the Vandellas. That's scary to a lot of people. It's sex that's involved. It's not hidden. It's real. You can overdo it. It's not only sex, it's a whole beautiful feeling.

E/E: But Negro rhythm and blues has been around underground for at least twelve years. What brought it out now?

BD: The English did that. They brought it out. They hipped everybody. You read an interview asking who the favorite Beatle's singer was and they say Chuck Berry. You never used to hear Chuck Berry records on the radio, hard blues. The English did that. England is great and beautiful, though in other ways kinda messy. Though not outside London.

E/E: In what way messy?

BD: There's a snobbishness. What you see people doing to other people. It's not only class. It's not that simple. It's a kind of Queen kind of thing. Some people are royalty and some are not. Here, man, somebody don't like you he tells you. There it's very tight, tight kinds of expressions. Their whole tone of speaking changes. It's an everyday kind of thing. But the kids are a whole other thing. Great. They're just more free. I hope you don't think I take this too seriously – I just have a headache.

E/E: I think you started out to say that music was more in tune with what's happening than other art forms.

BD: Great paintings shouldn't be in museums. Have you ever been in a museum? Museums are cemeteries. Paintings should be on the walls of restaurants, in dime stores, in gas stations, in men's rooms. Great paintings should be where people hang out. The only thing where it's happening is on the radio and the records. That's where people hang out. You can't see great paintings. You pay half a million and hang one in your house and one guest sees it. That's not art. That's a shame, a crime. Music is the only thing that's in tune with what's happening. It's not in book form, it's not on the stage. All this art they've been talking about is non-existent. It just remains on the shelf. It doesn't make anyone happier. Just think how many people would really feel great if they could see a Picasso in their daily diner. It's not the bomb that has to go, man, it's the museums.

Note: In his More Rain Unravelled Tales, Heylin suggests that the above may actually have been from a mini press-conference held at Forest Hills. He also points out that in the Ribakove's Folk Rock: The Bob Dylan Story quotes which correspond to that interview are credited to a Susan Szekeley:

"We're not playing rock music," he told columnist Susan Szekeley. "It's not a hard sound. These people call it folk rock – if they want to call it that, something that simple, it's good for selling the records. I can't call it folk rock. I have a whole way of doing things that's been on every single record I've ever made, a certain feeling. That has not changed. I know it hasn't changed. And I know that it's real."

Ephron and Edmiston were reporters for the New York Post, but I have no record of this ever having been published in that newspaper, or any other.

He had, said a lady reporter, a quality of detachment. He was not, for example, as accessible as Frankie Laine. "I should hope not," said Dylan, "I started in a different way. I never sang for ballroom dances. What I do now, like I don't have to prove anything. I'm not a preacher or a traveling salesman. I do what I do. There was a time I cared if anyone understood, not anymore."

"I know what I write," he said, "And it makes sense to me. You can't tell me what it's supposed to mean, I know."

August/September 1965
David Moberg Interview

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 991-992.

Dylan gave this interview to David Moberg of Newsweek sometime between the Forest Hills show of August 28 and publication in Newsweek on September 20th 1965.

THE FOLK AND THE ROCK

A kind of common-law marriage of folk song with the electric beat of rock n' roll, folk-rock is sweeping the volatile weekly record listings. Billboards latest tabulation of the best sellers crowds six folk-rock discs into it's top ten.

The Patrick Henry of this revolution is 24 year old Bob Dylan, a bony, prophet-haired poet of protest. His leave-me-be lyrics and defiant delivery have provided the movement with a mood and a language. Folk- rock really ignited last March when Dylan's ballad of hip Weltschmerz, Mr. Tambourine Man, was given a big-beat rendition by a new rock quintet, the Byrds, and became an instant hit. Rock groups gone folk have been ransacking Dylan's material ever since. Forty-eight of his songs have been recorded within the past month. Even groups who don't sing his songs acknowledge his influence. 'He's a force on our music,' said one of the Lovin' Spoonful, 'just like The Star Spangled Banner -we've all heard it.'

At a recent concert at Forest Hills, N.Y., Dylan split his hip world apart when he appeared for the second half of the concert backed by an electronic organ, electronic bass, electronic guitar and drums. After each number, folk purists in the crowd cried, 'We want Dylan, we want Dylan,' summoning their old hero, the work-shirted, cloth-capped troubadour. But the rockers in the crowd, the partisans of the new sound, rushed small raiding parties to the base of the stage to bask in the glow of their idol. Dylan had turned folknik against rocknik.

To Newsweek reporter David Moberg's suggestion that there might be a new Bob Dylan, the singer retorted: 'How would you like it if somebody introduced you as the 'new' Dave Moberg?' Dylan understandably reacts with vehement negatives to the overeager labeling of the culture definers. 'I've never written a political song,' he said. 'Songs can't save the world. I've gone through all that. When you don't like something, you gotta learn to just not need that something.'

He is irritated by that bogey word, teen-ager: 'Teenagers? They all talk different languages. Name me a teenager. I have no recollection of being a teenager.' He has a non-attitude to his undefined enemies: 'They can crush you. They can kill you and lay you out on 42nd Street and put the hoses on you and flush you in the sewers. They can put you on a subway out to Coney Island and bury you on a Ferris Wheel. Who cares?' Asked if he was leading a real life, he snapped: 'If I'm leading somebody else's life, I'd like to know who the hell is leading mine.'

The conversion of Dylan the performer to folk-rock was instinctive. 'I had this thing called Subterranean Homesick Blues,' he explained. 'It just didn't sound right by myself. I tried the piano, the harpsichord. I tried it as blues. I tried it on the pipe organ, the kazoo. But it fit right in with the band. I haven't changed a bit. I just got tired of playing the guitar by myself.' As for his imitators, Dylan says: 'I like everybody.'

DYLAN DISOWNS HIS PROTEST SONGS
This article is reprinted, with permission, from the Long Island Press of 17 October 1965.

Now that he's on the charts where the best-sellers of the pop music world are listed, Bob Dylan disowns all the folk songs he wrote and the protest songs that made him famous. He won't sing them any more (hasn't for several months now) and he doesn't plan to write any in the future.

Dylan, until recently the adored king of folk music, no longer wears the dungarees and boots that became the uniform of the hip kids who imitated him. His halo of red-brown hair is about the only outward sign of the old Dylan. Inwardly he's calm and quite sure of his direction. "I'm not a voice of their generation," he said in an interview in his manager's Manhattan office. "How can I be? I'm not their generation."

He's doing now, says Bobby, exactly what he's always wanted to do: blues, rhythm songs and song-stories in poetry that are startlingly beautiful... and mostly unintelligible. He thinks of his best-loved songs such as 'Blowin' in the Wind' and 'With God on Our Side' as dead. "They're ghosts," he says.

When thousands of Long Island young people called for them at his recent, jammed concert in Forest Hills Stadium, Dylan "didn't hear that." He seems surprised on being told they called for those songs until they realized he had no intention of singing them.

Dylan does realize he was booed when he appeared for the second half of the concert with an electric guitar in his hands and a noisy jazz combo behind him. He remembers that thousands of youngsters chanted "We want Dylan" and "We want the real Dylan" when he launched into rock and roll. For those young people we have some sad news. Today's twenty-four-year-old rock and roll expert is the real Dylan. Bobby himself says so.

"I never wanted to write topical songs," he explains. "Have you heard my last two records, Bringing It All Back Home and Highway 61? It's all there. That's the real Dylan."

Why, then, did he ever write anti-war songs and songs inspired by and inspiring to the civil rights movement? "That was my chance," he says frankly. "In the Village there was a little publication called Broadside and with a topical song you could get in there. I wasn't getting far with the things I was doing, songs like I'm writing now, but Broadside gave me a start."

It also brought him the attention and friendship of Joan Baez, undisputed queen of folk music, and Pete Seeger, for many years a folk-singer and composer known in many nations. Joan Baez brought an almost unknown Dylan onstage two years ago at her own concert in the Forest Hills Music Festival. He wasn't an instant hit – his voice almost harsh where now it's rich and stirring. But his songs were loved by tens of thousands of young people who began to buy any record he made. Soon he was their idol. He created one song after another on themes from the movement that swept every campus in the US.

What most young people don't realize is that 'Blowin' in the Wind' made money... but not for Bobby. The trio who made the record got the lion's share. His income, right up to October of this year, was low enough to qualify him for an award from the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers. The ASCAP fund is for 'young artists of merit' whose work brings them insufficient income.

Where he was once proud to be the angry young man of the music world, Bobby now takes comfort in his popularity. He can fill concert halls three or four times a week. His albums sell enormously. His blues and rollicking tunes are high up on every chart. He's also on top in England where 'With God on Our Side' is bringing in ghostly money that banks accept. "I'm writing now for the people who share my feelings," he says earnestly. "The point is not understanding what I write but feeling it."

Of course, thinking, feeling or just plain listening, Dylan's blues are superb and his new singing style is ingratiating. His wayout poetry is full of brilliant images and marvelous color as well as sharp wit. Dylan thinks his newest work, 'Desolation Row,' is a more important piece of music than 'Blowin' in the Wind'. If you haven't heard the Desolation opus, it's a long, plaintively poetic piece about... chaos. In it Bobby writes of 'Einstein disguised as Robin Hood' and of Ophelia whose 'sin is her lifelessness' as well as of 'heart-attack machine... then the kerosene'. Fire and brimstone? Purgatory? Life itself is hell?

Where he's heading now is clear to Dylan and to his newest fans who are content with 'Like a Rolling Stone' and 'It Ain't Me, Babe'. His older fans still play his older albums. Some of his followers still love 'Blowin' in the Wind' and were happy to hear it played, only last week, as the finale in a Dylan salute by the Hullabaloo TV show.

His most devoted followers still hope Dylan will some day sing to them of reality, as he once did in clear, sharp tones and lyrics they can remember.

Pop Singers and Song Writers Racing Down Bob Dylan's Road
Musicians 'Sound' Inspires a Variety of Entertainers in 'Folk Rock' Idiom
By ROBERT SHELTON

If imitation is the sincerest form of flattery, then Bob Dylan must be one of the most flattered performers in American popular music today; The singer and song-writer, who will appear tomorrow night at the Forest Hills Music Festival in Queens, has fostered a trend that music circles call "the Dylan sound."

At least three groups and one individual who consciously style their singing after Mr. Dylan are listed high on popularity charts of recordings. Sonny and Cher, the Byrds, the Turtles and Donovan all have a strong Dylanesque quality in their recordings.

Many others, from the Beatles to Johnny Cash to the song-writing team of Barry Mann and Cynthia Weil, have publicly acknowledged their debt to Mr. Dylan. And John Lennon has even recorded a song in the Dylan mode.

In a telephone interview, Mr. Dylan, the often enigmatic folk performer, parried questions about his new imitators and the controversy over his fusion of folk music with rock 'n' roll, called "folk rock."

'Missing Something'

"It's all music; no more, no less," the 24-year-old musician, from Hibbing. Minn., said. "I know in my own mind what I'm doing. If anyone has imagination, he'll know what I'm doing. If they can't understand my songs they're missing something. If they can't understand green clocks, wet chairs, purple lamps or hostile statues, they're missings something, too."

Many pop-music insiders regard Mr. Dylan as the most influential American performer to emerge since the rise of Elvis Presley 10 years ago. Some think he is on the brink of superstardom.

Mr. Dylan is a wiry, sharp-featured, sunken-eyed youth who affects a somewhat bizarre image. His hair has grown so long since he became interested in "folk rock" that the Beatles look clean-cut by comparison. After leaving Hibbing, he studied briefly at the University of Minnesota but flunked out of the science class, he says, "for refusing to watch a rabbit die."

He went on the road, playing at a carnival and elsewhere, until he got off the subway in Greenwich Village in the spring of 1961.

Since Mr. Dylan was discovered at Gerde's Folk City in September of that year, he has evolved through several composing and performing approaches. Each time he has changed he has brought an increasingly larger segment of the pop and folk music world with him.

The tousle-haired musician, who has written more than 100 songs, expressed a driving need to create and perform new material. "I get very bored with my old songs," he said. "I can't sing 'With God on My Side' for 15 years. What I write is much more concise now than before. It's not deceiving."

When Mr. Dylan first appeared in New York he was strongly under the influence of Woody Guthrie, the Oklahoma ballad-maker. By the spring of 1963, with the popularity of his antidiscrimination protest, "Blowin' in the Wind," he became nationally known. His "Times They Are a' Changin'" was considered a credo for the discontented protesting collegians, for whom he became a spokesman.

Personal Expression

About a year ago he veered toward more personal expression with "Mr. Tambourine Man," a current hit. Last spring, he introduced "folk rock" with "Subterranean Homesick Blues", and the currently popular "Like a Rolling Stone."

Some of Mr. Dylan's lyrics are obviously "camp" fantasies, while others are poetically profound. Many are sufficiently; elliptical to spur squadrons of interpreters.

Mr. Dylan refused to explain this avant-garde direction. "I have no idea what I'll be doing at Forest Hills Saturday," he said. "I'll have some electricity [electrically amplified instruments] and a new song or a couple of three or four new songs. Time goes by very fast; up there onstage. I think of what not to do rather than what to do."

Hollywood Press Conference, Hollywood, California

This article by Tracy Thomas appeared in the New Musical Express of February 11, 1966. Whilst not wholly evident, it would seem that the following relates to the so-called Hollywood Press Conference of September 4th, 1965 which took place in a bungalow at the Beverley Hills Hotel in Los Angeles on the day following the Hollywood Bowl concert. According to Heylin (Stolen Moments) – Dylan arrives with Dave Crosby, a Columbia executive and a 'barefoot girl'. The conference lasts about an hour, Dylan again playing his 'word-games' – much to the bemusement of most of the journalists there.

'SILENT DYLAN TALKS AFTER ALL'
NME's TRACY THOMAS at a Hollywood Press reception

BRIGITTE BARDOT, Robert Goulet and Phil Spector. What have these three famous celebrities in common? All played a part in one of Bob Dylan's infrequent Press conferences in Hollywood recently!

The shapely French actress's name arose in the question: "Didn't you dedicate your first song to her?" Tousled-haired, sleepy-eyed, faint-voiced Dylan agreed and proceeded to crack up the hardened reporters with his answer to the follow-up: "Why?" "Why? Come on, you can see? Why! Think it out for yourself!"

Though a local television commentator tried his best to make today's king of folk n' roll say that Barry McGuire is a protest singer, Dylan did not succumb, insisting that McGuire is a mixture of country-and-western and modern-day minstrel.

"I think a protest singer is one who sings against his will like Robert Goulet or Eydie Gorme."

Spector proved to be one of his favorite A&R men, though he admitted: "I've only heard of a few."

Meanwhile another reporter attempted to force the undernourished-looking singer into confessing that he and many other performers use drugs. But to no avail.

"I wouldn't know one if I saw one. Why, do you use 'em?" he cracked with a smile

Most of the press obviously expected obscure wisecracks from a sullen, sarcastic, rebellious youth. Instead, Dylan began the conference with mumbled, incoherent answers, but soon warmed to his audience, laughing and joking, but giving wild answers to poor or obvious questions, in excellent dead-pan fashion.

Perhaps the best example was his comments about movie plans. Speaking out of the top of his head an innocent Dylan elaborated: "Yes, we're making one. I'll play my mother in it. I guess we'll call it Mother Revisited. I'm quite excited about it." This last bit was dragged out in a lazy, completely bored tone.

And again, when quizzed on why he was in California, folk music's boy-wonder replied in a manner rivaling the famous Liverpool straight-faced send-uppers: "To find some donkeys.

We're shooting this film about the life of Christ back in New York and we need several donkeys. Also I'm doing a few concerts."

His serious and thoughtful side came to the fore when discussing his followers. "I was amazed when I heard a taped interview with a 15-year-old girl, who was waiting to get into one of my concerts. She said how she digs William Blake and a bunch of others that no one else has read.

"She was really hip and more free in mind than most of these 22-year-old college kids."

About letters from fans – "Some of them actually understand. I like to read them."

Politics and political singers crept into the questioning, but Dylan adamantly denied any political connections. "I'm too busy for that. It's fine for those who want to mix the two fields, but it's not for me."

However, he couldn't let the subject pass without a laugh. When asked about his participation in anti-Vietnam movements, be protested: "I don't participate in anything. I defy you to name one thing I participated in. Name one!"

The conference ended with the all in-black-clad Dylan remaining in his seat several minutes to oblige the photographers. With a wave and a smile, one of the most influential and controversial musical figures of our time concluded a rare 45 minutes of answering a wide assortment of questions, leaving the impression that, if not the boy-genius-next-door, he is at least a lot more human than we're led to believe.

24 September 1965
Austin Press Conference, Austin, Texas

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 801-802.

This following was taken initially from Pickering's Bob Dylan Approximately: A Portrait of the Jewish Poet in Search of God. It was then compared with the version in McGregor's Bob Dylan: The Early Years – A Retrospective. Both versions are basically identical. Pickering and McGregor regard this session as an interview with an unnamed journalist with no record of where the article was published. Pickering gives a date of September 22nd whilst McGregor does not provide a date. If this session took place in Austin then it must have been either September 23rd or 24th. In Stolen Moments, Heylin states that Dylan held a press conference prior to his Austin concert and this seems to be where the following was taken from. Heylin's assertion that the following represents a transcript of a 'lost' Austin press conference appeared earlier in his More Rain Unravelled Tales.

The Austin show was, incidentally, the first concert where Dylan was backed by Levon and The Hawks.

JJ= Journalist or journalists.

JJ: What do you consider yourself? How do you classify yourself?

BD: Well, I like to think of myself in terms of a trapeze artist.

JJ: Speaking of trapeze artists, I've noticed in some of your recent albums a carnival-type sound. Could you tell me a little about that?

BD: That isn't a carnival sound, that's religious. That's very real; you can see that anywhere.

JJ: What about Ballad Of A Thin Man? This sounds as though it might have been dedicated to a newspaper reporter or something.

BD: No, it's just about a fellow that came into a truck-stop once.

JJ: Have the Beatles had any influence on your work?

BD: Well, they haven't influenced the songs or sound. I don't know what other kind of influence they might have. They haven't influenced the songs or the sound.

JJ: In an article in the New Yorker, written by Nat Hentoff, I believe, you said you sang what you felt and you sang to make yourself feel good, more or less. And it was implied that in your first two albums you sang "finger-pointing songs", I believe.

BD: Well, what he was saying was, I mean, I wasn't playing then and it was still sort of a small nucleus at that time and by the definition of why do you sing, I sing for the people. He was saying, "Why do you sing?", and I couldn't think of an answer except that I felt like singing. That's about all.

JJ: Why is it different?

BD: Come on, come on.

JJ: What is your attitude toward your "finger-pointing" songs? He implied that you thought they were just superficial.

BD: No, it's not superficial, it's just motivated. Motivated: uncontrollable motivation. Which anyone can do, once they get uncontrollably motivated.

JJ: You said before that you sang because you had to. Why do you sing now?

BD: Because I have to.

JJ: Your voice in here is soft and gentle. Yet in some of your records, there's a harsh twang.

BD: I just got up.

JJ: Could you give me some sort of evaluation as far as your own taste is concerned, comparing some of the things you like, old music, say, Girl From The North Country, which I consider a very beautiful type ballad? Perhaps some of the things that have come out in the last couple of albums – do you get the same satisfaction out of doing this?

BD: Yeah, I do, I wish I could write like Girl From The North Country. You know, I can't write like that any more.

JJ: Why is that?

BD: I don't know.

JJ: Are you trying to accomplish anything?

BD: Am I trying to accomplish anything?

JJ: Are you trying to change the world or anything?

BD: Am I trying to change the world? Is that your question?

JJ: Well, do you have any idealism or anything?

BD: Am I trying to change the idealism of the world or anything? Is that it?

JJ: Well, are you trying to push over idealism to the people?

BD: Well, what do you think my ideas are?

JJ: Well, I don't exactly know. But are you singing just to be singing?

BD: No, I'm not just singing to be singing. There's a much deeper reason for it than that.

JJ: In a lot of the songs you sing you seem to express a pessimistic attitude toward life. It seems that Hollis Brown gives me that feeling. Is this your true feeling or are you just trying to shock people?

BD: That's not pessimistic form, that's just statement. You know, it's not pessimistic.

JJ: Who are your favorite performers? I don't mean folk, I mean general.

BD: Rasputin. Hm-m-m... Charles de Gaulle. The Staple Singers. I sort of have a general attitude about that. I like just about everybody everybody else likes.

JJ: You said just a minute ago you were preparing to go to classical music. Could you tell me a little about that?

BD: Well, I was going to be in the classical music field, and I imagine it's going right along. I'll get there one of these records.

JJ: Are you using the word classical perhaps a little differently than we are?

BD: A little bit, maybe. Just a hair.

JJ: Could you explain that?

BD: Well, I'm using it in the general sense of the word, thumbing a hair out.

JJ: Any attention to form?

BD: Form and matter. Mathematics?

JJ: What is your belief in God? Are you a Christian?

BD: Well, first of all, God is a woman. We all know that. Well, you take it from there.

October to Early November 1965
Mary Merrifield Interview

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 587-588.

A brief interview conducted by Mary Merrifield (MM) for the Chicago Tribune in which it appeared on November 21st 1965 under the heading "Young People Here And Abroad Are Listening To What Bob Dylan Says". Heylin (Stolen Moments) dates this interview as occurring October to early November 1965 but cautions that "it is possible that this interview dates from considerably earlier given it's content".
A tape of the interview is supposedly in existence, but I have not been able to locate one.

Students, young rebels, and a new crop of message singers are imitating America's Bob Dylan in Paris and throughout England with lyrics not nearly so meaningful as his, but with an enthusiasm that has been growing slowly since Dylan's first album of folk songs in late 1960. On my recent trip to Europe, I heard Dylan's name mentioned in every youth group I interviewed, and I also read discussions of his work in the newspapers overseas. In this exclusive, taped interview with 24-year-old Dylan, I think that Dylan's message will be understood by youth and that parents will find clues to the younger generation's thinking.

MM: In one part of your song, The Times They Are A-Changin', you talk of adults not understanding young people today. Why?

BD: I can't really say that adults don't understand young people anymore than you can say big fishes don't understand little fishes. I didn't mean it as a statement, truth, or anything like that. It's a feeling – you know – just a feeling.

MM: Your lyrics always have substance, an idea, as well as imagery. Have you always been writing?

BD: Yes, for a long, long time. But I really can't talk about what I do. You know, as a third person. I find it very hard and get all twisted up about it and say what isn't really right. I really don't have any idea why I even write these things, you know.

MM: Are you more interested in youth or ideas?

BD: I'm interested in what's happening. I'm interested in what's really happening. And I know there are no answers. If a question can't be answered by a question then I know it really can't be answered. You know, if it can't be answered by just asking it, then I would think that it's not a valid question... .

MM: But you feel involved with people.

BD: People, yeah. I get involved when I see people. I can't fight any people. When people, individual people, fight, they're fighting for such phony reasons most of the time – all the time you could really say, I guess. You take the guy that has to work at the gas station eight hours a day, while the world is going on. Probably he is going to blow up some time, you know. I don't want to fight him. I've got no quarrel with him. you know. I'd just as soon make him laugh. I'd just as soon be with him, talk with him about his gas station, you know, this sort of thing. But then I've got to go. I can't stay at a gas station – and you know, he's got to stay there.

MM: Do you think your songs may be a vent for him and thru your songs he can identify with the blues of others?

BD: I don't know. All I know is that I can get along with him. I can get along with him only because I dig him. I've got nothing against him. I've got no prejudice against him. I haven't read any books about him. I haven't seen any movies about him. When I see him or meet him, you know, I can just be with him, talk to him.

MM: Is there anybody you can't get along with?

BD: No – no, there really isn't. The people I can't get along with can't get along with me - not because of me, for I want to get along with them. It's because they're so in knots. They're so tied up that it's actually impossible to them to be with me unless they're going to be untied. And to untie them, they'd have to lose all they have – and I wouldn't want that either. I'd just rather leave – myself. I would rather leave because I wouldn't be there to stay anyway.

MM: I heard a minister use verses from your Blowin' In The Wind for a baccalaureate address. He said you are doing more good than many ministers – that you are asking key questions. That you're awakening people's conscience.

BD: I feel I haven't any special message for any special people. I have none for really anybody unless they're ready to hear it. I feel sad when I think about people – you know, people who really are slaves to their jobs. I can't say, "Get on your feet and do something." I can't. I don't see how anybody can. You can't tell somebody's been living for 40, 50 years he's been living a lie, you know, so change. You can't do that. This has to be an understanding that you both know, and that's the best you can do-I think. And try to make the newborn better off, Without any hostility, you know.

MM: Do you think that there's sort of a new religion today?

BD: Yeah – well, maybe phoniness is going out of religion and that's good. There's the phoniness of 'go to church on Sunday and everything is cool.' You know, it's not right. The phoniness of telling somebody they're different from you because they're a different religion. That's not right. No matter which way it comes, a new religion could come in the church, in school, dime store. A lot of people were raised, you know, raised strictly in religious ways and they now have to have a certain amount of freedom, I would think, in their ideas. You know, not just think that they're right. There's a lot of different gods. You know, so long as somebody doesn't think that my god is the only god. As long as he doesn't think that 'I'm right. I'm right because my preacher told me I was right, ' then it's O.K., I would think. Why I've known old people – farmers – that just walk along in the fields and never go to church in their whole lives, and they're more religious than people who go to church and give to charities and everything.

MM: Are you saying you have faith in people?

BD: I have faith in the world, you know, in the world – anything that breathes. If it breathes, it's gotta be good. It's got to be righteous. It's gotta be alive – and I don't think it wants to be bowed down to.

Autumn 1965
Nat Hentoff (The Playboy) Interview
The Original Unpublished Version, New York City, New York

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 319-358.

There are two versions of this interview, the original version which you'll find on tape and the published version which appeared in Playboy in March 1966. To call them versions ignores the fact that they are totally different interviews. The published version has been presented already in Volume 1 (pages 65-80) and background notes and general information can be found there. For starters, I've compared the 1984 Alan Williams transcript and the circulating tape. The Williams version is an extremely accurate account and it's formed the backbone of my transcript.

NH: For years, the conventional, intellectual position, as well as the so-called sophisticated position, has been that popular music in this country was declining because... things like rhythm and blues and rock n' roll and the like were mechanical and decadent and were the kind of thing that adults manufactured for the kids... that the kids didn't really have any say in it. What's your view about this? In other words, what is the kind of popular music that moves you? And where does it come from?

BD: That I just like to listen to?

NH: Yeah, listen to and also increasingly as... you know, in terms of what people call 'folk-rock', the way you're broadening your bases in a way.

BD: Well, whatever this 'folk-rock' is you know, I don't really listen to it that much, you know. I listen more in terms of... in terms of sound, which, you know, a few years ago, when there wasn't such a big folk or folk-rock or whatever have you, when there wasn't really hardly much of anything. When there wasn't people talking about music so much, just because there, you know, wasn't any kind of sound really. Whereas the sound could be, you know, transformed in a lot of things, a lot of ways you can get your sound. You can get your sound with words, you can get a sound with just plain, bare sound.

NH: What about rhythm and blues and rock? Well, rhythm and blues particularly? What do you find in it of value? In other words, it's been put down as...

BD: Well, I'm really no authority, you know. I just listen to it, that's about all. I don't listen to hard, straight rhythm and blues in terms of the Del Satins or the Emotions, those kind of people that recorded a long time ago... just the four chord thing. I mean, it's advanced pretty much farther than that now and that seems kinda... old... you know.

NH: Yeah.

BD: Now the rhythm and blues which would be much more contrived kind of chords, and different sounding things.

(Aside to studio technician (ST))

NH: You know I still don't think we're getting anything on it.

ST: Yes you are.

NH: Yeah?

ST: Wanna check it?

NH: Just for a...

ST: OK.

NH: Alright.

(And back to the interview.)

NH: Well, what about the people who still say, you know, that there aren't any good songs anymore, like Cole Porter or Jerome King, you know, and they...

BD: Well, they're, you know, they're just looking for that kind, er, that kind of music. They're probably right, you know. If they think, you know, there are no more good songs like the ones Cole Porter wrote and George Gershwin, I guess they are right, you know...

NH: But what is the music that's popular now... and it's increasingly by people who come out of the rhythm and blues scene... what is that music saying to the younger generation? 'Cause I've never seen anything quite like the kind of response there's been...

BD: The music that's being played now?

NH: Yeah, you know...

BD: I really don't know. I really have no idea. I know one thing, that everybody around a cert... the certain age I'm at now... that's about twenty four... everybody around 24, 25, 26, 23, no matter what they were doing in the past, you know, years, I mean, I know, has been... was turned on to rock n' roll a long time ago, you know. I mean it's just... it's just something everybody's tried to hide for a long time, you know.

NH: Yeah.

BD: Uh...

NH: What was there in the rock n' roll that really moved people your age?

BD: Well, it was just that, you know... rock n' roll, or country and western music, which is just a total kind of feeling, which is not the same as, you know, watching TV, or being taught anything in school, or being... it was just a total other kind of form of sound, and which puts your head in a different place. It, you know... the reason it died out is because there was no way to make it any more.

NH: Mm.

BD: Like, you had to have friends to play it with you, you know. You had to have money to buy electricity. You had to, you know, to keep a band, which costs money and that's all very hard.

NH: Yeah. While it was going, do you think it's accurate to say the music – that kind of music -also had more emotion, more direct feeling, than most of the other which was around?

BD: Oh sure. Oh sure, it still does, you know. That's, you know... it still does. You just can't take that away from it, you know. That's why most people... you can just about pinpoint the people that don't like it. You can just about, usually, walk down the street and you see and know who wouldn't like it. I mean it's a... if they wouldn't like that, they wouldn't like the people that play it probably, you know, and it's got to do with more than just... it's got to do with a lot of things, really which overlap.

NH: You say you can pinpoint the people that don't like it... like how? You mean the way they walk, the way they hold themselves?

BD: Oh sure. The way they light a cigarette. You can tell...

NH: Yeah.

BD: ...what they're like.

NH: You mean inhibited, uh?

BD: Inhibited... really it's a whole other thing. Something which I don't think's ever gonna be brought across to anybody. I mean because deep down, you know, people either who... most people do like it. I mean, they have to like it. A lot of people are, you know... It just represents something that a lot of people don't want to even think about probably; that's why they raise such a commotion. But it... when you think about it really, it comes down to everybody just putting themselves on really. Because if they didn't like it, you know, they'd... the people that... they have to let their kids do something. We're speaking now of people who go to school and high school and buy all the records, you know.

NH: Mm.

BD: They have to let them do something because they really... don't really give them too much of anything else. So they let them buy records, you know. They don't really know what they're listening to, but now, I guess that they're finding out what they're listening to. You know, they could easily just extinguish the whole thing by cutting out their allowances. Then there'd be no more records out.

NH: When you say they're not given much of anything else, you mean, much of a feeling of, what do you call it? Interpersonal...

BD: Well, well, I mean, who treats... who treats their kids like they treat their friends? You know?

NH: Yeah, yeah, that say's it. Who are some of the people in the country and western, the rhythm and blues fields. I don't mean influences now, but people that you just enjoy listening to especially?

BD: Well, I don't like to listen to too much country and western people. I like to listen to some of their songs...

NH: Yeah.

BD: ...that they sing. But I get, oh, monotonized by listening to too many. I like Buck Owens' songs, he's alright. And Hank Williams and Joe Williams. There all the time, easily, you can make some sort of sound.

NH: Mm.

BD: But the other people are just the songs they sing. I think.

NH: How about in the rhythm and blues and rock n' roll fields? Who do you especially, you know... who strikes you especially?

BD: Oh, you mean just name a name?

NH: Sure, just, you know, if you're... almost like free association... if you're thinking in terms of just pleasure in listening, who would you think of?

BD: I'd listen to all the Motown records. I listen to Wilson Pickett. Otis Redding, I guess. Charlie Rich.

NH: Yeah. How about Chuck Berry who... seems to be rediscovered by a lot of people?

BD: Well, he's OK. I like Chuck Berry.

NH: This goes back to something you started to say before, and it's about the generation gap. I've seen it among some of the kids who work in SNCC and Students For Democratic Society, you know, where you can't trust anybody over thirty... uh...

BD: That's not really true. That's just a fallacy. I think that's the right word – fallacy.

NH: Yeah.

BD: You know, I mean, it's... it's ridiculous.

NH: How much of that gap, though, does exist? This feeling that the older generation just isn't with it?

BD: I don't know many of these people. I never really have. That was just a thing from the newspapers. Newspapers seemed to say that nobody liked anybody over thirty, and the people that read it believed it. But I don't know if that's true. I don't really... you know, I never said I don't wanna talk about anybody over thirty, 'cause I'm almost thirty myself.

NH: So you wouldn't go with the thesis that all adults are almost square by definition because they're... they are over a certain age?

BD: No, no I wouldn't... I don't... it doesn't matter... I have no prejudices on age.

NH: Yeah. Communication depends on two people, right? Essentially?

BD: Well. If you think there's such a thing as communication.

NH: Yeah. You were saying you're almost uh... well, you're about six years from thirty, are you at all concerned about somehow not becoming insulated rather? Being not as open as you are now, you know, if...

BD: No. I have no fears about that. No. You know, everything will still be the same. It's too late to change anything like that. But I'm certainly not gonna cop out, though, and become any kind of... schoolteacher. I mean, out in Vermont, you know, living in an old cottage, teaching English once a week. Reading poetry to, uh, girls or something. I'm not gonna do anything like that.

NH: Yeah. So far as you look ahead, if you do, do you intend to pretty much stay in what you're doing now?

BD: Yeah. It'll be taken to some other degrees... making a movie some time – wanna do that. I've a book coming out but it just... I mean, It's very average to me, you know. I can't really be excited about it. I've worked on it kind of hard at certain times. But now it's all done... now it means very little.

NH: Is that the one that Macmillan's putting out?

BD: Yeah.

NH: What's it all about? Los Angeles, or...

BD: No. It's not about anything. It's just a... a book of, uh, words.

NH: What's the movie gonna be like?

BD: Well, the movie'll be like a song really. Uh, it's not gonna... there won't be any kind of "Well, this is the first movie, here, and we have to, uh, set an example for the rest of the movies". It's just gonna be like a song. It's gonna be a straight movie and, uh,. maybe a horror movie or something. Something very natural.

NH: Are you gonna write it?

BD: I'll write some of it, yeah.

NH: And who's gonna produce it, or put it together?

BD: That's not decided yet.

NH: Yeah. Um... once, when we were talking, you were saying that you have no particular feeling of support for groups like the NAACP, 'cause they're too middle class, too slow. What civil rights groups are you that interested in?

BD: I'm not really interested in any of them, to tell the truth. Uh... I used to know some of the people in SNCC, that's about 1960, you know, and I've lost all contact. Evidently there was something wrong someplace, or else, you know... I would've been president of SNCC right now.

NH: (Laughs).

BD: But, I don't know... I can't go along with all this. I mean, it's just a laughing matter, as anybody that's... you know, I mean, a lot of people take all that very seriously, like Leroi Jones... you know, this kind of stuff, but...

NH: Yeah.

BD: It's sort of... it's kinda funny, because, if you think about it, because even Leroi Jones is gonna die you know. I mean, whoever Leroi Jones is! I just saw him on television once.

NH: Oh yeah. So your feeling is that these social movements, or whatever tend to get kind of exaggerated in importance?

BD: Well, not exaggerated in importance. Of course people are starving, you know, people are... lot of people are in bad trouble. But, obviously, there you make your own choice, you know, and you go through with it. Or you don't fuck around, you know, in other peoples lives. You know. I've got my own life that... and I try my best to handle that, you know. To try to handle somebody else's life you really have to, you know, to be a very powerful person, you know.

NH: Yeah.

BD: You have to sort of have... well, you've got a lot of responsibility on your hands. And the more peoples lives you're, you know... you're responsible for, the bigger the weight is.

NH: Hm.

BD: Look at President Johnson. Look at him. He doesn't seem like a very normal fellow to me. And you can understand why.

NH: Not very normal in what ways?

BD: Well, you take a look at him. I mean, you can just see a picture of him and you can see that he's a little... uh... he's a little worried about something.

NH: Yeah. What about... well, like Joan, for example, has for a long time been involved in things like Vietnam and peace demonstrations and the like. Do you have any particular interest in that?

BD: Well, you know, it might sound very funny but... you know, like... I can only talk about it in terms of me, you know.

NH: Sure.

BD: It's like... It's like, if I was... if somebody told me right now, "You're gonna have to die in an hour" you know, there would really be nothing that I'd have to clean up, you know. No unfinished business, no, you know... I could very easily accept it. I mean, that would be the way it's gonna be, you know. Like it's... I don't really know... you know... like who's gonna be better for all the... I mean, I don't know how long these people wanna live, you know. I don't know if they're looking for eternity, or looking to be moralised, or, you know, whatever have you, or why they do these things, you know. I mean, I...

NH: People who get involved in the peace things, you mean?

BD: Well no, not those especially. I'm talking about people that aren't really... not really completely straight, you know. People that are afraid of something, but act as if maybe they're not. And, uh... you know, I think that's fine, that there are peace demonstrations and all this kind of thing, you know. It's just a little more complicated in my mind. I know what it is in a feeling, but in order to put that feeling into words, I really can't do it too good. And if I'd even attempt it, I know it wouldn't come out the right way, and I...

NH: Yes.

BD: And then, all in all, I know if... even if I did, it wouldn't matter anyway to anybody, because... so that it... I mean, I think what Joan Baez is doing is just marvelous. But, uh...

NH: It's not your way.

BD: It's just not... it's just... I mean, I think that's just wonderful, but, you know... if there's... if she ever needed my help for anything, God willing, I wish she'd come and ask. But...

NH: But you're not going to go out looking for demonstrations or things like that.

BD: No, I've done most of that, you know. I went through that too. And, uh... it, you know, it definitely has to be done.

NH: Yeah.

BD: But, uh, y'know, everybody talks about... you know, I mean, just the names that strike familiar chords, you know, like Jesus Christ, you know... like with all the good He did, you could say. But what good, where, you know, for who, or how, or when, you know. And then, look what they did to Him. (Inaudible) And everybody's talking about Him, y'know. But how does anybody know the way He really felt, you know? It certainly has been such a long time ago that I think it's just about impossible to even find out anything about Him. It's just been so... you know, people have written so much that... I don't know. You just have to believe, you know.

NH: Yeah.

BD: That's a dangerous business there, just believing. 'Cause there you're sacrificing a whole lot.

NH: So that for you, the thing is to live your own life as best you can and stay as straight as you can?

BD: Yeah, stay, you know, just, uh, I guess so, in terms of just words, you know, just... just words. But it's like, one time I wanted to write a novel, you know, and so I was putting a lot of time in. It must have been about six months, off and on. Trying to put this novel together, but I knew, you know... and finally I just come to the conclusion, like: OK, you know, so I got this novel put together. You know, like – is this gonna be the novel, the statement, you know? Is this my message? My thing? And no matter how many... I had about a thousand, you know, not a thousand, about five hundred pages of it. I said:

No, you know, of course not. That's bullshit. You know. This is nothing. If I finish this novel, I'm just gonna have to write another one. If I finish this novel, it's not gonna come out until at least a year and a half to two years, before, you know... before, you know... now. It's gonna be a completely different thing by the time it does come out, and by the time it does come out everybody's gonna say how great it is, or else they're gonna put it down. Meantime, I'm not even gonna be there anymore. And I'm gonna... it won't even be me that wrote that novel. And from then on I have to live up to that novel, you know, and to be writing another novel. People are gonna ask me what I'm doing... I'm gonna have to say I'm writing another novel. You know. It's like... it's just that... and when you even get it done, all it does is that it helps you to get to parties. You go to more parties and, you know, sign autographs and give away free copies of the book; and, you know, you can have a ball for a couple of weeks. But I went through all that with records, you know, and things, and it's not the same thing. Every time I write a song, it's like writing a novel. Just takes me a lot less time, you know and I can get it down, you know... down to where, you know, I can reread it in my head a lot. And believe me, you know, they're not... the songs that I've written are just not... you know, that's what they are to me, 'cause, you know, I can't stand on any of them, I mean, like. They're just, uh, songs.

NH: You don't feel then as if you have to compete with yourself every time you write another one?

BD: No, no. I don't. I somewhat... Do, in a very funny way. But I don't really, once I can get in the movement of what I wanna do. If the music comes very natural. But, uh, it's not really a competition thing.

NH: Getting back for a minute to the opposite of Joan, a lot of the things you hear now from, let's say, from the American Legion with Johnson is – how come these kids don't realize that they'd be, how does it go, they'd... do they... are they saying they'd rather be red than dead? Or d'you know that? How that little thing goes? How do you feel about that kind of slogan?

BD: Rather be red than dead?

NH: Yeah. In other words, you've got like this so-called...

BD: I don't really go for slogans in any kind of way, but, you know, I mean, I'm sure... you say that's a slogan there. I'm sure there's another slogan that says I'd rather be dead than red, which I wouldn't go for that slogan either, you know. Slogans are just, you know, a misusage of time really, 'cause there's nobody gonna help out the world any, you know. There just is nobody. I mean, you know, you just take a look out on the street, if you think things change. And you can open up that curtain, this whole room would be different, you know. There's too many people, you know... that, uh, have things to do.

NH: Are you ever bothered by things like the Dominican Republic and Vietnam, in the sense that the whole thing may blow up?

BD: Yeah, well, I'm sure it might, you know, but it's gonna happen probably, you know, and when it happens, the most I can say is that it wasn't me.. But that's, you know, that's about all, I mean, I don't want... I certainly don't want to be walking around in any kind of, you know, any kind of nuclear thing. Or any kind of, like, growing six inches on my elbow, uh, you know... magnetized a thousand times and, you know, six legs and anything like that. Man, I don't want to be caught in that position. I would have to get somebody to... I would have to have a good friend along, you know, to get me out of that. But, uh... I don't know.

NH: Let me try a fantasy for a minute. Suppose you were, somehow, in a position like Johnson and you had a deal with, let's say, the Chinese communists. What would you do?

BD: Well, first of all, I can only talk in terms of "if". I mean, I'll answer your question just as if it's like a fantasy, but...

NH: Yeah.

BD: But I'm not gonna... I'm not gonna think that, you know, first of all... you mean, if I was President Johnson right now?

NH: Uh, let's say if you were President.

BD: If I was President?

NH: Yeah.

BD: Well, let's see. If I was President, first thing I'd do, I'd have all my friends in the White House, right away. I'd completely revise the whole White House so everybody that works there would just look a whole other way... everybody would just have to wear high-collared shirts. There would have to be a section where everybody wore flowers on their tie. And there... there would be a whole different set of heroes right away.

NH: Like who?

BD: Well, like... I think... instead of talking with Martin Luther King about anything I would have to talk to, uh, Roebuck Staples, you know, who would be a spokesman for the, uh, you know... for that. And have all, you know... just all... the whole place just redecorated completely, with swings and, uh, teeter totters...

NH: Yeah

BD: And for the first week we'd just have a party to get straight, you know. And there would... I'd probably send for Mao, tell him to come over and see what we were like.

NH: What else would you do, like in foreign policy?

BD: Foreign policy?

NH: Mm. So you figure then, like, that if he saw what we were like, then things could be a little less dissonant?

BD: Mm. I don't know, you know. I don't even know what he's like to begin with. I would... well, you know, you see those pictures of all those guests, all the chicks are carrying guns and uh... you know, I know, that he probably likes his women to be tough, you know. Urn. He would probably come over here and be flabbergasted, you know. Have to have some tough women waiting for him, you know, in the lobbies. I'd fix it up nice for him, you know, if he came over, no doubt about that.

NH: What did you think of the Free Speech Movement and all that, at the University of California, and the way that sort of thing is spreading to a lot of other colleges? Is that a good sign? Or does it mean anything?

BD: Well, it's college, you know. It's... that's nice, you know, that really is very nice... that they do that at college. Uh, but it's... well, what exactly does it do, though? I mean, for other people that don't go to college?

NH: Mm.

BD: You know, I think it's tremendous that they would have enough courage to do what they did. But I, you know, I don't really know too much about it. I have all those things that they're... I can't possibly imagine anybody, you know, wanting what they were wanting, that's all.

NH: What do you mean?

BD: Well, I guess they were wanting to picket, or wanting to have free speech.

NH: Yeah.

BD: Well, I have free speech, you know... I... I don't have those problems that they have, you know, like, they've... I don't have... I don't really have to put up with any teachers, you know, or I don't have to have any degree. I don't have to take any tests. I don't have to sort any kind of philosophies out in my mind. I don't have to memorize anything, you know. I don't have, you know, to look like the next person. I don't have to, uh... I just don't have these problems. I don't have...

NH: You don't have to join a Free Speech movement.

BD: Well I don't really have anybody that's supporting me, you know... so I don't have to rebel against this, you know?

NH: Do you ever have any... uh, not regrets, but, let's say curiosity about college, about going yourself?

BD: That would be silly, wouldn't it? I have no regrets about it... I've played at some, you know, but I didn't really get out to see too much of... y'know, it's a nice place to be. Their colleges are really nice, you know, they're certainly a lot quieter than the city. The ones out in the country are fantastic... just like, you know, like old-age homes... you know, they're nice. I would like to go to one, just to relax once in a while, you know, but... just to sit on the banks of some river, most of them are on rivers, you know. Just do that. But I can't imagine going to any classes, or reading any books that they would give me. I imagine I'd start up a few friendships with some of the people around, but that's, you know...

NH: You just pick up on what interests you in terms of books or anything else, I take it?

BD: Yeah, yeah, I do. I don't really read that much, and when I do read anything, it must be small. But I don't know... I go see movies once in a while, I guess... stuff like that.

NH: I remember you're reluctant to give advice to anybody else, but do you think some of the people either in college or about to go might think awhile about whether they ought to go? You know, judg... looking at yourself, for example, not as a model, but as...

BD: Well, things were different, you know, when I didn't go to college, you know. Things really were much different then than they are now, you know, like. Then... there was a group of people, sort of, that were just bumming around the country, you know, and I was one of them, you know. But things are... seemed to be different than they are now. Like, I can't imagine, you know, bumming around the country now with any of those people that are bumming around the country now, like...

NH: What's the difference?

BD: Well, see, in those... back then, to make it, you know, was just out of the question, you know. It was more or less a thing of, you know, from here to there, and that's what it was. It was groovy, you know. And it seemed a lot of people were groovy then. But now you can still see people that are still doing it, and they're just totally whacked out. Like, they're still there, they're doing it, but they're all... twisted up and they don't wanna... get the feeling they don't wanna do it any more. And even the... well, you know, you can take that whole... the Beat generation thing. I just read a little bit of that kind of stuff and... you know, like, what stuff really was there, except for Allen Ginsberg, you know. Or, you know... that's just about all I can think about. I can't really think of any of these other people that did their thing. I mean that...

NH: You mean, the ones who are doing it now, don't even get any... don't seem to get any kicks out of it.

BD: Well it is a kick, you know.

NH: Yeah.

BD: Like, you do it... you do things for a kick, you know. That's why you really do things. You do things for a kick. I mean, you don't wanna do anything you don't wanna do, you know. The hang-up comes in, is when, most people, they get involved in something, they get detached, you know, and sooner or later they come to the conclusion that they're not getting any kicks any more, and then they see other people getting kicks. Well that's fine, you know, like that, I guess, just happens. But the problem comes in, is when you wanna stop other people from getting kicks, you know, just because, you know, it hangs you up, you know. Like, it drives you farther into suicide, you know. But I can, you know... I don't get too many kicks anymore nowadays, you know, once in a while I do. But I certainly don't wanna stop anybody else from getting 'em.

NH: That's like...

Break in recording

BD: It's funny to hear these people talking "The next thing's gonna be country rock, you know."

NH: Yeah.

BD: Country rock was Elvis Presley. Just tired Elvis Presley, you know. I mean, how can you say the next big thing's gonna be country rock? You listen to Elvis Presley's first records. I mean, if you have a better name for them, you know... there isn't a better name. All this has been done before. It's just, you know, like another... another time going over, only with different times.

NH: Yeah. Did you like those first Presley records when you came out?

BD: Oh sure. We liked those, yeah. I just didn't like them any more after Teddy Bear and stuff like that.

NH: Yeah.

BD: But I got all his early records. All... all of 'em.

NH: You were saying that you don't get as many kicks now as you used to. Why is that, do you figure? The fame, or what?

BD: Well, the kicks, you know... like, uh... I've done everything that I really wanna do, you know. Like now, I mean, 'cause I don't get any kick out of... you know, like the first time, you say, I was in Rome, I saw... I was standing there and digging that, you know, whaddya call it? Big stadium...

NH: Coliseum.

BD: ...Coliseum, yeah, you know, it was a kick, you know. Just being... just the whole thing, you know. The whole feeling of being around there and whatever happened, whatever else happened. The second time I was there, you know, it just distracted me, you know. Like this Coliseum and how beautiful it was – it was distracting, you know. I can... and then something else – Portugal, man. All this beauty. It was just very distracting, you know. It just, uh...

NH: Do you ever get tired of Big Sur? Do you find that distracting?

BD: I never spent that much time out there, but I did find it a little distracting, yes.

NH: Yeah. Well. You were saying you've done just about everything you wanted to, and yet you're twenty four. What have you got to look forward to?

BD: Well, I don't know. I'd... think about it. I might start me a bubble gum factory or something. Different kinds of cartoons inside, you know.

NH: So you haven't... you haven't lost the expectation that there may be more kicks ahead?

BD: Oh no, nothing like that. Well, it's like... it's not like I can go any place now, you know and something is usually bound to happen. You know, you take your chances, you know. But now I can't really go any place, you know. And even now, when I go any place, it's not where, you know... it's more of a chance anything's gonna happen, because it's a little different now. It's, you know, sort of like "strike and split", you know. It's, uh...

NH: Yeah.

BD: It's a whole different thing. I know... I can see through most of the people, you know, that... and it's just... it's not any fun, you know... and, like, it's more fun just stopping at a red light and watching the people walk by, you know. That's really a lot of fun!

NH: In the sense that, what, that they might see you...? Or...

BD: Well, it's like there's a kick, like, I would think in terms of kicks, you know, just getting on a Greyhound bus for three days, but, you know, and going some place.

NH: Can you do that now?

BD: I can't do that any more, you know. It's up to, you know... get the Greyhound bus to come to me. But, uh... I have to hire the bus, you know, and stuff like that. It's ridiculous. But, I mean, it's not really... I'm not complaining or down about it. It's just a thing, that's all. It's gotta happen to somebody, I guess.

NH: Yeah. We were talking about college and I wonder, this isn't quite fantasy because, well... suppose, not that you were in charge of a school, but if somebody were to ask you what should a school be and do so that kids don't get all tied up and uptight the way they often do when...

BD: Well it shouldn't really be that way. Like.. like school... if someone wants to be a doctor, you know, they gotta go to school, you know, I mean, obviously they gotta go to school and they've gotta learn how to do all these things to be a doctor. But I wouldn't send anybody I knew – tell 'em to go to school, man, unless they wanted to be a doctor. I mean, I don't care what they wanna be, but if you wanna be a doctor, you know, gonna be something like that, you know, lawyer or, you know something like, you know... something really hard, you know – tell 'em to go, you know, do it, you know. But if you're gonna do it, you know, do it. But the other thing, just going to school reading and writing and taking tests, I guess, you know, and learning, you know, why things happen, it's just ridiculous in the face of things that are going to happen whether you know why they happen or not.

NH: So what should you be doing during these years if you're not gonna be a doctor or something, you know, specialized?

BD: Well you should be... it's not what you should be doing. It's... you could do anything you wanna do, you know. You could hang out in Mexico for four years. Man, you know, and uh, it's... you should know about a lot of things though, which you don't know, which people keep you away from until you get to be a certain age.

NH: Like, for example?

BD: Like, for example, everything, you know, just about anything you can imagine. It's not gonna... if you do any things that are... like that, like as if they're gonna kill you, too many habits and things and... they're not gonna kill you at all. They might shake you up, but they're not gonna kill you...

NH: Do you mean sex or pot or...?

BD: Like, anything, absolutely anything, you know... uh, doing handstands. It's... you, know, I don't know, it's... when you come to think of it, when a person even goes to college – and I remember, I got out of high school I didn't think about it then but I think about it now – what I did I really know? When I got out of high school, I mean, what did the school teach me?

NH: Yeah.

BD: And I can truthfully say, you know, that I haven't used any of that stuff which I've learned in twelve years, except, you know, adding, maybe and reading and writing and how to, you know... and that's all though, you know, like. The rest of it, it just seems to be a thing to take up your time, you know, which, you know, has gotta be. I mean, it can't be any other way, because nobody's gonna come around and say "okay, we're gonna... our courses are gonna be much harder now, and everybody's gonna graduate by the time they're nine," you know, "and then, if you're ready, you can go to college." Which could easily be done.

NH: Yeah.

BD: Because all you'd have to do is teach somebody how to read and write, and you put them in college. Teach them a little math and that's really all you have to teach them, really. Who cares, you know, who the first President of the United States was and who cares where Africa is in terms of...

NH: You can always look it up.

BD: Right. You can carry an encyclopedia around. But I wouldn't want that to happen to anybody. I mean most people can't really afford to have their kids be total outcasts, you know, so they wouldn't do that, you know. Most people, I guess, would want their kids to be, you know, with other kids and normal and having a good time and birthday parties and...

NH: Yeah.

BD: ...stuff like that. Well, that's all fine too.

NH: How would you raise your kid?

BD: How would I?

NH: Yeah.

BD: I have no idea. I certainly wouldn't hide anything from them or anything like that. I mean a kid w... would... couldn't open his eyes anyway until about five years old – five or six years old. I wouldn't imagine I'd even be around by that time, so... so I wouldn't have that problem.

NH: Why do you think you wouldn't be around by that time?

BD: Well, obviously, it could happen, you know. I mean I'm not counting on being around, but...

NH: You just don't look ahead that far anyway?

BD: I can't look ahead that far, no. That's...

NH: This has interested me. You're... you got out of that locked step, the whole question, career thing, and as a result you're a lot freer in many ways than a lot of people. What was it in your background, in how you grew up, that let you do that? 'Cause you started, I guess like everybody else.

BD: Well, where I come from it's different than around here, you know. It's... you can be just about anything you want, you know. It's more or less... there's no distinguishing... there's no lines of you know, poverty. Like, everybody's more or less the same. All the towns are, you know... it's just a whole other thing, you know. It's not... you didn't really have that much, you know, I mean...

NH: Nobody had that much?

BD: No. No.

NH: But still, most of the people, the kids you were growing up with, I'm sure, went...

BD: Well, a lot of... oh sure, sure... I just was... I just... I don't know. I have no idea. My uncle was a professional gambler. I'd see him once in a while. Maybe that had something to do with it. I don't know.

NH: Yeah.

BD: I don't know really what it was that I, you know... there were a lot of people – I'm not the only one that left there and traveled around like me. There was people that... everybody left there. I don't know really of anybody that stayed there. There's nothing really there. Everybody my age I know left. I don't know where they are. Once in a while I hear from people, but I don't... I know that there's nobody... nobody stayed there to, uh, you know...

NH: So, in a sense there was an advantage in the way it was, 'cause it sort of got you to leave.

BD: Oh, from my very first time of consciousness I know I wanted to get out of there. 'Cause really... you know... everybody did.

NH: Well, you first hit the road when you were quite young. What was it, about 12?

BD: Well, I was just running away, but that's just a... a thing because... it doesn't mean too much here because it's not like hitting the road from...

NH: Yeah.

BD: ...New York for the west coast or anything like that. The towns are only ten miles apart, you know, and there are thousands of them so you can't really get too lost. It's, It's just a... just a... a thing, you know. It's running away; everybody runs away from home.

NH: But then... as I remember, you went farther distances, went over abroad.

BD: Yeah, yeah. But everybody else did it. It wasn't my own idea. It was a common thing to do. I think everybody ran away at least once or twice in their lifetimes, you know. It's ... I mean, I remember that, very simply, everybody did it, you know.

NH: Was there anything that you learned just in the process of doing that? You know, not only the traveling but in doing it and having the courage to do it, that, uh...

BD: It didn't really take much courage, it just took a "Ugh" feeling, that... "I must get some kicks." That's about all it was. You could actually hop trains where I come from. There were freight trains, box cars, ore trains. You could actually hop them and go for a ride, you know. I've done that.

NH: So it was a kind of a mobile existence to start with.

BD: Yeah. Well, I mean, if you knew where... what a part of the country it is... it's, there's nothing there, you know. I mean, it's not such a great thing, it really isn't. I mean, if I was here in New York City I probably wouldn't have done that. I probably would have turned out completely different. It's...

NH: Gone to Bronx High School Assize?

BD: Sure. I would've probably been a lawyer by now if I'd have stuck to the... if I would have been more lucky, to be born here. But really, you know, it's nothing special...

NH: You once said that you didn't want to work too often – you'd rather have most of your life and time to yourself. It seems... in the last year, haven't the tours been increasing and that kind of thing?

BD: Yeah. Yeah. They have. I'm working now a lot, because, uh, I dig it now moreso... It's a different thing now. I was gonna quit. When I was playing all by myself, I was gonna play... I was very mixed-up on how long I was gonna really do it, play by myself... uh... it's another thing altogether. I would never want to do it again. It's... really it's a whole other thing. It's not... it's a... see what it comes down to is that, uh... I've written a lot of songs, you know, and the thing about writing them and recording them, that's one thing. But to get up on stage and sing' em...

NH: Mm.

BD: ...night after night, gets a little hard. Because you're not really there in your right, you know, mind half the time. And to get up there and sing all these songs, which are...

NH: What do you mean by not being in your right mind?

BD: Well, just being in a... in a mind that's, uh... it is for people... put it this way, like, people come to the concert, they're all ready to see the concert. But, like you're not really ready to see them.

NH: Yeah, yeah. I dig.

BD: You know, it's, uh... you know, you can translate that into terms of, you know, somebody coming along and ringing your doorbell you don't wanna see; it just happens, this night that 3,000 people are ringing your doorbell.

NH: Yes. So you travel with a group now all the time?

BD: Yeah.

NH: What's the name of it?

BD: Well they're from... they're... we call 'em Levon and the Hawks.

NH: How do you spell the Levon?

BD: L-E-V-O-N.

NH: Yeah.

BD: Levon, he's from Arkansas. He's the drummer and, uh, he is... Robbie, Robbie's the lead guitar player. I've... Rob... I've known Robbie for some time. Uh, what that comes down to is just that you, you know, can't really get people to play with unless you can pay 'em...

NH: Yeah.

BD: And I wouldn't wanna cheat anybody and promise them anything, now, it doesn't cost anybody anything. I mean, it'd be foolish not to, you know, pay them, not to play with them, no...

NH: So that's one of the reasons you're working more now, huh?

BD: Yeah, it is. Also, I know what's happening is, not totally... it is... see, before I used to go to concerts, I used to play these concerts. I used to say "Well, would I come to see me tonight?" And I used to have to be very truthful and say "No, I wouldn't come." And I'd rather... I'd rather do something else. I really would.

NH: Mm.

BD: But that was just me, you know.

NH: Now, the way...

BD: But now I... I wanna... I would think, "Well, would I want to come to hear this tonight?" and I've gotta say I would.

NH: You mean having them with you increases your own enjoyment in performing?

BD: Well no, not really. It's another thing too. It's, uh... it's... you know, the songs are all uh... they don't have any influences you see. I mean, I know this to be true. That the songs, most of them, and, you know, it's all of them really put on the stage now, uh... is that, what they are in being, like is not influenced by... it's not... it's not a trying to be something else kind of thing. Whereas a lot of stuff is. Like, you can listen to a lot of records and things, or go and see a lot of shows, and it wouldn't really matter who was doing it, you know?

NH: Yeah.

BD: It would... you know, you could easily find the same thing down the block. Which is alright, you know. I don't say I'm putting down that stuff, you know, or anything, 'cause it's all very good. But I know, what we're doing is different. I don't know what exactly it is that we're doing... I know that it's different though. It's not folk-rock or this kind of thing. It's... if you wanna define it as that, it's... that's alright too, it doesn't matter. But I'd listen to it. I actually dig it, you know.

NH: Where would you say, beside not talking influences, but what are some of it's roots? Like negro blues and country music, and...

BD: Well, the roots are hard – a little bit harder to define than that. It's not, uh... it's everything really that, you know... it's just that, uh... I don't know. I can easily look at the others. Lot of first songs there were, like Hey Woody Guthrie, I Wrote You A Song was definitely influenced by Woody Guthrie. Uh, you know... Highway 51 on that first record was definitely influenced by Everly Brothers and, uh, you know, Charlie Pickett. On the second record you can still see the influences, you know, of stuff like that. Like, uh, the first record, there was Muddy Waters influence on it...

NH: But now there aren't any influences really.

BD: No, the influence is all sort of mashed up, you know, like the influence isn't in it's given form any more. The influences are... I know it all now. I've known it for quite a while, you know, I know it all. I don't really play too much, you know. It's just a thing now. It's uh... I know how to do it now. I know the music. I know... I don't have to think in terms of where, or what kind of tune I want these words to, you know? It's a... It's more or less of a... I don't have to hold anything back now. Before, I used to have to hold things back. I had to hold a lot of things back. I had to hold a lot of things back. I snuck 'em through...

NH: Yeah.

BD: ...but not too many people really realized it, you know. I snuck it through on my second record. It's not... with very pretty melodies in but...

NH: Why did you have to hold them back?

BD: Well, I still had to make it then. I still had to, you know, survive, you know, I still had to, uh... you know.

NH: What, you mean, you thought it might be too far out?

BD: No, not far out. I didn't want to really, uh, you know... I didn't really want to... you know, I mean, if somebody was gonna give me 350, you know, if I did a certain thing that wasn't that hard for me to do, I'd do it, you know. If they wouldn't give me the 350, you know, if I went along with what, if you want to call ideals, my ideals aren't that important to me. I don't really care. I don't really have any, you know, so it didn't matter. You know, like, that was transforming a personal thing into that. I wasn't really that big when I started out. I was just playing. I had no idea I was gonna be playing now. You know, when I started playing, I was just playing acoustical guitar, you know, easily understandable, that is, and the songs are very understandable too, and bread... not to scuffle.

NH: You mean if... you figure if some of the songs that you're doing now, where the lyrics... well, they...

BD: No, they're in their perfect form now. They're not in their... they're not in their form of hearing it perfectly. Not in the form of perfection. But they're in their perfect form, they're where they're supposed to be now. They're not, you know, in any kind of, you know... any kind of attempt to disguise anything. There's no, uh... it's all straight right down there. It's all, in another...

NH: What I meant was, do you feel if you had started with that kind of song it might have been harder to get...

BD: Well I did start with that kind of song. I did start that way. But I couldn't make it that way. It was impossible, totally impossible. I would have been a total failure, you know. I didn't really think... I didn't look ahead and say "Whohoohoo, if I do it this way now, I can do it this way later," and plan it all just like that. I mean, 'cause, you know, uh... but that's what it is. I mean, it's... you know.

NH: Why would it have been so impossible?

BD: Well, like I say, you know, it's... you have to pay everybody. You have to, you know, to have a band that makes music. Well, first of all, if you have somebody, you know... if you're playing with people, you know, you're playing with people. And when you don't have anything, that means you're all together. Everybody just doesn't hang out in their house, and then come on over. Like, if you're going to make something, you know, you've either gotta make it by yourself, you know, or else have it all set up for you.

NH: Well do you think that the songs you're doing now would've been harder for large numbers of people to understand at the beginning?

BD: Oh sure. Also I couldn't have written those songs back then, all stuff, I couldn't...

NH: Yeah, the two got together.

BD: But I... oh yeah, sure, if I just came out and sang Desolation Row five years ago, then I probably would've been murdered.

NH: How did you feel like at Newport and at Forest Hills, when some of the, let's say the old audience, or they thought they were the old audience, got so upset at hearing the electric guitar and all that, and the... new kind of material?

BD: Well, I figure there's a little boo in all of us, you know, and er, you know, like... it, uh... if they had a good time, you know, uh... like, what can I say, you know, if they had a good time booing. I mean there's just nothing I can say. I feel happy about. I mean, if they didn't have a good time booing, I gotta... I gotta think something's wrong somewhere, you know. Like, first of all, when you say "old fans", I know they're not my old fans who booed. I know they're not my old fans. They consider themselves probably as my old fans, but they're not my old fans really. The old fans are people like... they're in that, you know, 1,228 people that bought my first record. That's my old fans, you know.

NH: Yeah.

BD: Old fans are, you know, the 67 people that came into Gerde's, you know. Or the people that went down to the Gaslight – they're the old fans, they're the people that just hung around the East Side, you know, that stayed in the apartments. People I don't even see any more. People I haven't seen... who thought, you know, that I had it made on my, you know, second record.

NH: Yeah.

BD: Y'know, it's "Oh yeah, Dylan's got it made" and that's it, on the second record. That's what success meant then, you know. When I made my second record.

NH: How come they don't see you and you don't see them anymore?

BD: I've no idea where they are, you know. I hear from them too, once in a while. I... I don't know, you know. I see them once in a while. They're scattered all over, they really are.

NH: Have you heard that thing Murray the K's being saying on the air? It goes in a... in a poem, and I can't remember, but the idea is the people who boo Dylan are as prejudiced as the KKK.

BD: I believe that! By all means!

NH: Are you at all ever concerned about the fact that now that you're making it in the... you know, the way most people talk about making it... a lot of bread and all that stuff, that it'll be at all difficult not to be tempted to keep on being popular? In other words to stop going your own way?

BD: Yeah, there's always that temptation but I just know too well that it's just gonna, you know... it's just now, you know, it's not... I refuse to be any kind of... I don't know... Lawrence Welk or something like that. I don't know what else I can do. I'll continue making the records. They're not gonna be any better from now on. They're gonna be just different, that's all. The last record I made was, uh... I can't imagine when. Whereas, when I made my last record, before this, I still knew what I wanted to do on my next record. I don't know what I'm gonna do on my next record, but I know it's gonna be the same kind of thing, but just a little different.

NH: How can you be so sure it's not gonna be better? That you're not gonna find something that's beyond?

BD: Because on this last record, it's just too good. There's a lot of stuff on there which... I mean, I would listen to.

NH: What's the title of that one, uh...?

BD: Highway 61 Revisited.

NH: Highway 61 Revisited, yeah. Um. You don't call what you're doing now folk-rock, but how did you get... move in that direction? You know, bringing in the electric instruments, having that kind of rhythm, that kind of base?

BD: Well I've always done it. Even, you know... it was there on the second record, from one session, if you remember. And the reason it wasn't done any more is because I just couldn't... didn't have any bread to pay anybody else to come in. We just did it for that one session, you know. I didn't want to pay anybody else.

NH: So it's not so new at all, that new direction?

BD: No, it's not new in my mind. It's new in a lot of other peoples minds though, I guess. It's not new in my mind.

NH: What's your reaction, I think now of Irwin Silber. To me it's an idiotic position, but it's taken – Dylan isn't singing protest songs anymore, that must mean he's sold out. That kind of jibe.

BD: Well, that's his problem, you know. It's... I have really no reaction to it all. It's just a... you know, it's all the other thing. It's... I'm glad that he's... I mean, if he's happy, you know, I wish him the best. But he can, you know... I don't care. It doesn't matter what they say about me. It really doesn't. I mean, if anybody could really understand that, you know, as soon as... as long as they're troubled about me, I'm gonna be around, you know. As soon as everything gets straight...

NH: Would you elaborate on that a bit?

BD: Well, as soon as they, you know, start to, you know... I don't really know what they say. You know, I really don't know the ridiculous things they say. I know some of the things I do wrong, you know. I do a couple of things wrong. Once in a while I do something really wrong, you know, which I really can't see when I'm involved in it, and after a while I look at it later, I know it's wrong. I don't say nothin' about it. It's got nothing to do with music though, you know.

NH: Yeah.

BD: Well, that kind of thing is the only thing that means anything I do is wrong, you know, and... but this thing about, you know, I'm not singing protest songs is, you know... if they want to do that, that's... I have absolutely no contact with that. I have no respect for anything that, you know, they stand for to begin with, you know. Not in terms of that, but in terms of... not only for them, personally, but like, I've no respect for the conversation on, you know... whenever somebody's got something to say, you know... I mean, I just don't have any respect for it. I think it's vulgar, obscene, you know, this... the idea of somebody having something to say.

NH: A message song.

BD: A message thing. It's, uh... then again, you know, like we have the literary world, or whatever have you, the museum types and this kind of thing, which also I have no respect for, you know. I just can't make it, you know. It's just a total thing which I just can't see. In my mind, you know, if something is, you know, artistic or valid or groovy or, you know, nice to be with, it should be out in the open, you know. It should be, you know, in the men's room and it should be, you know, places like that. It, uh...

NH: You are quoted as saying, like, what you have in the museums and what are in the books now really have no relationship to what's happening, to what's real, and that...

BD: Well, it never has, you know. It never really has. I mean, I don't see how it could. I really don't understand, you know. I'm not involved in that side of it, but, see, the Sing Out world just overlaps into that kind of world, whereas that is really why I can't really pay too much attention to it. It's just a stagnation thing, of putting books on the shelf, you know, like... like, once you read a book, you know, you just put it on a shelf and there it is, you know. If you wanna buy a painting, you've gotta go out and pay a lot of money for a painting. If you wanna see paintings, you've gotta, you know, pay to go in the museum. If you wanna see dancing, man, you have to go to... you have to mix with these theatrical people. If you wanna see a play – look who... Look at all the people you'd love to sit next to if you wanted to go see a Broadway play. You know, like, look at all that stuff which is really, in terms of just... you know, like, nobody with a dollar a day could go out and have anything to do with it, you know. It's like... I think a person's more lucky if they can buy a car. They can buy a car with a radio, well, they'd be much better off than if they have, you know, been straining to go see all these Broadway plays and museums and stuff that's, you know... because the same thing is on the radio.

NH: Yeah, I remember you being quoted as saying that it's on the radio and on records that you get a sense of what's happening.

BD: Well, it's not a sense of what's happening. It's like... the things now... I don't know if you know, you know, the Motown Music Company?

NH: Yeah, yeah. I get all their records.

BD: Well, you know, just, like, to listen to one of those records, you know, like, they may not sound the same and stuff like that, but that's like... listening to one of those records... I mean, if you can't understand the whole total thing, you know, on... what's it all about... you know, then you've got to go to plenty of museums, man! Really. You gotta go to museums, drink a lot of coffee and wear a banana, man.

NH: Somebody was saying, though, he said he started to play some of those Motown records at a very slow speed, and he said he was quite "shocked", unquote, 'cause some of those lyrics were very, uh... what was the word? Lewd. Does that bother you at all?

BD: I don't think they're lewd on Motown. They're usually... not lewd. Say, I've had many stuff... I've had stuff banned for me, for being lewd. I mean, it depends what you think is lewd. You know, lewd...

NH: How would you define...

BD: It's like Lewd was the name of a person, Lewd. John Lewd. I know John Lewd.

NH: Is there anything in words... you know, like, Lenny Bruce would say there is nothing in a word that can be bad. It's just a word.

BD: Yeah. That's true. I mean, I don't see how anything man, you know... I don't... I'm not afraid of words. I mean, maybe a lot of people are afraid of words, but that's, you know, who you're dealing with. People are afraid of words, that's... a lot of people are afraid of words. Well, you know, that's a shame. That's worse than being frightened of a dog.

NH: That line's gonna last. Ewan McColl had a thing where he said that you were so eager to get immediate success you deliberately wrote down to your audience, and he said you avoided, during the protest song period, you avoided basic issues 'cause you had no real anger. Your passion was manufactured.

BD: Ugh! Who's Ewan McColl?

NH: He's that Scottish actor and folk singer, you know.

BD: Is he famous?

NH: In Scotland.

BD: Well, I don't know... you know, like, uh... I've never written down to anybody.

NH: Yeah.

BD: You know, I certainly, uh... if he say's I wasn't angry, you know... I've never met him really. I don't know what he does for a living, you know. Is he a...

NH: He plays clubs in London and he records, that kind of thing.

BD: Is he famous?

NH: Um, among the real hard-core folk people.

BD: Oh he's probably a little bit angry, you know, that he's not really famous. You know, really famous, you know. I certainly can't, uh... I certainly... he's not... I don't even know the fellow. I can't really comment on these things. I'm sure he's got good intentions, but...

NH: Yeah. Do you ever feel a weight at all at the fact that there are all these kids who... they not only listen to the records, but it's almost like some of them try to absorb as much of what they think is going on on those records as possible, and if they don't make you a model, they're certainly being very influenced by what they think is you. Does that ever...

BD: Well, I think it's good being what some of them think, I know that you know... First of all, what do you mean, like...

NH: Well, I know kids starting twelve up and they say that this is... this guy is... nobody manipulates him. He's gone his own way and that kind of thing.

BD: Yeah, well. That's right. But they can't very well do it at twelve.

NH: But do you feel any responsibility in that sense?

BD: No, no. I have no responsibility towards them.

NH: The music just says what it says and that's it.

BD: It's in the music, yeah. I'm certainly not gonna tell them to go out and do anything vulgar, you know. It's... I've no responsibility towards the fans, you know. They're... they're big grown-up people.

NH: You were saying that a message song is vulgar. Using message in another sense though, so far as you could put it into words, what is it you're trying to say through the songs you're doing now?

BD: Well, I'm not trying to say anything any more, you know. Like, once upon a time I tried to say "Well, I'm here, listen to me," you know. Once upon a time I tried to say "I'm here, I need some bread, you know, and I want to... will you let me stay at your house tonight?", you know. That's really what it boils down to, you know, I mean, I don't have to say that any more, you know, and now it's just letting, you know... the songs are just somebody else is hearing them, that's all it is. It's like, they'd be there if anybody listened to them or not, you know. They're not manufactured songs. They, you know, would... they would be there. They exist, and whoever listens to them, that's none of my business.

NH: And what they get out of it is none of their business either.

BD: None of my business either, you know. It's... I know what they are, you know, but I can't... I can't tell somebody what they are, you know.

NH: Nor can you tell anybody how to react to them or what they're supposed to get out of them.

BD: No.

NH: Mm. How do you account for the... 'cause it's not just a passing thing, at least, not in terms of three or four years... of this great attraction that you do have for more and more young people? You know, I go...

BD: Well, young people are really... young people have... they don't wanna have free minds, you know. They wanna be... they don't want to because, you know... they're young, you know. Whereas people once, you know, like, once they get out of college, or go to college, they get involved in their lifetime thing, and they really don't have time to be... they sort of really know that, you know, it's all kinda useless and, you know... anyway, they can't really make such a big fuss over somebody, you know. They can't really plan to go see a concert, you know, months ahead of time. You know, things don't have the same attraction for them. They have to put it out of their minds, you know. They have to look down on a lot of things, you know, because it makes them feel better. You know what I mean?

NH: Mm.

BD: Whereas kids, the kids don't have to think like that. They're all leaving home and they wanna get out, you know. This though, it's still another thing to them.

NH: Do you have any expectation that the kids listening to you now and being moved by what they hear... that some of them anyway may be somewhat different? That they won't get trapped in that kind of adult box and that maybe you've helped not getting them trapped?

BD: No, I don't think so. It's not for that kind of thing, you know.

NH: I guess we ought to stop for a...

Break in Interview

NH: Yeah. I had started to ask about whether you thought there was any hope that at least some of the kids now, particularly those listening to you, might not get into that adult box and maybe, if they don't, one of the reasons is the kind of stimulus you gave them.

BD: Yeah, but it's not in my mind, though, my way of thinking. I don't really... I don't think in terms of the people that listen to me, you know. I don't think in terms of the records, or who buys the records, you know, like. When it comes time, it's all in terms of what's happening here, around here. It's, you know, a total other world than a teenage market. I'm not gonna fall for being any kind of spokesman for them, or trying to teach them anything, because it'd be kind of silly, you know. It's a whole other thing. If it happens that way, you know, then, fine. But it's...

NH: You're not out to save them.

BD: No, no. I certainly wouldn't run over them on the street or anything, you know. Or if somebody really needed... if somebody needed a mouthful of water, I'd probably, you know, give them...

NH: But you can't save their souls for them.

BD: No, I can't save their souls. I could... I can't save their souls for them.

NH: There was a quote in a Newsweek piece where you said "I've never written a political song. Songs can't save the world. I've gone through all that. When you don't like something, you've gotta learn to just not need that something." Is there anything you'd add to that?

BD: No.

NH: That's pretty much what you feel?

BD: Yeah.

NH: The idea... that, you know, like, the Pete Seeger idea that you can change men's hearts and that sort of thing...

BD: It's not true at all.

NH: No. Can anything? I mean, do you have any hope that there might be a new society, to use that kind of old terms for...

BD: No, no. I don't know... I don't even think in terms of society, you know. Society, you know, fights among itself, you know. All societies do I guess. And I'm not really part of any society like that. I don't really know any more.

NH: I know the earlier write-ups used to say "Well, here's Dylan. He's a social critic. He's shown us the hypocrisy in American life and all in the..."

BD: Yeah, but, see it's not what it was really about. They could say that very easily about me, you see. It doesn't take much balls to say that, you know, or to write me up like that, because in fact it's very easy to see I wasn't even a part of the society, their society, you know. They could come round and see the concerts and write stories about me and see me at a party or something, but it's very easy for to say "Here he's condemning society," when I wasn't a part of that society. It's very easy, you know, for somebody to get kicked by somebody that's not a part of that society. Now let's say somebody like, you know, General McNamara – he starts criticizing the society – now they're gonna take... now they're gonna start worrying about it a little bit. But nobody has to worry about anybody from the outside, that's very evidently on the outside, criticizing their society, because he is on the outside and, you know, he's not in it anyway. And so, they can just keep themselves happy, you know, and think that something, you know, is... you know, romanticize things. But it's not true at all.

NH: Do you, or did you, consider yourself from the outside a social critic? or was it just...

BD: No, I wasn't really a social critic. It was just like, you know... it's like, I knew where to put the song, you know. I knew where the slot was, you know. That's all. Nothing more to it than that.

NH: Yeah. Speaking of being outside the society, one of the things that Joan is doing is – herself and trying to get other people not to pay income tax as a way of protesting foreign policy. What's your view of that kind of criticism of the society from the outside?

BD: Well, she doesn't live in the society, you know. You can't go around criticizing things you're not a part of, you know. That's no way to make something better, you know. I'm sure, you know, that she's, you know, got a very good point there, keeping not paying her money to the, you know, tax department. If that's a question, like, you know, am I gonna do it, I'm not gonna do it, you know, I'm gonna pay. I'm not gonna get in trouble with those people, you know. I mean, I live here. I wouldn't have what I have really in this country unless it was this country. Wouldn't have it in another country. I'm not gonna, you know, go along with them and I'm not gonna go along with anything they do. I'm just not gonna be a part of a lot of these things which they do, that's all. But that's not trying to wave any flag, that's just me, you know. You know, if I was gonna, you know, not pay my income tax, that means, first thing, all the papers are gonna come up and they're gonna say "Bob Dylan doesn't pay his income tax," you know. You know, it's like, you know, what goods' that gonna do? They don't need my money. It's just a form of, you know, saying what you do, that's all. It's not gonna make a dent or anything. You know, if somebody wants to pay their income tax, I figure that's fine. If somebody doesn't want to pay their income tax, that's fine too. You know, I'm certainly not condemning anybody that doesn't pay their income tax. I mean, most people don't really pay their rightful income tax. I think it's kind of a bad point to come out and stress it, because it's gonna be hard on a lot of other people, who really don't pay a lot of their income tax.

NH: You mean there's people gonna start looking more closely at all of them?

BD: Yeah, yeah.

NH: Another thing, and this is squareville, but people'll say, well, isn't Dylan in a sense playing a role? 'Cause he's not a country guy or whatever, but the dress is informal and to a, let's say the Columbia Record context, it's, if not bizarre, at least, you know, very distinctive. Is that a kind of a stance? Or just more comfortable?

BD: Well, it's just clothes I wear, you know. That's something which... I certainly don't... I dressed in blue jeans for a long time, right? I dressed in shirts and clothes and everybody said "Look how funky he looks," you know. They made a big point out of it. Well, you know, like, it doesn't take much thinking, you know... I didn't really have many clothes, you know, back when I played on... back, you know... I didn't really have many. 'Cause I didn't really know what clothes were, you know. Now, I'm not gonna walk around like I used to walk around. I've got money to buy better clothes now. Why should I walk around like a, you know, like a clown? Like, I look like a normal person now. I'm not gonna look like...

NH: But also you're not gonna go for Brooks Brothers or whatever, 'cause that's not your style.

BD: Well, it's that I don't like that style. No, I mean that Ivy League style. No, I don't like that.

NH: What about the feeling among some people that you've become, in a way, your own kind of establishment? You know, surrounded by people, kind of hard to get to. Does this jibe with, you know, the feeling that you're talking about... everybody being egalitarian and no pomp, you know, no...

BD: I'm not talking about anybody. That's their own paranoia.

NH: You don't feel that you've become that much... of like the old movie star thing, with hangers-on, like Sinatra...

BD: I haven't got hangers-on, stuff like that.

NH: Getting back to the "look" thing again, like Sonny and Cher, is there any significance, do you think, to the long hair business and the... all that?

BD: No, there's not really that much significance. It's just... either you like to, you know, wear your hair a certain way or you don't. It's certainly infested a lot of minds with, you know, trouble, but, you know, I really see no reason for it.

NH: You don't think anybody's trying to prove anything that way?

BD: No, no. It's not that thing at all. Well I must admit it looks pretty incredible at first when you see, you know... if you've ever been to England and you see people... people just look a whole other way over there, you know. They really look like their ancestors, whoever; Prince Valiant, you know. All kinds of weird people. Over here they don't... there's nothing... you can't even compare it with the look over there. They had a thing in some magazine a while back, showing long hair, showing a long-haired person in the United States. And they showed beach-boys, kinda people with hair that comes down a little bit, you know, on the back of their neck. Then they showed some kids in Chicago, rebelling, with their hair coming down a little bit on their forehead a little bit. Then somebody else, you know, in Hollywood, California, with a little bit over their ear. Then it showed, you know, the last picture showed a picture outside of a pub in England, with kids about 17, 18 years old, just standing around. Yeah, and just no comparison in terms of people, man, like they just, I mean, you know, could tell they weren't worried about long hair, you know.

NH: It's not rebellion or anything like that?

BD: No, no. It's not a rebellion kind of thing. It's just another way... a kind of thing which, I don't know, I guess most people can't really see themselves doing, you know. It's an attitude I guess, you know.

NH: The attitude being...

BD: That attitude of, you know, "why not?", you know.

NH: Yeah, that's it "Why not". It's like, I get asked once a week, "why have you got a beard". Why not? This "why not" thing, do you feel that among the younger generation there maybe is becoming more freedom? Like, the kid... for example, more and more of the younger people using pot or LSD or being a lot freer about sex...

BD: I don't see... I don't really know that many of the younger people, you know, like. That's... that really is... it's fine if they use pot and LSD and heroin and sex and everything. I mean, that's groovy. But, I mean, I don't really know any of them, you know. If you're speaking of young people now, you mean, you know, kids in high school and stuff like that.

NH: Yeah.

BD: I don't know... I don't really... I really have no contact with them, not directly, you know. I read about them in the papers.

NH: Yeah.

BD: But I don't really...

NH: From what you read, do you think that that gives some hope, that they'll be, again when they grow up, they'll be less hung up with conformity and with playing safe?

BD: Oh yeah. But what it comes down to now is that somebody learns something so fast, by the time they're twenty-one they know that it's all bullshit, you know. And they have to get to really think of something to do, you know.

NH: You mean the thing like pot or LSD just isn't gonna be that much of a...

BD: Yeah. Most people like... you get to it like... a lot of people get turned on when they're forty-five and they realize what a waste everything's been. I know some people like that, you know. They're really, really, you know... I mean, they're happy that they apparently know a few things, but like they really – go, shall we say? – go to pot, you know. They quit their jobs and they just sit around the house and laugh.

NH: This is with pot, do you mean?

BD: I mean people that really sort of understand that... at forty-five... that they've just been really hung up their whole life, you know. It's not necessary to think about if your chick is with somebody else, man, you know. The world's filled with too many people, you know, and...

NH: But by "turned on", you don't mean to anything, just to a realization.

BD: No. Just to the realization of things, you know. There's many thousands of ways to realize things, you know. They have even groups across the country. They have self-realization groups somebody can become a part of.

NH: Yeah. And there's no guarantee that, if you try pot, that's gonna turn you on to any kind of realization of...

BD: I guess everybody's smoked pot. I mean, pot is sort of behind the times now, you know. It's like... to get busted for pot is kind of like... it's not really, it doesn't really make much of a stature any more.

NH: What does? LSD?

BD: Nothing really depressive. Any of that stuff is just... kind of like, just a sign of very uncoolness. Unless they plant it on you or something.

NH: You were saying that, if the kids now... they learn it so fast that by twenty-one it really has no meaning any more, in the sense of what? That they realize that that too doesn't bring them answers?

BD: They realize that it's really a drag to plan for tomorrow their whole life. And realizing in terms of really hard reality that tomorrow never comes. Like, you always wake up and it's today. You know, tomorrow just never seems to come. And, you know, there is no yesterday. So what's left is just, you know, a nothing.

NH: Well, live in the present.

BD: Yeah. But... you know, I know a lot of people know this... I know a lot of people know this... I didn't know this really, you know, when I was sixteen or seventeen. But a lot of people know it now. A lot of people at sixteen really know now that... you know, the communication is so great, you know. Communication of TV, you know, and radio and letters can get across the country fast. And telephones... there's no reason for anybody not knowing anything, really, by the time they're that age. And a lot of people don't, you know. A lot of people... you know...

NH: By "knowing anything" you mean knowing, again, that it's all in the present.

BD: Not that it's all in the present. To know pot, or to know any drug, is fine, and it's not gonna fuck you up, you know. You know, that's one thing. But to know it in terms of not saying anything about it, that's another thing, you know. Anybody, you know, when they, you know, smoke pot, even when you're smoking pot for the first time, you know – whoopee – you've got to tell your friends. I mean this kind of stuff. I mean, that's not really, you know, so great or anything like that, you know.

NH: It's like what counts is not whether whatever it is you're using or not using but that realization about the futility of planning for tomorrow.

BD: Yeah. The thing of, like it doesn't even matter, you know, if like... it's you know, a silly thing to even... to discuss, you know. You see lectures all the time in the *Village Voic*e, lectures on everything. Absolutely everything. They talk about, you know, the relationship of Ghandi, you know, to pipe tobacco, man! And I'm sure they're gonna get a hall filled, you know, and you see reasons for, you know, the coming of the camel, you know. There are thousands of people there, gonna go to see it. And of course, they all wear glasses, you know, and... This is not really a valid world, this is, you know, a... what are you gonna call it? I don't know. That's what they call an intellectual kind of world. It's boring, you know, it really is boring. Can't do anything.

NH: Then I know some of the kids in Students For A Democratic Society, you know, working in the ghettos, and they say "Well, the kids who figure they have the answer through pot or whatever are really running away from everything".

BD: Well, I never felt as if there's an answer through pot. I don't want to make this, kind of, a drug interview or anything, like. LSD like... once you take LSD a few times... I mean, LSD is a medicine. You know, you take it and you know... you don't really have to keep taking it all the time. It's nothing like that. It's not that kind of thing, you know, whereas pot, you know, nobody's got any answers through pot. Pot's, you know, not that kind of thing. I'm sure that the people that say that the people who figure they got their answers through pot, first of all, those people who say that, they're just inventing something. And the people that really actually think that they got their answers through pot, probably never even smoked pot, you know. I mean, it's like... pot is, you know... who smokes pot any more, you know, anyway? Pot is...

NH: Getting back to music, you were saying that you liked the early Presley. I wondered about somebody like Johnny Cash. Now, how does he affect you? 'Cause he's the guy that said that...

BD: That's a very funny thing to ask. I can't really talk about it too much. I like Johnny Cash a lot. I like everything he does really.

NH: Yeah, I'm just beginning to pick up on him.

BD: His early records were much better, I think, than his latest records. Although he's written some fantastic things. He's really written some great things. He wrote a rewrite of Frankie And Johnny. Did you ever hear that?

NH: No.

BD: That's better, much better than even the traditional version. He wrote Big River and all those songs, like that.

NH: What about the, you know, Rolling Stones and The Animals? How strongly do you react to them, what they're writing and singing?

BD: They've just... the Rolling Stones just recently began to write. I don't think the animals have ever written anything. Well, I don't know. I don't think the Rolling Stones consider themselves writers or anything.

NH: How about the music itself?

BD: The music is just hard, straight music. It's...

NH: Do you dig it?

BD: Do I personally dig it?

NH: Yeah.

BD: Well I... I would... yeah, I dig some of it. I dig some of it, some of the Rolling Stones music. I dig some of The Animals music.

NH: And the Beatles; you got to see them, I guess, fairly often. In fact I read somewhere, George Harrison said that you said that what you did mostly was laugh all night.

BD: Yeah. That's true.

NH: What kind of communication's going on there?

BD: I don't know about communication. It's just a... you know, I can just laugh all night, that's really about all.

NH: How do you feel about Lennon and McCartney as writers? 'Cause some of the jazz guys are finally finding that their tunes are pretty interesting.

BD: Oh, their tunes are... yeah, their tunes really are good. Yeah, they're alright.

NH: How would you, now I'm gonna ask you to be like a musicologist, but, where do all these things fit in? Where's the mainstream in terms of, you know, country and western, rhythm and blues, bluegrass, all that? How do you see it all in some kind of perspective? Or does it matter?

BD: Well, it doesn't really matter, you know. I don't really think about it, you know. I don't... what does that mean, "mainstream"?

NH: I don't know. I never knew.

BD: Oh! That puts it in a whole other light. I certainly wouldn't know. I have no idea.

NH: That stuff to you is just irrelevant? It depends on how it sounds?

BD: Yeah.

NH: One thing I wanted to ask, about jazz, which seems to have lost the kids entirely. You appeal to them, the Beatles do, the Stones, the Righteous Brothers. But jazz seems to have gone past the young almost all the way. Why is that?

BD: Well, jazz is, you know, I mean... I don't know what you mean by "jazz". You know, like the modern jazz kind of thing?

NH: Yeah. Let's say Miles or Thelonius Monk. That kind of thing.

BD: Well, I don't know. It's more like a little room kind of thing, you know. I would think. I've been in some of those places and you've gotta take the full trip. I mean, you can't just come in, you know, in the middle of a song and get excited, you know. You've gotta start from the beginning and you've gotta be ready. It's like, you've gotta sit down there and you've gotta say – "OK, I'm gonna read this now, you know". It's music, you know. A lot of people really aren't equipped to deal with sounds, you know. In such a way that they have no... they can't see any lead, they can't seem to follow. Whereas they can only follow straight chords. They don't wanna follow anything else, you know. They don't care how far out it is, as long as they can follow it in some kind of way. Like, a lot of jazz you just can't follow. I mean, you can, you know, if you sit down and just take it from the beginning and do that. But, I mean, that's a whole... that's a hard... that's work, you know, like. Who really wants to do that?

NH: Do you figure your songs are at all work? Like the images...

BD: No. Oh, that might be work, but, like, they're all easy to follow.

NH: Musically?

BD: Yeah. I mean, they're all easy to follow. I know, because I can follow them, you know. And if I can follow them then anybody can follow them.

NH: You're through with the protest thing, you know. But what's your reaction to this growing thing of, you know... like Eve Of Destruction. Somebody like P. F. Sloan, who says that his inspiration comes from being bugged most of the time. Do you think this is a passing thing?

BD: Yeah, that's passing. Yeah, that'll just go so long... that protest thing, you know... Eve Of Destruction, you know... it's nice, you know. It's good that stuff like that is being on the radio. But it's... I don't know what it means, you know. It's protest music. Protest music is... we all know what protest music is... been out in New York for about five years. That comes from California. That's a whole California thing now. Which, when California gets into something, they really go all out, you know, But...

NH: Why do you think it's gonna fade away?

BD: Well, because people are just gonna get tired of it, you know. Like they get tired of anything. They don't wanna hear that stuff all the time, you know, protesting all the time. I mean, you know...

NH: Do you think the kids who buy the records like Eve Of Destruction buy it 'cause they agree with what the guy's saying?

BD: No, I think that was a good song. That was hard, that was exciting. That was... you know, anyway, you'd get sick of it too. You'd even get sick of *I Got You, Bab*e. You get sick of... you get sick of anything, you know. Anything, you gonna get sick of. Doesn't matter what it is.

NH: But I meant some of the other songs, that aren't as good musically as Eve Of Destruction. Do you think the kids are digging the message, or is it just part of a fad thing?

BD: Yeah, well... it's better to have them buying those things, I guess, and thinking about something. But... you know, like, *Don't Step On My Blue Suede Sho*es, like, Carl Perkins, man, you know, like, there's no comparison in which is better, you know. Absolutely no comparison, you know. Like, *Don't Step On My Blue Suede Sho*es, sung by Carl Perkins, you know, is, you know... that's really, you know... more listenable, you know. Or you could see more in it than that, or I can than I could in Eve Of Destruction. Only just because my mind works that way. Lot of people, you know, can't really see as much in that, you know.

NH: We started off talking about, you know, people like Cole Porter and Gershwin. Do you think it's accurate to say that what's happening now, on records, is a lot closer to reality than the Porter, Vincent, Youman things, which was really kind of for a small group of sophisticates living pretty well?

BD: Well, it's the same way as everybody. That's even all the poetry books, you know. All the intellectual books, you know, just appeal to a small group of people, you know. Even people, you know, like Robert Frost, you know, Ezra Pound, you know... all of those people, you know. Even people, you know, like, you know, Jean Genet. They all just appeal to a certain crowd of people, you know. And nobody else really. They only sell, you know, a certain amount of books and they sell them to people who are just going to talk among themselves about it. But they don't really get out into places where the people who don't really know each other can... all of a sudden are swarmed over by, you know... Well, what would happen, you know, if the United States was just... all of a sudden Ulysses came on the radio one day, you know? Or what would happen, you know, if it was just on top 40 radio station? What would happen if they played, you know, the movie We Are All Murderers, man, on a double bill with an Elvis Presley flick? But it just don't happen, you know.

NH: What would happen?

BD: Well, I don't know, but... I guess, I mean... why not? Why not do it, you know? Why not play, you know, those kind of things together?

NH: So anyway, that's why Ralph Gleason keeps writing that what has happened is that popular music has become democratized for the first time. You've got negro influences and country influences and songs that mean something to the kids. Do you think that's a fair appraisal?

BD: Yeah, but then again, you know, like, I really have no contact with kids. I... what I'm doing is... somebody just that's watching, you know, and listening. I would do it, you know, if they didn't. I've always done it and it's that kind of thing, you know.

NH: Do you have any contact with the kid dan... you know, the new dances like the Dog and the Frug?

BD: No, I have no contact with that. In a lot of the towns we go into the Club. At some of the clubs they dance, but... I have no contact with those kind of dances, no.

NH: You've also said that "Teenagers all talk a different language. Name me a teenager. I have no recollection of being a teenager."

BD: Yeah, I told that – "name me a teenager". You know, "name me one teenager, like, who is a teenager", and he couldn't do it, you know. Name me a teenager, I mean, who knows a teenager, you know. It's like, you know, I asked him what he meant by "teenager" and I said "Name me a teenager. Who do you mean when you speak of the word "teenager"? You know, you're sort of insulting a lot of people there. Like, who really do you mean?" And he just couldn't think of anybody that he wanted to insult.

NH: And when you said that you don't recollect being one, that means that when you were fifteen or sixteen you were Bob Dylan at fifteen or sixteen.

BD: Right. I wasn't a teenager, no.

NH: Then he quotes you as talking about enemies – "They can crush you, they can kill you and lay you out on 42nd Street and put the hoses on you". Who are... who do you figure are your enemies?

BD: The enemies?

NH: Yeah.

BD: The enemies are those people that can crush you and send you to 42nd Street and that kind of stuff. I don't know... The enemies can be... you know, the enemies are so... the enemies... I don't really... don't even know any enemies. But there's just a lot of people, you know, who show... without a better name can be referred to as enemies.

NH: How would you characterize them? I mean, what...

BD: Well they usually have acid coming out of their ears, you know...

NH: But do yourself feel that in any specific sense you have enemies either in music or whatever? Anybody.

BD: No. I guess there are a lot of people that want, you know, to see me done away with, you know, and...

NH: Why?

BD: Well, the obvious reason is because there are people that want to see anybody done away with, you know. But, I mean, I can't really think in terms of that kind of thing.

NH: A thing you said to Shelton was "What I write is much more concise now than before – it's not deceiving." What did you mean by "deceiving"?

BD: Well, deceiving means, like... like, when I wrote those songs, you know, a lot of those songs I wrote before, they were written within a small circle of people...

NH: You mean like Masters Of War and...

BD: Yeah, there was a small circle of people that heard them, you know. And when some of them were brought finally to the outside, somebody else who heard 'em just weren't equipped really to take it and know it, you know, the same way. You know what I mean? It's like... I don't mean deceiving, it's like... straightforward blunt kind of thing and where somebody else could possibly think that, you know, something is happening which isn't happening. That's like, uh... I don't... I can't even remember back then. I can remember in little rooms, you know, writing those things. But I also remember I was writ... I took the time out to write those things. The other stuff I was doing didn't even resemble those songs at all. They resembled more what I'm writing today, in terms of songs, you know. Which I wouldn't consider writing then in terms of songs, because I know nobody could, you know...

NH: Yeah. How could you explain the difference? Although it's there to hear it. But, I mean, if you wanted to put it into words...

BD: Between then and now?

NH: Between then and now.

BD: Well the difference is, back then I was me and now I'm me.

NH: No better answer than that. You mentioned now that, you know, it's hard for you to just go on a bus, let's say, for three days. Is there any other way that all the renown has changed your private life? Are you still able to keep a private life to any degree?

BD: Oh yeah, to some degree, you know. I mean it's... yeah... yeah, it's a private life, but it's just that I don't really get around much, you know. I don't... I keep a private life... it's down, you know, to a certain thing, but... it's, you know, it's what it is. I can't really ask any more about it than that, you know, it's... I certainly don't want any cameras coming in on my private life.

NH: Yeah, and you'd like to keep it private. Do you still have the motorcycle?

BD: Yeah, yes, somewheres. I don't really ride it too much down here...

NH: Why? 'Cause I remember you used to be very fond of that.

BD: Yeah, well now I'm gonna put my name on it and sell it for a lot of money.

NH: So that the whirr of that kind of activity is kind of diminished.

BD: Well, yeah. When I come to think of it, I have ridden it one time during the whole summer. It's kinda senseless to...

NH: Why did it stop?

BD: Well I guess it stopped because I didn't ride it that much, you know, and a lot of people were fooling around and I said this is really silly. It got messed up.

NH: We were talking about Joan, you know, in terms of her political... you know...

BD: Yes.

NH: How about music? 'Cause I remember you once said she changed your definition for a time of what beautiful was. 'Cause you thought it had to be ugly.

BD: Well, no. You read that on the back of liner notes.

NH: Yeah, yeah.

BD: Well, you know, I wrote those liner notes, you know. I wrote those liner notes. I can't... yeah, well... I really don't... I haven't even looked at them. I don't know what they say, you know. But...

NH: How do you, in a sense, assess her? And also what do you think about the fact that she's using more and more of your songs. Do they sound that much different, when she does them, to your ear?

BD: Yeah, they... she does them OK, you know. There's nothing like that... she sings very well, you know, like, a certain kind of thing she sings really, really very good. It's not the kind of thing where you can really listen to it all the time, you know, or anything. But it's like... it is a thing, you know, it is a thing that definitely Joan Baez, you know, is, you know... is... sings validly, you know. And what she does is, you know... it's good, it really is, you know. I don't think she sings, you know, that good, but, you know...

NH: Have you ever had much conversation with her about non-violence. You know she's opening an institute or a training center...

BD: No, I've no... I beat her up once. That's about all.

NH: I take it then that your philosophy doesn't necessarily encompass non-violence as an absolute.

BD: I don't... I've never met any non-violent person, you know. When I meet somebody that's really non-violent, I can see how they act, I can, you know... you know, I will then make my decision as to whether non-violence is worth it, you know, to anybody at all. But I have never met anybody that's non-violent.

NH: Do you want to elaborate on that, beating her up? Or do we just drop that?

BD: Yeah. I just beat her up, that's all.

NH: OK.

BD: She wanted me to be non-violent.

NH: From what you've said, it comes down to, you know, living in the present, not worrying or expending energy on the future. Now, beyond that, and this is a slippery word, but, what are your values? Just for yourself, not in terms of what anybody else thinks. What is meaningful to you in how you live? What makes it, what doesn't make it?

Break in Interview.

NH: Yeah, I started to ask about a hard word to put into words – values. What, you know, what you live by, it sounds like Reader's Digest, but... what makes it and what doesn't in terms of your own feeling about what's worth doing and what isn't worth doing?

BD: Well, anything is worth doing really. In terms of the values, I just don't have any values. You know? I really can't... you know, I can't really think of any, you know. I'll do anything once. It's like, uh... I just don't have any values, you know, in terms of... values are supposed to raise your standard of being, evidently, you know.

NH: Yeah.

BD: It doesn't matter to me about my standard of being, you know. I know in my own mind, you know, that... I don't wanna hurt anybody or anything like that, and... that's about all I can say about it, you know. Ah, but then again, I know a lot of people are hurt, but it's not really me that hurts them, you know.

NH: What do you mean?

BD: Well, I mean like they're just deceived. But like, I haven't hurt them any.

NH: Yeah.

BD: But then again, you can actually come out and hurt somebody, you know. Like, I don't really worry too much about people who say they've been hurt by me, because, you know, ninety-nine times out of a hundred, it's not me that hurts them.

NH: But that's a value then, isn't it? Not wanting to hurt anybody.

BD: Well I guess so, but, you know... I mean, I would think that's everybody's thing, you know.

NH: But is it?

BD: Oh no, of course not. I guess not. No, well... even, even that ceases to be a value when, you know... even if there is somebody that wants to hurt somebody, you know... like, what if that person goes out and finds somebody that likes to be hurt? You know, they just keep it there on that level. I'll hurt you and I won't hurt anybody else, if you promise not to be hurt by anybody else except me, you know.

NH: What you're saying then is that everything is really relative. There aren't any absolutes

BD: I would think so.

NH: Yeah. Do you ever envision that you might get interested in politics or in foreign affairs like some of the folk singers are?

BD: No, no. That's really not my thing at all. I can't really see myself up on a platform with ways to help people that aren't gonna get me killed, really, if I really wanted to help anybody.

NH: What do you mean?

BD: Well, I mean if somebody's really got something to say, you know and they really can help somebody out, just bluntly, you know, obviously they're gonna be done away with, you know.

NH: Yeah. Do you have any people in public life, not heroes but people, that you especially respect, for one reason or another?

BD: In public life?

NH: Yeah.

BD: Umm. Well, I'm sure there are some. But I don't know of any.

NH: Are there any groups or musicians we haven't talked about, that you'd have something to talk about? Like, I don't know, the Righteous Brothers or Sonny and Cher. What do you think about what they do?

BD: No, no, I can't really... they're OK, you know, I don't...

NH: The last thing I wanted to ask was, going back, all the various things that became part of your growing-up process as a musician and as a composer – remember you've mentioned Big Joe Williams among others – how did all this, you know, take shape, so far as you can look back?

BD: Well, I just, you know, made up my mind very early that if there was anything you wanted, you know, you really had to... really had to, you know... make an attempt to sacrifice everything, a lot of things. And there was nothing really that I wanted, 'cause, you know, you can look around and see people who've got just about anything you'd wanna think to have. And you can see how they are, how they act and what they're like, you know.

NH: How do they act? I mean...

BD: Well, they just act very strange. Let's say people, you know, who've got it all... you know, an inheritance and stuff like that, you know. And nice things, and that's all they've got, you know, is their things like that... Well, I didn't want anything like that. I knew that what would... however I did it, it would be in terms of some kind of creating something. No matter what it was, but it was me that did it, you know. Something which I could also do, you know, just for, you know, me. 'Cause I just made up my mind not to have anything, you know.

NH: How old were you when this was...

BD: I don't know. I was about eighteen, seventeen. I knew there was nothing I ever wanted.

NH: Materially, you mean?

BD: Yeah. And I didn't want anything, and I just made it from there. So I just drifted around. I mean, I've been up a lot of times round places with no places to go and it's been very early in the morning and stuff like that, and it never fazed me. It was never like, well, here I am, stuck on the, you know, highway, bumming down the railroad line, hell, and I feel sad. It wasn't that kind of a thing at all. It was like, right out of my mind.

NH: Does all of this bread now, like I read you're gonna make a million and a half in the next eighteen months, does that mean anything to you?

BD: Well yeah. All it does is that it enables me to stay away and not get... you know, not really go insane, with all the people that grab at you. And it's honest, you know, it's honest bread. I mean, it's honest in terms of – when you're talking about all the bread, what we're talking about is not the concert money or the, you know, record sales money, that stuff. The money has come from just writing these songs.

NH: That's where most of it comes from.

BD: Yeah, most of it comes from there. And that, all that money, you know, like, it's there ... I really can't think about it one way or another.

NH: Do you have that scene where somebody takes care of it and invests it?

BD: Oh yeah, I don't even touch it, man. I don't want anything to do with it. I don't want to be like that.

NH: What do you thinks gonna happen to it eventually?

BD: Well, eventually it'll probably just blow away, back where it came from.

NH: Do you think your renown is gonna blow away, you know, the way things just sometimes disappear?

BD: Oh sure, to a whole crowd of people that are just buying the hit records now. The majority of those people probably won't have heard of me for a couple of years, probably.

NH: And then maybe a new generation of kids might find somebody else?

BD: Yeah. I don't really worry about fading in or fading out, though. That's another thing.

NH: In a way, would you welcome being anonymous again?

BD: Well, I would to a degree, but not really. I mean, I wouldn't wanna be anybody except me.

NH: I meant anonymous only in the sense that you could walk down the street and...

BD: Oh yeah. Well, anybody would welcome that. That's another thing, but... then again, being me I can get all sorts of little things, you know, favors and stuff like that for other people, you know, so that's...

NH: Oh, we didn't go back to that... the various kinds of musics that, as you were growing up, helped shape what you were gonna do. Big Joe Williams was one.

BD: Well, that was later. That was when I left there. The only music I heard up until I left Minnesota was – I didn't hear any folk music at all. I just heard, you know, country and western music, rock n' roll and polka music.

NH: Who were the ones that you heard then that you especially dug? Country and western, let's say.

BD: Oh, just about all the people. There was Marty Robbins. Not Marty Robbins, I didn't think (rest of sentence mumbled and indistinct) Lefty Frizzell, you know, Faron Young, all those people like that.

NH: And rock n' roll?

BD: Well, all the people that were around. Elvis Presley and Carl Perkins, Gene Vincent, Buddy Holly, Jerry Lee Lewis.

NH: And then what was added on, like in the folk field?

BD: Well... then it came down to the fact that to make it alone you had to, you know, play alone. So you discovered folk music, where people had to, you know, play alone. And, you know, first it started with, you know, Odetta. Oh no, it starts with Harry Belafonte. It starts with Harry Belafonte. You know, him. And right away you know he's not really where it's at.

NH: Why?

BD: Well, I mean, you know, you know right away, and you haven't got that much time to spend on it. Harry Belafonte, I mean, you know, that he just doesn't know that many songs.

NH: Yeah. Then Odetta?

BD: Then Odetta and you go through these stages. Josh White... till finally you arrive at Woody Guthrie, who sounds pretty weird, you know. And obviously who looks like... you know, looks like you, to some kind of degree. And I went through all Woody Guthrie's songs. And, you know, then the folk music, which I'd heard somewhat to a degree. I knew people that sung Barbara Allen and stuff like that. And I listened to all that music. And a lot of it I heard before, I mean, I really actually have heard before, I've actually heard old people singing a lot of the folk songs that... like Lord Thomas and stuff like that. I've heard these songs before when I was young.

NH: You mean around where you grew up?

BD: Yeah, yeah. I've heard people sing them. I've never paid much attention, you know, to people that did it. But people are... you know, the people sitting on their porches and then sometimes, you know, when you'd walk by, they wouldn't be singing anything that you'd hear on the radio. They'd be singing folk songs, you know. But who would wanna hear 'em? Like, they were a drag, you know. But I remember hearing 'em, you know, and... you know, there was stuff like that.

NH: After Guthrie was there anybody particular?

BD: Uh, no, not really. Woody Guthrie really hasn't influenced that... what I'm doing now. He hasn't had much to do with the influence of these past two records. In fact he really hasn't had any influence at all on the past two records.

NH: Yeah, I haven't heard any.

BD: The influence has all been on the first record, second record, third record. The fourth one, it was kind of wearing off a little bit. But that was still confined to the folk music circle. When I say influence, I mean total influence. I mean either writing or singing, you know. I mean, his influence is... is in his manner of speaking, you know. His influence is in his topics that he writes about. His influence lies in his phrasing, you know, and stuff like that. Now there's really no influence and I don't know what it is any more. It's not influenced by him really at all as much as... the songs are influenced by sounds.

NH: Sounds?

BD: Yeah. The songs are just... you know, like opening up a window, you know. Just looking out on a street, you know. Like every... it's all gonna be a different street. Or just being out on a street, just a whole kinda thing, which is not a thing to write about. I don't write about anything any more. Those songs aren't about anything.

NH: Yeah, there's a kind of surrealistic feeling, especially in the last record, in which you get a... all kinds of images getting together. It's a very provocative kind of thing.

BD: Well, you see, you know, they're not really images to me. You know, like, I know what they are, they're real, you know, they're... they might be images to other people who've never seen them, you know, like. But I know what those things are and, uh... when it comes time for me to be an image-maker, now you're really gonna hear some fantastic images. But up till now there's been no images really.

NH: Yeah. Well how do you define an image-maker?

BD: Something which I haven't seen, you know.

NH: Oh I see. Where it comes entirely out of your imagination.

BD: Yeah. These songs are not out of my imagination.

NH: Out of experience.

BD: Yeah. You can call it experience, I guess, or something.

NH: What you've seen or whatever.

BD: Yeah.

NH: How do you feel when you hear kids coming up now who try to sound like you? You know, all of a sudden you're an influence.

BD: I like that, you know. I'd rather have them have me for an influence than... Carroll Baker or, you know, Warren Beatty or somebody like that.

NH: It's... I wanted to be sure I was clear on one thing. You feel more like performing now 'cause the group's with you, which means there's less of that kind of pressure of being a soloist?

BD: Yeah. Also because I just want to. I really dig it, you know. I dig it. And the halls are all very full, you know. And there's... it's just a thing now. I always wanted to do it, you know.

NH: Why do you think it's become more fun for you in the last...

BD: Well, it's good because I'm more in control. I know what it's... I know more... it's like, uh... I know what I'm doing, you know. Before I used to do it, it just happened. Like, you want a concert for a long time, you know, and the first big concert I played with them was in Philadelphia. And we just went there, you know, in a car, and then got out, took the guitar and went up to the stage and sang for about three and a half hours, you know. I didn't know what I was going to sing. I was just standing there trying to think of things to sing. I sang just... and then I... after the concert I just put the guitar back in and I left. That was at Town Hall, and...

NH: Philadelphia?

BD: Yeah, Philadelphia. Then when we had one the next night, it was exactly the same thing, you know. That was fine for then, but I couldn't keep on doing the... I couldn't do that nowadays. I wear out my clothes every time I get on stage. I can't...

NH: You mean there's that much wear and tear?

BD: Well, yeah. It's either that or else I'm really... I play it now, you know. Now it's like every... I got... I'm not just standing there and thinking of what to play. Like, it's all down now and I know it, sort of, you know, And, uh...

NH: You're a professional.

BD: Well I hate to think of my term... myself in terms of that. Hate to think of my terms in self of that, really!

NH: Do you think of yourself in terms of being a folk singer? Does that term mean anything to you?

BD: No, it means absolutely nothing to me, folk singer. I know what folk music is, you know, that's why I really can't call myself a folk singer.

NH: Why?

BD: Well, you know, it's like... people, they're talking about folk music nowadays. Like, most of the people talking about it, they don't even know what they're talking about. It's like, when they... they always say that folk music, that you've gotta keep something simple, so that the people can understand it, right? Actually they're insulting a bunch of people by calling them people, right? So the people can understand it, you know, whereas when they really wanna look at folk music and at folk songs, there are some really strange, weird folk songs, you know, that have come down through the ages, based on nothing. Based on a legend or Bible or, you know, plague or... or religion, and just based on mysticism. There are a lot of those folk songs. Really a lot of them. And it's... you know, I don't understand where all this business is, you know. You gotta just keep things simple. This is like the labor movement kind of thing, which is all just total, you know, waste.

NH: Yeah.

BD: Look at all those labor people. They're all rich suburb people. Tell their kids not to buy Bob Dylan records.

NH: You mean the ones who came up with the simple labor songs of the thirties?

BD: Yeah. Which Side Are You On? I'm not asking anyone "which side are you on?" And which side can you be on? I mean, is there really only two sides to anything, you know?

NH: Why don't you consider yourself a folk singer then, in terms of what you know about folk music?

BD: Well, because I've got a very deep respect for it, you know. I respect folk music. I mean, I really do. You know, it's great man, it's great music, you know. There's no doubt about it. I'd rather listen to it sometimes than anything. But it's not a thing to play with. You know, you can't play around with it and have folk song groups and have folk gatherings and "let's all sing a bunch of folk songs". It's not that kind of thing at all, you know. It's just not that... people just lost the point. That is not the point of what a folk song is and who a folk singer is, you know.

NH: What is the point and who is the folk singer?

BD: Well, you know, you have a lot of these people in the south, who just sit around in places and, uh... they don't wanna be bothered with any collectors or Alan Lomaxes or anybody like that. They're not gonna sing any songs over tape-recorders. They're not gonna do that. They sit around, you know, and they can sing all by themselves. Or if somebody's in the room, they won't even know you. They're like a writer, you know, they're like, totally in a world of their own. They sing songs about things which mean something to them but don't mean a thing to anybody else. They talk about roses growing out of peoples brains, you know. And, you know... lovers who are geese, you know... and swans who turn into angels and, you know... There's some very hard stuff, you know, like much more harder than that. They really talk about things which you know they know about. Or if they don't know about, can feel it. That's what folk mus... that's what folk song... a folksinger singing a folk song, that's what I would think of. I certainly wouldn't think of any, you know, twenty-two year old kid going to a, you know, labour rally and singing some union songs. This is...

NH: You mean a folksinger is where it comes out of a whole inner world, a whole world really, of background, culture...

BD: Yeah, it's a whole world in somebody's head, you know. Where a folksinger, you know, can be a gas station man really, you know. We don' have to call folk singers, you know, southern mountain farmers. We don't have to call a folk song, you know, a song that has been living, you know for 1800 years. We can call anything a folk song, you know.

NH: Providing it's pertinent to the...

BD: Providing that it is in a rhythm of it's own and in a time of it's own, and somebody else is... whoever listens to it is allowed to listen to it, you know.

NH: Allowed? You mean, uh...

BD: They're allowed to listen to it. Not even to make a comment on it.

NH: It's not a performance, in other words.
BD: Right, it isn't a performance at all.
NH: Then what do you call yourself or consider yourself?
BD: Obviously when I'm on the stage I'm performing. Now, the records aren't performances. We could've made this last record a lot better than we did. But it's all down there, you know.
NH: Are you a folk singer then on the records?
BD: No, I'm not a folk singer really at all, you know. I'm not... I could call myself a folk singer. I mean, if it would mean anything. But it doesn't mean anything.
NH: What do you call yourself?
BD: I don't call myself anything, I really don't. I'm sort of a slot machine. Slot machine wonder!
NH: What do you do?
BD: I don't really have any titles which I would really wanna claim, you know.
NH: Is there anything I haven't asked that you think would be relevant? Or irrelevant?
BD: I don't know. No, well, it's... really it's... I don't know, somehow. I mean, somehow even, you know, the idea of where this is even gonna go. This interview is just... it's just, uh...
NH: Say some more about that. I wanna see if...
BD: I mean, who's even gonna read it, you know. Take the kinda people that are gonna read it. How much is the magazine, first of all? It costs what? A dollar or something?
NH: A buck and a quarter, something like that.
BD: Yeah, well, there's only a certain kind of people that's gonna read that magazine.
NH: Seventy-five?
BD: Certainly, like...

Three million people (unknown speaker)

BD: I don't wanna find that I'm in a magazine, gonna make some bunny chick someplace, you know, to be in the magazine. But I don't see anything that's really gonna be done, you know. I don't expect to know anything 'cause I can't... I don't know where the outlet is for what I do, you know. The only outlet I know of is records, and I don't know who buys the records. It's the same with the magazine. I have no idea really who buys the magazine except that I know it's a very funny-looking group of people, you know. I mean people which I don't freely associate with. I don't know anybody that associates with. And we go to towns and we see the Playboy Clubs, and we see the people that go into Playboy Clubs. But, God man, like it's... that's just uh... who wants to go in a Playboy Club, you know?
NH: Yeah. You said, and this is the very last thing, do you think anything can be done by any one person to change anything?
BD: Well I don't know. Like, I used to have spent... I was about to change things, you know. Like, it used to be that for days and days I'd walk around in the same clothes, you know. Nowadays I change clothes, you know, once a day and, you know, if I can possibly get to, I change 'em more. I change 'em more, you know. I think that's a big step.
NH: That's about the...
BD: ...for me.
NH: That's about the one possibility of a change?
BD: That's about the only change I see. The other change is destruction, you know.
NH: And you think that might happen?
BD: Well I don't think it'll happen here. I just don't think people are ready for it, you know. I don't think that... everybody's so destructive as it is that if anybody wants to destroy something there are enough people around to destroy whatever it... destroys, you know.
NH: Yeah.

BD: But if you want to change something, man, well what's all this talking business? If you wanna change something you just... Wham... you just destroy it, you know? Or else don't talk about it.

NH: Or sing about it.

BD: Right.

NH: Thank you very much. You have a lot of patience.

9 October 1965
Ann Carter Interview, Atlanta, Georgia

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 995-997.

Ann Carter interviewed Bob just before the show at the Atlanta Auditorium on October 9th 1965. The article appeared the following day in the Atlanta Journal.

NOT FOLK SINGER OR LEADER – DYLAN

Bob Dylan, the 24 year old singer-poet described as a 'mythological' – almost legendary – folk leader in his own time, denies that he is either a folk singer or a leader.

"I'm not involved in folk music," Dylan said before his Saturday night concert at the City Auditorium.

"What I do is music. I have a deep respect for it, not necessarily for what's being written today, but for songs about plagues, myths and Bible stories."

"I just listen because I dig them; not because I get anything out of it."

"When I write, I don't try to reach anybody. If someone likes it – or doesn't like it -it doesn't matter."

"I only hold respect for what I write. I don't create my fans, they can take care of themselves."

But a group of around 4,500 young people at City Auditorium Saturday night did 'take care' and applauded Dylan wildly for his performance.

Dylan, who was described by one concertgoer as a 'small-scale Chico Marx', strung verse pictures together in his newest (about six weeks old) song, Desolation Row. The song lasted 12 minutes.

The second part of the program, judging from applause, was the most popular. Dylan, still dressed in British-cut grey suit, played an electric guitar and was accompanied by five others.

He concluded the performance with Rolling Stone and took one curtain call, despite shouts of "more".

Some critics say that Dylan, who became well known for his songs like Blowin' In The Wind, his nasal, half speaking, singing voice; and his guitar and harmonica playing has grown away from his folk style to rock n' roll.

"I don't play rock n' roll." Dylan said. "I do play with electricity. I like it. The only reason I didn't do it before is because I couldn't afford it."

"The Beatles haven't influenced my music or my words. They may've influenced my going to England."

Dylan says he has been to England three times in the past four years, giving concerts first in 'little' and now big hotels. He's met and talked with the Beatles and has admiration for a group called Herman and the Hermits.

"I wouldn't know what to say if I met Herman and the Hermits," Dylan admits. "I'd probably punch them on the nose. I do that to people I like."

Asked what kind of music he liked, Dylan answered, "I like midgets because I can look down on them, and mailmen... and scientists."

He said people send him lots of letters and he answers them all.

Later, on the subject of people, he denied that they provoked him. "I like people. People think something's wrong with everything. I don't. I can accept sword swallowers, hunchbacks, girls with one leg... I accept everybody."

Did he have any personal philosophy? "I never hide Kleenex from anybody," Dylan replied. "And I always try to keep one eye on the ashtray. The ashtray keeps my head straight."

"I'm not out to prove anything. I have no point to get across. I'm no messenger, no spokesman. It's not my place. I just do what I do."

He added, however, that he disliked institutions. "I have no respect for any group that has a president or a vice-president... for any organisation that has a motto. I stay out of it. I don't need it. I live in a world that doesn't exist in politics. I just don't have those problems."

"If people ever ask me what to do – I can't tell them – they'll kill me. But they have Martin Luther King and President Johnson to tell them what to do now. They don't need me."

"I'm sure you don't understand why I sell records (he has 6 LP's on the market) or who my followers are. They are people not in the headlines. They are not protestors. I'm not making an attempt to tell anybody that I KNOW what's going on. I really know nothing of what's going on... if you can understand the law of opposites."

"I don't do stuff like protest the war in Vietnam. Who's somebody to say 'No' to another who wants to fight. When has somebody to fight?" Dylan asked.

"We all have to learn to take care of ourselves. We all have to learn judo to protect ourselves."

15/16 November 1965
Margaret Steen Interview, Toronto, Canada

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 803-808.

This interview took place in Bob's hotel room in the Inn On The Park, Toronto after the Massey Hall concert on either the 15th or 16th of November 1965. Margaret Steen conducted the interview and it was eventually reported in The Toronto Star Weekly on January 29, 1966.

Not Bob Dylan! The anguished folkniks would've believed it of anyone else but not of him. Bob Dylan is, for the uninitiated, a mopheaded throaty-voiced 24-year-old folk singer-poet-composer. But not an ordinary folk singer. From 1961 when his melodious Blowin' in the Wind asked some important, unanswerable questions about the world and first gained him mass recognition, his visionary lyrics to guitar have made him the spokesman for a whole restless, rebellious generation.

Unlike most musical idols of the young, his ability to handle folk and blues idioms had established him as a major – an original! – talent with even the most highbrow, purist critics; his image-filled verses had won the respect of serious poets. To his fans Bob Dylan means the ultimate in far-out, the untouchable, the incorruptible, the uncompromising – the man who sees through the Image Makers and the Mass Market and the Big Sell.

But what was this at Toronto's Massey Hall? Bob Dylan to an electric music band – boom boom, deafening, cacophony! I mean, you have to call it rock and roll. Bob Dylan, how could you do this to us?

Bob Dylan stares at the cigarette butt he is jamming into an already crowded ashtray, looks resigned but amused.

"A lot of people don't dig it, or say they don't dig it, or tell people not to dig it." (His speaking voice is musical, rises and falls constantly, phrases intensely.) "It don't matter. It's easy for people to classify it as rock and roll, to put it down. Rock and roll is a straight 12-bar blues progression. My new songs aren't. I used to play rock and roll a long time ago, before I even started playing old-fashioned folk, 10 years ago when I was a kid for God's sake..."

"Nowadays the music industry is totally different. You know who the rock and roll singers were 10 years ago – Fabian, Ricky Nelson, Bobby Rydell. Rock and roll singers now are a different kind of people; they make the old people look sick."

He picks up a Toronto Daily Star folded to a review of his Massey Hall concert the night before. He doesn't usually read much that's written about him, but one of the fellows in the band showed him this one line that really got him; The reviewer said Bob Dylan who once prefaced a song with the announcement that it "wasn't written in Tin Pan Alley, where most of the folk songs come from these days – it was written down in the United States," now belongs to Tin Pan Alley.

"Tin Pan Alley! I know that scene. Fat guys chewing cigars and carrying around gold records, and selling songs, selling talent, selling an image. I never hung out there! Neither did anyone else who is big now. The singers 10 years ago were kids but the old guys ran things; now the people actually in control are younger – the managers, the record company-bosses, kids, in their 20's. Man, these old guys have no idea, they've been left behind and by the time they figure it out they'll be so old it won't matter. Then the pace was slower, you could sell a 'talent'; now you can't do that, the industry is too big, exposure too great, you can't manufacture an image because sooner or later that image is gonna have to talk."

He runs down like a record when you switch it off without removing the needle, averts his face, embarrassed at having gone on so long. For he is the exception to what he's just said; he doesn't talk. "Like I write, I don't have to talk," he says with a grin when I catch him up on this; and he means it. These days with the Beatles loving press conferences, tossing out one-liners that make great copy, exposing their witty, whimsical selves like verbal pin-ups, Bob Dylan is really unique.

He says he doesn't like giving interviews, doesn't like talking to the press and he really means it. Take this concert tour he's doing with Levon and the Hawks, the Toronto electric-music group he's adopted. If you were a reporter in one of the Canadian or U.S. cities they played, you pestered an entourage of road managers, personal managers, press managers – all kids! in their 20's – and kept getting the polite response, "I'll talk to him and let you know, but I don't think there's much chance. He doesn't like interviews."

He's ill at ease in this interview, one of the few lengthy ones he's ever given. He's sitting beside me on a couch, dressed in an outrageous navy blue shirt with white polka dots and huge billowing sleeves (looking just as he does in pictures, the mop of hair, everything! only more graceful) and somehow making his standard hotel room in Toronto's swanky Inn on the Park seem a world away from the gray flannel conventioneers roaming around the lobby below. He fidgets constantly, keeps twisting his legs up under him and stretching them out again, pushing cigarette butts around the ashtray, sitting bolt upright and slouching back down. I soft of want to reassure him, to quote from his own song.

> I ain't lookin' to compete with you,
> Beat or cheat or mistreat you,
> Simplify you, classify you,
> Deny, defy or crucify you.
> All I really want to do
> Is Baby, befriends with you.

But that would be pretty silly so we keep talking about the New Sound, which has put Dylan records on top of the teen charts in addition to all the high-class prestige symbols he's accumulated; and which is making some purists shriek, "Rock and roll! Sell-out!" and others shriek "Marvelous!" On the concert tour he does the first half of the show by himself, with guitar and harmonica, the social-comment songs that first won him renown and – mostly – the more recent love songs. But then he brings on Levon and the Hawks with their array of electric guitars, electric Fender bass, electric organ and piano and drums. Dylan plays an electric guitar himself! And they do the New Sound. The words are as brilliant, surrealistic, meaningful as ever. But it's harder to hear them. And quite a few folkniks have been booing their one-time idol.

"If they like it or don't like it, that's their business," Bob Dylan tells me gently. "You can't tell people what to do at a concert. Anyway, paying out $4 for a ticket to come and boo – is anyone groovy gonna do that anyway? Four years ago I used to sing in Village coffee houses, 50 people and they were packed, fire inspectors all over the place, you know? Then I knew my real fans. Now, these concerts, I don't know them, I don't know why they're there. I don't know what they think about when they go away."

To Bob Dylan the idea of pinning a "folk idiom" and therefore "all right" label on his old songs is as absurd as calling his new songs rock or folk-rock, a distortion of an old form and thus "commercial! a sell-out!" He says, "It's all music; nothing more, nothing less." He has no prejudices about music; when he was learning, he soaked up every influence – early Elvis Presley as well as the folkniks' darling, Woody Guthrie, who is said to have had the greatest influence on his work. He is constantly experimenting – and how can you call one experiment more "commercial" than the other? He made as much money on his folk albums as he does on his rock singles, and as for the money "that's something I haven't come to terms with yet" anyway. He literally has no idea how much he earns (though associates say it was well over $250,000 last year); he's incorporated so he won't be taxed too brutally, but he leaves all that to business managers, and except for the private plane which taxis him from one concert stand to the next, his life is luxury-less in the conventional "star" sense.

When he first came to the Village from the town of Hibbing, Minnesota, 60 miles from the Ontario border, where he grew up, he did real old-fashioned folk songs – you know, written by the people. Then he said, "I can't do this. I don't care how pure the song is, or how great its tradition – it don't mean anything to me, today." So he started singing about stuff that means something to him, today – A Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall about the 1962 Cuban missile crisis; Oxford Town about the ordeal of James Meredith, the first Negro to enroll in the University of Mississippi; Blowin' in the Wind of course – and developed the modern protest song which now, three years later, has spawned scores of imitators, ("the children of Bobby Dylan," Life magazine called them recently) and has become the thing in popular music.

But though his words are new he was still writing in old musical forms – and why was this any less artificial than singing dated lyrics? I mean the way-out electronic Space Age sound was the natural next step – electric music is what's happening today, it's sheer 20th-century.

"Before," he says of his first protest songs, leaning forward with one of his rare stares right at me, "every song had to have a specific point behind it, a person, a thing. I would squeeze a shapeless concept into this artificial shape, like, like..."

Like With God on Our Side, his ironic commentary of three years ago on how people justify fighting, which ends with the lines:

> The words fill my head
> And fall to the floor,
> If God's on our side
> He'll stop the next war.

"Yeah! Yeah! Like that one," says Dylan, excited that I'm catching on to what he means. "It's a good song, I'm not putting it down; but this thing I wanted to say, I had to jam it into a very timed, rigid stylized pattern."

"Now!... Well for one thing, the music, the rhyming and rhythm, what I call the mathematics of a song, are more second-nature to me. I used to have to go after a song, seek it out. But now, instead of going to it I stay where I am and let everything disappear and the song rushes to me. Not just the music, the words, too. Those old songs I used to write, everyone is imitating them now. What I'm doing now you can't learn by studying, you can't copy it, someone else can't say he's writing a song 'like that'."

This is true. Lyrics like this from 'Subterranean Homesick Blues' get the message across all right, but not in a lecture – in a rush of feelings.

Ah get born, keep warm
Short pants, romance, learn to dance
Get dressed, get blessed
Try to be a success.

It's the same with the love songs. Take the girl of whom he sings:

You will start out standing
Proud to steal her anything she sees
But you will wind up peeking through her keyhole
Down upon your knees.

Is she a real girl? He smiles enigmatically. "She's a lot of real girls. You know girls like that, don't you?" And, of course, you do, but you would never have thought of describing her quite that way. In an age when love song lyrics must be either terribly flippant and rhymey, or else sheer gibberish, Dylan's evocative imagery may make him the 1960's answer to the romantic poets of the past.

There is silence for a few moments while I think of some of the more intriguing lines from his songs. What, I asked him did he mean by:

Ah, but I was much older then,
I'm younger than that now.

"My God, did I write that line?" He smiles "I was in my New York phase then, or at least, I was just coming out of it. I was still keeping the things that are really really real out of my songs, for fear they'd be misunderstood. Now," with another smile, "I don't care if they are."

Like, he had all the answers, then. If we can get rid of the Bomb nobody will fight any more. If we integrate the schools every one will love one another. It was so simple, he was so much older then.

"No, I'm not disillusioned. I'm just not illusioned, either. The civil rights and protest songs, I wrote when nobody else was writing them. Now everyone is. But I've found out some things. The groups promoting these things, the movement, would try to get me involved with them, be their singing spokesman – and inside these groups, with all their president vice-president secretary stuff, it's politics, all politics. Inside their own pettinesses they're as bad as the hate groups. I won't even have a fan club because it'd have to have a president, it'd be a group."

He's wound up now, veering off toward something else that he feels very strongly about.

"They think the more people you have behind something the more influence it has. Maybe so, but the more it gets watered down, too. I'm not a believer in doing things by numbers. I believe that the best things get done by individuals. Back when I used to play in the rock and roll bands I used to get in these hang-ups on the group, the lowest common denominator. I knew I couldn't make it that way. So I discovered folk, and sang by myself."

But now he's back to playing with a group again...

"Yes but we play my songs."

As always when he works himself up to a pitch about something he's saying, his mood breaks visibly, and he sinks down into his seat with a look of resignation, trying to expand a bit more but not really interested: "It's different now, there aren't the same hang-ups as with a bunch just starting out... But it don't matter. If I weren't sleeping here in the Inn on the Park, so I'd be sleeping off in some alleyway somewhere."

Again, it's like a line from one of his songs:

> There's no success like failure > and... failure's no success at all

But what does it really mean? He smiles that faraway, enigmatic smile again "When you've tried to write this story about me if you're any good you'll feel you've failed. But when you've tried and failed, and tried and failed – then you'll have something."

"Look." He's sitting up again, intense, eyes bright. "If I met you in a bar somewhere, or even at a party, I could tell you more, we could talk better, I know it. But you're a reporter, you're here for your interview – and where will it all get either of us? Nothing will happen. You're not even writing this story under your own conditions. And how much can you say? How much room would you have to say it in, even if you could say it?"

"Look. I'm sorry. I know you couldn't get everything, but you did get something didn't you?"

Yes Oh, yes, and thanks. I know he doesn't like talking to reporters, and I really appreciate it...

He is saying goodbye, across a great gulf, already weighing the experience that isn't quite over yet, probably deciding it was useless but weighing it just the same, face blank, but eyes giving him away, the mind behind them whirring away like crazy. I can understand how he could say, as he did earlier when I asked him about material for songs, "Why man, just with the experiences I've experienced already, I could never step outside this room again and still write songs until the end of time."

The 19 November 1965 Columbus, Ohio, concert took place at the Veterans' Memorial Auditorium and the only songs known to have been done there are: She Belongs To Me, Baby Blue, and Desolation Row. Between almost every song in the first half, Dylan retuned his guitar, saying at one point, "My electric guitar never goes out of tune".

26 November 1965
Joseph Hass Interview, Chicago, Illinois

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 315-318.

Joseph Hass of the Chicago Daily News interviewed Dylan on November 26th 1965 before the first of his two concerts at the Chicago Arie Crown Theater. The article appeared in the Panorama section of the November 27th edition of the Chicago Daily News.

Bob Dylan, one of the most talented and controversial figures in American entertainment, will perform tonight in the second of two concerts in Arie Crown Theater of McCormick Place. When the twenty-four year old performer sings his original compositions, in his highly distinctive way, millions of young people listen – at concerts and on his best-selling long-playing albums and single recordings. Wise parents, who want to understand what the younger generation is thinking, would do well to listen to him, too. Dylan is a difficult performer to classify. Is he a protest singer, leader of the folk-rock cult, a rock n' roller, or a natural progression in American folk music? He has been called all of these things, and perhaps the wisest course is not to try to classify him at all, but to let him speak for himself, at length and informally.

JH: Will you sing any of the so-called folk-rock music in your concerts here?

BD: No, it's not folk-rock, it's just instruments... it's not folk-rock. I call it the mathematical sound, sort of Indian music. I can't really explain it.

JH: Do you dislike folk-rock groups?

BD: No, no, I like what everybody else does, what a lot of people do. I don't necessarily like the writing of too many songwriters but I like the idea of, look, like they're trying to make it, you know, to say something about the death thing. Actually I don't know many of them. I'm twenty-four now and most of them playing and listening are teenagers. I was playing rock n' roll when I was thirteen and fourteen and fifteen, but I had to quit when I was sixteen or seventeen because I couldn't make it that way. The image of the day was Frankie Avalon or Fabian or this whole athletic supercleanness bit, you know, which if you don't have that, you couldn't make any friends. I played rock n' roll when I was in my teens. Yeah, I played semi-professionally, piano with rock n' roll groups. About 1958 or 1959, I discovered Odetta, Harry Belafonte, that stuff, and I became a folk singer.

JH: Did you make this change so you could "make it"?

BD: You couldn't make it liveable back then with rock n' roll. You couldn't carry around an amplifier and electric guitar and expect to survive, it was just too much of a hang-up. It cost bread to make enough money to buy an electric guitar, and then you had to make more money to have enough people to play the music. You need two or three to create some conglomeration of sound. So it wasn't an alone kind of thing, you know. When you got other things dragging you down, you're sort of beginning to lose, crash, you know? when somebody's sixteen or twenty-five, who's got the right to lose, to wind up as a pinboy at sixty-five?

JH: By "making it", do you mean making commercial success?

BD: No, no, that's not it, making money. It's being able to be nice and not hurt anybody.

JH: How does your sound differ today?

BD: It differs because it doesn't. I don't know, you see. I don't know exactly what to say rock n' roll is. I do know that... think of it in terms of a whole thing. It's not just pretty words to a tune or putting tunes to words, there's nothing that's exploited. The words and the music, I can hear the sound of what I want to say.

JH: Did you go into the folk field, then, because you had a better chance of "making it"?

BD: No, that was an accidental thing. I didn't go into folk music to make any money, but because it was easy. You could be by yourself, you didn't need anybody. All you needed was a guitar. You didn't need anybody else at all. I don't know what's happened to it now. I don't think it's as good as it used to be. Most of the folk music singers have gone on, they're doing other things. Although they're still a lot of good ones around.

JH: Why did you give up the folk sound?

BD: I've been on too many other streets to just do that. I couldn't go back and do just that. The real folk never seen Forty-Second Street, they've never ridden an airplane. They've got their little world, and that's fine.

JH: Why have you begun using the electric guitar?

BD: I don't use it that much really.

JH: Some people are hurt because you've used one at all.

BD: That's their fault. It would be silly of me to say I'm sorry because I haven't really done anything. It's not really all that serious. I have a hunch the people who feel I betrayed them picked up on me a few years ago and weren't really back there with me at the beginning. Because I still see the people who were with me from the beginning once in a while and they know what I'm doing.

JH: Can you explain why you were booed at the Newport Folk Festival last summer when you came on stage with an electric guitar and began singing your new material?

BD: Like, I don't even know who those people were. Anyway, I think there's always a little boo in all of us. I wasn't shattered by it. I didn't cry. I don't even understand it. I mean, what are they going to shatter, my ego? And it doesn't even exist, they can't hurt me with a boo.

JH: What will you do when the success of your present kind of music fades?

BD: I'm going to say when I stop, it just doesn't matter to me. I've never followed any trend. It's useless to even try.

JH: In songs like The Times They Are A-Changin' you made a distinction between young and old thinking. You talked about the older generation failing to understand the younger?

BD: That's not what I was saying. It happened maybe that those were the only words I could find to separate aliveness from deadness. It has nothing to do with age.

JH: What can you say about when your first book is coming out?

BD: Macmillan is the publisher, and the title now is Tarantula. Right now it's called that but I might change it. It's just a lot of writings I can't really say what it's about. It's not a narrative or anything like that.

JH: Some stories have said that you plan to give up music, perhaps soon, and devote your time to writing?

BD: When I really get wasted, I'm gonna have to do something, you know. Like I might never write again. I might start painting soon.

JH: Have you earned enough money to have freedom to do exactly what you want?

BD: I wouldn't say that. You got to get up and you got to go to sleep, and the time in between there you got to do something. That's what I'm dealing with now. I do a Jot of funny things. I really have no idea, I can't afford to think about tonight, tomorrow, any time. It's really meaningless to me.

JH: Do you live from day to day?

BD: I try to. I try not to make any plans. Every time I go and make plans, nothing really seems to work. I've given up on most of that stuff. I have a concert schedule I keep, but other people get me there. I don't have to do anything.

JH: Do you ever hope to settle down to a normal life, get married, have kids?

BD: I don't hope to be like anybody. Getting married, having a bunch of kids, I have no hopes for it. If it happens, it happens. Whatever my hopes, it never turns out. I don't think anybody's a prophet.

JH: You sound quite pessimistic about everything.

BD: No, not pessimistic. I don't think things can turn out. That's all, and I've accepted it. It doesn't matter to me. It's not pessimism, just a sort of sadness, sort of like not having no hopes.

JH: What about religion or philosophy?

BD: I just don't have any religion or philosophy. I can't say much about any of them. A lot of people do, and fine if they really do follow a certain code. I'm not about to go around changing anything. I don't like anybody to tell me what I have to do or believe, how I have to live. I just don't care, you know. Philosophy can't give me anything that I don't already have. The biggest thing of all, that encompasses it all, is kept back in this country. It's an old Chinese philosophy and religion, it really was one... There is a book called the I Ching, I'm not trying to push it, I don't want to talk about it, but it's the only thing that is amazingly true, period, not just for me. Anybody would know it. Anybody that ever walks would know it. It's a whole system of finding out things, based on all sorts of things. You don't have to believe in anything to read it, because besides being a great book to believe in it's also very fantastic poetry.

JH: How do you spend your time when you're not on a concert tour?

BD: I keep a regular bunch of hours. I just do what I have to do, not doing nothing really. I can be satisfied anywhere. I never read too much. Once in a while I write up a bunch of things, and then I record them. I do the normal things.

JH: What about romantic reports about you and Joan Baez?

BD: Oh, man, no, that was a long time ago.

JH: On her latest album, about half of her songs are Dylan songs.

BD: Heaven help her.

JH: What about the story that you changed your name from Bob Zimmerman to Bob Dylan because you admired the poetry of Dylan Thomas?

BD: No, God, no. I took the Dylan because I have an uncle named Dillon. I changed the spelling but only because it looked better. I've read some of Dylan Thomas' stuff, and it's not the same as mine. We're different.

JH: What about your family?

BD: Well, I just don't have any family, I'm all alone.

JH: What about a story that you invited your parents to one of your early concerts, paid their way there, and then when they were seated, you said on stage that you were an "orphan", and then didn't visit them when they were in New York.

BD: That's not true. They came to a concert, they drove there on their own, and I gave them some money. I don't dislike them or anything, I just don't have any contact with them. They live in Minnesota and there's nothing for me in Minnesota. Probably sometime I'd like to go back for awhile. Everybody goes back to where they came from, I guess.

JH: You talk as if you are terribly separated from people.

BD: I'm not disconnected from anything because of a force, just habit. It's just the way I am. I don't know, I have an idea that it's easier to be disconnected than to be connected. I've got a huge Hallelujah for all the people who're connected, that's great, but I can't do that. I've been connected so many times. Things haven't worked out right, so rather than break myself up, I just don't get connected.

JH: Are you just trying to avoid being hurt again?

BD: I haven't been hurt at the time, the realization is afterwards. Just looking back on it, thinking about it, it's just like a cold winter.

JH: Do you avoid close relationships with people?

BD: I have relationships with people. People like me, also disconnected, there are a lot of disconnected people. I don't feel alienated, or disconnected, or afraid. I don't feel there's any kind of organization of disconnected people. I just can't go along with any kind of organization. Some day I might find myself alone in a subway car, stranded when the lights go out, with forty people, and I'll have to get to know them. Then I'll just do what has to be.

3 December 1965
San Francisco Press Conference, San Francisco, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 359-374.

The San Francisco Press Conference was set up by Ralph Gleason at KQED-TV, an educational station, in the bay area of San Francisco and took place on December 3rd 1965. It was broadcast on KQED later that day, just before Dylan and The Hawks played their first night at the Berkeley Community Theater. The Press Conference proceedings were published in Rolling Stone and later in the Rolling Stone book Talking With The Legends of Rock And Roll. The conference is to be found on vinyl and CD where there are, in parts, major differences from the Rolling Stone transcript. I've used the CD as my source, checking a few points out on the vinyl as well.

The cheekiest of all the questions, perhaps, – "Can you ever envisage being hung as a thief" was posed by Allen Ginsberg who was in the audience.

The following introduction is from Gleason himself and is taken from the Legends article.

When Bob Dylan's five concerts in the San Francisco Bay Area were scheduled in December 1965, the idea was proposed that he hold a press conference in the studios of KQED, the educational television station.

Dylan accepted and flew out a day early to make it.

He arrived early for the press conference, accompanied by Robbie Robertson and several other members of his band, drank tea in the KQED offices and insisted that he was ready to talk about "anything you want to talk about". His only request was that he be able to leave at three p.m. so that he could rehearse in the Berkeley Community Theater where he was to sing that night.

At the press conference there were all sorts of people. The TV news crews of all the local stations were there; so were reporters for three metropolitan dailies (their stories were subsequently compared to the broadcast of the interview by a University of California journalism class), plus representatives of several high school papers; and personal friends of Dylan including poet Allen Ginsberg, producer Bill Graham and comedian Larry Hankin.

Thus the questions ranged from standard straight press and TV reporters questions to teenage fan club questions, to in-group personal queries and put-ons, to questions by those who really had listened to Dylan's songs.

He sat on a raised platform, facing the cameras and the reporters and answered questions over a microphone, all the while smoking cigarettes and swinging his leg back and forth. At one point he held up a poster for a benefit that week for the San Francisco Mime Troupe (the first rock dance at the Fillmore Auditorium and one of the first public dances featuring the Jefferson Airplane). At the conclusion of the press conference, he chatted with friends for a while, jumped into a car and went back to Berkeley for a rehearsal. He cut the rehearsal off early to go to the hotel and watch the TV program which was shown that night.

I'd like to know about the cover of your forthcoming, er... album, the, er... the one with... and some blues in it. I'd like to know about the meaning of it and the Triumph T-shirt.

BD: What would you want to know about it?

Well I'd like to know if that's an equivalent photograph. It means something; it's got a philosophy in it. I'd like to know visually what it represents to you – because you're a part of it.

BD: Um. I haven't really looked at it that much.

I've thought about it a great deal.

BD: It was just taken one day when I was sittin' on the steps, y'know... I don't really remember too much about it.

Well, what about the motorcycle was an image in your song writing? You seem to like that.

BD: Oh, we all like motorcycles to some degree.

I do.

Do you think of yourself primarily as a singer or as a poet?

BD: Oh, I think of myself more as a song and dance man, y'know.

What?

BD: A song and dance man.

Why?

BD: Oh, I don't think we have enough time to really go into that.

You were quoted in the Chicago Daily News as saying that when you're really wasted you may enter into another field. How "wasted" is really wasted, and do you foresee it?

BD: No, I don't foresee it, but it's more or less a ruthless type of feeling. Very ruthless and intoxicated to some degree.

The criticism that you've received for more-or-less leaving folk for folk-rock hasn't seemed to bother you very much. Do you think you'll stick with folk-rock or are you going on into more writing?

BD: I don't play folk-rock.

What would you call your music?

BD: I would call it... urn... I like to think of it more in terms of vision music... it's mathematical music.

Would you say that the words were more important than the music?

BD: Er, the words are just as important as the music. There would be no music without the words.

Which do you do first, ordinarily?

BD: Er, the words.

Do you think there will ever be a time when you will paint or sculpt?

BD: Oh, yes. Oh sure.

Do you think there will ever be a time when you'll be hung as a thief?

BD: You weren't supposed to say that. Do we have a match?

Bob you said you always do your words first and think of it as music. When you do the words can you hear it?

BD: Yes!

Can you hear what sort of music you want when you do your words?

BD: Yes, Oh Yes!

Do you hear any music before you have words?... Do you have any songs that you don't have words to yet?

BD: Umm, sometimes, on very general instruments, not on the guitar though... maybe something like the harpsichord or the harmonica or autoharp... I might hear some kind of melody or tune which I would know the words to put to. Not with guitar though. The guitar is too hard an instrument. I don't really hear many melodies based on the guitar.

Do you sit down just to write a song or do you... on inspiration?

BD: I more or less write it on a lot of things.

What poets do you dig?

BD: Oh, Rimbaud, I guess. W. C. Fields. The Family, you know, the trapeze family in the circus; Smokey Robinson, Allen Ginsberg, Charlie Rich... he's a good poet.

In a lot of your songs you are hard on a lot of people... in Like A Rolling Stone you're hard on the girl and in Positively Fourth Street you're pretty hard on a supposed friend. Are you hard on them because you want to torment them or because you want to change their lives, to make them notice.

BD: I want to needle them.

Do you still sing your older songs?

BD: No. No. I just saw a songbook last night; I don't really see too many of those things, but there's a lotta songs in those books I haven't even recorded, you know. I've just written down, you know, and put little tunes to them and they published them. I haven't sung them though. A lotta the songs I just don't even know anymore, even the ones I did sing. There doesn't seem to be enough time, y'know.

Did you change your program when you went to England?

BD: No, no, I finished it there. That was the end of my older program. I didn't change it, it was all, it was more or less... I knew what was going to happen all the time, y'know. I knew how many encores there was, y'know, which songs they were going to clap loudest and all these kind of things.

On a concert tour like this do you do the same program night after night?

BD: Oh, sometimes it's different. I think we'll do the same one here in this area though.

Did you, in England, do any of the songs like Subterranean?

BD: No, I didn't work with the Band then.

Would you be working with the Band here?

BD: Oh yeah.

(Some unheard comment from the floor) BD: Thank you very much.

In a recent Broadside interview Phil Ochs said you should do films. Do you have any plans to do this?

BD: No, I don't... I do have plans to make a film but not because anybody said I should do them.

How soon will this be?

BD: Next year probably.

Can you tell us what it will be about?

BD: It'll just be another song.

Who are the people making films that you dig, particularly?

BD: Truffaut. I really can't think of any more people. Italian movie directors, y'know, but not too many people in England and the United States particularly who I really think that I would dig.

You did a Charlie Chaplin bit as an exit line in a concert once.

BD: I did!?! That must've been an accident. Have to stay away from that kind of thing.

(Various aside comments concerning a polaroid picture given him about which he comments)

BD: Good God. I must leave right away.

What do you think of people that analyze your songs? Do they usually end up with the same meaning that you wrote, or...

BD: I welcome them... with open arms.

The University of California mimeographed the lyrics to all the songs on the last album and had a symposium discussing them. Do you welcome that?

BD: Oh sure. I'm just kinda sad I'm not around to be a part of it, but...

It'd be pretty wild if you had been.

BD: Yes.

Mr. Dylan. Josh Dunson in his new book Freedom In The Air implies that you have sold out to commercial interests and the topical song movement. Do you have any comments, sir?

BD: Well, no comments, no arguments. No, I sincerely don't feel guilty.

If you were going to sell out to a commercial interest, which one would you choose?

BD: Ladies' garments.

Bob, have you worked with any rock n' roll groups?

BD: Uh, professionally?

Or just sitting in or on concert tours with them, or sitting in on their sessions.

BD: No, no, I don't usually play too much.

Do you listen to other peoples recordings of your songs?

BD: Sometimes. A few of them I've heard. I don't really make it, I don't really come across it that much though, so...

Is it a strange experience?

BD: No, it's like a, more or less like a heavenly kind of thing.

What do you think of Joan Baez' interpretations of your earlier songs?

BD: Er, you mean the one's she... I haven't heard her latest album, or her one before that. I heard one. She does 'em all right, I think.

What about Donovan's Colours and his things?

BD: What do I think of Donovan's Colours?

Do you think he's a good poet of love ballads?

BD: No. He's a nice guy though.

I'm shattered.

BD: Well you needn't be.

Are there any young folk singers or rock groups that you would recommend for us to hear?

BD: I'm glad you asked that. Oh, yeah, there's the Sir Douglas Quintet, I think are probably the best that are gonna have a chance of reaching commercial airways. They already have with a couple of songs.

What about Paul Butterfield?

BD: They're good.

Mr. Dylan, you call yourself a completely disconnected person. Would you like to...

BD: No. I don't call myself that. They sort of drove those words in my mouth. I saw that paper.

How would you describe yourself? What is it that you, you... have you analyzed why you appeal to people?

BD: I certainly haven't. No.

Mr. Dylan, I know you dislike labels and probably rightfully so, but for those of us who are well over thirty, could you label yourself and perhaps tell us what your role is?

BD: Well, I'd sort of label myself as "well under thirty." And my role is to, y'know, to just stay here as long as I can.

Phil Ochs wrote something in Broadside magazine to the effect that you have twisted so many people's wigs that he feels it becomes increasingly dangerous for you to perform in public before an audience.

BD: Well, that's the way it goes, you know. I don't, I can't apologize, certainly.

Did you envision the time when you would give five concerts in one area like this within ten days?

BD: No, no. This is all very new to me.

If you were draftable at present, do you have any feelings of what your actions might be?

BD: No, I'd probably just do what had to be done.

What would that be?

BD: Well, I don't know, I never really speak in terms of "what if, y'know, so I don't really know.

You're considered by many people to be symbolic of the protest movement in the country, by the young people. Are you going to participate in the Vietnam Day Committee demonstration in front of the Fairmont Hotel tonight?

BD: No, I'll be busy tonight.

You planning any demonstration?

BD: Well, we thought of one. I don't know if it could be organized in time.

Would you describe it?

BD: Uh... well, it was a demonstration where I make up the cards, you know; they have... uh... they have a group of protesters here... uh... perhaps carrying cards with pictures of the jack of diamonds on them and the ace of spades on them. Pictures of mules, maybe words and... oh, maybe about 25-30,000 of these things printed up and just picket, carry signs and picket in front of the post office.

What words?

BD: Oh, words – camera, microphone, loose – just words, names of some famous people.

Do you consider yourself a politician?

BD: Do I consider myself a politician? Oh, I guess so. I have my own party though.

Does it have a name?

BD: No. There's no presidents in the party... there's no presidents, or vice-presidents, or secretaries or anything like that, so it makes it kinda hard to get in.

Is there any right wing or left wing in the party?

BD: No. It's more or less in the center... kind of on the uppity scale.

Do you think your party could end the war with China?

BD: Uh... I don't know. I don't know if they would have any people over there that would be in the same kind of party. Y'know? So it might be kind of hard to infiltrate. I don't think my party would ever be approved by the White House or anything like that.

Is there anyone else in your party?

BD: No. Most of us don't even know each other, y'know. It's hard to tell who's in it and who's not in it.

Would you recognize them if you see them?

BD: Oh, you can recognize the people when you see them

Are there still tickets available for your concerts...

BD: I don't know, I would imagine so.

How long do you think before you finally quit?

BD: Gee, I don't know. I could answer that, you know, but it would mean something different probably for everybody, so we want to keep away from those kind of sayings.

What did you mean when you said...

BD: I don't know, what things were we talking about?

You said, "I don't think things can turn out on a..."

BD: No, no, no... it's not that I don't think things can turn out. I don't think anything you plan ever turns out the way you plan it. That's all.

Is that your philosophy?

BD: No, no. Doesn't mean anything.

Do you think that it's fun to put on an audience?

BD: I don't know. I've never done it.

You wrote a song called Baby You Been On My Mind. You didn't record it, right? Do you sing it in concert? Have you?

BD: No I haven't. No I haven't.

Are the concerts fun still?

BD: Yeah. Concerts are much more fun than they used to be.

Do you consider them more important than your albums, for instance?

BD: No. It's just a kick to do it now. The albums are the most important.

Because they reach the people?

BD: No, because it's all concise, it's very concise, and it's easy to hear the words and everything. There's no chance of the sound interfering, whereas in a concert, we've played some concerts where sometimes they have those very bad halls. You know, microphone systems. So it's not that easy for somebody to come and just listen to a band as if they were listening to one person, you know.

Will you make all those lyrics of songs available in a book sometime?

BD: Oh yeah. They all are.

You say you no longer sing your older songs. Do you consider your old songs less valid than the ones you are putting out now?

BD: No, I just consider them something else to themselves; you know, for you know, for another time, another dimension. It would be kind of dishonest for me to sing them now, because I wouldn't really feel like singing them.

What is the strangest thing that ever happened to you?

BD: You're gonna get it, man.

What is the weirdest thing that ever happened to you?

BD: I'll talk to you about it, later. I wouldn't do that to you.

What areas in music that you haven't gotten into do you hope to get into?

BD: Er, writing symphony... with different melodies and different words, different ideas... all being the same, which just roll on top of each other and underneath each other.

Mr. Dylan, when will you know that it is time to get out of the music field and into another field?

BD: When I get very dragged.

When you stop making money?

BD: No. When my teeth get better... or, y'know, God, when something makes a drastic... uh... when I start to itch, y'know? When something just goes to a terrifying turn and I know it's got nothing to do with anything and it's time to leave.

You say you would like to write symphonia. Is this in terms that we think of symphonies?

BD: I'm not sure. Well, songs which are all written as a part of a symphony... different melodies, different changes... with words or without them, you know, but the end result being a total... I mean they say my songs are long now, y'know; sometimes it's just gonna come up with the one that's gonna be, you know, one whole album, consisting of one song. I don't know who's going to buy it. That might be the time to leave.

What's the longest song you've recorded?

BD: I don't know. I don't really check those things, they just turn out long. I guess I've recorded one about eleven or twelve minutes long. Hollis Brown was pretty long on my second record and With God On Or Side was kind of long. But none of them, I don't think, there's words, there's much into anything as Desolation Row was, and that was long, too. Songs shouldn't seem long, y'know. It just so happens that it looks that way on paper, that's all. The length of it doesn't have anything to do with it.

But what happens if they have to cut a song in half like Subterranean Homesick Blues?

BD: They didn't have to cut that in half.

They didn't have to, but they did.

BD: No, they didn't.

Yeah?

BD: No. You're talking about Like A Rolling Stone.

Oh, yeah.

BD: Oh, they cut it in half for the disc jockeys. Well, you see, that song, it didn't matter for the disc jockeys if they had it cut in half because the other side was just a continuation on the other side, and if anybody was interested they could just turn it over and listen to what really happens, you know. But, we just made a song the other day which came out ten minutes long, and I thought of releasing it as a single, but there was... they would have easily released it and cut it up but it wouldn't have worked that way, so we're not going to turn it out as a single. Its called Freeze Out, you know. You'll hear it on the next album.

Of all the people who record your compositions, who do you feel does most justice to what you're trying to say?

BD: I think Manfred Mann. Manfred Mann. They've done the songs, they've done about three or four. Each one of them has been right in context with what the song was all about.

What's your new book about?

BD: Oh, it's about, uh... just about all kinds of different things... rats, balloons. They're about the only things that come to my mind right now.

Is that the same book by MacMillan?

BD: Yes, yes.

(Indecipherable question)

BD: No, I don't really do many of them. I wouldn't do it if I was oppressed or depressed... there's nothing wrong... it seems kinda silly up here...

Mr. Dylan, how would you define folk music?

BD: As a constitutional replay of mass production.

Would you call your songs "folk songs"?

BD: No. No.

Are protest songs "folk songs"?

BD: I guess, if they're a constitutional replay of mass production.

Do you prefer songs with a subtle or obvious message?

BD: With a what?

A subtle or obvious message?

BD: Uh... I don't really prefer those kind of songs at all... "message"... you mean like... what songs with a message?

Well like Eve Of Destruction and things like that.

BD: Do I prefer that to what?

I don't know, but your songs are supposed to have a subtle message.

BD: Subtle message?

Well, they're supposed to.

BD: Where'd you hear that?
In a movie magazine.
BD: Oh... oh, God! Well, we won't... we don't discuss those things here.
Are your songs ever about real people, like occasional poetry?
BD: Sure, they are, they're all about real people.
Particular ones?
BD: Particular people? Sure, I'm sure you've seen all the people in my songs at one time or another.
Who's Mr. Jones?
BD: Mr. Jones, I'm not going to tell you his first name. I'd get sued.
What does he do for a living?
BD: He's a pin boy. He also wears suspenders.
How do you explain your attraction?
BD: Attraction to what?
Your attraction... your popularity... your mass popularity.
BD: No, no. I really have no idea. That's the truth, I always tell the truth. That is the truth.

What are your own personal hopes for the future, and what do you hope to change in the world?
BD: Oh, my hopes for the future. To be honest, you know, I don't have any hopes for the future, and I just hope to have enough boots to be able to change them. That's all, really, it doesn't boil down to anything more than that. If it did, I would certainly tell you.

What do you think of a question and answer session of this type, with you as the principal subject?
BD: Well, I think we all have different... uh... I may have dropped an ash on myself somewhere... you'll see in a minute here... I'm not going to say anything about it though... uh... what was the question?
What are you thinking about right now?
BD: I'm thinking about this ash.
Right before that.
BD: Uh... the ash is creeping up on me somewhere... I've lost... lost touch with myself, so I can't tell exactly where it is.
Was that an inadvertent evading of the question?
BD: No, no...
What do you feel about the meaning of this kind of question and answer session?
BD: I just know in my mind that we all have a different idea of all the words we're using... uh... y'know, so I don't really have too much... I really can't take it too seriously because everything... like if I say the word "house"... like we're both going to see a different house. If I just say the word right? So we're using all these other words like "mass production" and "movie magazine" and we all have a different idea of these words, too, so I don't even know what we're saying here.
Is it pointless?
BD: No, it's not pointless. It's... you know, if you want to do it, you're there... then that's not pointless. You know, it doesn't hurt me any.
Is there anything in addition to your songs that you want to say to people?
BD: Good luck.
You don't say that in your songs anywhere do you?
BD: Oh, yes I do. Every song tails off with, "Good luck, I hope you make it."

Why couldn't you... uh... most of what you say...
BD: Who are you? (Laughter) Get the camera on this person here.

What do you bother to write the poetry for if we all get different images? If we don't know what you're talking about.

BD: Because I got nothing else to do, man.

Do you have a rhyme for "orange"?

BD: What, I didn't hear that.

A rhyme for "orange."

BD: A-ha... just a rhyme for "orange"?

Is it true you were censored for singing on the Ed Sullivan Show?

BD: I'll tell you the rhyme in a minute.

Did they censor you for singing what you wanted to on the Ed Sullivan Show?

BD: Yes. It was a long time ago.

What did you want to sing?

BD: I don't know. It was some song which I wanted to sing and they said I could sing. There's more to it than just censorship there. They actually said I could sing the song, but when we went through the rehearsal of it, the guy came back afterwards and said that I'd have to change it, and he said, "Can't you sing some folk song like the Clancy Brothers do?" And I didn't know any of their songs, and so I couldn't get on the program. That's the way it came down to.

Have you found that the text of the interviews with you which have been published are accurate to the original conversations?

BD: No, no. That's another reason I don't really give press interviews or anything, because, you know, I mean, even if you do something... there are a lot of people here, so they know what's going on... but like if you just do it with one guy or a few guys, they just take it all out of context, you know, they just take it, split it up in the middle or just take what they want to use, and they even ask you a question and you answer it and then it comes out in print that they just substitute another question for your answer. That makes you just sound like the way... It's not really truthful, you know, to do that kind of thing, so I just don't do it. That's just a press problem there.

Do you think the entire text of your news conference today should be printed in the newspaper?

BD: Oh, no, nothing like that. But this is just for the interviews you know, when they do want interviews in places like Omaha, or in Cincinnati, man, you know. I don't do it, and then they write bad things.

Well, isn't this partly because you are often inaudible? Like, for most of this dialogue or monologue you have been inaudible, and now when you are touched personally by the misquotation, your voice rises and we can hear you.

BD: Yeah, well, I just realized that maybe the people in the back there can't hear me, that's all.

I was gonna ask you whether, you know... in your songs, you sing out...

BD: Yes, I do.

And whether...

BD: Well, the songs are what I do. You see, the songs are what I do... is write the songs and sing them and perform them. That's what I do. The performing part of it could end, but, like I'm going to be writing these songs and singing them and records for, and I see no end, right now. That's what I do... uh... anything else interferes with it. I mean anything else trying to get on top of it, making something out of it which it isn't, it just brings me down, and it's not, it's not, uh... it just makes it seem all very cheap.

Well, it made me feel like you were almost doing kind of penance of silence here...

BD: No, no.

For the first part, no.

BD: I'm not one of those kinds of people at all.

You don't need silence?
BD: No, no silence. It's always silent where I am.

Mr Dylan, when you're on a concert tour, how many people travel in your party? Do you travel alone, or... ?
BD: We travel with about twelve people now.
Do the number of people seem to go with the amount of money you're making?
BD: Uh, I didn't hear that.
Do the number of people seem to increase as you make more money?
BD: Oh, yes. Of course.
Is that known as Dylan's law? Why do you need so many people when you travel on...
BD: Well, we have the band, we have five in the group. And we need other things. We have to... it's a lot of electronic equipment now, a lot of different things which have to be taken care of, so we need a lot of people. We have three road managers and things like that. We don't make any big public presentations, though, like we never come into town in limousines or anything like that. We just... uh... go from place to place, you know, and do the shows. That's all.

You fly in your own plane? Do you have a private plane?
BD: Yes. yes.

Do you have to get in a certain kind of mood to write your music?
BD: Uh, yeah, I guess so. A certain type of mood, if you want to call it that.
Do you find that you are more creative at a certain time of day?
BD: Yes, yes, I feel that way.
Like a night writer?
BD: I would say night has nothing to do with it.

Have you ever sung with the Beatles?
BD: No, no. Well, I think we may have messed around in London, but no, I don't think anything serious.

Have you ever played a dance?
BD: No, it's not that kind of music.
It is.
BD: Well, what can I say? You must know more about the music then than I do. How long have you been playing it?
Do you find that when you're writing, that you sort of free-associate often?
BD: No, it's all very clear and simple to me. These songs aren't complicated to me at all. I know what they are all about. There's nothing hard to figure out for me. I wouldn't write anything I can't really see.
I don't mean it that way. I meant that when you're creating a song, are you doing it on a sort of subliminal level, where you're letting you're mind just flow?
BD: No, my minds like that whether... or not...
You're very conscious of each step, each word.
BD: No, no. That's the difference in the songs I write now. In the past year or so... in the last year and a half, maybe two, I don't know... but the songs before, up till one of these records... I don't know. I wrote the fourth record in Greece... there was a change there... but the records before that, I used to know what I wanted to say, before I used to write the song, you see. All the stuff which I had written before which wasn't song was just on a piece of, you know, toilet paper. When it comes out like that it's the kind of stuff I never would sing because you know, I know people would just not be ready for it. But I just went through the other thing of writing songs so, and I couldn't write like it anymore. It was just too easy, and it wasn't really "right". I would start out, I would know what I wanted to say before I wrote the song and I would say it, you know, and it would never really come out exactly that way I thought it would, but it came out, you know, it touched it, you know, but now, I just write a song, you know, like I know that it's just going to be all right, you know, and I don't really know exactly what it's all about, but I do know the minutes and the layers of what it's all about.

What did you think about your song, It's Alright Ma (I'm Only Bleeding)? It happens to be my favorite one.

BD: God bless you son. I haven't heard it for a long time. I couldn't even sing it for you, probably.

How long does it take you to write a...

BD: Uh, usually not too long a time, really. I might write all night and get one song out of a lot of different things I write.

How many songs have you written?

BD: How many have I written? Uh... I guess, well, there's one publisher that's got about a hundred. I've written about fifty others, I guess. I got about 150 songs I've written.

Have they all been published?

BD: Well, no. Just... no. Some of the scraps haven't been published. But I find I can't really sing that anyway, because I forget it, you know, so the songs I don't publish, I usually do forget.

Have you ever taken these scraps, as you call them, and make them into copied songs?

BD: No. I've forgotten the scraps. I have to start over all the time. I can't really keep notes or anything like that.

You can't go back to one of your earlier things and use it in your...

BD: No, no. That wouldn't be right either.

(Indecipherable question)

BD: Yes, it happens, you know. That was a very... are you the same cat that was sitting over there?

On your songs, do you get any help from the rest of your entourage?

BD: What?

Do you get any help from the group that you play with... that you write your songs...

BD: Robbie, the lead guitar player, sometimes we play the guitars together... something might come up... but I know it's going to be right. I'll be just sitting around playing so I can write up some words. I don't get any ideas, though, any kind of ideas... of what I want to, you know, or what's really going to happen here.

Why do you think you're so popular?

BD: I don't know. I'm not a reporter. I'm not a newsman or anything. I'm not even a philosopher, so I have no idea. I would think other people would know, but I don't think I know. You know, when you get too many people talking about the same thing it tends to clutter up things, so I just... Everybody asks me that, so I realize they must be talking about it, so I'd rather stay out of it and make it easier for them. Then, when they get the answer, I hope they tell me.

Has there been any more booing when you played electric guitar?

BD: Oh, there's booing... you can't tell where the booings going to come up. Can't tell at all. It comes up in the weirdest, strangest places, and when it comes up it's quite a thing in itself. I figure there's a little "boo" in all of us.

Bob, where is Desolation Row?

BD: Where? Oh, that's someplace in Mexico. It's across the border. It's noted for it's coke factory. Coca-Cola machines are... sells -... sell a lotta Coca-Cola down there.

Where is Highway 61?

BD: Highway 61, it exists... that's out in the middle of the country. It runs down to the south, goes up north.

Mr Dylan, you seem very reluctant to talk about the fact that you're a popular entertainer... a most popular entertainer.

BD: Well, what do you want me to say?

Well, I don't understand why you...

BD: Well, what do you want me to say? What do you want me to say? Do you want me to say... who... who... what do you want me to say about it?

You seem almost embarrassed to admit that you're...

BD: Well, I'm not embarrassed, I mean, you know... well, what do you want, exactly... for me to say? You want me to jump up and say "Hallelujah"... and crash the cameras or do something weird? Tell me, tell me. I'll go along with you. If I can't go along with you, I'll find somebody to go along with you.

No, but I find that you really have no idea as to why you are, or... no thoughts on why you are so popular. That's what interests me on it.

BD: I just haven't really struggled for that. I don't, er... It happened, you know. It happened like anything else happens. Just a happening. You don't figure out happenings. You dig happenings. So I'm not going to even talk about it.

Bob, do you feel that part of the popularity is because of a kind of identification of your audience with what you're saying or what you've been writing about?

BD: I have no idea. I don't really come too much in contact.

Does it make life more difficult?

BD: No, it certainly doesn't.

Were you surprised the first time the boos came?

BD: Yeah, that was at Newport. Well, I did this very crazy thing. So, you know, I didn't really know what was going to happen, but they certainly booed, I'll tell you that. You could hear it all over the place. I don't know who they were though, and certainly whoever it was did it, you know, twice as loud as they normally would. They kind of quieted down some at Forest Hills, although they did it there, too. They've done it just about all over except in Texas... and they didn't boo us in Texas, or in Atlanta, or in Boston or in Ohio. They've done it in just about... or in Minneapolis, they didn't do it there. They've done it in a lot of other places. I mean, they must be pretty rich to be able to go someplace and boo. I couldn't afford it if I was in their shoes.

Other than the booing, have the audiences changed? I mean, do you get screaming and do you get people rushing on stage?

BD: Oh, sometimes you get people rushing the stage, but you just, you know... turn 'em off very fast. Kick 'em in the head or something like that. They get the picture.

Bob, going back to what you said a minute ago about not really being concerned or not really knowing why you are in the midst of this popularity. That is in direct opposition to what most people who reach this level of popularity say.

BD: Well, you see, a lot of people start out and they plan to try to be stars. I would imagine, like, however, they have to be stars. I mean, I know a lot of those people, you know. And they start out and they go into show business for many, many reasons, to be seen, you know. I started out, you know, like this had nothing to do with it when I started. I started from New York City, you know, and there just wasn't any of that around. It just happens, you know, so...

Don't misunderstand me, I agree with your right not to have to care. My point is that it would be somehow... somewhat disappointing for the people who think that you feel towards them the way that they feel towards you. And that's the reason for your popularity. That's what they think.

BD: No, well. I don't want to disappoint anybody. I mean, tell me what I should say... you know. I'll certainly go along with anything, but I really don't have that much of an idea.
You have a poster there. Is that an...

BD: Yeah, it's a poster somebody gave me. It looks pretty good. The Jefferson Airplane, John Handy Quintet and Sam Thomas and the Mystery Trend and the Great Society are all playing at Fillmore Auditorium Friday, December 10th, and I would like to go if I could, but unfortunately, I won't be there, I don't think, but if I was here, I certainly would be there.

Do you tour in the South?

BD: Yeah.

What's more important to you: the way that your music and words sound, or the content, the message of the work?

BD: The whole thing while it's happening. The whole total sound of the words, what's really going down is... it either happens or it doesn't happen, you know. That's what I feel is... just the thing which is happening there at the time. That's what we do, you know? That is the most important thing, there really isn't anything else. I don't know if I answered your question?
Well, you mean it might happen one time and might not happen the next time with the same song?

BD: Oh yeah! We've had some bad nights, but, well, we always take good cuts for the records. The records are always made out of good cuts and in person, it just, most of the time it does come across. Most of the time we do feel like, you know, playing. That's important to me... the aftermath and whatever happens before and after is not really important to me, just the time on the stage and the time that we're singing the songs and performing them. Or not really performing them even, just letting them be there.

Bob, we promised to spring you at a certain time which is now... it's now two o'clock.

A Night With Bob Dylan

INTRODUCTORY NOTE:
This article originally appeared in the NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE with a sub-heading, “Photographic Portfolio by Daniel Kramer”.
The previous day, the HERALD TRIBUNE had promised that its Sunday NEW YORK MAGAZINE would “devote 11 full pages to the amazing Bob Dylan”.
After describing Dylan as “the personification of anger and loneliness”, they went on to say that “this phenomenon is examined in depth in Sunday’s New York Magazine. Dylan’s talent is interpreted by critic William Bender. Plus a folio of photographs of the hero on a long night’s prowl around the city, with a commentary mostly in Dylan’s own words. Plus a cover portrait.”
Also on 12 December 1965, the NEW YORK TIMES carried a long piece on Dylan.
Three days later, Columbia Records issued a press release about the two pieces.

Bob Dylan picked himself up from the revolving turntable, staggered into an armchair, waved his hands above his head and sat down to watch the tube. On it, Soupy Sales was grinning from a mask of cream pie.

“Mmmmm”, said Dylan. “What a horrible, terrible, obnoxious way to make a living!”

Behind him, a double exposure of Elvis Presley fired two six guns into the room from a well-silvered Andy Warhol canvas covered with cellophane.

“I hate it...” Dylan said. “I’m going to cut a hole in its abdomen and put a water hose through it.” He got up, walked with cowboy bowlegs into the kitchen and asked someone to make him some tea. The reflection of Soupy Sales still grinned from his gray-colored shades.

It wasn’t Dylan’s pad; he had borrowed it from someone or other. On the floor, a mink rug played tablecloth for several cups and saucers, ashes and the ashtrays that the ashes had been intended for. On a couch opposite Dylan’s armchair sat Robbie Robertson, whom Dylan refers to as “the only mathematical guitar genius I’ve ever run into who does not offend my intestinal nervousness with his rearguard sound.” Robertson, who plays lead guitar in Dylan’s band, was strumming an autoharp. Several other people wandered about the room, some of them while sitting in their chairs.

“I want to hear that record again,” said Dylan, clattering back into the room on the high heels of his suede shoes with the laces untied. The record was “Since I Lost My Baby” by the Temptations, and Dylan had played it several times during the day.

“Do you think it’s as good as the Beethoven Quartets?” someone asked.

“I think it’s certainly as good as ‘Tracks Of My Tears’,” Dylan answered.

The doorbell rang. It was Brian Jones of The Rolling Stones with a limousine waiting outside. Dylan wiped Soupy Sales’ face off the TV tube, Robbie Robertson wiped the autoharp off his lap and everybody split. Dylan was the last to leave. He took the Temptations’ record off the turntable, hid it under his double-breasted corduroy jacket and winked at a light bulb. His tea, unsipped, was left to cool in its cup.

In the limousine, Charlie, the chauffeur, asked if the group was going downtown. “I’m getting off at the next block,” said Dylan. “These other people’re going downtown...” “Thank you, sir,” said Charlie. “No, we’re not going downtown,” said Milly, a friend of Brian’s. “Shut up!” said Dylan, “shut up and quit making that racket or else you’ll be thrown to the fire inspectors... and they're very hungry." "What?" yelled Milly. The car stopped at the corner and Milly, one way or another, was thrown out... "Watch the fire inspectors!" yelled Brian. "Nonsense," said Dylan, "I'm just fooling. We really don't have them over in America." The limousine eventually stopped at a bar in the Eighth Avenue district. After everyone in the party had entered, a very muscular woman ran up and very surprisingly hugged Dylan. "You're not supposed to do that without an eyepatch!" he jolted. "Hug my friend there, Brian, he looks more like me!"... "You can write on the walls here," said Dylan later at the table. "This is the only bar I know of where you can write on the walls and nobody calls you a poet."... Sailors began wandering over towards the table and eventually everyone decided to leave. "Where's Harold the driver?" asked Bob Neuwirth, a third cousin of Bob Dylan's. "That's not Harold," said Dylan, "that's Mr. Egg, and there but for fortune go you or I." "Ahhhhhhhhh," said Bob Neuwirth. "You must give me two points!" said Dylan. "And anyway, how do you know that his name ain't Egg?" "Where are we going?" said someone everybody called Hare-up. "We're going to the zoo."

"You Americans must all be soft," said Brian Jones. "Do you have any coyotes?" A sailor leaped on the table, grinning at Brian, who snarled back. "I like your hair," the sailor said. "What about hair?" Dylan said. "I thought we were going to the zoo," said Bob Neuwirth. "That's what we need," said Brian, "some coyotes." "Are you sure you mean coyotes?" said Dylan. "Are you sure we're going to the zoo?" said Brian Jones. "Be yourself," said Dylan. Everybody walked towards the door with the sailor leaping off the table and following them. "We're not really going to the zoo, are we?" said a girl named Johanna, a mutual acquaintance of everybody. "We're not going anyplace," said Bob Neuwirth. Dylan leaned on Brian Jones and asked, "Tell me, Brian, why is it that your lead singer does not have a little, pencil-thin moustache?"

Back in the limousine, someone directed the driver to an underground movie house on Lafayette Street. Later on, when questioned about it, Dylan said they were all blindfolded and taken there at gunpoint. On the stage inside, there was no movie, but instead a group of green painted musicians were presenting a spontaneous ritual which had taken them three months to prepare. Timothy Cain, a friend of Dylan's, whom they had run into under the marquee, grabbed the seat next to Dylan. "Can you smoke here?" he asked Dylan. "Of course you can smoke here," replied Dylan. "Put out that cigarette!" said a long-haired flowery girl, who turned out to be an usherette. Timothy ignored her. The usherette left in a huff, returning moments later with a chubby man who wore a handle-bar moustache and slippers. "Put out that cigarette!" the chubby man said. "Oh, my God," said Dylan "it's Porky Oil". Immediately, Timothy rose, grabbed the usherette's flashlight, unscrewed it, took the batteries out and threw the batteries at the Exit signs and proceeded to punch the chubby man in his ample stomach. At the same time, everyone in the party got up to leave as Dylan mumbled, "What good are exits anyway?" "I'm not an art fanatic," said Timothy, "I'm a cigarette smoker." "I like you," said Dylan. "I wish we were both alive during Napoleon's time."

After several stops, which included a pinball arcade on 42nd Street, the backroom of a fortune teller in the Chelsea district, the Phonebooth, a discotheque, and St. Paul's Cathedral, the limousine wound up in front of a bar in Greenwich Village. Four people remained in the group, the others having been left behind by accident. "Plenty more people inside," said the chauffeur. "Watch your tongue," said Dylan.

The group got out to go inside the bar, but it was already closed. "Back to the pad," said Dylan. There was a small number of people gathered around the mink rug when they returned. Dylan took the Temptations' record out from beneath his double-breasted corduroy jacket and put it on the record player. Then he went into another room and closed the door.

There was a W.C. Fields movie on the TV set. Dylan walked into the kitchen to get a bandage. "I think Marlon Brando should play the life of W. C. Fields," he mumbled. He fiddled around the in the kitchen. "I also think that Warren Beatty should play the life of Johnny Weissmuller." Wrapping the bandage round his finger, Dylan returned to his room, stopping to say, "As for me, I plan to play the life story of Victor Mature." "Is he serious?" said the mild-mannered, petite colored girl, who was sitting cross-legged on the floor. She was immediately thrown out.

Q: I wonder if you could tell me, among folk singers, how many could be characterized as protest singers today?
BD: I don't understand. Could you ask the question again?
Q: How many people who labor in the same musical vineyard in which you toil... how many are protest singers? That is, people who use their music and use the songs to protest the social state in which we live today. The matter of war, the matter of crime, or whatever it might be.
BD: How many?
Q: Yes. Are there many who...
BD: Yeah. I think there's about 136.
Q: You say, "about 136"?
BD: Yeah.
Q: Or do you mean exactly 136?
BD: It's either 136 or 142.

Q: What does the word "protest" mean to you?
BD: It means singing when you really don't want to sing. It means singing against your wishes to sing.
Q: Do you sing protest songs?
BD: No.
Q: What do you sing?
BD: I sing all love songs.
Q: Is it true that you changed your name? If so, what was your other name?
BD: …Kunezevitch. I changed it to avoid obvious relatives who would come up to me in different parts of the country and want tickets for concerts and stuff like that. Kunezevitch, yeah.
Q: Was that your first or last name?
BD: That was my first name. (Laughter & applause). I don't really want to tell you what my last name was.

Q: Bob, why is there such a widespread use of drugs among singers today? (Laughter)
BD: I don't know. Are you a singer?
Q: Do you take drugs yourself?
BD: I don't even know what a drug is. I have never even seen a drug. I would not know what one looked like if I saw one.
Q: Bob, what sort of technique do you use when you write a song, or don't you cal it any technique?
BD: Well, I just sit down and the next thing I know, it's there…
Q: Why are you putting us, and the rest of the world, on so?
BD: I'm just trying to answer your questions as good as you can ask them.
Q: I am sure you must have been asked a thousand times—what are you trying to say in your music? I don't understand ONE of the songs.
BD: Well, you shouldn't feel offended or anything. I am not trying to say anything to you. If you don't get it, you don't have to really think about it, 'cause it's not addressed to you.
Q: Are you trying to say something when you write? Or are you just entertaining?
BD: I'm just an entertainer. That's all.
Q: Do you really feel that it's important for you to write and sing?

BD: (Menacingly) Now, you are gonna make me mad now.
Q: Or do you just want to do it because you're successful? Do you really feel the things that you write?
BD: What is there to feel? Name me some things.
Q: We are talking about standard emotions—pain, remorse, love…
BD: I have none of those feeling.
Q: What sort of feelings do you have when you write a song?
BD: I don't have to explain my feelings! I am not on trial here!

Q: You sound and look very tired, very ill. Is this your normal state?
BD: I take that as an insult. I don't like to hear that kind of thing.
Q: What's the reason for your visit to California?
BD: Oh, I'm here looking for some donkeys. I am making a movie about Jesus.
Q: Where are you making it?
BD: Back east.
Q: Did your parents give you any special advice when you last saw them? Did they say 'good-bye' or 'good luck' or anything like that?
BD: No, do your parents do that to you?
Q: As a little boy, did you want to write songs and be a singer?
BD: No, I wanted to be a movie usher. It's been my lifelong ambition to be a movie usher, and I have failed, as far as I am concerned.

Q: Why do you think that kids are listening to you now?
BD: I really don't know. I just heard something a couple of days ago that amazed me… outside a concert we played at San José, there was this fifteen-year-old girl… being interviewed as to why she was there… she knew all the poets, like William Blake, and she knew his works and she was hip to all kinds of different things which people are usually not acquainted with at that age. So, maybe, it's just a new kind of person, a new kind of fifteen-year-old. I do know that today there's more freedom in the mind of twenty-two-year-old college students. I know that, that's rue.
Q: What's the attitude today among your people?
BD: Oh, God! I don't know any of these people.
Q: What do you spend your money on? You seem to lead a very simple, uncomplicated life. You don't seem to be interested in motor cars, girls, yachts…?
BD: Well, that's the way it goes. (Laughter).

Bob Fass/WBAI Interview, New York City, New York

Source: Hungry as a Raccoon by John B. Way, pp. 2-89.; The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 589-637.

The interview is more by way of a phone-in. WBAI-FM is a New York radio station sponsored by its listeners; Bob Fass (BF) was one of its regular presenters, hosting a late night show called Radio Unnameable. Fass's guest in the early hours of Jan 26th 1966 was Dylan – throughout the two hour program. Also present were Victor Maimudes (Pete The Suede) and Al Kooper (AK -Roosevelt Gook). Callers to the studio are numbered C1, C2,... etc.. Bob Fass repeated this phone-in exercise with Bob Dylan in 1985 (to be covered in a subsequent volume).

I have used the tape as my primary source but have relied heavily on the excellent transcript provided by John Way in his book Hungry As A Raccoon. John's book which covers both the 1966 and 1986 WBAI interviews contains detailed notes explaining many of the references or inferences in the text.

BD: That's groovy, man! Right. (commenting on music being played of Joseph Spence singing a Bahamian spiritual).

BF: This is Bob Fass. We're back on here with Radio Unnameable. Remember I told you about ten minutes ago that we were gonna have somebody come up who wasn't Shirley Temple?

BD: Ha! (sniffs).

BF: Well, it's true! Say hello!

BD: Uh, I don't... this is Shirley Temple.

BF: Yeah?

BD: (laughing) Aw, come on now, don't do this to me... I'm not supposed to do that... I haven't come down to apologize for not being Shirley Temple!

BF: You want me to introduce you like Mike Wallace?

BD: No – no, no, I wouldn't...

BF: Uh, This is Bob Dylan...

BD: Nooo, no... would I say that?

BF: I can't say who it is? Oh alright, OK.

BD: Unless you tell 'em who I really am.

BF: Well, who are you really? Put this in front of your ugly beard. Yeah, that's good. [probably BF hands Dylan a microphone at this point].

BD: Have you got any ashtrays here?

BF: Use the floor; I'll sweep up before I go.

BD: Oh, really?

BF: Yeah.

BD: Mm. All right...

BF: This is WBAI – listener-sponsored radio in New York City.

BD: I'm not hearing much...

BF: Does that impede you?

BD: No it doesn't impede me but I'm looking for a chair back there. Can we get another chair, Bob?

BF: Yeah, we'll see if we can get another chair in here – Raoul?

BD: Sort of a nice soft, comfortable chair.

BF: Let's sit down and get nice and comfortable. What's been happening with you?

BD: Oh my God, I don't know. What's been happening with you?

BF: Well gee, thousands of people are dying to find out what's been happening with you.

BD: Well, I know twice as many people that just have... that just have been tortured to death wondering what's been happening with you!
BF: Yeah? With me too.
BD: So what have you been doing, Bob?
BF: Well see, to tell you the truth I wish you'd come up some...
BD: Well, I came up here to talk about you now.
BF: ...some other evening, Bob, because I know that it's really hard for you to communicate without an extension cord...
BD: Oh, come on...
BF: ...without electricity. Have you brought electricity with you?
BD: Yes, I did.
BF: Batteries! Oh, you're transistorised!
BD: No, I... Oh God, I keep reaching for (unclear) I can see very well that it's (unclear). I'm sorry...
BF: Where were we, Bob? I don't know. Do you wanna take some telephone calls? Maybe if somebody could call...
BD: No; we were gonna get a chair, man...
BF: You need another chair?
BD: Well, I would like to have another chair, yeah. If it's alright.
BF: Can somebody out there bring up a chair to WBAI?
BD: Haven't you got some nice young girls that work down in (unclear)?
BF: ere, take a look at this, Bob.
BD: An advertisement, right?
BF: No, it's not. We don't have advertisements on this station, remember? Been a long time since you were here.
BD: Oh, yeah.
BF: (Reads) A radio station and its controversial late show announcer were knocked off the air by two men who invaded the studio and beat him with his microphone.
BD: That sounds like us. (laughs).
BF: Were you in Trenton, New Jersey last night, Bob? (Comment of "Sh, sh, sh." in background)
BD: My God.
BF: (talking of the radio announcer) He did a lot of things about 'right wing' and stuff like that.
BD: Well, I don't think it was us.
BF: No?
BD: No. We were out there, going to a Mario Lanza meeting, but we didn't see any (unclear)
BF: There's a Mario Lanza Society?
BD: Mario Lanza Society, right. But we don't wanna talk about it, though...
BF: Well, people call up and ask us to play old Mario Lanza records. Somebody called up and asked me to play some Liberace tonight.
BD: Oh, that's fine.
BF: Yeah?
BD: Yeah.
BF: Try to get in a little closer...
BD: You know, I met him one time – he smiled!
BF: Oh, yeah? I thought that he was really Merle Oberon.
BD: No, God, you oughta see him smile... I can't hear anything out here. Man, am I supposed to do this? With this over here?
BF: No, I've been putting you on. This isn't really a radio station.
BD: It's not a radio... ha ! I didn't think so ! I didn't think that'd be... (to Al Kooper AK) You see, I told you it wasn't a real radio station.
AK: You were right.

BD: He's got a record going right there.
BF: We'll stop that. We'll lift that off.
BD: (unclear) Stop right now.
BF: Who are all these people you brought up with you?
BD: I brought – over there to my right you see Charlie Fredericks. Charlie Fredericks usually handles all the equipment for the bulldozer riders, and comes with us during the half-times. And over here on your right you have, uh, Pete the Suede, who is at this minute wearing corduroy, but that's just because he doesn't (unclear).
BF: Suede shades. I've never seen suede shoes before.
BD: Suede shades – yeah, that's right. Everything about him is suede if you look closely.
BF: Yeah, and he's easily swayed.
BD: And that's Harry the Hat, who's gonna change his name, by the way. To – what was that? To, uh...
AK: Roosevelt Gook.
BD: Roosevelt Gook. Just for, uh, family reasons.
BF: You mean, change it back to Roosevelt Gook?
BD: No, change it to Roosevelt Gook. He's got a pretty strange family.
BF: Well, I mean, was it Gook in the old country, before they came over here?
BD: Uh, I don't know. You'll have to talk to him about that. If you care to talk to him I'm sure he'd be glad to...
BF: Sure, I'll talk to him.
BD: Oh, what about... oh, did you get the chair... oh, you got that, right... Are we really on the radio? Now come on, now.
BF: Yeah, we're on the radio, really. I think we are, yeah. It's the first night in a long time.

an unknown voice says "Eight and a half minutes to two."

BD: Eight and a half to two.
BF: Let's open this door.

unknown voice "It's dark in there".

BD: It's very dark in there, yeah.
BF: Yeah it's tough to work without an audience, huh?
BD: It is! Well, for who? For who, Bob?
BF: For me! I usually have a screaming audience of my fans in the studio.
BD: Yeah. Oh yeah, I can see, I can see there where the water cooler is that you...
BF: That's better. That's better. Our lighting engineer just came in...
BD: Do you have a telephone here? What I really dropped in for was to use your phone. (laughter)
BF: Well, here's a dime. Why don't you go down the corner and use the one there?
BD: (laughing) There's always one in every crowd.
BF: You wanna take some telephone calls?
BD: Where are they?
BF: And talk to the great, vast listening audience of WBAI?
BD: Sure! Are you joking? It's all I ever do!
BF: Yeah!
BD: To quote Socrates.
BF: I'll tell you what we'll do. We will go in the studio... To quote Socrates?
BD: Yeah... to quote Socrates!
BF: Yes, but in the ancient Greek?
BD: Why should we go to the studio to quote Socrates in the ancient Greek? I don't wanna quote him in the ancient Greek.

BF: All right then, I'll go, I wasn't... I didn't
BD: No, uh, did you want it in the studio?
BF: No, I wasn't going to say...
BD: I don't even know any Greek man! I can't stay and talk in... Greek.
BF: Well, maybe we can find an old Greek text book in the studio.
BD: Well, we could do that. We could, uh...

Unknown voice "Why'd you turn on the telephone?"

BD: Turn on the television! (laughter).
BF: Turn on the television, right. Tell you what we'll do, we'll send out some...
BD: Turn on the telephone – where is this telephone I've been hearing so much about?
BF: You're not letting me tell you what we're gonna do!
BD: Your telephone is very infamous.
BF: Yeah? Here's that thing here. We get people to call us on our talk-back number, see? And you can talk to them...
BD: Can we go in there? Is there any chance of going in there? I mean, I don't wanna be a drag... Let's turn off some light in here, Bob. I can understand why your program gets to be the way it is in the wee hours. It's very light in here.
BF: Is that better? (Puts lights off).
BD: No, no.
BF: How about that? Is that better?
BD: Wow, that's better! (laughing)
BF: That's more like it! The only thing you can see is those dials!
BD: Out there's Community City! My God. (talks to friends).
BF: Yeah, we're sitting in the control room here. It looks like we have a little stick in front of us, and we're flying low over New York City.
BD: Flying low?
BF: Yeah low. Are we flying low?
BD: Yeah. Did you notify Albert Grossman we were gonna fly low?
BF: No, I didn't notify Albert Grossman. Who's Albert Grossman?
BD: He's my, uh, pepper-maker. He makes all the pepper and, uh, keeps a good supply of, uh, (unclear).
BF: He's the magic Christian pepper-maker?
BD: Oh, magic Christian – maker of pepper, yes. But, uh, I wouldn't classify him really to that... that doesn't really catch the boundary of his life. (laughs). But it does good enough for a normal person on the street.
BF: It bounds off the edges?
BD: Yeah, yeah. Whatever edges there are to him. Well, let's go in there. Can we go in there? Can we just play a record in the meantime and then go in there and just, uh...
BF: Yeah. Any records you wanna hear?
BD: Oh, yeah – I wanna hear that Lightnin' Hopkins record.
BF: You wanna hear a Lightnin' Hopkins one... Raoul?
BD: Yeah it's called Drive My Car. You can be in my car and, uh... Oh, wait, no, no, it...
BF: Let's see. I have one Lightnin' Hopkins in here, I think.
BD: Oh, really?
BF: I can't find it in the dark!
BD: Oh, well don't... There you go, that's your stacking problem. (?) You really copped out, right? This music station business has really got...
BF: (to 'Pete the Suede') Lend him your suede shades.
BD: I don't have any suede shades. You must be talking to somebody else.
BF: That's a Ravi Shankar there (presumably searching through record collection).
BD: What's that? Oh, come on, come on, be serious.

BF: That's a test record here – yodelling in Hi-Fi...
BD: Jesus!
BF: ...Lightnin' Hopkins!
BD: Let me see if it is. Let me pick one.
BF: Yeah, you pick one.
BD: Lightnin' Hopkins – I Wish I Was A Baby (laughs). Lightnin' Hopkins? Did he say that.
BF: Well no, he sung it. It's a kind of a talking, uh... I wish you wouldn't drop your ashes on my Jose Feliciano records, there.
BD: Oh ho, good God. Poor Jose! Look why don't we put him between those wires over there and hang him there for a while?
BF: Talk about the subconscious wrath...
BD: That's the first terrible thing I've said all night. I've been trying to be good. Christmas Time Is Coming – I don't think this is the right album. This is a Joseph Spence album.
BF: No, no. This is the Lightnin' Hopkins album.
BD: Oh, I see. I was lookin'at this one's cover.
BF: Hey, how about giving me back that Lenny Bruce record I lent you three years ago? Have you got it with you?
BD: Hey, hey, come on. I don't mind making conversation but – Jesus God, man, don't just come and try to put some garbage in my, you know...
BF: You'd better watch taking the name of what's his name in vain.
BD: Who? Lenny Bruce?
BF: No! You said those other things there.
BD: Lightnin' Hopkins?
BF: No, no! You said, you know, the expletive there.
BD: Who?
BF: Just because Nietzsche says He's dead, you know...
BD: Nietzsche? (laughing).
BF: Nietzsche, yeah.
BD: Which Nietzsche, man?

unknown voice says "Which Nietzsche?"

BF: Hey, did you see that on the front page, I think, of the Herald Tribune, there were these women knitting an enormous sampler... sewing on this sampler that said 'Keep The Rumor In Circulation That God Is Alive'.
BD: Well... that's better than a lot of other slogans I've heard.
BF: I can't think of one that it's better than.
BD: Oh, it's better than, uh... it's certainly better than 'I'd Rather Fight Than Switch'!
BF: But it doesn't say who!
BD: What does it care... who'd care who? I'd rather hear... what was that one you just... what does it say? What was it?
BF: The one that I...?
BD: Yeah, the one you just said. What was that? Hold it – don't play another record until we settle this.
BF: 'Keep God Alive Because The Rumor Is Dead'. The fellow who'd written... (unclear).
BD: Yeah. Now I think that's a much better rumor to spread than 'I'd Rather Fight Than Switch'. Now that's all I said, right? (laughs). I think that's what I said. (aside to Bob Fass, who now attempts to play the record). Bob, quit reaching around me. Bob quit kissing me – Bob! Bob, no! No, Bob! Ah...
BF: You don't know what love is.

The Lightnin' Hopkins record plays.

BF: This is WBAI and this old building is crammed full tonight. Bob Dylan is here with me, and we're gonna be taking some telephone calls on Oxford 7-8506...
BD: (laughs) You get to say this...
BF: All you hippy-dips...
BD: (laughs) All the hippy dips.
BF: From Forest Hills, here's your chance to call up and talk to Bob Dylan. OK?
BD: Well, hey, maybe not, now. I might refer them to somebody else.
BF: WBAI... Hello there.
C1: Listen – I've just been listening and... I called a couple of times. I was wondering is it possible to come over and take a couple of pictures?
BF: No, it's not. I'm sorry. It's all right with me – you can take pictures of me, but some other night. Bob Dylan shakes his head – no.
C1: He shakes his head no.
BF: Yeah, the truth is that Bob Dylan isn't really here, and he's sold his soul to the Devil, and pictures don't appear. People point cameras at him and push buttons and nothing happens, and they're his blank emotions.
C1: Let me ask you one question, OK? Would you just tell him that it's my 15 year-old infatuated sister-in-law, and it's not for myself. (General laughter in the studio).
BD: Oh, of course, come right over.
C1: She didn't make it to Forest Hills, and she didn't go to Antioch.
BD: My goodness...
C1: ...you know and it's rough all round.
BD: What can I do? What can I do?
C1: And I promise a cup of coffee also.
BD: Oh Jeez, you make me feel terrible, I just can't begin to... (unclear).
C1: To make steps to go along with the mustard. (?)
BD: The mustache?
C1: The mustard. And I also sent in 15 dollars, you know, so...
BD: Oh, my goodness.
BF: What, did you send it to me or to Bob Dylan?
C1: No, I sent it to you.
BF: Oh well, see, that doesn't do any good.
C1: And I'm starving. It's not possible?
BD: Oh well, all right. We'll see you again some other time. Thanks for calling.
C1: It is possible or it's not possible?
BD: Huh? It's possible what?
C1: To take a picture or not
BD: Oh – to take a picture up here?
C1: Yeah.
BD: Oh no, you wouldn't wanna do that, no, no.
C1: I would like to do that!
BD: No, no, no. You really wouldn't. You'd be very disappointed. Yeah, you'd be disappointed.
C1: (breathes heavily)
BF: (sotto voce) I don't want you to know this but do you remember when Jose Feliciano was here and he did that invitation to Bob Dylan?
C1: Yeah.
BF: He's here again tonight, and he isn't really here...
C1: Oh. Would you do me another favor?
BF: ...It's really Jose Feliciano.
C1: Ask Jose to please explain folk-rock.
BD: Ha. What, have we gotta think about it...?
C1: I followed him up till then.

BD: I've, uh...
BF: It's gone way over three minutes.
BD: Yeah, it's gone way over three minutes, now.
BF: Oh, we let people go on as long as they want here.
BD: Not me! You don't let me go on over (BEEP) three minutes! (laughs).
BF: Well, you went on six minutes with the last record.
BD: Oh come on now.
C1: What's that little beep for?
BD: Well, that's not a little beep. (laughs)
BF: That's coming from the amplifier.
BD: (Clearly in jest) No, no – I don't know any folk-rock. I' m a folk singer, I'm a folk singer. I'm an ethnic folk singer. I feel very sensitive towards that fact. When people say that... (short break in tape)... folk singer, I usually... no, I can't hear that kind of thing. I'm very sensitive towards it and I don't wanna discuss it because it tampers into my personal psyche, uh, psycho... it, uh, I don't like it. You know like, I'm a folk singer. I'm an ethnic folk singer and like, uh, that's who I am, and if they don't like it then just don't call me up and talk to me on the telephone anymore. That's all I can say, because I don't like it and I don't... I refuse to be hurt! (background laughter) I refuse just to stand here on the phone and be hurt, and be asked questions which... I refuse it, I refuse it.
BF: Let me see if I can explain something to you. Big Bill Broonzy said that all music is folk music because he never heard horses sing.
BD: That's right. Big Bill Broonzy said that! (laughs).
BF: So it must be true.

Unknown voice "You tell 'em, Bob."

C1: Can I ask an extra question? Did he originate the term – Dylan – or was that something that the papers used?
BF: Did who originate? I don't know what you...
C1: That 'folk-rock' term.
BF: Did he originate? I don't know what you're talking about. Folk-rock...
BD: Sure I did! (laughs) Sure, I was just sitting around one night and I said "Folk-rock – what a great word!"
BF: Irvin Silber invented the term. It's the name of his new magazine.
BD: That's right! I don't know how many people know that. Are you a folk music fan?
C1: Yeah.
BD: Yeah well I'm sure you're aware of the magazine Sing Out!. It's a very respected well-to-do magazine in the folk music field and you'd better recognize who it is right?
C1: (breathing heavily again) OK. Fine.
BD: OK. Now if you... better realize right now... the organization and the bosses behind that magazine work in the Brill building, in Wall Street and, uh, in the toothpaste company. Like...
BF: Ever read the Protocols Of The Elders of Zion...?
BD: ...they invented that phrase 'folk-rock'. They also invented the phrase 'folk music'. They also...
BF: ...Fascist, Jewish conspiracy, right.
C1: Ha you're gonna get stabbed!
BD: You said It, you said it. You said it when you just called up.
C1: Oh you're gonna get beat up!
BD: Who?
BF: By the snow lovers.
C1: Yes.
BF: Listen, we have a lot of other calls.

C1: OK, fine. Thanks a million. Bye-bye.
BF: Bye-bye WBAI.
C2: (polite female voice) May I speak to Mr. Dylan, please? (impolite laughter in the studio).
BD: Is this chick going out over the radio?
BF: Yeah.
BD: (laughs) Can everybody else hear her voice?
C2: Hello?
BD: Who's this?
C2: I don't know.
BD: (laughs) All right.

Unknown voice "That's a good start That's great."

C2: Bob did you ever share a TV dinner with anyone?
BD: Did I ever share a TV dinner with anyone?
C2: Mm-hm.
BD: Never! Never! No, no.
C2: Would you share one with me?
BD: Insult after insult.
BF: I'm sorry, I'm gonna have to close the telephone if you people keep...
BD: No I most certainly did not.
BF: ...making improper suggestions to my guests.
C2: I thought it was a free speech radio station.
BF: Yes, but there are bounds of propriety. You can't shout free speech dinner in a crowded theatre!
C2: Oh you cannot?
BD: It's true! God that's pretty good! (laughs)
C2: How about lots of TV dinners?
BF: How about what?
C1: How about lots of TV dinners?
BF: That's compounding the conspiracy.
BD: Didn't I see you on Sixth Avenue?
C2: I called up NBC and complained about what they said about you!
BD: Huh?
BF: What, dear?
C2: I said, I called up NBC concerning what they said about you.
BF: What did they say about Mr. Dylan on NBC?
C2: They didn't say anything about him but they said something about BAI that I didn't like too much.
BF: Uh-Huh!
All: Ohhh! Wooooooooh!
BF: You know what we say about NBC!
BD: Yeah.
BF: TV dinners to NBC.
C2: OK. Bob wants two, but overcooked.
BF: OK. Anything else you want to say?
C2: Is he happy?
BF: That's a good question!
C2: Are you?
BD: Who, Mr. Brill?
C2: Bob!
BF: That's my name. I'm Bob.
C2: Are you happy?

BF: No, his friends call him Bobby.
C2: Well who said I was his friend?

Unknown voice "Big Bob to all the friends!"

C2: Am I your friend? Am I?
BD: (mutters).
BF: Who are you talking to?
C2: All of you.
BF: All of us?
BD: True everybody's your friend.
BF: That's a very personal, individual question.
BD: It's not personal, no, it's just dumb! I mean everybody...
C2: Why is it dumb? Of course, I couldn't possibly be your friend, because you don't even know who I am.
BD: Oh, come on. I do too!
C2: You do not!
BD: Come on! I saw you the other day!
C2: You did, huh?
BD: I did yes, and you know I did!
C2: It's funny, 'cause I didn't see you!
BD: Well, nobody ever sees me!
C2: Except on album covers. I'd like to though because I bet you're very nice.
BD: Well, that's very fortunate. Most people don't even see those... Huh?
C2: Underneath it all.
BD: Underneath it all?
C2: Um-mm?
BD: Yeah there's a lot of fortunates. (sings) "Underneath it all..."
C2: Would you make a record, called 'Underneath It All'? I bet you could.
BD: Would I? Would I make a render, uh a record underneath it all?
C2: Yeah.
BF: You have a peculiar love/hate relationship with your fans, I'm beginning to realize.
BD: No, I just realize I'm... (unclear)
BF: No, It's a love/hate, like something out of Genet.
BD: Oh, come on, all my fans have a sense of humor.
BF: OK. Unless you can say something besides 'TV dinner', we're gonna have to go on to another call.
C2: Well what can I say? Why don't you answer a question that I haven't asked? Something that you want to tell everybody but nobody asks you.
BD: Oh! I was waiting for somebody to ask me that!
C2: Well, would you?
BD: Well, no I won't.
C2: Why?
BD: Well, it's one of those things, it's one of those things.
BF: You're not wearing your tie tonight.
BD: Uh... no, you're not.
C2: What are you wearing?
BD: What are you wearing Bob?
BF: Well...
BD: He's wearing a pen, a fountain pen. He's wearing a wrist-watch. He has some very strange glasses! He wears very strange glasses, and I can tell you he'll be ready for an hear-aid pretty soon.
C2: Are you cold?

BD: Cold man – the chick's interested in you, Bob.
BF: What? Am I cold? I am a little chilly. Yeah heat up that TV dinner OK, thanks a lot...
BD: Oh yeah why don't you come here and set your lipstick on fire? (much laughter).
C2: Because I don't wear lipstick. Don't be cruel. See why don't you call back? No, you won't...
BD: Gee, we'll call you right back.
C2: No you won't.
BF: OK, bye bye.
C2: 'Bye.
BF: WBAI
C3: Hello.
BF: Hello.
C3: I wanted to ask, what happened to The Mask? Does he know what caused the demise of The Mask?
BF: What caused the demise of The Mask...
BD: The Mask... I don't know, d'you mean the Mask Theater in Newark?
C3: Pardon?
BD: You mean the Mask Theater?
C3: No it was a 'mask'. It was a bar or restaurant that I understood you used to go to on Christopher Street.
BD: I used to go to a place called The Mask?
C3: Yeah.
BD: Mm. Gee, I don't know. I'll have to pass on that. You'll have to call me back in the morning. OK?
C3: When you might be remembering it?
BD: Yeah. I don't even... as far as I know... I don't even... thank you very much anyway.
C3: OK. Can I ask one other question?
BF: If it's all right with Bob.
C3: Is it all right, Bob?
BD: Sure, sure.
C3: OK...
BD: No this is Harry.
C3: Why are some of your songs so long?
BD: My... Well, see, I get paid by the word.
C3: You get paid by the word! OK, thanks.
BD: Yeah. OK, 'bye.
BF: We're on Oxford 7-8506. WBAI.
C4: Hello. May I speak to Phil Ochs, please?
BD: (laughs) Yes, this is Phil Ochs.
C4: Oh.
BF: Well, you have him. What do you want to say to him?
C4: Uh, listen, the Mask Theater burnt down about eight months ago.
BD: (laughs) You're the same cat that just called up. Come on! Will you quit this? We all know who you are, come on! We know you! We can see you!
C4: How many phones do you think I got at this desk?
BD: Come on, come on, we can... see you. We know who you are, you can't...
C4: Right through the glass...
BD: We'll see you at the...
C4: In the Bat Cave.
BD: Yeah at the Bat Cave... good for you.
BF: WBAI.
C5: Hello is Mr. Dylan there? Can I talk to him?
BD: (laughs) Sure.

C5: Uh, hey, I'm on a psychedelic trip. Do you have any suggestions?
BD: (laughs) If you're on a psychedelic trip, where are you going to?
BF: Well change at Newport.
C5: I, I don't know, uh... I haven't decided yet.
BF: Are you going by bus?
BD: Did you pay for it, man? Did you pay for your ticket or what did you do? Did you just jump on or what?
C5: Well, I boarded... I got on board...
BD: Oh, you can afford it can you?
C5: Sure, why not?
BD: Uh-huh.
BF: Well, you have your... You're going with an outboard motor?
C5: Outboard motor? Is that a good way to go?
BD: Well... how's your gums feel?
C5: What's that?
BD: How's your gums feel at this point?
C5: It's beginning to hurt! (laughs).
BD: Ah-ha-ha, you see? It wasn't so good after all, was it?
C5: Well it's my head, I guess, now.
BD: I don't know about your head, man, but I'm more concerned with where you are. I mean you just might come into where we are!
C5: That's good. Can I do that, Phil?
BD: No, no, no, you can't do that.
C5: Why?
BF: Because there are all kinds of people waiting outside to beat us up. They're roaming around, rolling up snowballs.
C5: Why do you seem so paranoid? It seems like you're paranoid. Why should they want to beat you up.
BD: Tell him Bob, will you?
BF: Well, 'cause I guess we deserve it.
C5: Why? You're great! You got a radio station of your own and, uh... can't see why anybody wants to beat you up.
BF: 'Cause they don't like to listen to it.
C5: They don't like to what?
BF: Because we don't answer the other telephone calls.
C5: Oh! But why should you answer the other telephone calls?
BD: Well – listen, man, I hope you get where you're going...
BF: Yeah. Listen – drop us a line.
BD: ...and make sure you don't get robbed or anything, man, on the way!
C5: No. I'll be careful, OK.
BF: OK, bye-bye.
C5: All right, 'bye.
BF: WBAI.
C6: Hello. I'd like to ask Mr. Dylan why his book has not been published.
BD: Oh.
BF: There's a conspiracy.
BD: Oh, that's a serious question, right? No it's gonna be published soon. It's gonna be published... it'll be out within two months. I've just been changing it a lot.
C6: Not one, but two! I'm a bookseller – I have lots of young people asking "How long till it gets published?"
BD: Oh, I'm sorry, sir. Uh, I'm sorry sir.
C6: It's not a conspiracy really?
BD: Yes, uh, (to himself) Hmmph. What can I say to this fella? (laughs).

C6: No, seriously, I...
BD: No, it'll be out within two months. The thing is, see, I've just been changing it. I mean, I just can't let this, you know... let anything go out, right? It's very easy to write a book, I mean, it's...
C6: No, but you've got lots of young people. I'm just an old man trying to sell books.
BF: You know, Truman Capote took six years to write his book.
BD: Yeah, well... no, no, I would never take six months.
C6: Well, no. Give me a clear...
BD: It'll be out, I'm told – see, I'm just gonna go over it one more time – it's in the galleys now.
C6: Yes...
BD: It never was in the galleys before. We went with the, uh, individual printers, you dig?
C6: Sure.
BD: And so, uh... but they just didn't turn out right, and it was a shuck. So I just wasted time, but now it's back in the Macmillan galleys, so it should be out within two months.
C6: Well, I'm not concerned for me, but it's the kids... you know.
BD: Mm, I realize that, yes. (aside) Is there any tea coming?
C6: If you just knew how much they kinda look with pleading eyes to the bookseller- 'why not?'
BD: Oh, well – I realize you booksellers are all just like octopuses, ha, ha!
C6: No, but it's kind of a compliment to you – but if I could just give you...
BD: What bookseller, uh, store do you run?
C6: I have a bookstore in New Jersey.
BD: Oh, yes.
BF: Oh, that's the one where the autograph party is going to be?
C6: No, I wish it were, but...
BD: No, the autograph party is gonna be on 12th Street.
C6: Look, I'm just trying to be business-like about this in saying...
BD: Oh, I don't talk business over the telephone.
C6: No, but seriously – if you can tell them and say its in the galleys – you were just telling me.
BD: Sure. Oh, I'll tell them, sure. It'd be a delight, sure. Sure – if you need... you want my official word on it.
C6: (unclear)
BD: Yeah, it's in the galleys. You can definitely say it'll be out within a couple of months.
C6: Well, that's kind of... it's still vague, isn't it?
BF: Yeah, I know. Our folio is often late too.
BD: Yeah, I'm just very thirsty. I gotta get a drink of water now.
C6: Look I'm trying to be quite serious about this...
BF: Uh, uh, thank you. But seriously...
C6: ...but if you look at the various announcements – oh yeah, Bob Dylan says this, says that, and then – no, sorry, it's being postponed. Can you give me any positive answers like maybe May 15th.
BF: Is there any hope?
BD: This isn't, uh, Laurence Harvey, by any chance is it?
C6: No, no.
BD: Are you sure?
C6: I'm not putting you on...
BD: Well, come on!
C6: ...I'm just a poor bookseller trying to answer the teenagers!
BD: Oh.
BF: Oh, well, we're just poor.
BD: We're just teenagers man, trying to answer...

BF: Trying to answer the telephone.
C6: Yes.
BF: So OK, thanks very much.
C6: Well, I didn't do this casually. You were asking to dial this number and I called you and I'm very pleased we talked at least for a little time.
BD: OK, 'bye.
BF: OK, 'bye.
C6: Bye-bye...
BF: WBAI.
C7: (female voice) Hi. I'd like to ask Bob Dylan a question.
BF: Why don't you?
C7: I'd like to know if he writes his songs from experience or does he just make things up? 'Cause they seem very to the point.
BF: Would you care to answer that, Mr. Dylan?
BD: Oh, well – I don't care to ask... uh, what would you think?
C7: Well, I don't think anyone can write them, unless it was...
BD: Experience?
C7: ...you know, from life. I was just wondering if you were going to say it.
BD: What's experienced about them?
C7: Well, I mean, like It Ain't Me, Babe and Don't Think Twice, It's All Right.
BD: Oh. Oh, you don't have to go anyplace to have those kind of experiences though, really, do you?
C7: Well, I don't know. You have to go through something! I mean, did you just make them up? Come on...
BD: Well, I guess I did. I just made 'em up out of my head, yeah.
C7: You did, huh?
BD: I guess so. I mean, you know, I can't say I didn't. I can't say they weren't in my head. But right now at this minute, uh, I have something else in my head... and, uh – I don't wanna get personal about this... please don't take it personal...
C7: (laughs) Alright, you enjoy yourself.
BD: No, I'm sorry, I just drifted off there for a minute. I didn't mean to... you don't have to worry about it. It shouldn't bother you one little bit, how I write my songs.
C7: Oh, it doesn't bother me.
BD: Well, good!
C7: I like them very much.
BD: You shouldn't even think about where they come from, or what, you know... you shouldn't think about anything. If you like 'em you like 'em, and if you don't, you don't. You don't have to think about 'em. OK?
C7: OK
BD: OK, bye.
C7: Right, 'bye.
BF: This, by the way, is WBAI in New York City, and this is Radio Unnameable.
BD: Who's calling please?
BF: WBAI.
BD: Yes, who's calling, please?

Unknown voice "Garth Hudson."

BD: Hello. Who's calling?
BF: Who's calling, please?
C8: Hello, my name is Frankenstein.
BF: Yes?
BD: Yes?... I don't believe him.

C8: Can I speak to Bob Fass, please?
BF: Yeah, I'm speaking, Mr. Stein.
BD: Are you gonna get any tea...?
C8: Hello. Yeah... Oh, Frankenstein – that's my second name.
BF: Yes... we don't seem to...
C8: Yeah?
BD: Yeah, yeah, hold it there, Frankenstein.
BF: Do you want some tea with lemon, huh? I wish someone would try to get some tea with lemon.
C8: Hello.
BD: Yeah, OK, Mr. Frankenstein.
C8: Yeah, well, uh, I don't want to speak to Bob Dylan.
BF: You want to speak to me, right?
C8: No, I wanna... you see...
BF: Yes? Are you having trouble talking, sir?
C8: Well, uh...
BD: ...say, Frankenstein, come on!
C8: Uh... Can you get her phone number?
BF: Can we what?
C8: Can you get her phone number?
BF: Whose phone number?
C8: You see, uh, I'm pretty hungry.
BF: Uh, huh. Thanks a lot, uh...
BD: No, no. Don't turn him off... he's hungry! Tell me, are you as hungry as a man in drag?
C8: Yeah? ..
BD: Uh?
C8: Yeah, well, she got a TV dinner there.
BD: Hey, hey, hey... come on, now. (pause). Oh, you can't get an answer... How hungry are you?
C8: Oh, I'm starvin'.
BF: Oh?
BD: How? How hungry? Are you as hungry as, you know, as a raccoon – a piece of flypaper that's balancing on a pair of ear-plugs...
C8: Yeah...
BD: ...out, out in Allen Ginsberg's kitchen? Are you that hungry?
C8: I'm down outside your studio now.
BD: Huh?
C8: I'm down outside your studio now. I'm waitin' to throw snowballs at you, but I'm so hungry, I'm sort of eating them.
BD: You're waitin' to throw snowballs, huh? Well, this is all a joke here now. You just come up a little closer to that door, and you see what's gonna happen. If you come up just a little closer, you throw one at that door. We're not down there, but you just go ahead and do it!
C8: I got a mob with me too.
BD: Oh, groovy! (laughs)
C8: And a small Irishman called Quill.
BD: Oh ho-ho! Very scary, very scary indeed but, uh... I'm not hungry.
C8: Yeah, yeah, you wanna see us, but...
BF: So long, bye-bye.
BD: Why don't you say goodbye nice to him and...
BF: Goodbye nicely, sir.
C8: Well, so long.
BF: Nicely. WBAI.

C9: Hello, is this Dial-A-Prayer?
BF: (laughs) Yes this is Dial-A-Prayer.
BD: Diaphragm?
BF: Dial-A-Prayer!
BD: Oh.
BF: That's where you sing from.
BD: Oh.
BF: Yeah, hello. You'll have to turn your radio down, sir.
BD: I thought they were those things that chicks get. (laughs)
BF: Hello? Hello? So long! WBAI.
C10: Hello... Mr. Dylan, please.
BF: Yes, the voice of sanity!
BD: Switch her right over here. This sounds very good.
C10: Hello.
BD: Who is this?
C10: Hello, who is this?
BD: Well, who is this?
C10: This is Ann!
BD: Well, you have to, you have to say who it is because they have to all be marked down on a little book that has to go into the YMCA files.
C10: Yeah, all right...
BD: So who is this, please?
C10: This is Ann Wilkinson, sort of from Buffalo.
BD: Who?
C10: Ann Wilkinson, sort of from Buffalo. I sort of met you there.
BD: (mockingly) Ann Wilkinson from Buffalo – oh yes, of course.
C10: I sort of burst in on one of your concerts at Kleinhans.
BD: You what?
C10: I sort of burst in on one of your concerts at Kleinhans.
BD: Oh, yeah, pretty good.

Unknown voice "Beating on the window..."

BD: Oh you beat on the window. Was that you? One of those people who was beating on the window out there?
C10: No, no, not there. I saw it from the sky!

Unknown voice "A go go dancer!"

C10: Uh, I wanted to wish you Merry Christmas.
BD: Well, thank you very much! How's your toe? (laughs)
C10: I'm a bit late. I also wanted to know when Visions Of Johanna is coming out.
BD: What?
C10: I wanted to know when Visions Of Johanna...
BD: Oh, you heard that song?
C10: Yeah, Al Kooper played it for me. (much laughter in the studio)
BD: Say that again!
C10: Al Kooper played it for me.
BD: Oh, yeah. It's good, huh? (laughs)
C10: Yeah, and I would rather hear you sing it, I think.
BD: Wow! Where does all these... what do... where do you do... where is... well, oh, it's coming out on the next record.
C10: Oh, it is?

BD: Yeah. You never heard me play it, huh?
C10: No, no.
BD: Oh.
C10: It's a real good song, though.
BD: Yeah it's weird... (studio chat).
C10: I mean, from what I heard from Al, you know. Yeah, well, I'd like to hear it sometime.
BD: OK.
C10: OK?
BD: Yeah, 'bye now.
C10: Nice talking to you, bye bye.
BD: Do you have any matches?
BF: Anybody out there have any matches, and some tea?
BD: Oh, yeah – where's all the tea, Bob?
BF: WBAI.
C11: Yeah.
BF: Hello?
C11: Hello.
BF: Yeah... hello.
C11: Uh, I'd like to get an impression on The Fugs from Dylan.
BD: On The Fugs?
C11: Yeah.
BD: (to Bob Fass) I'm not sure I can get it right now, The Fugs.
BF: No. The rock n' roll group.
BD: Oh, the rock n' roll group, The Fugs? The rock n' roll group, The Fugs!
C11: That's right. Yeah, Tuli Kupferberg and Ed...
BD: Oh, oh, right! I haven't... I have never... I just heard a record, uh, one record by them. Are... you really wanna know? Oh, I think they're great, man, I really think they're great. I think they're...
C11: You been down to see 'em?
BD: No. Well, I'm never in town, but I think they're the best. I'll push 'em as much as I can, you know. I really... I think they're definitely the best.
C11: Yeah, well – what I was thinking is...
BD: I know Peter's not in the group any more, Peter... I've always wanted to go hear them but I could never make it down there.
C11: Yeah, well – d'you ever get into that vein?
BD: What?
C11: Well, you know-that type of music?
BD: The Fug music?
C11: Yeah.
BD: What kind of music is that?
C11: Well, the Fuggery sounds.
BD: Fuggery sound?
C11: Uh, you know—it's not so easy to...
BD: Well, I know... (?), man. But I mean, a Fuggery sound. I mean. Are you serious? Fuggery sound – what's a fuggery sound? Fuggery sound isn't a sound.
C11: Well, you know – a colorful sound.
BF: Hey, listen – I'd like to remind everybody that we're on the radio here, and that, uh...
BD: Why? Why d'you want to remind everybody?
BF: 'Cause the... FCT spells the name of that group a different way.
BD: Did they call up?
BF: No, but you know, we have licenses and things to protect. Everybody be careful, everybody be careful.

BD: Oh no... you know, personally I think... I think they really, uh, they really, uh, can change a lotta things, but like, that's 'cause I think they're great, you know – I think they're, they're very dimensional. I mean – like, they're that way but... like, I know, I know, uh, I don't know what... well, I don't know any of them – I don't think I do. I might – oh, I might know those two guys, uh, Ed Sanders and Tuli Kupferberg. I think I might have said hi to them, but... in the East Side at certain times, but... like, I don't think I... I haven't actually talked to them. I mean, I don't know how they are musically, but... like, I remember, but I know they write and they have that kind of sense, but... like, it's, it's a different thing...

C11: Yeah.

BD: ...uh, but... like, they're, they're very straight and honest and – like... and like, they have it made, man, you know? Like if they want to... uh, to reach a whole lotta people...

C11: Well...

BD: ...No, but – like... but – like, it's up to them if they want to do it, you know, that's all.

C11: eah. Like, there's some pieces that can't go on the air.

BD: Oh, it don't even matter about that, it's just how... it just matters if they wanna, uh, reach a whole lotta people... if they think what they're doing is different enough that they... to reach a whole lotta people.

C11: Sure. Going on the air they call themselves 'the group that sings the napalm mantras'...

BD: Oh. Hey, well, they're very good.

C11: ...and that gets it.

BD: I, I like them a whole lot. I think they... (?)... great.

C11: Oh, it's good to know. OK, thanks.

BD: Yeah, 'bye.

C11: So long

BF: Bye-bye. WBAI...

C12: Good evening. I'd like to talk to Bob Dylan.

BF: Why don't you?

BD: You have to give your name.

C12: Uh, my name's Steve.

BD: What?

C12: Steve.

BD: Steve what?

C12: It's Gitlin.

BD: Steve Dylan?

C12: Gitlin.

BD: Dylan. (laughs)

Unknown voice – "Steve Dylan!"

BD: That was almost my name! (laughs)

BF: What was it before it was Gitlin?

C12: What was it before it was Gitlin? Gitlin!

BD: What do you have to say, Dylan?

C12: Uh, Bob...

BD: (Laughs) Come on. What else have you go to say?

C12: Uh, Bob, I wish it were Dylan. To start off with, uh, what do you think of the group called The Byrds?

BD: The Fugs?

C12: The Byrds!

BD: The Byrds! Oh, come on! Don't ask me these kinda questions, I don't wanna... I get... I don't wanna do this kind of...

BF: Yeah.

BD: I like The Byrds, man I like everybody! Come on whaddaya mean?
BF: Can somebody bring some water in here please.
C12: What do you do, uh...
BD: Well, what do I think of Rosemary Clooney or Judy Garlands' daughter? Rosa Minelli?
C12: What? What do you think about boys who have long hair? Do you think...
BD: Oh, you're Rosa Minelli's boyfriend, I know you are.
BF: Boys with long hair, huh?
C12: Do you think they should be made to be... uh, be made to be cut?
BD: Oh, what do you think?
C12: Oh, not really.
BD: Oh well then, there you have it There you have it in a nutshell.
BF: That's up to you.
BD: It's up to you. It's in your hands, man, I don't know anything about... what do I care? It's in your hands. Whatever you think, you tell your principal that.
C12: Yeah, and if they funk me out of school?
BD: Well, I don't know, I..
BF: You don't wanna go to a school like that, do you?
BD: That depends what you wanna do, man. If you wanna go... you wanna go to school or if you don't wanna go to school. If you don't wanna go to school, you can try to help school. But if you wanna go to school, you just better... just take your place and be quiet.
C12: Uh huh? Have got a new album out?
BD: Have I?
C12: Yeah.
BD: No, it won't be out in about February.
C12: Uh, huh. Uh where do you get your ideas for songs?
BD: No, no, this is... over the limit. I can't...
BF: From people who call up, I guess. From people who call up. I m gonna go to another call; thanks a lot.
BD: Goodbye now, 'bye now.
BF: Bye-bye. WBAI...
C13: Can I have Bob Dylan, please?
BF: Can you what? Can you have him? No. Nobody can have him.
BD: Uh, you have to give your name – I'm sorry, sir.
C13: Uh, Melvin Margoulis...
BD: Melvin Margoulis. I've seen you before.
C13: ...oh this is behind (?) – I'm really Bob Dylan!
BD: Uh? What?
C13: I'm really Bob Dylan! ,
BD: Ha, ha. I know you are.
C13: How do you know?
BD: How do I know? I heard...
C13: Well, get that imposter off the radio.
BD: Well, what can I do, man? He's sitting here right now, he's...
C13: No, but I'm really John, by the way.
BD: Oh, well. Well, I, I, I, uh...
BF: I think you have a very advanced case of schizophrenia. I'll go on to the next call. We're at Oxford 7-8506.

While the following conversation takes place between Dylan and Fass, caller 13 continues talking: "No, no, see, I know Ann Wilkinson, and she's from Buffalo and so am I. Uh-huh?", and then seems to be trying to join in with the conversation. He is totally ignored!

BD: Well, hold on now – don't be mean. Now don't be mean, uh, you can't just turn him off like that!
BF: No?
BD: No, I don't think that's...
BF: But that's my image!
BD: Oh yeah, but come on...
BF: I have to maintain my image. I have a mean image.
BD: Just for one night! Be nice to people, just – just one night.
BF: I'll try.
BD: Have you ever been nice to people, man? Have you ever walked on the street, Bob, and just looked at somebody and said you know, "Hi!", you know? I don't know if you have...
BF: Try?
BD: No, I'm not saying try... I've never done it! No, but I mean, a lotta people have done it, you know, and I can understand...
BF: Just say "Hi!" to everybody I meet?
BD: Well, yeah – I do it in different ways. Like, I go up to 'em and, uh, I give them things, you know, like rocks. Just things I pick up on the block before I meet them or stuff like that.
C13: Hello?
BF: Give 'em folk-rock?
BD: (to the poor guy on the phone) Yeah, I'm sorry. Goodbye.
C13: Yeah, OK, bye-bye.
BD: See you later.
BF: Bye-bye. WBAI...
C14: Hello.
BF: Hello, why is everybody talking so low now? It sounds like the telephone is very low.
C14: Sounds like the telephone is low?
BF: Maybe because it's late at night...
C14: Getting late.
BD: Who's this?
C14: What was that?
BD: Who's this?
C14: Oh, I wanna speak to Bob Dylan if I...
BD: Well, you have to give your name.
C14: Oh, well, uh... you see, I wrote an article for him, it's just some magazine.
BD: Well, you have to give your name anyway, because the YWCA wants it.
C14: Yeah, I know. (laughs)
BD: So what is it?
C14: Larrie Birnbach.
BD: Larrie Birnbach, right. Larrie Birnbach. B, I, R... .
BF: Is that CH or CK?
C14: CH, CH.
BD: Birnbach...
BF: How do you spell that name?
C14: B-I-R-N-B-A-C-H.
BD: How do you spell the first name? Larrie – how does that... how do you spell that? Larrie? Larrie?
C14: Yeah?
BD: Yeah, you know, just spell your first name out. Just spell it.
C14: Oh, L-A-R-R-I-E. It's really...
BD: L-A-R-R-I-E.

C14: ...Yeah, yeah.
BD: That's who you are. You're Larrie.
C14: That's right.
BD: OK, Larrie...
C14: OK, man! (laughs)
BD: Shoot!
BF: OK – what is it you'd like to know, Larrie?
C14: What is it I'd like to know? I just wanted to speak to him about the article – I wanted to find out if he...
BD: Oh, yeah – what article?
C14: Oh, I wrote an article called, uh, 'Bob Dylan' which was in Hit Parader magazine.
BD: Was it good? What magazine?
C14: Hit Parader.
BD: Oh – was it good?
C14: Uh, well, I thought it was pretty good, yeah.
BD: Oh. Well then – I guess it was good!
C14: Yeah it was fairly good.
BF: You were happy with it – you thought it was an artistic success?
BD: It's a job that you did well by it and then...?
C14: I felt that I'd succeeded, yeah.
BD: OK, well, that's fine...
BF: Send a copy of it...
BD: Thank you very much. I'll send you a pencil. I usually send pencils...
BF: Larrie?
C14: Yeah?
BF: Send a copy of it to me here.
C14: Send a copy of it to you?
BF: Yeah.
C14: Who am I speaking to?
BF: Bob Fass.
C14: Oh, oh, am I on the air now?
BF: Yeah, you're on the air now!
C14: Oh, I am on the air!
BF: Yeah.
BD: Yeah, Larrie!
C14: Oh. How are you, man? (laughs) Did you read the article?
BF: Yeah, send some coffee through with the mail, would you?
BD: (laughs) Now his whole tone changes! You didn't know you were on the air before, huh?
C14: What's that?
BD: You didn't know, Larrie?

Unknown voice – "Could have said a whole lot more."

BD: Could have said a whole lot more...

Short break in the recording here

BD: Yeah, OK, listen, we'll see you later, 'cause we have to all go to sleep now.
C14: Let me ask you something. Have you seen Scott Reuss (?) at all recently?
BD: Gee, gee. So many friends I've got. They just call me up...
BF: Yeah, just like uh... Listen – this is getting to be, like very personal. This is not of wide interest.
BD: It's not personal, like...

C14: Did you read the article?
BD: No, no, I didn't.
C14: You didn't read it. Well, yeah, I'll get a copy of it to you.
BD: Huh?
C14: I'll get a copy of it to you.
BD: Oh, OK. Just send it to WBAI. It'll usually... yeah.
C14: Yeah, I will, I will. Good.
BF: Yeah, Bob works in the subscription department with B. J. Richards.
C14: He does huh? (To Bob Fass:) Listen, man. You know, I, I really... I dig these blues things you have in there, I really do.
BD: (misunderstanding) Oh, thank you very much.
C14: No, not you! Fass. He has some nice things he plays.
BD: Yeah. (laughs)
BF: OK. Thank you.
C14: 'Bye.
BF: 'Bye. WBAI...
C15: Yeah, I'd like to speak to Bob Dylan.
BF: Hello?
BD: (laughs) Oh, you have to give your name.
BF: Hello?
C15: My name is Linda Mingo.
BD: Linda Mingo. Are you any relation to Charlie?
C15: No, I'm no relative at all.
BD: Oh. Are you alone?
C15: I'd like to know if Bob remembers the old Ten O'Clock Scholar in Minneapolis.
BD: Sure!
C15: Well... Bob...
BD: Oh, now you're getting... you're a representative of the Ten O'Clock Scholar, and they're going bankrupt right?
C15: No I'm not! I just thought you'd like to know the place burned down before Christmas!
BD: Oh great! (laughs) I didn't know that.
C15: Yeah! Like, the fire started in the dirty grocery...
BD: Oh, far out...
C15: And the Chinese Laundry went, and the old apartments above it...
BD: Chinese laundry, dirty grocery...
BF: What's the Ten O' Clock Scholar, Bob?
BD: It's a coffee house in Minneapolis.
C15: Yeah. It's a place where Bob used to play. I worked there about, uh, be about six years ago.
BD: Oh, yeah. 'Bout the same time as I was there, right?
C15: Yeah, I know. When Clark Batho had the place. Anyway, uh...
BD: Uh-huh. We were good friends.
C15: ...it's gone!
BD: Yeah. Yeah. Well, I can't say...
C15: Well, I have to go back to sleep, so...
BD: OK, go back to sleep. See you later.
BF: You mean you woke up just to call Oxford 7-8506?
C15: No, I just woke up to hear an old familiar voice.
BD: Oh...
C15: Bye-bye.
All: Ah...
C15: Ooh...
BD: Oh hey! Are you gonna just say "Hey Bob – you'd better put your head on the street?"

C15: No – I, like, have to go to sleep.
BD: Hey, listen – Bob's sitting up there, hey...
BF: Hey, hey...
BD: ...Linda? Linda?
C15: Yeah?
BF: (to Dylan) Psst, psst... it's your voice. It's your voice, not mine.
BD: (to Bob Fass) I'm trying to help you.
BF: I'm trying to help you, Bob.
C15: Oh, I'll tell you what – I'm trying to go back to sleep.
BD: She likes you.
BF: No – she likes you, Bob!
BD: Hey, come on.
C15: Bye-bye.
BD: So long.
BF: Hey, we're fighting over you.
C15: Bye-bye.
BD: I'm not. (laughs)
BF: WBAI...
C16: Hello – Bob Fass?
BF: Yeah?
C16: Can I speak with Mr. Dylan?
BF: Sure!
C16: Mr. Dylan?
BF: You see? They all like you, Bob!
BD: Texas. (laughs)
C16: Are you coming to Westchester, February?
BF: No, I'm not. Oh, you! (to Dylan).
BD: Oh, me!
BF: I keep forgetting.
BD: I don't know...
C16: To the County Center?
BD: I'm playing in February in White Plains...
C16: White Plains.
BD: ...and to say... Oh – wait, now – yeah I guess I am – I don't know if it's advertised, I am.
C16: Mm. I'm gonna see...
BD: OK. See you later.
C16: OK.
BF: WBAI...
C17: Bob Fass?
BF: Yeah?
C17: Uh, you know, uh...
BF: Turn your radio down.
C17: Yeah, I just did. Hey, you know, I can hear this stuff on WCBS or NBC all day long.
BF: You can?
C17: I really much prefer to hear...
BF: Well, how can you manage to stay up so late, if you're gonna listen to CBS all day long?
C17: I never listen to it, but one of the reasons I'm a supporter of BAI's 'cause I like, you know, 'Unnameable'.
BF: Yeah?
C17: ...and everything else, but this is a drag!
BF: This is a drag?
C17: (?)... I'd much prefer to hear.
BF: Don't you have any respect for our feelings?

C17: A great deal...
BF: How do you think we feel when you tell us something like that?
C17: I'm just being honest. I'm supporting you...
BF: Just because... just because we're in showbiz doesn't mean that we have no hearts...
C17: Hearts?
BF: Hearts, yes, hearts.
C17: Come on!
BD: No. What's your name, right? You didn't give your name.
C17: Dave Applet on.
BD: Dave Appleton. Where are you from, Dave Appleton.
C17: Where am I from?
BD: Yeah, come on!
C17: New York.
BD: New York City? What do you do?
C17: What am I doing?
BD: No. What do you do?
C17: Oh...
BD: Come on! What do you do?
C17: I'm a bum.
BD: What do you do for a living?
C17: What do I do for... I'm in insurance.
BD: You're in insurance for a living right?
C17: Right.
BD: You sell insurance?
C17: Nope.
BD: Well, what do you do in insurance? What do you mean?
C17: I'm an adjuster.
BD: You're an insurance adjuster. How old are you?
C17: Huh?
BD: How old are you?
C17: I'm 26.
BD: 26. You've had four years at college, right.
C17: Mm.
BD: Two years?
C17: None.
BD: None. You worked your way up on the ladder. You were apprenticed, uh, acoustical, uh...

Unknown voice "Insurance..."

BD: Insurance, uh, cl... uh, clerk, or... right?
C17: A what? An acoustical?
BD: Hey, what? Yeah, right?
BF: Adjuster.
BD: Adjuster.
C17: No, it's just... no I was in the music business for six years.
BD: Well, what kind of music? Rock n' roll?
C17: Excuse me? No, no, what?
BD: Rock... You were in rock n' roll music?
C17: Not by a long shot. No, I was in public relations.
BD: In folk music you were in?
C17: No, I was...
BD: Well, what kind of music were you in?

C17: ...huh?

BD: What kind of music were you in?

C17: I was doing public relations for Shelly Manne.

BD: Jazz!

C17: ...Jack Sheldon...

BF: Jazz!

BD: Jazz, right? right?

C17: Right!

BD: And so... and so you dig all the... you dig all the records that Bob plays, right?

C17: Uh, no.

BD: But you dig most of them right?

BF: (interjects while Dylan is speaking)

BD: No. I know where he's at. You just, uh... you just feel insulted when somebody comes down to advertise to you.

C17: No!

BD: You think you're, you think you're... you're beneath or above all that, when somebody comes along and...

C17: No...

BF: Are you... Is that why you're here?

C17: No not at all!

BF: Are you here to advertise?

BD: No, no, no. He is! Don't get me wrong, but...

BF: Oh, he is. Is he advertising Shelly Manne... on a non-commercial radio station? That Shelly Manne supports?

BD: Yeah, yeah, right. Right he's doing that. But the only reason he listens to your radio station is because there's no advertising and it brings him down to hear advertising, you know. He's really one of these...

C17: No no, it doesn't bring me down.

BD: ...high class cats man. He's an insurance adjuster.

C17: Gentlemen no. It doesn't bring me down...

BD: Oh, come on. You can go any place you wanna go. Now, come on, be thankful for that. You're very inconspicuous and... and be thankful for that You have many blessings. You don't have to worry about who... what's gonna be played to you on the radio, for God sake's – nor why should you?

C17: Yeah, no, but you know, I'm...

BD: Why don't you turn on some other...

C17: Hey, dig, baby. I'm up here tonight tryin' to hear some good... you know, some good Radio Unnameable.

BD: Well, you know, listen tomorrow night!

BF: That's a contradiction in terms! (at the mention of good radio unnameable)

C17: But frankly I prefer to hear you sing.

BD: W... mm... prefer to hear me sing.

C17: You know, man, to hear, you know these insults pouring out...

BD: Well, forget... forget that it's me here. Just think of somebody you never even heard of.

C17: Think of something I've never heard of?

BD: Think, think of something...

BF: Wait a minute, wait a minute, wait a minute, wait a m... did you say you will sing?

BD: No. I... come on. No.

BF: Oh well, then, OK.

BD: No.

C17: See that's what I prefer to hear!

BD: Oh well. Hey, well... I can't help it...

C17: 'Cause I think... I think that your singing is a lot more exciting than... than, you know, what's been going on.

BD: Yeah, well, it probably is! But, who am I to judge? I'm certainly not gonna look into any kind of incrimination from you!

BF: Mr. Appleton? Mr. Appleton?

C17: Huh?

BF: Mr. Appleton?

C17: Yes.

BF: I bet there a lot of people who think that your singing is more exciting than what you've been saying.

C17: Oh I doubt it! I doubt it very seriously! And then again...

BD: No, no. Mr. Appleton's prob... Hey, we've been taking up a long time with him.

BF: OK, we're gonna go on to the next call.

BD: Yeah we're going on to the next call, but listen – uh, well, you... it's, uh... you've been very appreciative, believe me.

BF: Impatient too. Oxford 7-8506.

BD: Hey, tomorrow night. Tomorrow night, promise. Promise you he'll be right back to normal and just... a night, man, what's a night? I mean, one night. So you can, you know, listen to records or try another station. One night – it'll be good. (?)

C17: No, but I prefer to listen to BAI. Hey look, I can't...

BF: It won't hurt you to get to bed early one night.

BD: Hey, that's true too.

C17: What's true?

BD: That's true too. What time do you get up in the morning?

C17: Uh, about eight.

BF: Oh, well, you'd better get to sleep!

C17: No, I stay up all night listening to this thing. I got insomnia.

BD: No wonder. No wonder you call up now and say these terrible things! You don't get any sleep!

C17: They're not terrible things!

BD: Oh, God, man... how can you talk anymore. How can somebody talk to me... D'you have any friends...?

BF: You'd better go to sleep. We have some other callers.

BD: (indignantly) Do you ever write letters? Taking pleasure (?)... How do you like your boss?

C17: I have no boss.

BD: Ohh...

C17: I am the boss.

BD: Yeah. Well, you're just... you're just like all the rest of the people.

BF: All the rest of the bosses. We have another call, thank you.

C17: Okeedoke.

BF: Bye-bye.

C17: So long.

BF: WBAI...

C18: Oh, hello...

BF: Hello.

C18: Bob Fass? .

BF: Yeah?

C18: Um, are you gonna play any more music tonight?

BF: Sure.

C18: That's good! (laughs)

BF: Oh-ho. wow!

C18: Um... Could you play some Jim Kweskin when you get around to it?

BD: (laughs)

BF: I don't think I have any of his records.

BD: Jim Kweskin!

C18: You don't?

BF: No, I don't think I have any of his records!

C18: Oh. Oh!

BF: Oh. Do you?

C18: Yes!

BF: Well, why don't you play them?

BD: No. For how long are people callin' up there? They have to just say what they wanna say in one word...

C18: Well, I'd rather hear it over the radio.

BF: Why would you rather hear it over the radio? How lazy can anybody be?

BD: ...this chick... this chick is gonna have to say why she called up...

C18: Well, I don't usually hear it over the radio.

BD: Hello. Give her name and say what she wants to talk about Jim Kweskin, right? And then – we'll see if we wanna do it. We can't take all these calls; this switchboard... Jim Kweskin!

BF: OK, thanks very much.

C18: All right. Goodbye.

BF: We can't follow your suggestion.

BD: Well I didn't mean... I didn't say that to her. I didn't... she didn't say that, did she?

BF: WBAI...

C19: I'd just like to speak to Bob Dylan, please.

BF: Yes, you may.

C19: Uh, Mr. Dylan – I was just wondering why you all sit around there... pardon me if that sounds nasty, but why you all sit around there putting down every phone caller, when in fact all you have to do is to be, you know, sweet, loveable Bob Dylan and everybody will go crazy and ecstatic!

BD: Oh my God man! Hey, no! Hey, no; you just don't, man, you just don't understand! I mean – all these, all these people... hey, hey, listen! I don't know who this is. I'm not even gonna ask your name! That's how much I think of you! but... all... everything you just said... hey, you know – like, these people are calling up... any... I'm sure that any normal person that's listening, knows that this is just not a putdown! Now if you just listen to all the words in your own mind – putdown, bringdown, comedown...

C19: Yeah... OK. (laughs)

BD: ...you know, just listen to what your vocabulary consists of. Well then, this comes closest. Nobody's being put down!

C19: But you're inviting it! You're inviting the whole thing by saying, "Hey, come on kids, call me up."

BD: Not to kids! What kinda kids are gonna be up at this hour, listening to the radio?

BF: Yeah – go to bed, kids.

C19: Everybody that calls up then, they say, "Hey Bob, like, I know you," or "Hey, listen! What are you doing about karma and stuff like that."

BD: Now come on, come on, come on, come on. What do you want me to do... answer them? (laughs)

BF: What would you like us to talk about?

C19: Talk about something that you like!

BD: I like to do this right now. When I leave from here and ride around in the car we'll talk about some other things. Right now we're here. What can I say to you?

C19: OK I'm sorry.

BD: OK. You should be. So long.

BF: No. You shouldn't be sorry.

BD: No, no. You shouldn't be sorry, I'm sorry... I'll give you two tickets to Choose The Consequences.
C19: No, no. But the whole thing is that it sounds like each one is trying to show how aware they are of what a bad scene they were...
BD: No, we're just all in a very strange mood, that's all! You don't have to put up or put...
C19: It's not moods. No, it's scenes. That's different from moods.
BD: Oh, well, hey, listen. Whatever goes down, please don't take it personal. What am I gonna do?
C19: I always take it p...
BD: Oh, do... not take it personal.
C19: No. I listen to your songs, and my sister loves you...
BD: Oh, right! Everybody's sister loves me...!
C19: ...and we followed you from the beginning, like a little boy...
BD: ...Everybody's kids love me! Nobody loves me... !
C19: ...And we said, "This is Rimbaud!" You know – this is a beautiful adolescent growing up!
BD: ...what d'you say?
C19: This is a beautiful adolescent growing up we feel, you know, both pity and sorrow but also beautiful and love and all those kind of things. Then to hear you get on the phone and... and be hip, you know...
BD: Yeah. Hip, hip.
C19: ...it sort of just doesn't come.
BD: I'm really hip!
C19: Yeah, this is just...
BD: Hey, listen. You're hip, man, I'm not hip. I'm not.
C19: Oh, come on! Don't do that!
BD: You're much more hippier than I am from being so aware of the situation now.
C19: No, no, don't do that!
BD: I'm not hip. Don't... don't do it to me.
C19: Don't do it to me either! God knows... !
BD: Oh, my God, the cat's just lost his mind! (laughs) Hey, come on! Come on now – it's OK!
C19: Yeah, I know it's all right, but my poor sister may be listening, and I don't want her...
BD: Oh, well, you just explain it to her, right? If she's your sister...
C19: Yeah.
BD: The least you can do is take an interest in her.
C19: I know.
BD: So explain it to her if you know better. If you don't know better, don't complain to me.
C19: Well, could you explain it to her? Could you say, you know, like...
BD: I don't even know her!
C19: Still, but you're talking to a radio audience.
BD: Hey, I'm sure you know her much better than I do! Can't you explain it to her? I don't know her. I don't even know what she wants me... what she wants to have explained to her.
C19: Say, "Hey, I'm nice". That's all.
BD: What's her name?
C19: Her name is Merle.
BD: Merle. Huh. OK, I might... hey, I gotta tell you though, I never in my whole life... I have foreseen a lot of things but, like, I've never, never, never uh, foreseen saying "I'm nice" to somebody by the name of Merle!
C19: No, true.
BD: I mean, I never have. It comes out of the blue, you know.
C19: (inaudible)... anything can happen.
BD: I mean, have you ever?

C19: Yeah! Sure.
BD: Have you ever considered saying, "I'm nice" to somebody by the name of Bodegarde?
C19: Yes. Yes, certainly.
BD: D'you think about it?
C19: I read Pogo while I was sitting here, saying 'Little doggy, you're nice and I'm nice too'.
BD: Oh. You read the comic strips, right?
C19: Sure.
BD: Oh, God. OK. Well, we'll see you later.
C19: OK, goodbye.
BD: 'Bye. (pause) Hello...?
BF: Speaking of comic strips, this is WBAI in New York City.
BD: Say Hi to Merle!
BF: Hello.
C20: Yeah?
BF: Merle?
BD: This is Merle?
BF: Who's this? '
C20: Oh, yeah, hello. Listen, I just called to tell you that I'm turning on to WNCN because, uh, I think you've played, you know, long enough.
BF: You want us to be serious. OK, seriously...
C20: No, no. I just, you know...
BF: Seriously!
BD: Hey, we just went through that other one.
C20: I'm just tired of this, you know. I like to listen into... you know. It was fun but.
BD: Hey, hey, hey, hey... why don't you just... hey, why don't you, hey...
C20: It's time to change.
BD: OK, let her change Hey, hey, what's the next one, Bob?... I was gonna ask...
BF: Push the next one (speaking to Dylan about a button on the console).
BD: Hey, hey, see if there' s not, if there's not four... in the next four calls (laughs) if you send out one call that says (laughs), that say, that says, uh...
BF: You are nice!
BD: Yeah...
C20: Yeah.
BD: That we are nice. If there's not one call in the next four, hey, we'll just split, right? We'll just keep 'em all down to a minimum, OK? I don't wanna do anything bad here. I certainly don't wanna be...
BF: OK, you heard him. You heard, uh... WBAI...
C21: Hi! Bob Dylan is beautiful, Bob Fass is beautiful and Radio Unnameable is beautiful.
BF: Well, now, that's only one. That only counts for one.
BD: (laughs)
C21: Hey! OK, so it's only one.
BD: Oh, you, you're very beautiful! (laughs)
BF: You're beautiful too. We can tell by your voice !
C21: Thanks... (?)
BD: You're not like those other people.
C21: Yeah. Oh, I, I, I... it makes me paranoic to be on the radio so... anyway, uh.
BD: Is it all right? I mean, we're not gonna... I'm not gonna be here... we're not gonna be here that long, and believe me... we were just passing by. I don't mean to interrupt any of your music, 'cause I listen to the radio station too, and I know how good it is.
C21: Oh, I don't care about the music.
BD: Huh?
C21: The music's beautiful, but people are more beautiful.
BD: Oh.

C21: So, OK. Get another call. OK?
BD: Yeah, yeah.
C21: OK. Bye-bye.
BF: Would you say this was a good station?
BD: Oh – I'd say it was the best station, yeah. I've al... (?) people.
BF: What station? What station?
BD: WBAI! WBAI is the best station... baby! (laughs) it's what's, uh, occurrin'. It's what's occurring, Slim. (laughs)
BF: WBAI...
C22: Hi! I don't want to talk to Bob Dylan.
BD: Oh, ha...
C22: I just want to talk to Bob Fass.
BF: Yes?
C22: And state the fact that the reason that I became a member of the WBAI program guide gang is because of Radio Unnameable and its rather casual, uh, attitude towards, uh, its programming. And having things like Bob Dylan come up, and Jose Feliciano, is a big part of it. And hearing them on the air is a big part of Radio Unnameable, and it's absolutely necessary it should be on the air, and don't be discouraged by all these clods that are calling up and saying that it's too long, and all this other jazz.
BD: (laughs)
C22: You're doing a good job.
BF: You've encouraged us!
BD: Oh, that's, yeah, that's great.
C22: And keep it up. As long as you're on, have a ball!
BF: What's your name?
BD: Alan Lomax?
C22: This is Will Fowler.
BF: OK, Will. Bye-bye, thank you.
C22: OK.
BF: Bye-bye.
C22: Keep it up.
BF: Thank you.
C22: Bye-bye.
BF: See? You leapt to a conclusion there.
BD: (laughs)
BF: WBAI...
C23: Um, I'd like to ask one question if I may.
BF: One question; you may.
C23: OK. Did you ride the 'A' train down to WBAI tonight?
BD: Did I? No, no. We came the other way.
C23: You came the other way. You didn't come on the 'A' train?
BD: No.
C23: OK. Thank you.
BF: I think there's more than meets the ear in that telephone call.
BD: Yeah! That sounded very mysterious! I don't know about these telephone calls, Bob... I do not know about any more of these telephone calls!
BF: WBAI...
C24: I'm Donald Martin. I was wondering if I...
BF: Carl Martin (?) isn't here now.
C24: I was wondering, uh, if Bob was working on some plays a while ago? Uh, I was wondering if he'd, uh, finished any of them?
BD: No, no, no.
BF: He said there was a part in it for me too.

BD: Oh, I haven't finished it, Bob. I wrote one... I wrote one, but it's... I'm not doing anything with it. Nothing's happening.

BF: That's the truth behind why I left here, you know, the first time. I told everybody I was fired, but it wasn't really true. See, I quit because I thought I was gonna get a part in Bob Dylan's play!

C24: (laughs)

BD: I wanted Bob... I wanted Bob Fass to play Burgess Meredith!

C24: What other writings have you been doing besides so-and-so? Have you...

BD: Just songs... I did a book. I did a book.

C24: You did? Has it been published yet?

BD: Yeah. And then I'm gonna do... I'm gonna do a TV Special... uh, I'm gonna write that and a movie too, but I'm gonna also help, have some help with some screenwriters.

C24: I heard you were supposed to be working on a movie with Allen Ginsberg. Was that true?

BD: Oh that was just a, a... just a little movie we were just gonna try to make. This is a big movie.

BF: That's the one that was gonna be shot on the Taconic State Thruway?

BD: Yeah.

BF: That was the one you were playing your mother in.

BD: Yeah. Mother Revisited.

C24: Keep up the writing. I like it a lot. Keep the show going. It's very interesting.

BF: Thank you.

C24: Goodbye now.

BF: Thank you. WBAI...

C25: Hi, Uh, Bob Fass, please?

BF: Yeah.

C25: Bob, I'd just like to back up, uh, the man a couple of calls back and tell the gentleman who called a little earlier who had his sister that's such a devoted fan that that's exactly why this thing is on at night. Uh, that you can have guests like Bob Dylan and Phil Ochs, and they can be themselves and, you know jive around with people who are willing to call in, even if they're gonna bitch a little bit just to light a sort of fire or something. I mean that's what it's all about and I don't know why he got so upset. They surely can switch their radio anytime they want to.

BF: OK, thank you.

C25: Right.

BF: Bye, bye. WBAI... Hello...

C26: Hello?

BF: Hello!

C26: Hi, this is... Can I talk to Bob Dylan?

BF: Sure.

C26: Uh, this is Steve Vogl, and... well, first of all I'd like to disagree with that uh, that guy that guy that... guy that said, uh, he liked this sort of thing.

BF: Raoul?

C26: See, I'd like to know how a nice healthy guy with both legs and both arms, who's not a student or anything, uh, can keep from getting drafted!

BD: You, you, y, y... you're a student? And you're being drafted and, and, and, and... and you know somebody that doesn't have any arms or legs?

C26: No, you know like uh, Bob Dylan. You know, nice healthy, healthy guy, you know, not...

BD: (laughs)

C26: ...sick or anything, how, how, how does...

BD: He doesn't know! (laughs)

C26: ...he keep from getting drafted?

BF: No, he doesn't know.

BD: Yeah, well, I'm not going to go into that! (laughs)

C26: You're not going to go into it?
BD: Yeah, no, no. I assure you, uh, uh, I have nothing against the army! (laughs)
C26: You have nothing against the army?
BD: I wouldn't go without, you know, if it was my... if it was my thing or whatever... I don't know, whatever... I don't know like... I just do what I have to do. I really do. I mean, like, I don't, I don't, I don't tell... I don't want people to judge what they think of me, you know, for themselves, you know... so... so sometimes I miss a lot of things that other people get to do. So...
C26: No. I was just wondering whether, you know, you don't have any nice good (lawyer?) to avoid it.
BD: No. I never really think about it. I don't know... I don't... I don't have any id... I don't even have any idea.
C26: No, 'cause a lotta guys up at school here are gonna reclassify.
BD: Oh. Well, sure, well... that's their, you know... what can you do?
BF: That's their...
C26: That's their affair, whatever. (?)
BD: Mm.
C26: OK. Well, thanks a lot.
BF: WBAI...
C27: Uh this is Dave Levy. Can I speak to Bob Dylan, please?
BD: Dave Levy?
C27: Yeah.
BD: Old Daily... (laughs) Not the old Dave Levy?
C27: Same one!
BD: Same one? Oh-ho... What are you doing?
C27: Who's that?
BD: You never used to listen to the radio! You just sit around houses... I haven't seen you in four years! This is what you've come to, right?
C27: Who are you?
BD: Uh?
C27: Who are you?
BD: Who am I?
C27: Yeah.
BD: This is Dave Levy?
C27: Yeah, right. I...
BD: Old Dave Levy from Housing Project?
C27: No, this is Dave Levy from WNCN.
BD: Oh, WNCN. Oh, wrong cat! Oh, I'm sorry. I almost made a big mistake.
BF: What are you doing listening to another station, Dave Levy from WNCN? This is WBAI in New York City.
C27: I'm trying to talk to Bob Dylan.
BF: Oh, well. You are.
BD: What do you wanna know?
C27: Uh... remember me?
BD: (laughs nervously)
C27: Shall I continue?
BF: Well. It's kind of dark in here. We don't recognize you.
C27: This is Bob?
BD: Yeah, yeah, I remember you.
C27: From 97th Street?
BD: Yeah. You used to wear a tire iron, right?
C27: What?
BD: You used to wear a tire iron?

C27: No!

BD: Around your shoulder, right. You used to come by... you used to always turn the corner there, around from 97th Street? You also used to turn the corner 'round 96th Street, right? Amsterdam Avenue, right?

BF: No. I really do remember this guy. He's the man who stole my Lone Ranger record.

C27: Well, anyway, I still wanna know...

BD: He stole more than that from me. I remember him too, man. He stole a whole apartment up on 95th Street!

BF: (laughs)

BD: He stole every... You copped everything from the pad, right?

C27: What pad, baby?

BD: On 96th Street... (delayed laughter)

BF: He said 'baby'. He said 'baby'.

BD: Yeah, I'm gonna have to have a tracer on this call. I'm really getting... What can I do...? Huh?

C27: It's All O... who else was playing on that It's All Over Now, Baby Blue side, It's All Over Now...?

BD: Oh, that's Bruce Langhorne.

C27: Oh, it is Brucie!

BD: Yeah.

C27: OK, very good.

BD: It's Brucie!

C27: Yeah.

BD: So long.

C27: Tarah!

BF: Bye-bye. His friends call him Bubbles! WBAI...

BD: Who was that kid who just called up?

BF: Hello?

C28: Hello, both Bobs...

BD: Yeah...

BF: Yeah...

C28: Hi. I just wanted to tell you that, um... I don't know, am I number 4 or something? Will you be... I don't know. I just want to tell you that, you know, you're fine and you shouldn't get discouraged by people who don't like you.

BF: Uh, thank you.

BD: Oh, that's very good...

BF: If you turn your radio down you'll find it makes it sorta confu...

C28: Yeah, yeah, it sort of confuses it up – all right.

BF: Everybody that calls Oxford 7-8506 – turn your radios down.

C28: OK. Well, um, you know, it's really interesting and it's... it's just good to hear. I called a little while ago and I'm sitting here sort of burping at the people who were calling in the meantime and criticizing you, 'cause they're sort of narrow minded, I think...

BD: Who's thanking you, Bob?

C28: But you're doin' good stuff.

BF: (to Dylan) They like me. It's you they don't like!

BD: (laughs) I know! It's a drag sometimes!

BF: Yeah?

BD: Yeah, they make it very...

C28: Oh well, you're both fine. OK.

BF: See, I told you I could do your career a lotta good.

BD: Isn't the tea gonna come?

BF: No, it hasn't come.

BD: Why shouldn't I sit with that Phil out there? That Phil out there with... with the, uh... what's it... what's... uh... that tattoo on his neck. Ask him if the tea came, or if he drank it all.

BF: WBAI...

C29: Uh, yeah. I'd like to ask Bob Dylan a question.

BF: OK.

C29: Uh yeah. I, uh, was watching the Les Crane Show a long time ago and he said that he was gonna make a movie with Allen Ginsberg.

BD: Oh... no that never came through. We just did a little bit of it. OK?

C29: What happened to it?

BD: Oh we just scrapped it.

C29: Oh, I was looking forward to it.

BD: We didn't have... none of us had the time.

C29: Have you made any attempts on the screen?

BD: Yeah, well, I... I'm in contact with Allen, yeah. He's the...

BF: The footage... the footage was bought by, uh...

BD: Would you see if there's any tea? Hey, Phil, would you see if there's any tea? Please ask, ask, ask, ask.

BF: ...the footage was bought by that Polish director and it's in Repulsion right now.

C29: Yeah, right. (laughs) Have you made any other attempts on the screen?

BD: Huh?

C29: Have you, like...

BD: No, no, no. Yeah, pretty soon. In the fall, make a movie. Sometime, I guess...

C29: OK.

BD: 'Bye.

BF: Listen, I think you can... you can probably tell 'em about playing Jack Elliott in the movie... Bob's gonna be playing Jack Elliott in the movie of the same name.

C29: OK, great...

BD: No, no, you got it wrong. I'm gonna be playing Jack Elliott playing Marie Windsor.

BF: Oh, Oh. I knew I had something like that.

BD: Yeah.

BF: WBAI. Hello!

C30: Oh, Good morning!

BF: Good Morning!

C30: Uh, I'd like, uh, Mr Dylan to give a free plug for his television Special that he mentioned and, uh, let us all know when he's going to be on.

BD: Oh!

BF: OK...

BD: Oh, well, it... Uhh... gee, I don't know the date of it, uh, it's not a plug really. I just said it, you know, because... they asked me. Uh... it'll be in the papers, I guess. It's gonna be an hour long. It's on... Well, I really shouldn't say much about it at all. It'll be in the papers, you know.

C30: Oh, all right then.

BD: It's in a couple of weeks, I guess.

C30: And I'm enjoying the program, so that makes number 5.

BD: Oh!

C30: OK, goodnight.

BF: Oxford 7-8506, to register your approval or disapproval.

BD: Are you, are you still with us, man?

BF: But of course. WBAI...

BD: I guess we'll stay for a little while.

C31: Uh I'd like to speak to uh... is it Bob Dylan or Bob Fass? Hello?

BF: Well. You'd better make up your mind!

BD: I don't know if I'll speak to him, man.
C31: Uh... uh...
BF: No, I'll speak to him.
C31: Hello!...
BF: Yeah?
C31: Is this Bob Fass?
BF: Yeah!
C31: Yeah! Well I didn't think I'd get on that fast! Uh, because I tried it before and you had a coupla busy signals and the line was really tied up.
BF: Yeah?
C31: But I just thought I'd say I really enjoy your program, and you've been keeping me up all night long just listening to it every night. And, uh, I'd like to speak to Bob Dylan.
BD: Uh, huh.
BF: OK, you are.
BD: Well, this is Bob Dylan.
C31: Yes... uh, I'm getting quite a bang out of listening to you talk.
BD: Oh!
C31: And it's, uh, fascinating! It's about all I can say, and I think the program is great. I think you are pretty good too, and besides, I'm a pretty...
BD: Oh, oh, thanks.
C31: ...old guy to be listening to this type of thing.
BD: Well thank you.
C31: So that's something in your favor.
BF: I hope you get a lot older!
C31: (laughs) I'm getting a lot younger, listening to it.
BF: OK, that too.
C31: OK, thank you.
BF: Bye-bye. WBAI...
C32: Uh, good morning.
BF: Good Morning.
C32: First of all, Bob, uh, I really like your program a whole lot. I usually call you up about this time some evenings, to tell you that I'm doing a paper and, uh, Mr. Dylan? Uh, I think your writing is real great, and you play the kazoo and guitar real great but it would be real...
BF: The kazoo?
C32: ...real greater if you could, you know, just kinda sing a little bit better.
BD: Huh. Well, I appreciate that! (laughs). I'm always looking for good, crisp, solid... good solid rock bottom foundational criticism. And that just sinks it right in.
C32: 'Cause whenever I hear you sing... it's... I just... but I think your songs are really great.
BF: You know, not everybody has the courage to tell Bob the truth.
BD: Not everybody has the courage to sing like I do! (laughs)
C32: OK, thank you.
BD: 'Bye.
BF: 'Bye-bye. A controversial cat, you know that? WBAI...
BD: That's one of your phrases.
C33: Oh, OK; can I listen to a recording, please?
BF: Sure.
BD: Yes.
C33: Hello. Mr Dylan, do you know if crickets dream?
BD: Crickets Dream? (thinking it to be a group)
C33: Yeah.
BD: No, I've never heard of it. No.
C33: You don't know if they dream or not?

BD: Oh, if crickets dream? How would I know?
C33: Well, I just thought you might know, I mean...
BD: No, I don't know.
BF: I've just gotta sit there in the control room, Bob. We have to change the tape in about four minutes.
BD: Oh, OK. Why don't you go play a record? Why don't you play a record?
BF: OK, we'll play a record now.
BD: Yeah.
C33: Are you still on?
BD: Yeah.
BF: Yeah..
BD: Oh, we're gonna say goodbye now, though.
BF: What if crickets dream?
BD: I don't know. I've never heard if crickets dream. This... this guy... this guy must be well shot... (?)
C33: No, but crickets, you know... that's kind of interesting if you find out about animals though.
BD: Huh?
C33: If you find out all about animals, then you know how... you know all about people...
BD: Yeah. Ha, ha, ha. You believe that? (laughs)
C33: See, I don't live in New York City, and...
BD: Yeah, well, you're a pretty smart fellow. (laughs)
C33: Thanks.
BD: Yeah. OK, keep it up now.
C33: OK; 'bye.
BD: Goodbye.
BF: Bye-bye.
BD: Yeah, the world's gonna be saved by cats like him... who examine animals.
BF: There's no place around here that's open now Bobby.
BD: Oh. Are we still on the radio?
BF: Oh, yeah. There's a taxi driver who listens sometimes.
BD: Oh, God.
BF: When we say we're hungry or thirsty he brings us food and drink.
BD: See, none of these people are our real friends that are calling us. They're just calling up to, oh to... to keep themselves up...
BF: Yeah. Is Myrie Josephson near a turntable? Maybe he can play a record.
BD: They're certainly not bringing us anything. Well, we'll just talk to this one... this one person here, that's right in the middle. Can we answer the call?
BF: Sure. Answer this one last call.
BD: OK. Hello?
C34: Oh hello. WBAI?
BD: Yeah.
C34: Hello. It's nice to be on. The busy signal sounded so good recently! I'd like to ask Bob Dylan if he'd like to say hello to some fans of his in England.
BD: Sure!
C34: I'm recording this on tape and I'll be sending a dub over to them...
BD: (laughs)
C34: ...as soon as I can. They're Linda Bennett and Tony Bennett over in Basildon, England.
BD: (laughs)
C34: Tony Bennett... not the singer.
BF: Not the Tony Bennett?
BD: Oh, God... what am I gonna get into here...?
BF: Another Tony Bennett. This guy's not the real Tony Bennett.

BD: OK. Listen, uh, I wanna say hello to all my fans there, and tell them Tony Bennett loves them! And... uh... and, gee, I just...

BF: (singing a Tony Bennett song)

BD: They've just bought... I'm looking forward to another hit as big as my last one, one about San Francisco. And, uh... I recently have been doing a lotta research and I've got another hit and just tell all my English fans that I just love them and... and think of them, and can't wait to get back there and play again in my old, uh...

BF: Keep those cards and letters coming.

BD: Yeah, just keep 'em coming. Keep 'em coming and...

C34: By the way, are you going down to Philadelphia?

BD: I remember you. Mmm! (blows a kiss) Yes. Philadelphia... No.

C34: Yeah. I was wondering just in case you ever happen to be down Philadelphia some Saturday night with nothin' to do...

BD: Yeah... (laughs)

C34: ...would you like to stop into WRTI-FM in, uh, Temple University?

BD: Oh, man! I couldn't wait.

C34: We have a folk show. We'd love to have you.

BD: Oh, I'll be there, you know, the minute I get within... within driving range. And, uh, if I got nothin' to do I'll be right there!

C34: Yeah. Park Avenue, North.

BD: Right. OK, I got it. Park Avenue...

BF: I think we've got it now... (?)

BD: OK, 'bye now.

C34: OK. 'bye then. '.

BF: Bye-bye.

BD: Oh, I'm j...

BF: OK; we're gonna... Listen call back a little later. We'll go... as soon as we've changed the tape and played some records.

BD: Oh, will you play a Lightnin' Hopkins record again?

BF: Maybe. OK we have a Lightnin' Hopkins cued up again.

BD: Oh, play this Fugs record! Play Nothing.

BF: Uh... No, I don't think I'll play Nothing. There's that old FCC.

BD: Oh, you mean it's dirty? It's a dirty song?

BF: Yeah, well, it's not.

BD: No, that's not a dirty song.

BF: ...duty...

BD: You know they banned a lotta my songs, you know? You know that?

BF: Who did? Who did?

BD: Oh, a lot of the songs on my last album were...

BF: Which ones?

BD: Whole lot of them...

The Lightnin' Hopkins record plays, and the tape recording cuts

BF: OK, we're back.

BD: You tell... Oh.

BF: We're back on the air. What were you gonna say, Bob?

BD: No, I forgot.

BF: You forgot? Hey, Bob... Bob, you don't like our... the way we sign off huh? 'Bye-bye', it's terrifying?

BD: Yeah, yeah: frightening.

BF: Yeah?

BD: Well, I don't wanna get into that, though. Why don't you just do what you're gonna do?

BF: You wanna take some more calls?
BD: Uh, I don't know. That doesn't matter to me. I'm not necessarily looking forward to it.
BF: You made a record today?
BD: Yeah.
BF: That we can't put... I just heard it, and we can't play it on the air.
BD: Oh yeah. That's too bad.
BF: Not because it's dirty or anything like that, but it isn't released yet.
BD: Yeah.
BF: But I heard it, and I can... I've memorized it and I'll sing it... I'll sing it.
BD: Ha. You would!
BF: (laughs) But it's not copyrighted!
BD: That's right.
BF: OK, we'll take some more calls. Oxford 7- 8506, ooh! There they are – ha, WBAI...
C35: Hi. May I speak to Bob Dylan, please?
BD: I don't hear anything on my...
BF: You don't hear anything?
BD: No.
BF: Hey... how about now?
BD: Huh? What?
BF: How about now, Bob?
BD: You'd better tell the person to say something.
C35: Bob?
BF: Hello?
BD: I can't hear anything...
C35: Is that Dylan?
BF: Well, we're having a little trouble here. .
BD: Can you hear it?
BF: Take that other earphone there, Bob.
BD: Well, maybe these earphones aren't plugged in.
BF: Try that one. This one doesn't work.
BD: Oh.
C35: Hello?
BF: Hello?
C35: Yeah. OK, OK, all right.
BD: I'll change (?) with you, OK? Oh, I can hear him now. OK I'll change (?) with you.
C35: Um, d'you remember back about your third album, um, you know, you were sort of...
BD: Hey, let Robbie hear some way. Is there some way...
BF: OK, see if you can... Sorry, excuse us for just a moment. We're having what we call in the trade 'technical difficulties', right.
C35: Yeah, right.
BF: You've heard the term before right? Robbie, find a place underneath the table that you can plug those into and, uh...
BD: Is this the right place here? Is there a double place over here, man?
BF: Yeah.
BD: OK.
BF: Just another interesting, uh, glance behind the scenes...
BD: Oh, oh.
BF: ...radio, and the work that goes on behind the scenes of...
BD: ...a bit further down...
BF: ...of radio there, where people are down on the floor...
BD: ...did you see anything?
BF: ...roaming around on their hands and knees...
BD: ...Plug it in which way they were before...

BF: ...Looking for places to plug in.. Hello! Somebody put a light on, so that we can see. We still can't see...

BD: ...no...

BF: Yeah, it's right here, right here, here we are. There's the place, it's uh... Things are very primitive at WBAI, you probably, uh, found out by now.

BD: Can you hear now?

RR: Yeah.

BF: Can you hear now? Good, good. OK. Hello?

C35: Hello?

BF: You were asking a question.

C35: Yeah. Uh, Bob?

BD: Yeah.

C35: Um, can you remember back about your... I think your third album, when you were writing, uh, you know, Masters Of War and those songs like that?

BD: That was the second album.

C35: Uh, the second? Oh, no, third was God On Our Side, yeah right. Well you, know, like that.

BD: Yeah.

C35: Um... I... you know, I guess you were probably being pretty sincere then, like that, and since then your music has changed and...

BD: No, I haven't changed, you've changed.

C35: No, no. I said your music has changed.

BD: No, my music hasn't changed. I'm not saying... I'm just using other people playing with me. Same music.

C35: Yeah. No, no, no... come on, don't goof on me.

BD: (together with BF) We're not goofing on you!

BF: He's not goofing on you!

BD: Other people are just playing with me; the songs are the same!

BF: I can't understand this! I listen to the record and I hear the same thing!

C35: No, I mean...

BF: I hear the same thing, and I think, maybe, something deeper.

C35: Well, uh...

BD: I mean, I'm not... I'm not defending myself in...

C35: No, no, no, no, I don't want you to.

BD: ...in saying that I haven't changed; but I'm just saying you're lookin' at the wrong thing.

C35: Yeah yeah, no no... I don't want you to defend yourself, no. But you see, the thing is... well, that's not my main question. Like, uh, when you wrote those songs like that, there was, like, Vietnam... it wasn't as big as it is now... and questioned and...

BD: I never wrote songs about those kinda things. I only wrote one specific... no, two – two specific songs about anything.

C35: Well, no, no... Like, like... No, I'm not asking you to be a Phil Ochs, you know! But, like... like, God On Our Side...

BD: Yeah.

C35: ...for a... that's just one... yeah, you know...

BD: Oh, God, man! That's just like... With God On Your Side is contained in like, you know, like two lines of something like Desolation Row.

C35: Yeah, yeah, right!

BD: That whole song is in there. I mean, I managed to get two I... you know, in two lines. I mean, if you can't pick it out or single it out, that's not my problem.

C35: Yea, yeah, yeah, all right. What I'm saying... what I'm saying is, like... like it's a lot more subtle... there. I, I think it is.

BD: It's not, it's not.

BF: Wait a minute, wait a minute. Which one do you think is more subtle?

C35: Pardon?
BF: Which one do you think is more subtle?
C35: Something like, um, something like Desolation Row...
BD: It's not more subtle! It's just more to the point. It's just more... it's just more... it doesn't spare you any time to, you know, to string the thing together. It is all together. It doesn't... it doesn't pretend like it has to do anything, that's all.
C35: Yeah, well...
BD: Hey, I don't know... I can't talk about what I do. I'm not gonna...
C35: Well no, no, no... well, take, like, the Forest Hills concert...
BD: Huh? Oh.
C35: Like at the Forest Hills concert, I was there, just after Newport. And, like most of Desolation Row you had... like, you know, kids screaming and, uh, laughing, you know, and...
AK: No, they were quiet!
BD: Well I wasn't... that's not my problem. I can't worry about what the audience is gonna do. I... Hey, come on – what do I care?
C35: Well, anyway, uh, the main question is this, the one that I wanted to get to, like, uh you know, I'm not saying, like...
BD: Anyone got a cigarette? Thanks.
C35: ...live all these problems like they get now, like, don't live the war and all this. But it seems like... I remember during the summer there was a sing-in and a lotta people were there, are, you know, it was strange. Uh...
BD: Well, I don't sing on the stages with other people. I don't go on stage with a bunch of other people. Well, I... Oh, I could do that...
C35: Yeah, yeah, well no, the thing is... you sound like you're getting awful defensive. I mean ... I'm not trying to...
BD: I never went on stage with a bunch of other people. Don't... What are you saying? Are you saying I should be on stage with a bunch of other people?
C35: Well, well... I don't know... Yeah, I was wondering how come you're not...
BD: Oh, 'cause I don't do it, that's all.
C35: ...how come you're not, you know, doing something now. I mean, you know about it? I mean...
BD: About what?
C35: Uh... well... yeah, OK, yeah, there's very little anybody can do about... (?)... you know, to take the war, OK? There's very little anybody can do about it.
BD: So what can anybody do about it? It's a war, it's a war!
C35: Yeah, yeah, yeah, but, you know, something!
BD: Hey, wars have been around for a long time. What makes you think this is anything special?
C35: Yeah, yeah, yeah, but, you know... yeah, but guys are dying now!
BD: 'Course guys... guys have always died.
C35: And, and it just seems like, you know, a couple of years back, uh if...
BD: Well, have you... What grade are you in?
C35: Were you at Washington?
BD: W... Washington, where?
C35: At the, uh, Civil Rights march? Yeah, I know 'which one?' You know, you know, the...
BD: That was that one a long time ago... the huge big gigantic one?
C35: Yeah, yeah...
BD: I was there, yeah.
C35: Yeah, and, like, you know, you...
BD: Well, that didn't take much courage to really go there, like, when there's...
C35: No, I'm not saying courage.

BD: ...like, three hundred thousand people there too! I mean, don't, don't, don't think I'm sticking up for any kind of minority rights; I mean, three hundred thousand people isn't any kind of minority, man, you know!

C35: I'm not trying to, you know, put you up as some kind of hero like that. But it's just that now, uh, like, like, you... I imagine you were sincere then, I mean I don't think you were...

BD: No! I don't know what you mean. Like, I'm not gonna go out 'n' picket anything, if that's what you mean.

C35: Well, I don't know, I just think you...

BD: Well if you can't... give me one reason why I should, then I'd do it, but...

C35: Well (laughs), well, if I have to give you a reason why I should... well, then I guess I'd better not ask anything that...

BD: No, no, it's not... you know, it's none of my doings... I really do other things. I'm not like you (laughs).

C35: Yeah, yeah, yeah, well...

BD: And I'm very... I'm very tied up in a lot of other... lot of other, uh, daily, uh... exercises. And then my mind just does not work, uh.

C35: No, I realize that, but...

BD: Thinking about the troubles of the world! I mean, like it's, you know... who am I to think about...

C35: Yeah, yeah, but you were...

BD: ...to carry the world on my shoulders... Huh?

C35: You were... you, like, uh, when you were writing these more obvious protest...

BD: Ah, yeah, well all the stuff that I'm writing now – I just never wrote as songs, that's all. I can't, you know...

C35: ...like, like, uh, Pawn In Their Game. I remember...

BD: Yeah, well... I did it because that was the thing. That's what I was involved in. If you're interested really, you know, I mean, for what it's worth. There's no big hoax or any kinda secret thing happening, or any kind of plan from the beginning. I just did what was hap... I played rock and roll music, you know when I was sixteen... fifteen years old!

C35: No. no, I'm not, I'm not puttin' down your rock n' roll...

BD: Well... well, I quit doing it, you know. I quit doing it because, uh, it just wasn't... I couldn't make it. You know, like, it's just too hard. It was just too... it's different now. The music field is different now than it used to be. People that're... that actually have, have... who actually make money in it now are not necessarily old people where they used to be. They used to be just old people that smoked cigars and hung around in certain bars, uh, uptown, you know, around Tin Pan Alley. Well, that used to be the music thing. But it's not that anymore... I mean, no, don't put down rock and roll. I mean I don't even know what it is. I don't play rock and roll, first of all, if you think I do.

C35: I didn't put down rock and roll but, like, take March 17th, you know, where it's... no...

BD: Oh, oh where – this March?

C35: Yeah, in Washington this...

BD: Oh, oh, why... Come on, I ain't going to march nowhere. I got things to do.

C35: But, hell, you know; I mean, if you... I'm sorry! If you, uh... you know 'cause, 'cause it's...

BD: Hey, listen, I'm not... Do you see me in politics? Am I in politics? Or am I anybody's parents? Am I any... am I any mother or father to anybody? Who do you think I'm supposed to be responsible for? I didn't create any living person that walks around.

C35: No, no, no, but if you... if... I'm not asking you to live like that. But if you felt enough about it two Or three years ago, you know, why not now? Or have you just changed?

BD: Well, I don't know what I was thinking about two or three years ago. I don't know... I have to explain it to you – it's not so complicated, man. You don't even have to ask why – it's very simple, but, like, I just don't feel like sitting here talking about it right now.

C35: Oh, OK. I'm sorry.

BD: No. I'll talk to you some other time, but...

C35: Yeah, yeah – OK.

BD: 'Bye.

C35: 'Bye.

BF: Hey Bob...

BD: What?

BF: Once you said to me... one night you said to me in a, in a... in a private thing... uh, you said to me that Marlon Brando could've been President.

BD: I did?

BF: Yeah, you did.

BD: Huh.

BF: You did.

BD: I know Marlon Brando... I know him, I know him.

BF: Yeah... What did you mean by that?

BD: Huh?

BF: What did you mean by that?

BD: Well, I'm sure I said it before I knew him.

BF: Yeah.

BD: I wouldn't say the same thing now!

BF: Yeah?

BD: Oh. I meant that he probably... no, I don't... I didn't think... I don't think I meant that he could be President, or might've...

BF: Well, like, you felt that he was a gr... he was a kinda tremendous voice or leader...

BD: No, I said Marlon Brando and his kind maybe could've been President. I necessarily did not mean Marlon Brando specifically.

BF: Yeah.

BD: I'm just saying that people like that... But who wants to be President? Who wants to?

BF: What do you wanna do Bob?

BD: Well, I just wanna be here right now, and leave the same way I came in. (laughs) That's all I wanna do.

BF: Well, a lot of people want to know. WBAI... hello?

C36: Hello.

BF: Yeah.

C36: Is this Bob Ross?

BF: No, it's not Bob Ross.

BD: You got the wrong number!

C36: No, uh, Bob. What do you think of John Hammond's Country Blues album?

BD: I've never even heard it. Never even heard of it!

C36: You've never heard it?

BD: No!

C36: Oh come on!

BD: I, I've heard... I know John Hammond but I don't know anything about.. I've only heard... I only knew two, uh... I remember one album they made – his first album. I haven't heard anything else.

C36: Well then, you're out of it 'cause you haven't heard his album.

BD: Yeah, I guess so.

BF: Yes, he's out of it, yeah.

BD: Am I missing a lot?

C36: Quite a bit.

BD: Oh, my God!
C36: Quite a bit.
BD: Heaven help me. Is... I'll... I'll tell you, I'll make a special attempt. I don't want...
BF: I wonder if there's a record fair open now? Hey, Bob...
BD: Will it change me? Do I, do I need...
C36: I don't want it to change you.
BD: Well I mean... but, like will it just turn me around? Will it take me on some kind of trip?
C36: No. It'll turn you on. It won't turn you around.
BD: Oh. Is John Hammond better than Otis Redding?
C36: I dig Otis Redding too but, you know, that's two different bags.
BD: Uh-huh...
BF: Two different bags?
C36: Right.
BD: Well, what's Otis Bedding's bag?
C36: Well, he's the real thing.
BD: What's John Hammond?
C36: He's... No, that was a bad statement. Uh...
BD: What's Otis Redding's...
C36: Otis Redding's 'down home', you know?
BD: Yeah. What's John Hammond?
C36: And John Hammond is white... white city blues singer trying to interpret 'down home'.
BD: What's Muddy Waters?
C36: Muddy Waters is 'way down home' – like, Delta...
BD: Oh. What's, uh?
C36: And Otis Redding's Nashville, you know?
BD: What's Jimmy Rushing?
C36: Jimmy Rushing. I'm not familiar with him.
BD: Oh. He's city. (laughs)
C36: He's city.
BD: Yeah. What's... and what did you say John Hammond was again? Let's keep this in mind.
C36: He's a...
BD: A white boy interpreting 'down home'.
C36: ...who digs the blues...
BD: Yeah.
C36: ...who's trying to dig the blues...
BD: Hey. Well.
C36: But he's interpreting it in his own way.
BD: Yeah, well... what do I owe anybody that's an interpreter?
C36: You don't owe anybody anything!
BD: I mean, especially if it's something which I can understand, right? You see, if I can understand something, and I know something, you know, and I like it, and it's real and I know it's real, I mean, like, what use have I to listen to somebody else who... who's doing the same thing only he's not doing it as...
C36: He's not doing the same thing! He's not. He's not just mimicking him...
BD: Oh, I didn't say he was. I didn't say he was.
C36: You implied it.
BD: But isn't all his material that way?
C36: What?
BD: Isn't all that... isn't his material all 'down home'?
C36: Sure.
BD: Then it follows, he's just interpreting it then, right? He's an actor.
C36: Uh...

BD: Right?
C36: No, everybody's an actor...
BD: But he feels it? He feels it down... down deep in his soul? Does it, you know...
C36: No, not the way Otis Redding does, or Muddy Waters. What John Hammond does...
BD: Can you see it comin' in from his... from his brain? Does he have a headband around his head or what?
C36: What? If he can say or feel like...
BD: Hey, well, if you like him, hey, that's fine! Y'know...
C36: Well, I'm tryin' to put you on to him! I think you might like him.
BD: Well... hey, you don't have to put me on to him. That's OK... I'll... I'll, you know... I'll keep... if I come across it I'll listen to it.
C36: Right, OK. That's all I wanted to know.
BD: Yeah.
C36: OK, thanks a lot.
BF: Bye-bye, John. WBAI...
BD: (to someone else) You're going to what?

Unknown voice "Tenth Street."

BD: Yeah, I'll go with you! Yeah. I'll go with you, man. We'll go back down.
C37: Hello. Is Bob Dylan there? Hello?
BF: Yeah? Uh, what time is... This is the last call, 'cause Bobby's gotta go.
C37: Yeah, all right.
BD: Hey, I'm gonna have to go. Yeah, what is it?
BF: Both Bobs have gotta go!
C37: OK. Listen, this is Dick Lourie. The thing I wanna ask is, I've been tryin' to get... I'd like to get permission, um, to put a text of one of Dylan's songs in a magazine. Uh...
BD: What magazine?
C37: It's called Thing. It's a – it's a small... it's a poetry magazine.
BD: Well, what song?
C37: I was thinking – Like A Rolling Stone.
BD: Oh. Yeah, well, you can do that!
C37: I can do that? Well...
BD: Yeah. Well, you can. What's your name?
C37: My name is Lourie. L-O-U-R-I-E...
BD: Well, well, hey, I'll tell you what... I don't know... I don't know anything about it – you'll have to call up, uh... you can do it if you wanna do it, you know, but...
C37: Well, the thing is, I tried to get hold of your manager a coupla times and it's very hard, you know...?
BD: Yeah.
C37: ...like, to get to talk to him and to get any permission and stuff like that.
BD: Well... w, w... what's your name?
C37: My name is Lourie. L-O-U-R-I-E.
BD: Well, uh, you... Why don't you call him up again and, and, uh...
BF: Hey, Bob – I'll tell you what...
BD: No, let me tell him... I'll just tell him something, like how to do it.
BF: Oh, yeah – you tell him.
BD: I know the magazine; I've read his magazine and I know somebody that had it. I was looking at it. Things, is that the name of it?
C37: Yeah, Things, it's called.
BD: Oh. Yeah, it's... Uh, uh, uh – what you have to do is call up the number which you usually call, you know.
C37: Yeah.

BD: ...and, uh... you know, and uh, just leave word there. Just call up and say who you are, and somebody will call you back...
C37: OK.
BD: ...about what your business is...
C37: I'll do that. I'll do that next week.
BD: ...I'll just look after it. All right? Somebody will call you back, I guess, and give you permission.
C37: All right. Would you... Can you leave my name there and... later?
BD: Yeah, yeah. Yeah, what is it?
C37: It's Lourie. L O-U-R-I-E.
BD: Yeah, OK Lourie.
C37: Richard.
BD: Richard, right.
BF: Hey, I thought you didn't do business over the telephone!
BD: Yeah, I don't. I gotta go – 'bye.
C37: It ain't business, it's free!
BD: Yeah, so long, 'bye.
C37: So long.
BF: It's OK.
BD: (to Bob Fass) Yeah, I'll take one more if you want...
BF: You wanna take another one? Sure.
BD: I'll stand up and take one more.
BF: OK.
BD: Right. Are you gonna pull this up?
BF: No, we can't, we can't... Don't put... Come on over here to this microphone, Bob. Come on over here if you wanna stand...
BD: OK. We'll just go now you know. Oh this won't stretch. I'll just stand here and do some on this side.
BF: OK. One more call. WBAI...
C38: Yes, Mr. Dylan?
BD: Yes...
C38: Uh, if I mention Hazard to you, what comes to your mind?
BD: Hazard?
C38: Yeah.
BD: Uh, red flag on... on a... on a panel truck going down a highway?
C38: No, I mean Hazard, Kentucky.
BD: Hazard, Kentucky... ah, I don't know, is it like. Is it like Bilmont, Kentucky?
C38: No. I just wanted to see what your reaction was.
BD: Oh, how about Benmont, Kentucky... if I mention Bilmont or Reading Kentucky? If I mention Reading, Kentucky, what's your reaction?
C38: Uh... Same as if you said Ashland, Kentucky.
BD: What's that?
C38: Some small, uh, coal mining town.
BD: No you're wrong!
C38: OK.
BD: You never heard of it? You never heard of... you never heard of Reading, Kentucky.
C38: Yeah.
BD: You have. What about Bilmont?
C38: I don't know what...
BD: They're very small towns – they're in the mountains too.
C38: Yeah – I just wanted to...
BD: They're just like Hazard.
C38: Pardon me?

BD: You don't... you should, you should, find out about all those towns, they're all the... they're all around there. You shouldn't just know about Hazard, man. Hazard's just a... Hazard's just a propaganda.

C38: No, but the reason I mentioned this, uh, a friend of mine went hitching down to, uh, to...

BD: Hazard.

C38: ...Hazard, Kentucky, and I thought it was kinda stupid.

BD: Yeah, it was, probably.

C38: Like if you want to get down there in this weather, you might as well take a bus or something.

BD: Yeah, you might as well take a train.

C38: Yeah, he kinda like, froze..

BD: Yeah... OK. I'll see you later.

C38: OK.

BD: Bye now.

C38: Bye.

BD: OK. I guess we're gonna have to go, Bob.

BF: Thanks for coming up, Bob.

BD: Well, thank you very much for...

BF: Thanks for sparing...

BD: ...for uh...

BF: Thanks for playing the record for me. How soon will we have it?

BD: This record?

BF: Yeah.

BD: Oh, I guess it should be out in about, uh... They were gonna have it... it's a rush job. We've just made it.

BF: Mm.

BD: It's a single. We're into making an album, you know, and this one's the only thing we came out with in, like, three days. So... so, like, gonna have to forget about the album for right now. It's, it's, it's, uh... it's very good, the single. It's better than the last two, you know, and... and it's just as good as Like A Rolling Stone. And... in a lot of ways it's better, yeah?

Unknown voice – "Yeah".

BD: It is better.

Unknown voice – "Could say that".

BD: Yeah. And it's cleaner.

Unknown voice – "Without rush".

BD: ...(?)... here, that's all.

BF: Thank you. There'll be two of them coming out won't there?

BD: Huh?

BF: There'll be two of them coming out...

BD: Two what?

BF: Records have two sides.

BD: Oh, well... I don't think so. They're gonna cut it though, probably... only in New York do they cut it. They don't cut it anywhere else. Only do they cut it in New York because a lot of money is tied up in the advertising. And so that's why they cut it. And, uh...

BF: You don't know what's going to be on the flip... side?

BD: On the flipside is some song from the last album. Probably Queen Jane Approximately. That'll probably be on the flipside, but... that's... I always do that, you know. I was gonna put Positively 4th Street on the other side, but, uh... I didn't figure anybody could understand it so... What can you do? Want to take one more? If it's somebody very nice and sweet, man.

BF: How can you tell...?

BD: Hey, why don't you just answer and find out if it's somebody that's sweet?

BF: OK. Pick up the...

BD: Somebody that's gentle. Just... just anybody that's gentle.

BF: You wanna talk to somebody who'll bid you a sweet goodnight...

BD: No, no, we'll just... yeah, yeah, we'll just... yeah, whoever, yeah. Let's, like, just pick up one at random.

BF: Hello, Random...

BD: Hello. He don't sound very gentle to me!

C39: Yeah, I'd like to speak to Mr. Dylan.

BF: Will you turn your radio down, please sir?

C39: Hello?

BF: Turn your radio down, please.

C39: All right. Uh... I've turned the radio down.

BD: (presumably to Al Kooper) Sorry to keep you up so late, you know. You have no work tomorrow night, huh?

C39: Uh hello?

BF: Hello. Yes?

BD: Uh, how come it's...

(there is a short break in the recording at this point)

C39: ...anything happens.

BD: Yeah. Well they... they... they've got... they do it you know.

C39: They have to see that you all are entertainers...

BD: Yeah, well...

C39: ...and then, uh...

BD: They all are! (laughs)

C39: Well, that's what I say...

BD: Yeah.

C39: You all are entertainers and I love folk music because I am a Southener myself.

BD: Yeah, well, I appreciate...

C39: I love everything you sing and I love everything that Pete sings...

BD: Uh, huh.

C39: And, um, I just hate to see them try to put you in a certain type of situation where... that you can be called 'communists' and all this type of thing...

BD: Yeah.

C39: ...and I don't think, uh, this has anything to do with communism, because I been with all those people all day today...

BD: Well, whatever... it's...

C39: ...people's stand in the movement.

BD: It don't... it don't... it don't matter, you know? It's like, the sun's gonna rise and the sun's gonna go down and... and, like, whatever happens, man, it's just... you know, it's...

C39: Yeah man.

BD: ...it's gonna... the word's just gonna keep goin' on, man, like... like, really like, who cares really?

C39: Well, OK. Thank you, Bob.

BD: Well, just be good now. You be a good guy. (laughs)

C39: OK. Thank you, Bob, and, uh, uh... I'll pay you for this.
BD: All right. See you, now.
C39: Uh, don't worry about it... As I say, we are not gonna work on Maggie's Farm no more.
BD: Well, I say that too!
C39: OK.
BD: OK. So long.
C39: Uh, so long.
BF: OK. Thanks, Bob. You through?
BD: Yeah, yeah, we must go. Hey, thank you for havin' us up here...
BF: Thank you for coming up.
BD: We've taken a lotta peoples time up...
BF: This is WBAI in New York City. We're on...
BD: Oh, that's too bad. Well, call me if you need letters badly about it. Like, I'll pay for any damages and stuff like that...
BF: (laughs) Yeah, well... Just wait downstairs if there's anybody waiting for me with snowballs!
BD: Oh God! Hey, we'll handle it. There's some more of us here tonight.
BF: OK.

Unknown voice – "See you, Bob".

BF: Bye-bye, Bob.
BD: Goodbye.

20 February 1966
Martin Bronstein Interview, Montreal

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 375-378.

Martin Bronstein of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation caught Dylan during the interval of his Montreal concert on February 20th 1966.
Taken from the circulating tape.

MB: Do you say Dylan or Dye-lan?

BD: Oh, I say Dylan, Dyelan or whatever. I say anything you say really.

MB: Did you take it from the Welsh poet?

BD: No, no. That's, er, I guess what you would say a rumor made up by people who like to simplify things. It's, er, it's a name of my family but, er, it's my uncles family. It's not my first father's name. It's a name of my mother's, my mother's side of the family, and it's spelled DILLON, you know, and I, er, changed it from there.

MB: Do you consider yourself a poet or a songwriter?

BD: I don't consider myself either one of those two things. I did when I first heard the words, you know, of course – "songwriter" – you hear that when you're very young. "Poet," I never heard that word really. I never really could think of myself as such until I came to New York and then for a while I did think I was a poet, but I don't consider myself anymore from seeing all the rest of the people who're called poets too and I just don't like to refer to myself as a poet because it puts you in a category with a lot of funny people, you know.

MB: When did you first find yourself writing poetry or verse, or writing?

BD: When I was about eight or nine I wrote; I've been writing for a very long time, I mean, if you can say that. I mean, I'm not... I don't know if other – if most people write when they're eight – or eight or nine, you know, but I actually did write poems at that age, poems, rhymes, you know, for... you know, about the flowers and my mother and stuff like that but... so I've been writing for a while.

MB: What made you start singing?

BD: Er, well, er, I just did it, you know. It was a natural thing to do. I started a long time or two – I started singing after I started writing. I started that when I was about ten – ten or eleven – and started out just country and western – Hank Williams, Lefty Frizzell kind of things. Hank Williams I think was just about... had just died, and I started playing some time around there.

MB: Was he one of your first influences?

BD: Yeah. I sang... I tried to sing everything he would sing.

MB: What other influences have you had?

BD: Oh! I've had a lot of people that I tried to do things the way they did. As it stands now there's no influence that maybe I've taken. Ah, I don't really know the extent of their influence that they have on what I do. I've had... Hank Williams was the first influence I would think, I guess, for a longer period of time than anybody else. Er, he influenced ... nobody influenced what I wrote at that age, because I didn't really see anything that anybody wrote... er...

MB: Well let's put it this way. Did you have any idols when you first started writing and singing?

BD: Yeah. Oh yeah. Sure, sure. Well, not when I started writing. When I was singing... I never sang what I wrote until I got to New... until I got to be about eighteen or nineteen. I wrote songs when I was, you know, younger – fifteen – but they were songs. I wrote those... I never sang anything which I wanted to write, you understand. The songs I wrote at that age were just four chords, rhythm and blues songs based on things that The Diamonds would sing or, you know, The Crew Cuts or the groups of like... In The Still Of The Night kind of songs, you know. But, er, well, whatever have you.

MB: What's your reaction to the success that you've had?

BD: I honestly don't have any reactions to it. I've been at it too... I've been doing this too long. It's not... it's an accidental thing really. I never strived for it and I don't plan to accept it, you know, for that much longer a period of time. Er, it's, er, it just works hand in hand, that's all. The money that I do make from the success, it's not as easy as just saying that success brings in money because the money... what the success does... what the money does is to enable you to stay away from the causes of your success, really, if you follow me to some degree.

MB: Dick Gregory said this – that the people who made him famous were people who could only afford 35 cents for a bottle of beer, could no longer afford to see him. Is this what you're trying to say?

BD: Well, yeah, I don't know. I always played for free to those people. Huh, I don't know about Dick Gregory, I never... those people didn't make me famous. I always played for free. The people who made me famous were the people that bought Blowin' In The Wind and things like that.

MB: When did you realize this success was happening to you?

BD: This immediate success you're talking about now? Out here? This thing that we're doing?

MB: This thing that's made you world-famous.

BD: Er, not too long ago really. I never really realized it before, you know, four, five, six months ago that I couldn't go into a restaurant. I didn't really know it was that bad, you know. But I mean, I could never think of that because... I mean, it, you know, does tricks with your head where you can't go someplace, you know, where everybody else can go and be left alone. I mean, you can't say... you can't go down to, you know, the all-night drugstore or something and just sit there all night... and, you know, my whole life I'm used to staying out all night in public places. It's all gone now, you know. That's all. Do you have a cigarette now?

MB: Do you resent this?

BD: No, I don't resent it. I have no... I don't feel I have any right to resent it because if I... you know, it's my own fault if I go down there. I have no right to resent people that come up to me and bother me. I don't, you know. I get mad. I'm not saying mad. Sometimes I don't get mad, sometimes I do, it all depends. I usually try not to make it out you know, if I'm, you know, touchy about anything, I don't really like to see anybody.

MB: Let's move on to another point. What particular thing – song – would you say you remember as being a breakthrough for you? Was it Blowin' In The Wind?

BD: No, no, it was... the most... d'you mean the most honest and straight thing which I thought I'd ever put across? That reached popularity you mean? There's been a few. There's been a few. Blowin' In The Wind was – to a degree, but I was just a kid, you know, I mean, I didn't know anything about anything at that point. I just wrote that, you know, and that wasn't it really. Mr. Tambourine Man, er... I was very close to that song. I kept it off my third album just because I felt too close to it to put it on you know. That was, but that was a funnier way. The other, if you're talking about what breakthrough is for me, I would have to say, speaking totally, would be Like A Rolling Stone because I wrote that after I'd quit. I'd literally quit singing and playing, and I found myself writing this song, this story, this long piece of vomit about twenty pages long, and out of it I took Like A Rolling Stone and made it as a single. And I'd never written anything like that before and it suddenly came to me that that was what I should do, you know. I mean, nobody had ever done that before. A lot of people... anybody can write, you know, a lot of the things I used to write. I just wrote 'em first because nobody else could think of writing them, you know. But that's only because I was hungry. So... but nobody can... I've never met anybody or heard anything... I hear a lot. I mean, I'm not saying it's better than anything else. I'm saying I don't think, you know... I think Like A Rolling Stone is definitely the thing which I do, man. That's write songs. I don't like to, I'm not interested any more now. After writing that, I wasn't interested in writing a novel, or, you know, a play or anything. Like, I knew – I just said "Too much". I wanted to write songs, you know, because it was just a whole new category. I mean, nobody's ever really written songs, you know, before. Really. I mean, people have in older days, but those were sonnets and soft troubadour-type things.

MB: Well, I know we're pushing time. You say you no longer can stay out late as you've done all your life. That means one of your pastimes, one of your enjoyments, has been cut down. What does Bob Dye-lan do when he wants to be entertained? Where does he go?

BD: Oh, my God! That's not a half a minute question there. Why'd you ask one that'd take a lifetime? I have half a minute. I can't answer that really.

MB: OK. Let me give it to you in a briefer way. What are some of your pastimes?

BD: My pastimes? I have no pastimes. I have none at all. I just, you know... I can't really name you anything. I could talk to you about it sometime if there's enough time, but I have none. I would love to say, y'know, bowling or sailing or roller-skating or, you know, painting, or I'd love to give you a hobby or something that would once... people would, y'know, turn em on. But really, I can't really tell you anything. What I do is write and sing. I mean, I do it whether, y'know, I'm getting paid for it or whether or not. I mean, that's all I do.

MB: Mr. Dylan, thanks very much. I'll let you back to your audience.

THE CHILDREN'S CRUSADE
by Ralph J. Gleason

One Man with a dream, at Pleasure,
Shall go forth and conquer a crown;
And three with a new song's measure
Can trample an empire down.
— Arthur O'Shaughnessy

The first time I saw Bob Dylan, a frail, insolent-looking, scraggy youth standing on a stage singing folk songs. I thought he was a drag. Worse than that, pretentious and only a faint echo of Woody Guthrie.

But listening to that same voice has changed my life, fundamentally.

When I first was exposed to his singing, I didn't hear him, really. I only thought I did. Then, almost by accident, I was swept up in "The Times They Are A-Changin'" and "A Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall" and some of his epic work. Then he came to Berkeley, California, and I hear him. Really heard him. And "hear" is the key word. When I met him I apologized for not digging him at first. "Y'didn't hear me, that's all," he said softly and shook hands.

Bob Dylan's songs and lyrics changed my life because they provided a new, nonideological basis for an attach upon the evils of our society that is linked with the attacks made by other artists but which is, because of his song and because of his youth, particularly effective. "I write in chains of flashing images," Dylan says, and these flashing images seem to me to provide a more serious assault on the structure of the Great Society and upon its hypocrisies and pretensions than any ideology or armed might of a foreign power.

Dylan is a major voice in the entertainment world and it is no accident that his moral position is expressed from that pulpit. The churches have abrogated their responsibility to youth (and are madly trying to get back in the act with jazz priests and beatnik clergy and anything else they can think of, but a square is a square).

Youth has found its own way, a veritable children's crusade led by a slender 24-year-old songwriter, singer and electric guitar player whose song royalties for the first half of 1965 were greater than the combined royalties for that same period of the celebrated Tin Pan Alley heroes, Cole Porter, George Gershwin and Oscar Hammerstein. Bob Dylan songs, recorded by hundreds of artists, are flooding the record stores. His songs blare forth from every radio and every juke box, and his voice is loud in the land, even when he is not singing.

And that voice is unique for what it is saying. Dylan is telling the American audience (and through that audience telling the world) that it is better to make love than to make war, that the only loyalty is to oneself ("thst it is not he or she or them or it that you belong to"), that politics are irrelevant ("you say 'nothin's perfect' an i tell you again there are no politics"), that the leadership cult of the Great Society is a fraud ("don't follow leaders, watch the parkin meters"), that the old-fashioned virtues of hard work and thrift and a clean tongue are obsolete ("money doesn't talk it swears' obscenity who really cares?").

He is saying, in short, that the entire system of Western society, built upon Aristotelian logic, the Judeo-Christian ethic and upon a series of economic systems from Hobbes to Marx to Keynes, does not work.

What he is saying is getting an unbelievable intense reaction from a generation thirsting for answers other than those in the college text books. Students may very well learn more from Dylan today than from the obsolete educational system, structured by another epoch. "I know I am a better human being for reading Bob Dylan," a high school student wrote me, adding: "I would rather write poetry now than study science." In schools all over the country, students are copying down lyrics of Dylan songs from records and insisting that the English class study them. A Jesuit high school in Sacramento devoted most of an English class one semester last year to the study of Dylan as poetry, and the University of California, like numerous other colleges and universities, has seen students get together themselves to hold unofficial seminars on his poems.

Dylan's assault on Western society has incurred the wrath of critics, poets and spokesmen for the Cultural Establishment. Louis Simpson, himself a prize-winning poet, has said, "I don't think Bob Dylan is a poet at all; he is an entertainer… I am not surprised, though, that American college students consider him their favorite poet; they don't know anything about poetry." Simpson notwithstanding, Dylan has already made the kind of scaring impression upon this generation that any poet in history would have been proud to make. His words, not those of Pulitzer Prize winners, are quoted by students, written on walls, pasted in notebooks to demonstrate the fervor of their belief. Other poets, like Lawrence Ferlinghetti and Allen Ginsberg, who have been speaking to the young for years, quite obviously consider Dylan a poet, for they recognize what Dylan is.

Dylan has done the impossible. He has taken poetry out to the streets and put it in on the juke boxes and brought it into the lives of everyone. Surely this is the dream of all poets. Think of having the whole world for an audience, not just a circle of friends — a world audience hanging on your every word. Dylan has done this. He has taken poetry out of the classrooms and out of the hands of the squares. He has discovered how to speak to the youth, and youth is never square.

He is the first poet of that all-American artifact, the juke box, the first American poet to touch everyone, to hit all walks of life in this great sprawling society. The first poet of mass media, if you will. "I am a 39-year-old housewife, mother of three teen-agers, and I love the Dylan songs," reads a typical letter. Up front at a Bob Dylan concert in Berkeley last fall were two Hell's Angels, a couple of university professors, Ginsberg, Ferlinghetti, novelist Ken Kesey and others of the hip intelligentsia.

Is Dylan a poet? Even his advocates have their reservations. Ginsberg says Dylan is still hung up having to rhyme words and Ferlinghetti wonders if Dylan would be effective as a poet without the guitar. But the only fundamental dissent comes from those who are not moved by him. Not since Elizabethan days has there been such an amalgam of popular speech and poetry. Dylan has taken the speech of the streets, broken the rules of language and made poetry of it.

One of the reasons why he is hauntingly important to the youth is that he makes one face oneself. You may not "enjoy" a Dylan concert of a Dylan album, but if you hear it, really hear it, you have to be affected by it. You cannot ignore it. Like all great art it reaches inside you and its intensity is frightening, too, so that while you are pleasured by it in one sense, you are also fearful for the strength of such a vision. Is Dylan poetry? To me he is. How many lines of the last three Pulitzer poets are quoted by the young? Yes quotes from Dylan ring through everything they do or say today.

As W.H. Auden wrote, "In Memory of W.B. Yeats":

For poetry makes nothing happen: it survives
In the valley of its saying where executive
Would never want to tamper; it flows south
From ranches of isolation and the busy griefs,
Raw towns that we believe and die in; it survives,
A way of happening, a mouth.

Dylan says: "These songs aren't complicated to me at all. It's all very clear and simple to me. I know what I'm… what they're all about. There's nothing hard to figure out for me. I wouldn't write anything I can't really see. They're all about real people. I'm sure you've seen all the people in my songs at one time or another." Rimbaud, when his mother asked what he meant by "Season in Hell," said: "I mean what it says; literally and in every sense."

Dylan thinks of songs — all songs, his own included — as pictures, "chains of flashing images." Dylan's world is a nightmare world, for the most part. "If my thought dreams could be seen, they'd probably put my head in a guillotine," he wrote. In his world are all sorts of carnival freak show figures: "Einstein disguised as Robin Hood… with his friend, the jealous monk," "the motorcycle black madonna two-wheeled gypsy queen," "Sweet Melinda, the peasants call her the goddess of gloom," "Dr. Filth… his nurse, some local loser, she's in charge of the cyanide hole," "Mack the Finger," etc. Recurring figures in Dylan poetry include the monk, the hunchback, the sideshow geek and clown and Napoleon. It's a gaudy, depressing grotesquerie rivaled only by the inmates of "The Circus of Dr. Lao" or the images of Rimbaud's "Season in Hell."

For Dylan sees the world around him — and this is, I suspect, the core of his attraction for the young — as a world run by a vast machine and by men who are heartless, mechanized men and part of that machine. He signs of alienation, of the emptiness of the adult society; he is the clown, the Napoleon in rags, a Don Quixote riding across a neon-lighted jungle, across the moon country, past lines of empty drive-in movies showing vista-vision pictures of what's happening. The vision is apocalyptical, surrealistic, the images glowing, and he is articulating the realignment of priorities first heralded by the wordless revolt of the jazzmen's horns.

There is something in Dylan for everybody. "You who philosophize disgrace," he screams at the lawmakers in "The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll" (a song about the fatal beating given a Negro servant by a Maryland farmer). He sneers at the groves of academe ("the old folks home in the college"), at religion ("the phantom of the opera in the perfect image of a priest"), at Madison Avenue ("grey flannel dwarfs"), at the war machine in "With God on Our Side," at hard work ("I ain't gonna work on Maggie's farm no more… they say sing while you slave, an I just get bored").

The new generation is a lonely one. "It's always silent where I am," Dylan has said, and again: "There is no love except in silence and silence doesn't say a word." It is a generation born in the shadow of the Bomb and straining to make sense out of a life governed, stratified by and resting upon assumptions of another age.

In "Desolation Row," Dylan runs through a congeries of bizarre images, including the Titanic sailing with T.S. Eliot and Ezra Pound "fighting in the captain's tower while calypso singers laugh at them and fishermen hold flowers." Later in the song he comments: "All those people that you mention, yes, I know them, they're quite lame. I had to rearrange their faces and give them all another name."

Dylan's open use of personal references in his songs has given rise to a whole mythology of in-group stories and interpretations rivaling those of Shakespeare's sonnets. His love songs include, "It's All Over Now, Baby Blue," "Don't Think Twice," "It Ain't Me, Babe," "If You Gotta Go, Go Now," and "All I Really Wanna Do Is, Baby, Be Friends With You." They begin in a slightly acid-touched romantic mood, bittersweet and hipster-cool, then go on into the openly accusatory "Queen Jane Approximately," "Like a Rolling Stone," and "Positively 4th Street." Some of the songs are firmly believed by many to parallel his romance with Joan Baez, the queen of the world of folk song. But then again, one wonders, how many other episodes and how many other individuals might fit? Certainly the sentiments so eloquently expressed — the truth of beauty, the necessity of freedom, the belief in the sanctity of self — fit far more than an individual romance. They speak directly to the love-hopes of the young and they speak in a language the young understand.

Dylan has said it in his own way:

"What folk music is, it's not depression songs and these kind of things… its foundations aren't folk, its foundations aren't 'slave away' and all this. Its foundations are — except for Negro songs which are based on that and just kinds overlapped — the main body of it (folk music) is just based on myth and the Bible and plague and famine and all kinds of things like that which are just nuthin but mystery and you can see it in all the songs — roses growin right up out of people's hearts and naked cats in bed with, y'know, spears growing right out of their backs and y'know seven years of this and eight years of that and it's all really something that nobody can really touch… ."

Teenagers recognize in Dylan one of their own, a spokesman for their rejection of the adult world. "Look out kid, it's something you did god knows what but you're doin it again." That line is from Dylan's "Subterranean Homesick Blues," a song that was on every juke box in the country. No one under parental authority (or any authority in loco parentis) needs to intellectualize the empathy he feels for that line. Of for: "Them that must bow down to authority that they do not respect in any degree, who despise their jobs, their destiny, speak jealously of them that are free, cultivate what they get to be nothing more than something they invest in."

Dylan describes a world in which naturalness is forbidden, creativity is the enemy and beauty is assassinated. Youth, struggling to keep from growing up absurd in a land of TV commercials and high-rise rapacity, sees this same world and sees, too, that we adult numbers accept it.

"At midnight all the agents and the superhuman crew come out and round up everyone that knows more than they do; then they bring back them to the factory where the heart-attack machine is strapped across their shoulders, and then the kerosene is brought down from the castles by insurance men who go check to see that nobody is escaping to Desolation Row." Youth knows intuitively that this is a true State-of-the-Union megssage.

But Dylan's world is not all Desolation Row. Listen to these lines from "Mr. Tambourine Man":

"Take me disappearing through the smoke rings of my mind, down the foggy ruins of time, far past the frozen leaves, the haunted, sheltered trees, out to the windy beach, far from the twisted reach of crazy sorrow."

Or these lines from an album cover:

for i am runnin in a fair race with no racetrack but the nite an no competition but the dawn.

or

for my road is blessed with many flowers
an the sounds of flowers

or

for all people laugh in the same tongue
and cry
in the same tongue

or

it's just one big world of songs
an they're all on loan
if they're only turned loose t sing

or lonely? Ah yes but it is the flowers an the mirrors of flowers that now meet my loneliness

an mine shall be a strong loneliness dissolving deep
t the depths of my freedom
an that, then, shall remain my song.

"I try to harmonize with words the lonesome sparrow sings," he wrote at one point; and later, "My songs're written with the kettledrum in mind / a touch of any anxious color. unmentionable. obvious. an people perhaps like a soft brazilian singer… i have given up at making any attempt at perfection."

"My poems are written in a rhythm of unpoetic distortion / divided by pierced ears. false eyelashes / subtracted by people constantly torturing each other, with a melodic purring live of descriptive hollowness — seen at times thru dark sunglasses and other forms of psychic explosion, a song is anything that can walk by itself / i am a songwriter. a poem is a naked person… some people say i am a poet."

"The songs are insanely honest," Dylan wrote to a friend, "not meanin t twist any heads an written only for the reason that i myself me alone wanted and needed t write them. i've conceded the fact there us no understanding of anything. at best, just winks of the eye an that is all i'm lookin for now i guess."

Dylan provoked a storm at the Newport Folk Music Festival of 1964 when he abandoned his protest songs in favor of love songs — and bitter, slightly warped though they may be, they are songs bout love. The editor of Sing Out!, the bnational folk song magazine, wrote a long impassioned open letter deploring the change. Fans rose to Dylan's defense. Country and Westerns singer Johnny Cash summed it up with the statement, "Shut up and let him sing." Then in the summer of 1965, again at the Newport Folk Festival, Dylan went onstage with a rock n' roll band using the hated electric amplified guitar, bass and piano. The audience booed.

Dylan was a bit surprised.

"You can't tell where the booing's going to come up. Can't tell at all," he said. "It comes up in the weirdest, strangest places and they do it in blocks and when it comes it's quite a thing in itself. I mean they must be pretty rich to be able to go some place and boo. I couldn't afford it if I was in their shoes."

The booing — which apparently has tapered off now — indicates a very real concern with what Dylan stands for. They demand things from him. But fans are beginning to realize that he is a poet and as such cannot be "owned."

But with the very same cynicism and skepticism that Dylan speaks to, some of his teen-age audience is asking today, "Has Dylan sold out?" He certainly has made a very great deal of money; he is perhaps a millionaire. The New York Times quotes Columbia Records as saying that. His records have been on top of the best-selling charts. His concerts fill halls everywhere. And money, in our society, marks the "sell-out."

But Allen Ginsberg, replying to a questioner about Dylan's having sold out, put his answer bluntly: "Dylan has sold out to God. That is to say, his command was to spread his beauty as wide as possible. It was an artistic challenge to see if great art can be done on a juke box. And he proved it can."

"I have more money," Dylan said recently. "I just have a lot more money, is all." And he doesn't care about the taxes. "I have no remorse. I don't care. Uncle Sam, he's my UNCLE, he's a member of the family! Can't turn your back on a member of the family.

"I don't know how much I make. I have no idea and I don't want to ever find out. You see a lot of people start out and they plan to be stars. Like they have to be stars. I mean I know a lot of those people. And they start out and they go into show business for many, many reasons. To be seen, y'know. I started out and this had nothing to do with it. I just happened. I haven't really struggled for that. It happened, you know? It happened like anything else happens. Just a happening. You don't try to figure out happenings. You dig happenings. I really have no idea. That is the truth. I always tell the truth. That is the truth."

But popularity has had a deep effect on his life just as it has had on any of the star figures in our culture. "I can't write in the cafeteria, everybody wants the napkin," he complained, half kidding, to a friend. And then he arranged to meet the same friend at an all-night restaurant and sat in the window until the autograph seekers drove him out.

But whether Dylan admits any change, his program is different now. The rock n' roll band shows that; and he has abandoned some of the older songs. "I wish I could write like 'Girl from the North Country' (an older song) but I can't write like that anymore. I dunno why."

He doesn't think of his older songs as being any less valid, though. "I just consider them something else to themselves, at another time, another dimension. It would be kind of dishonest of me to sing them now because I wouldn't really feel like singing them.

"The difference in the songs I write now, in the last year and a half, maybe two… the songs before the fourth record, I used to know what I wanted to say before I used to write the song. See? All the stuff which I had written before, which wasn't song, was just on a piece of toilet paper. When it comes out like that, that's the kind of stuff I never would sing because people just would not be ready for it. I just went through that other thing of writing songs until I couldn't write like it anymore. It was just too easy and it wasn't really right. I would start out, I would know what I wanted to say before I wrote the song and I would say it and it would never come out exactly the way I thought it would. But it touched it.

"But now I just write a song like I know that it's just going to be all right and I don't really know exactly what it's all about, but I do know the minute and the layers of what it's all about.

" 'Rolling Stone' 's the best song I wrote. I wrote 'Rolling Stone' after England. I boiled it down, but it's all there. I had to quit after England. I had to stop and when I was writing it I knew I had to sing it with a band. I always sing when I write, even prose, and I heard it like that."

When he was told of high school students studying his lyrics, Dylan asked quickly if the lyrics were the old songs or the new ones. "If it's the old ones, I feel a little guilty about it. They should use the new ones, like 'Desolation Row.' I know I'm not accepted but the professors in the universities and it used to bother me, but I know now I have nothin to live up to" (an unconscious or conscious quote of one of his own lines in "It's All Right Ma").

The contrast between Dylan the person and Dylan the prophet of the Doomsday Poems is startling. Thin, almost emaciated, his lips clutching a cigarette, he talks quickly and nervously in a distinctive, edgy softness using a language of the urban hip street folk. His hands are cold and he seems shy and quick, like a young deer.

On stage, he is almost precisely the same as off. He dresses the same, though he may change boots or sometimes put on his suit of huge black and olive checks. "I come on stage the same way I go anywhere. I mean are all these people paying to see me look neat?"

"I want to sing you a song, recognizing that there are goliaths nowadays," he said as he prepared to sing "The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll," that grim description of the wanton murder of a Negro maid. "This is a true story, only the words have been changed," he said once, introducing "The Ballad of Davey Moore," which condemns the brutality of boxing.

His wry sense of humor creeps up continually; sometimes he seems even to be putting himself on. "It's Halloween," he said at Carnegie Hall, "an I've got my Bob Dylan mask on."

There's a line in one of Dylan's songs, "Like a Rolling Stone," which is very revealing. He sings, "You're invisible now, you've got no secrets to conceal." And another time he said to a questioner, "Don't these people know I expose myself every time I go on stage?" In his poem, "Last Thoughts on Woody Guthrie," are the lines, "Just where am I goin?... just what am I doin on this road I'm walkin? On this trail I'm turning?... am I mixed up too much?... why am I walkin… why am I runnin?... what am I sayin? What am I knowin?... who am I helping?... what am I breakin? What am I giving? What am I talking?"

"The songs are what I do," he says. "What I do is write the songs and sing them. And perform them. That's what I do. The performing part of it could end, but like I'm going to be writing these songs and singing them and I see no end, right now. That's what I do. Anything else interferes with it. Most of the time we feel like playing. That's important to me. The aftermath, whatever happens before and after is really not important to me. Just the time on the stage and the time we're signing the songs and performing them. Or really not performing them even, just letting them be there."

Dylan's Doomsday Poems thunder against injustice and sing out in defense of "the confused, accused, misused, strung out ones and worse an… every hung up person in the whole in the whole wide universe." They include "Chimes of Freedom" as well as "It's All Right Ma," that bitter attack on the American Dream: "make everything from toy guns that spark to flesh-colored Christs that glow in the dark. It's easy to see without looking too far that not much is really sacred" and "even the President of the United States sometimes must have to stand naked."

"You have to vomit up everything you know. I did that, I vomited it all up and then went out and saw it all again," Dylan told a poet. The parallel to Rimbaud is striking, quite apart from the kinship of "Desolation Row" to "Season in Hell." Rimbaud not only was a child prodigy of poetry, but, like Dylan, ran away from home again and again. "The poet makers himself a seer," Rimbaud wrote, "by a long, prodigious and rational disordering of the senses. Every form of love, of suffering, of madness; he searches himself, he consumes all the poisons in him, and keeps only their quintessences. This is an unspeakable torture during which he needs all his faith and superhuman strength and during which he becomes the great patient, the great criminal, the great accursed — and the great learned one! — among men. For he arrives at the unknown! Because he has cultivated his own soul — which was rich to begin with — more than any other man! He reaches the unknown and even if, crazed, he ends up by losing the understanding of his visions, at least he has seen them! Let him die charging through those unutterable, unnamable things: other horrible workers will come; they will begin from the horizons where he has succumbed!" Then Rimbaud adds, "the poet really is the thief of fire" and "eternal art will have its function, since poets are citizens, Poetry will no longer rhyme with action: it will be ahead of it!"

Dylan puts it slightly differently. "I am raginly against absolutely everything that wants t force nature t be unnatural," he says.

The New Youth is taking Dylan seriously. At a recent press conference, he noted "something that amazed me. This 15-year-old girl, and she knew poets like William Blake and she knew his work and she was hip to all kinds of different things which people usually are not acquainted with at that age. So maybe it's just a new kind of person. A new kind of 15-year-old person. I don't know. I do know that that person is more free in the mind than 22-year-old college kids."

The strength is there in the words and the songs. The ideas cleave to the minds of the young like moss to a tree trunk. And while he rejects the values of our world, of the Great Society and the New Frontier, he also speaks eloquently of a world in which the sacredness of the individual is paramount. It may not turn out that way, but the New Youth's "thief of fire" limns it out for you and, if poetry is ahead of action, it will come. This is how he says it:

i can't believe that i have t hate anybody
an when i do
it will only be out of fear an i'll know it

i know no answers an no truth for absolutely no soul alive
i will listen to no one who tells me morals
there are no morals
an i dream alot.

Nat Hentoff (The Playboy) Interview, New York City, New York

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 65-80.

This is the published "interview" and not the one you'll find on tape. The interview proper was conducted in Autumn 1965. It was an excellent and extensive interview lasting over two hours, but the resultant manuscript was mucked around with by the Playboy editor, much to Dylan's and Hentoff's annoyance, and was never published. To give you a feel of the extent of Dylan's displeasure I quote from Shelton -

> "I read the proofs and I said: 'Where in the fuck did you get these words?' Hentoff told me that the man from Playboy wrote in things to make it sound a little better... And they were downright fucking, silly-ass, you know, geech-like phrases. Peacock phrases. Just dumb bullshit, asinine things that... anybody that has ever met me and heard me talk knows I would not say."

How this "interview came" about is best described in Hentoff's own words:

> "There were two interviews. The first was almost an unusually straight interview. As I recall it was a quite sober, almost historical, biographical account, a lot of opinion, a certain amount of his – you know he can't avoid being sardonically funny, but just a straight interview. The galleys were sent to him and I don't recall him making more than two changes of no significance. Then the final set came to him after they messed with it in Chicago. I don't know what they did but I think they put some words in his mouth. They fooled around with it. I got a call and he was furious. I said, 'Look, tell them to go to hell. Tell them you don't want it to run.' And he said, 'No, I got a better idea. I'm gonna make one up.' I said it probably will work if they very much want to have a Dylan interview. We were on the phone and I did not have a tape recorder then. This was all by hand. I'll never forget, I could hardly move the damn thing for a day. He made up an interview. I helped I must say. Some of the good straight lines in there are mine, but all the really funny stuff... is his. It was run as was with absolutely no indication it was a put-on. I remember I saw him two or three times in the month or two after and he'd say, 'Hey, when's it coming out, when's it coming out?' because he thought it was a very funny caper, which it was.

And now the interview.

As a versatile musicologist and trenchant social commentator, Nat brings uniquely pertinent credentials to his task as interviewer of this month's controversial subject, about whom he writes:

Less than five years ago, Bob Dylan was scuffing in New York – sleeping in friends' apartments on the Lower East Side and getting very occasional singing work at Gerde's Folk City, an unprepossessing bar for citybillies in the Village. With his leather cap, blue jeans and battered desert boots – his unvarying costume in those days – Dylan looked like an updated, undernourished Huck Finn. And like Huck, he had come out of the Midwest; he would have said "escaped". The son of Abraham Zimmerman, an appliance dealer, he was raised in Hibbing, Minnesota, a bleak mining town near the Canadian border. Though he ran away from home regularly between the ages of ten and eighteen, young Zimmerman did manage to finish High School, and went on to spend about six months at the University of Minnesota in 1960.

By then, he called himself Bob Dylan – in tribute to Dylan Thomas, according to legend; but actually after a gambling uncle whose last name was similar to Dylan.

In the fall of that year, he came east to visit his idol, Woody Guthrie, in the New Jersey hospital where the Okie folk-singing bard was wasting away with a progressive disease of the nervous system. Dylan stayed and tried to scrape together a singing career. According to those who knew him then, he was shy and stubborn but basically friendly and, beneath the hipster stance, uncommonly gentle. But they argued about his voice. Some found it's flat Midwestern tones gratingly mesmeric; others agreed with a Missouri folk singer who had likened the Dylan sound to that of "a dog with his leg caught in barbed wire." All agreed, however, that his songs were strangely personal and often disturbing, a pungent mixture of loneliness and defiance laced with traces of Guthrie, echoes of the Negro blues singers and more than a suggestion of country-and-western; but essentially Dylan was developing his own penetratingly distinctive style. Yet the voice was so harsh and the songs so bitterly scornful of conformity, race prejudice and the mythology of the Cold War that most of his friends couldn't conceive of Dylan making it big even though folk music was already on the rise.

They were wrong. In September of 1961, a music critic for the New York Times caught his act at Gerde's and hailed the scruffy nineteen-year-old Minnesotan as a significant new voice on the folk horizon. Around the same time, he was signed by Columbia Records, and his first album was released early the next year. Though it was far from a smash hit, concerts and club engagements gradually multiplied; and then Dylan scored his storied triumph at the Newport Folk Festival in 1962. His next LP began to move, and in the spring of 1963 came his first big single: Blowin' In The Wind. That same spring he turned down a lucrative guest shot on the Ed Sullivan Show because CBS wouldn't permit him to sing a mordant parody he'd written about the John Birch Society. For the nation's young, the Dylan image began to form: kind of a singing James Dean with overtones of Holden Caulfield; he was making it, but he wasn't selling out. His concerts began to attract overflow crowds, and his songs – in performance by him and other folk singers – were rushing onto the hit charts. One of them, The Times They Are A-Changin', became an anthem for the rebellious young, who savored its message that adults don't know where it's at and can't tell their children what to do.

By 1965 he had become a major phenomenon on the music scene. More and more folk performers, from Joan Baez to the Byrds, considered it mandatory to have an ample supply of Dylan songs in their repertoires; in one frantically appreciative month – last August – forty-eight different recordings of Dylan ballads were pressed by singers other than the composer himself. More and more aspiring folk singers – and folk-song writers – have begun to sound like Dylan. The current surge of 'protest' songs by such long-haired, post-beat rock n' rollers as Barry McGuire and Sonny and Cher is credited to Dylan. And the newest commercial boom, 'folk-rock', a fusion of folk-like lyrics with an r'-n'-r' beat and background, is an outgrowth, in large part, of Dylan's recent decision – decried as a "sellout" by folknik purists – to perform with a rock n' roll combo rather than continue to accompany himself alone on the guitar. Backed by the big beat of the new group, Dylan tours England with as much tumultuous success as he does America, and the air play for his single records in both countries is rivaled only by that of the Beatles, Herman's Hermits and the Rolling Stones on the top forty deejay shows. In the next eighteen months, his income – from personal appearances, record and composer's royalties – is expected to exceed a million dollars.

Withal, Dylan seems outwardly much the same as he did during the lean years in Greenwich Village. His dress is still casual to the point of exoticism; his hair is still long and frizzy, and he is still no more likely to be seen wearing a necktie than a cutaway. But there have been changes. No longer protesting polemically against the bomb, race prejudice and conformity, his songs have become increasingly personal – a surrealistic amalgam of Kafkaesque menace, corrosive satire and opaque sensuality. His lyrics are more crowded than ever with tumbling words and restless images, and they read more like free-verse poems than conventional lines. Adults still have difficulty digging his offbeat language – and its message of alienation – but the young continue to tune in and turn on.

But there are other changes. Dylan has become elusive. He is no longer seen in his old haunts in the Village and on the Lower East Side. With few exceptions, he avoids interviewers, and in public, he is usually seen from afar at the epicenter of a protective coterie of tousle-topped young men dressed like him. His home base, if it can be called that, is a house his manager owns near Woodstock, a fashionable artist's colony in New York State, and he also enjoys the run of his manager's apartment on dignified Gramercy Park in New York City. There are tales told of Dylan the motorcyclist, the novelist, the maker of high-camp home movies; but except among his small circle of intimates, the twenty-four-year-old folk hero is inscrutably aloof.

It was only after a long period of evasion and hesitation that Dylan finally agreed to grant this interview – the longest he's ever given. We met him on the tenth floor of the CBS and Columbia Records building in mid-Manhattan. The room was antiseptic; white walls with black trim, contemporary furniture with severe lines, avant-garde art chosen by committee, everything in order, neat desks, neat personnel. In this sterile setting, slouched in a chair across from us, Dylan struck a refreshingly discordant note – with his untamed brownish-blond mane brushing the collar of his tieless blue-plaid shirt, in his black jacket, gray vaudevillian-striped pipestem pants and well-worn blue suede shoes. Sitting nearby – also long-haired, tieless and black-jacketed, but wearing faded jeans – was a stringy young man whom the singer identified only as Taco Pronto. As Dylan spoke – in a soft drawl, smiling only rarely and fleetingly, sipping tea and chain-smoking cigarettes – his unspeaking friend chuckled and nodded appreciatively from the sidelines. Tense and guarded at first, Dylan gradually began to loosen up, then to open up, as he tried to tell us – albeit a bit surrealistically – just where he's been and where he's going. Under the circumstances, we chose to play straight man in our questions, believing that to have done otherwise would have stemmed the free-wheeling flow of Dylan's responses.

NH: "Popular songs", you told a reporter last year, "are the only art form that describes the temper of the times. The only place where it's happening is on the radio and records. That's where the people hang out. It's not in books; it's not on the stage; it's not in the galleries. All this art they've been talking about, it just remains on the shelf. It doesn't make anyone happier." In view of the fact that more people than ever before are reading books and going to plays and art galleries, do you think that statement is borne out by the facts?

BD: Statistics measure quantity not quality. The people in the statistics are people who are very bored. Art, if there is such a thing, is in the bathrooms; everybody knows that. To go to an art gallery thing where you get free milk and doughnuts and where there is a rock n' roll band playing: that's just a status affair. I'm not putting it down, mind you: but I spend a lot of time in the bathroom. I think museums are vulgar. They're all against sex. Anyhow, I didn't say that people "hang out" on the radio, I said they get "hung up" on the radio.

NH: Why do you think rock n' roll has become such an international phenomenon?

BD: I can't really think that there is any rock n' roll. Actually, when you think about it, anything that has no real existence is bound to become an international phenomenon. Anyway, what does it mean – rock n' roll? Does it mean Beatles, does it mean John Lee Hooker, Bobby Vinton, Jerry Lewis' kid? What about Lawrence Welk? He must play a few rock n' roll songs. Are all these people the same? Is Ricky Nelson like Otis Redding? Is Mick Jagger really Ma Rainey? I can tell you the way people hold their cigarettes if they like Ricky Nelson. I think it's fine to like Ricky Nelson; I couldn't care less if somebody likes Ricky Nelson. But I think we're getting off the track here. There isn't any Ricky Nelson. There isn't any Beatles; oh, I take that back; there are a lot of beetles. But there isn't any Bobby Vinton. Anyway, the word is not "international phenomenon"; the word is "parental nightmare".

NH: In recent years, according to some critics, jazz has lost much of its appeal to the younger generation. Do you agree?

BD: I don't think jazz has ever appealed to the younger generation. Anyway, I don't really know who this younger generation is. I don't think they could get into a jazz club anyway. But jazz is hard to follow; I mean you actually have to like jazz to follow it; and my motto is, never follow anything. I don't know what the motto of the younger generation is, but I would think they'd have to follow their parents. I mean, what would some parent say to his kid if the kid came home with a glass eye, a Charlie Mingus record and a pocketful of feathers? He'd say: "Who are you following?" And the poor kid would have to stand there with water in his shoes, a bow tie on his ear and soot pouring out of his belly button and say: "Jazz, Father, I've been following jazz." And his father would probably say: "Get a broom and clean up all that soot before you go to sleep." Then the kid's mother would tell her friends: "Oh yes, our little Donald, he's part of the younger generation, you know."

NH: You used to say that you wanted to perform as little as possible, that you wanted to keep most of your time to yourself. Yet you're doing more concerts and cutting more records every year. Why? Is it the money?

BD: Everything is changed now from before. Last spring I guess I was going to quit singing. I was very drained and the way things were going it was a very draggy situation – I mean, when you do Everybody Loves You For Your Black Eye and meanwhile the back of your head is caving in. Anyway, I was playing a lot of songs I didn't want to play. I was singing words I didn't really want to sing. I don't mean words like "God" and "mother" and "president" and "suicide" and "meat cleaver". I mean simple little words like "if" and "hope" and "you". But Like A Rolling Stone changed it all; I didn't care any more after that about writing books or poems or whatever. I mean it was something that I myself could dig. It's very tiring having other people tell you how much they dig you if you yourself don't dig you. It's also very deadly entertainment-wise. Contrary to what some scary people think, I don't play with a band now for any kind of propaganda-type or commercial-type reasons. It's just that my songs are pictures and the band makes the sound of the pictures.

NH: Do you feel that acquiring a combo and switching from folk to folk-rock has improved you as a performer?

BD: I'm not interested in myself as a performer. Performers are people who perform for other people. Unlike actors, I know what I'm saying. It's very simple in my mind. It doesn't matter what kind of audience reaction this whole thing gets. What happens on the stage is straight. It doesn't expect any rewards or fines from any kind of outside agitators. It's ultra-simple, and would exist whether anybody was looking or not. As far as folk and folk-rock are concerned, it doesn't matter what kind of nasty names people invent for the music. It could be called arsenic music, or perhaps Phaedra music. I don't think that such a word as folk-rock has anything to do with it. And folk music is a word I can't use. Folk music is a bunch of fat people. I have to think of all this as traditional music. Traditional music is based on hexagrams. It comes about from legends, bibles, plagues, and it revolves around vegetables and death. There's nobody that's going to kill traditional music. All these songs about roses growing out of peoples brains and lovers who are really geese and swans that turn into angels -they're not going to die. It's all those paranoid people who think that someone's going to come and take away their toilet paper – they're going to die. Songs like "Which Side Are You On?" and "I Love You, Porgy" – they're not folk music songs; They're already dead. Obviously, death is not very universally accepted. I mean, you'd think that the traditional-music people could gather from their songs that mystery is a fact, a traditional fact. I listen to the old ballads. I could give you descriptive detail of what they do to me, but some people would probably think that my imagination had gone mad. It strikes me funny that people actually have the gall to think that I have some kind of fantastic imagination. It gets very lonesome. But anyway, traditional music is too unreal to die. It doesn't need to be protected. Nobody's going to hurt it. In that music is the only true, valid death you can feel today off a record player. But like anything else in great demand, people try to own it. It has to do with a purity thing. I think it's meaninglessness is holy. Everybody knows that I'm not a folk singer.

NH: Some of your old fans would agree with you – and not in a complimentary vein – since your debut with the rock n' roll combo at last years Newport Folk Festival, where many of them booed you loudly for "selling out" to commercial pop tastes. The early Bob Dylan, they felt, was the "pure" Bob Dylan. How do you feel about it?

BD: I was kind of stunned. But I can't put anybody down for coming and booing. After all, they paid to get in. They could have been maybe a little quieter and not so persistent though. There were a lot of old people there, too: lots of whole families had driven down from Vermont, lots of nurses and their parents, and well, like they just came to hear some relaxing hoedowns, you know, maybe an Indian polka or two. And just when everything's going all right, here I come on, and the whole place turns into a beer factory. There were a lot of people there who were very pleased that I got booed. I saw them afterward. I do resent somewhat, though, that everybody that booed said they did it because they were old fans.

NH: What about their charge that you vulgarized your natural gift?

BD: What can I say? I'd like to see one of those so-called fans. I'd like to have him blindfolded and brought to me. It's like going out into the desert and screaming, and then having little kids throw their sandbox at you. I'm only twenty-four. These people that said this – were they Americans?

NH: Americans or not, there were a lot of people who didn't like your new sound. In view of this widespread negative reaction, do you think you have made a mistake in changing your style?

BD: A mistake is to commit a misunderstanding. There could be no such thing, anyway, as this action. Either people understand or they pretend to understand – or else they really don't understand. What you're speaking of here is doing wrong things for selfish reasons. I don't know the word for that, unless it's suicide. In any case, it has nothing to do with my music.

NH: Mistake or not, what made you decide to go the rock n' roll route?

BD: Carelessness. I lost my one true love. I started drinking. The first thing I know, I'm in a card game. Then I'm in a crap game. I wake up in a pool hall. Then this big Mexican lady drags me off the table, takes me to Philadelphia. She leaves me alone in her house, and it burns down. I wind up in Phoenix, I get a job as a Chinaman. I start working in a dime store, and move in with a thirteen-year-old girl. Then this big Mexican lady from Philadelphia comes in and burns the house down. I go down to Dallas. I get a job as "before" in a Charles Atlas "before and after ad". I move in with a delivery boy who can cook fantastic chili and hot dogs. Then this thirteen-year old girl from Phoenix comes and burns the house down. The delivery boy – he ain't so mild: he gives her the knife, and the next thing I know, I'm in Omaha. It's so cold there, by this time I'm robbing my own bicycles and frying my own fish. I stumble onto some luck and get a job as a carburetor out at the hot-rod races every Thursday night. I move in with a high school teacher who also does a little plumbing on the side, who ain't much to look at, but who's built a special kind of refrigerator that can turn newspaper into lettuce. Everything's going good until that delivery boy shows up and tries to knife me. Needless to say, he burned the house down, and hit the road. The first guy that picked me up asked me if I wanted to be a star. What could I say?

NH: And that's how you became a rock n' roll singer?

BD: No, that's how I got tuberculosis.

NH: Let's turn the question around: why have you stopped composing and singing protest songs?

BD: I've stopped composing and singing anything that has either a reason to be written or a motive to be sung. Don't get me wrong, now. "Protest" is not my word. I've never thought of myself as such. The word "protest", I think, was made up for people undergoing surgery. It's an amusement-park word. A normal person in his righteous mind would have to have the hiccups to pronounce it honestly. The word "message" strikes me as having a hernia-like sound. It's just like the word "delicious". Also the word "marvelous". You know, the English can say "marvelous" pretty good. They can't say "raunchy" so good, though. Well, we each have our thing. Anyway, message songs, as everybody knows, are a drag, it's only college newspaper editors and single girls under fourteen that could possibly have time for them.

NH: You've said you think message songs are vulgar. Why?

BD: Well, first of all, anybody that's got a message is going to learn from experience that they can't put it into a song. I mean it's just not going to come out the same message. After one or two of these unsuccessful attempts, one realizes that his resultant message, which is not even the same message he thought up and began with, he's now got to stick to it. Because, after all, a song leaves your mouth just as soon as it leaves your hands. Are you following me?

NH: Oh, perfectly.

BD: Well, anyway, second of all, you've got to respect other peoples right to also have a message themselves. Myself, what I'm going to do is rent town hall and put about thirty Western Union boys on the bill. I mean, then there'll really be some messages. People will be able to come and hear more messages than they've ever heard before in their life.

NH: But your early ballads have been called "songs of passionate protest." Wouldn't that make them "message" music?

BD: This is unimportant. Don't you understand? I've been writing since I was eight years old. I've been playing the guitar since I was ten. I was raised playing and writing whatever it was I had to play and write.

NH: Would it be unfair to say, then, as some have, that you were motivated commercially rather than creatively in writing the kind of songs that made you popular?

BD: All right, now, look. It's not all that deep. It's not a complicated thing. My motives, or whatever they are, were never commercial in the money sense of the word. It was more in the don't-die-by-the-hacksaw sense of the word. I never did it for money. It happened, and I let it happen to me. There was no reason not to let it happen to me. I couldn't have written before what I write now, anyway. The songs used to be about what I felt and saw. Nothing of my own rhythmic vomit ever entered into it. Vomit is not romantic. I used to think songs are supposed to be romantic. And I didn't want to sing anything that was unspecific. Unspecific things have no sense of time. All of us people have no sense of time; it's a dimensional hang-up. Anybody can be specific and obvious. That's always been the easy way. The leaders of the world take the easy way. It's not that it's so difficult to be unspecific and less obvious; it's just that there's nothing, absolutely nothing, to be specific and obvious about. My older songs, to say the least, were about nothing. The newer ones are about the same nothing – only as seen inside a bigger thing, perhaps called the nowhere. But this is all very constipated. I do know what my songs are about.

NH: And what's that?

BD: Oh, some are about four minutes, some are about five and some, believe it or not, are about eleven or twelve.

NH: Can't you be a bit more informative?

BD: Nope.

NH: All right. Let's change the subject. As you know, it's the age group from about sixteen to twenty-three that listens to your songs. Why, in your opinion.

BD: I don't see what's so strange about an age group like that listening to my songs. I'm hip enough to know that it ain't going to be the eighty-five to ninety-year-olds were listening to me, they'd know that I can't tell them anything. The sixteen to twenty-five year olds, they probably know that I can't tell them anything either – and they know that I know it. It's a funny business. Obviously, I'm not an IBM computer anymore than I'm an ashtray. I mean it's obvious to anyone who's ever slept in the back seat of a car that I'm just not a schoolteacher.

NH: Even though you're not a schoolteacher, wouldn't you like to help the young people who dig you from turning into what some of their parents have become?

BD: Well, I must say that I don't really know their parents. I really don't know if anybody's parents are so bad. Now, I hate to come on like a weakling or a coward, and I realize it might seem kind of irreligious, But I'm really not the right person to tramp around the country saving souls. I wouldn't run over anybody that was lying in the street, and I certainly wouldn't become a hangman. I wouldn't think twice about giving a starving man a cigarette. But I'm not a shepherd. And I'm not about to save anybody from fate, which I know nothing about. "Parents" is not the key word here. The key word is "destiny". I can't save them from that.

NH: Still, thousands of young people look up to you as a kind of folk hero. Do you feel some sense of responsibility towards them?

BD: I don't feel I have any responsibility, no. Whoever it is that listens to my songs owes me nothing. How could I possibly have any responsibility to any kinds of thousands? What could possibly make me think that I owe anybody anything who just happens to be there? I've never written any song that begins with the words "I've gathered you here tonight..." I'm not about to tell anybody to be a good boy or a good girl and they'll go to heaven. I really don't know what the people who are on the receiving end of these songs think of me, anyway. It's horrible. I'll bet Tony Bennett doesn't have to go through this kind of thing. I wonder what Billy the Kid would have answered to such a question?

NH: In their admiration for you, many young people have begun to imitate the way you dress -which one adult commentator has called "self-consciously oddball and defiantly sloppy". What's you reaction to that kind of putdown?

BD: Bullshit. Oh, such bullshit. I know the fellow that said that. He used to come around here and get beat up all the time. He better watch it; some people are after him. They're going to strip him naked and stick him in Times Square. They're going to tie him up, and also put a thermometer in his mouth. Those kind of morbid ideas and remarks are so petty – I mean there's a war going on. People got rickets; everybody wants to start a riot; forty-year-old women are eating spinach by the carload; the doctors haven't got a cure for cancer – and here's one hillbilly talking about how he doesn't like somebody's clothes. Worse than that, it gets printed and innocent people have to read it. This is a terrible thing. And he's a terrible man. Obviously, he's just living off the fat of himself, and he's expecting his kids to take care of him. His kids probably listen to my records. Just because my clothes are too long, does that mean I'm unqualified for what I do?

NH: No, but there are those who think it does – and many of them seem to feel the same way about your long hair. But compared with the shoulder-length coiffures worn by some of the male singing groups these days, your tonsorial tastes are on the conservative side. How do you feel about these far-out hair styles?

BD: The thing that most people don't realize is that it's warmer to have long hair. Everybody wants to be warm, People with short hair freeze easily. Then they try to hide their coldness, and they get jealous of everybody that's warm. Then they become either barbers or congressmen. A lot of prison warders have short hair. Have you ever noticed that Abraham Lincoln's hair was much longer than John Wilkes Booth's?

NH: Do you think Lincoln wore his hair long to keep his head warm?

BD: Actually, I think it was for medical reasons, which are none of my business. But I guess if you figure it out, you realize that all of ones hair surrounds and lays on the brain inside your head. Mathematically speaking, the more of it you can get out of your head, the better. People who want free minds sometimes overlook the fact that you have to have an uncluttered brain. Obviously, if you get your hair on the outside of the head, your brain will be a little more freer. But all this talk about long hair is just a trick. It's been thought up by men and women who look like cigars – the antihappiness committee. They're all freeloaders and cops. You can tell who they are: they're always carrying calendars, guns or scissors. They're all trying to get into your quicksand. They think you've got something. I don't know why Abe Lincoln has long hair.

NH: Until your abandonment of "message songs", you were considered not only a major voice in the student protest movement but a militant champion of the civil rights struggle. According to friends, you seemed to feel a special bond of kinship with the Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee, which you actively supported both as a performer and a worker. Why have you withdrawn from participation in all these causes? Have you lost interest in protest as well as in protest songs?

BD: As far as SNCC is concerned, I knew some of the people in it, but I only knew them as people, not as any part of something that was bigger than themselves. I didn't even know what civil rights was before I met some of them. I mean, I knew there were Negroes, and I knew there were a lot of people who don't like Negroes. But I got to admit that if I didn't know some of the SNCC people, I would have gone on thinking that Martin Luther King was really nothing more than some under-privileged war hero. I haven't lost any interest in protest since then. I just didn't have any interest in protest to begin with – any more than I did in war heroes. You can't lose what you've never had. Anyway, when you don't like your situation, you either leave it or else you overthrow it. You can't just stand around and whine about it. People just get aware of your noise; they really don't get aware of you. Even if they give you what you want, it's only because you're making too much noise. First thing you know, you want something else, and then you want something else, and then you want something else, until finally it isn't a joke anymore, and whoever you're protesting against finally gets all fed up and stomps on everybody. Sure, you can go around trying to bring up people who are lesser than you, but then don't forget, you're messing around with gravity. I don't fight gravity. I do believe in equality, but I also believe in distance.

NH: Do you mean people keeping their racial distance?

BD: I believe in people keeping everything they've got.

NH: Some people might feel that you're trying to cop out of fighting for the things you believe in.

BD: Those would be people who think I have some sort of responsibility towards them. They probably want me to help them make friends. I don't know. They probably either want to set me in their house and have me come out every hour and tell them what time it is, or else they just want to stick me in between the mattress. How could they possibly understand what I believe in?

NH: Well, what do you believe in?

BD: I already told you.

NH: All right. Many of your folk-singing colleagues remain actively involved in the fight for civil rights, free speech and withdrawal from Vietnam. Do you think they're wrong?

BD: I don't think they're wrong, if that's what they see themselves doing. But don't think that what you've got out there is a bunch of little Buddhas all parading up and down. People that use God as a weapon should be amputated upon. You see it around here all the time: "Be good or God won't like you, and you'll go to hell." Things like that. People that march with slogans and things tend to take themselves a little too holy. It would drag if they, too, started using God as a weapon.

NH: Do you think it's pointless to dedicate yourself to the cause of peace and racial equality?

BD: Not pointless to dedicate yourself to peace and racial equality, but rather, it's pointless to dedicate yourself to the cause; that's really pointless. That's very unknowing. To say "cause of peace" is just like saying "hunk of butter". I mean how can you listen to anybody who wants you to believe he's dedicated to the hunk and not to the butter? People who can't conceive of how others hurt, they're trying to change the world. They're all afraid to admit that they don't really know each other. They'll all probably be here long after we've gone, and we'll give birth to new ones. But they themselves – I don't think they'll give birth to anything.

NH: You sound a bit fatalistic.

BD: I'm not fatalistic. Bank tellers are fatalistic. Clerks are fatalistic. I'm a farmer. Who ever heard of a fatalistic farmer? I'm not fatalistic. I smoke a lot of cigarettes, but that doesn't make me fatalistic.

NH: You were quoted recently as saying that "songs can't save the world. I've gone through all that." We take it you don't share Pete Seeger's belief that songs can change people, that they can help build international understanding.

BD: On the international understanding part, that's OK. But you have a translation problem there. Anybody with this kind of a level of thinking has to also think about this translation thing. But I don't believe songs can change people anyway. I'm not Pinocchio. I consider that an insult. I'm not part of that. I don't blame anybody for thinking that way. But I just don't donate any money to them. I don't consider them anything like unhip; they're more in the rubber-band category.

NH: How do you feel about those who have risked imprisonment by burning their draft cards to signify their opposition to US involvement in Vietnam and by refusing – as your friend Joan Baez has done – to pay their income taxes as a protest against the Government's expenditure on war and weaponry? Do you think they're wasting their time?

BD: Burning draft cards isn't going to end any war. It's not even going to save any lives. If someone can feel more honest with himself by burning his draft card, then that's great. But if he's just going to feel more important because he does it, then that's a drag. I really don't know too much about Joan Baez and her income tax problems. The only thing I can tell you about Joan Baez is that she's not Belle-Starr.

NH: Writing about "beard-wearing draft card burners and pacifist income tax evaders", one columnist called such protesters "no less outside society than the junkie, the homosexual or the mass murderer." What's your reaction?

BD: I don't believe in those terms. They're too hysterical. They don't describe anything. Most people think that homosexual, gay, queer, queen, faggot are all the same words. Everybody thinks that a junkie is a dope freak. As far as I'm concerned, I don't consider myself outside of anything. I just consider myself not around.

NH: Joan Baez recently opened a school in northern California for training civil rights workers in the philosophy and techniques of non-violence. Are you in sympathy with that concept?

BD: If you mean do I agree with it or not, I really don't see anything to be in agreement with. If you mean has it got my approval, I guess it does, but my approval really isn't going to do it any good. I don't know about other people's sympathy, but my sympathy runs to the lame and crippled and beautiful things. I have a feeling of loss of power - something like a reincarnation feeling. I don't feel that for mechanical things like cars or schools. I'm sure it's a nice school, but if you're asking me would I go to it, I would have to say no.

NH: As a college dropout in your freshman year, you seem to take a dim view of schooling in general, whatever the subject.

BD: I really don't think about it.

NH: Well, have you ever had any regrets about not completing college?

BD: That would be ridiculous. Colleges are like old-age homes; except for the fact that more people die in college than in old-age homes, there's really no difference. People have one great blessing – obscurity – and not really too many people are thankful for it. Everybody is always taught to be thankful for their food and clothes and things like that, but not to be thankful for their obscurity. Schools don't teach that. They teach people to be rebels and lawyers. I'm not going to put down the teaching system; that would be too silly. It's just that it really doesn't have too much to teach. Colleges are part of the American institution. Everybody respects them. They're very rich and influential, but they have nothing to do with survival. Everybody knows that.

NH: Would you advise young people to skip college, then?

BD: I wouldn't advise anybody to do anything. I certainly wouldn't advise somebody not to go to college. I just wouldn't pay his way through college.

NH: Don't you think the things one learns in college can help enrich ones life?

BD: I don't think anything like that is going to enrich my life, no – not my life, anyway. Things are going to happen whether I know why they happen or not. It just gets more complicated when you stick yourself into it. You don't find out why things move. You let them move; you watch them move; you stop them from moving; you start them moving. But you don't sit around and try to figure out why there's movement – unless, of course, you're just an innocent moron, or some wise old Japanese man. Out of all the people who just lay around and ask why? how many do you figure really want to know?

NH: Can you suggest a better use for the four years that would otherwise be spent in college?

BD: Well, you could hang around in Italy. You could go to Mexico. You could become a dishwasher. You could even go to Arkansas. I don't know, there are thousands of things to do and places to go. Everybody thinks that you have to bang your head against the wall, but it's silly when you really think about it. I mean, here you have fantastic scientists working on ways to prolong human living, and then you have other people who take it for granted that you have to beat your head against the wall in order to be happy. You can't take everything you don't like as a personal insult. I guess you should go where your wants are bare, where you're invisible and not needed.

NH: Would you classify sex among your wants, wherever you go?

BD: Sex is a temporary thing. Sex isn't love. You can get sex anywhere. If you're looking for someone to love you, now that's different. I guess you have to stay in college for that.

NH: Since you didn't stay in college, does that mean you haven't found someone to love you?

BD: Let's go on to the next question.

NH: Do you have any difficulty relating to people – or vice versa?

BD: Well, sometimes I have the feeling that other people want my soul. If I say to them "I don't have a soul" they say "I know that. You don't have to tell me that. Not me. How dumb do you think I am? I'm your friend." What can I say except maybe feeling bad and paranoia are the same thing.

NH: Paranoia is said to be one of the mental states sometimes induced by such hallucinogenic drugs as peyote and LSD. Considering the risks involved, do you think that experimentation with such drugs should be part of the growing-up experience for a young person?

BD: I wouldn't advise anybody to use drugs – certainly not the hard drugs. Drugs are medicine. But opium and hash and pot – now, those things aren't drugs. They just bend your mind a little. I think everybody's mind should be bent once in a while. Not by LSD, though. LSD is a medicine – a different kind of medicine. It makes you aware of the universe so to speak. You realize how foolish objects are. But LSD is not for groovy people. It's for mad, hateful people who want revenge. It's for people who usually have heart attacks. They ought to use it at the Geneva convention.

NH: Are you concerned, as you approach thirty, that you may begin to "go square", lose some of your openness to experience, become leery of change and new experiment?

BD: No. But if it happens, then it happens. What can I say? There doesn't seem to be any tomorrow. Every time I wake up, no matter in what position, it's always been today. To look ahead and start worrying about trivial little things I can't really say has any more importance than looking back and remembering trivial little things. I'm not going to become any poetry instructor at any girls' school; I know that for sure. But that's about all I know for sure. I'll just keep doing these different things, I guess.

NH: Such as?

BD: Waking up in different positions.

NH: What else?

BD: I'm just like anybody else. I'll try anything once.

NH: Including theft and murder?

BD: I can't really say I wouldn't commit theft or murder and expect anybody to really believe me. I wouldn't believe anybody if they told me that.

NH: By their mid-twenties, most people have begun to settle into their niche, to find a place in society. But you've managed to remain inner-directed and uncommitted. What was it that spurred you to run away from home six times between the ages of ten and eighteen and finally to leave for good?

BD: It was nothing. It was just an accident of geography. Like if I was born and raised in New York or Kansas City, I'm sure everything would have turned out different. But Hibbing, Minnesota, was just not the right place for me to stay and live. There really was nothing there. The only thing you could do there was to be a miner, and even that kind of thing was getting less and less. The people that lived there – they're nice people. I've been all over the world since I left there, and they still stand out as being the least hung-up. The mines were just dying, that's all; but that's not their fault. Everybody about my age left there. It was no great romantic thing. It didn't take any great amount of thinking or individual genius, and there certainly wasn't any pride in it. I didn't run away from it; I just turned my back on it. It couldn't give me anything. It was very void-like. So leaving wasn't hard at all. It would have been much harder to stay. I didn't want to die there. As I think about it now, though, it wouldn't be such a bad place to go back to and die in. There's no place I feel closer to now, or get the feeling that I'm part of, except maybe New York City. But I'm not a New Yorker. I'm North Dakota-Minnesota-Midwestern. I'm that color. I speak that way. I'm from someplace called Iron Range. My brains and feelings have come from there. I wouldn't amputate on a drowning man. Nobody from out there would.

NH: Today you're on your way to becoming a millionaire. Do you feel in any danger of being trapped by all this affluence – by the things it can buy?

BD: No, my world is very small. Money can't really improve it any. Money can just keep it from being smothered.

NH: Most big stars find it difficult to avoid getting involved, and sometimes entangled, in managing the business end of their careers. As a man with three thriving careers – as a concert performer, recording star and songwriter – do you ever feel boxed in by such non-creative responsibilities?

BD: No, I've got other people to do that for me. They watch my money. They guard it. They keep their eyes on it at all times. They're supposed to be very smart when it comes to money. They know just what to do with my money. I pay them a lot of it. I don't really speak to them much, and they don't really speak to me at all, so I guess everything is all right.

NH: If fortune hasn't trapped you, how about fame? Do you find that your celebrity makes it difficult to keep your private life intact?

BD: My private life has been dangerous from the beginning. All this does is add a little atmosphere.

NH: You used to enjoy wandering across the country – taking off on open-end trips, roughing it from town to town, with no particular destination in mind. But you seem to be doing much less of that these days. Why? Is it because you're too well known?

BD: It's mainly because I have to be in Cincinnati Friday night, and the next night I got to be in Atlanta, and then the next night after that, I have to be in Buffalo. Then I have to write some more songs for a record album.

NH: Do you get the chance to ride your motorcycle much anymore?

BD: I'm still very patriotic to the highway, but I don't ride my motorcycle too much anymore, no.

NH: How do you get your kicks these days, then?

BD: I hire people to look into my eyes, and then I have them kick me.

NH: And that's the way you get your kicks?

BD: No. Then I forgive them. That's where my kicks come in.

NH: You told an interviewer last year: "I've done everything I ever wanted to." If that's true, what do you have to look forward to?

BD: Salvation. Just plain salvation.

NH: Anything else?

BD: Praying. I'd also like to start a cookbook magazine. And I've always wanted to be a boxing referee. I want to referee a heavy-weight championship fight. Can you imagine that? Can you imagine any fighter in his right mind recognizing me?

NH: If your popularity were to wane, would you welcome being anonymous again?

BD: You mean welcome it, like I'd welcome some poor pilgrim coming in from the rain? No, I wouldn't welcome it. I'd accept it, though. Someday, obviously, I'm going to have to accept it.

NH: Do you ever think about marrying, settling down, having a home, maybe living abroad? Are there any luxuries you'd like to have, say, a yacht or a Rolls-Royce?

BD: No, I don't think about those things. If I felt like buying anything, I'd buy it. What you're asking me about is the future, my future. I'm the last person in the world to ask about my future.

NH: Are you saying you're going to be passive and just let things happen to you?

BD: Well, that's being very philosophical about it, but I guess it's true.

NH: You once planned to write a novel. Do you still?

BD: I don't think so. All my writing goes into the songs now. Other forms don't interest me anymore.

NH: Do you have any unfulfilled ambitions?

BD: Well, I guess I've always wanted to be Anthony Quinn in La Strada. Not always – only for about six years now. It's not one of those childhood-dream things. Oh, and come to think of it, I guess I've always wanted to be Brigitte Bardot, too; but I don't really want to think about that too much.

NH: Did you ever have the standard boyhood dream of growing up to be president?

BD: No. When I was a boy, Harry Truman was president. Who'd want to be Harry Truman?

NH: Well, let's suppose that you were the president. What would you accomplish during your first thousand days?

BD: Well, just for laughs, so long as you insist, the first thing I'd do is probably move the White House. Instead of being in Texas, it'd be on the East Side in New York. McGeorge Bundy would definitely have to change his name, and General McNamara would be forced to wear a coonskin cap and shades. I would immediately rewrite The Star-Spangled Banner, and little school children, instead of memorizing America the Beautiful, would have to memorize Desolation Row (one of Dylan's latest songs). And I would immediately call for a showdown with Mao Tse Tung. I would fight him personally – and I'd get somebody to film it.

NH: One final question. Even though you've more or less retired from political and social protest, can you conceive of any circumstance that might persuade you to reinvolve yourself?

BD: No, not unless all the people in the world disappeared.

March 1966
Jules Siegel Interview, Hollywood Hills, Los Angeles, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 809-819.

Whilst staying in Hollywood Hills, Los Angeles, sometime during mid to late March 1966, Dylan had his first meeting with Jules Siegel who was writing a profile on him for the Saturday Evening Post. Siegel accompanied Dylan on the last couple of American concerts in March when he interviewed him further. The profile / interview was eventually published in the Saturday Evening Post on July 30, 1966, the day before Dylan's motorcycle crash.

"Well, What Have We Here!"

We have Bob Dylan, singer, songwriter, poet, who at 25 admits he's a millionaire but denies being a genius.

Quick and little, Bob Dylan scrambled from the safety of a rented gray sedan and ran for his dressing room through a wildness of teen-age girls who howled and grabbed for his flesh. A cordon of guards held for a moment against the overwhelming attack. Then it broke and Dylan disappeared beneath yards of bell-bottoms and long hair. After a brief struggle he was rescued by one of his assistants, who methodically tore small and large girls off him, but it was too late. With a pair of enormous shears, a giant blond girl had snipped a lock of the precious Dylan hair and now was weeping for joy.

"Did you see that?" said Dylan in his dressing room, his pale face somewhat paler than usual. "I mean did you see that?" repeated Dylan, who tends to talk in italics. "I don't care about the hair, but she could have killed me. I mean she could have taken my eyes out with those scissors."

This is Bob Dylan's year to be mobbed. Next year it will probably be somebody else. But this year Bob Dylan is the king of rock n' roll, and he is the least likely king popular music has ever seen. With a bony, nervous face covered with skin the color of sour milk, a fright-wig of curly brown hair teased into a bramble of stand-up tangles, and dark-circled hazel eyes usually hidden by large prescription sunglasses, Dylan is less like Elvis or Frankie than like some crippled saint or resurrected Beethoven.

The songs he writes and sings, unlike the usual young-love pap of the airwaves, are full of dark and, many insist, important meaning; they are peopled with freaks, clowns, tramps, artists and mad scientists, dancing and tumbling in progressions of visionary images mobilized to the massive beat of rock n' roll. They often make very little logical sense, but almost always they make very good poetic sense. According to a recent poll, college students call him the most important contemporary poet in America.

He is certainly the only poet who gets his hair snipped off by shrieking teen-age girls, but Dylan has always been a defier of categories. His first fame was as a folk singer and folk-song writer. Last year he modified his style to what has been labeled "folk-rock," a blend of serious, poetic lyrics and rock n' roll music, which has brought him his greatest commercial success but has alienated some purists who were his early fans. He is a singer whose voice has been compared to the howl of "a dog caught in barbed wire"; a performer whose stage presence includes no hip wiggling or even, until recently, any acknowledgement of his audience; a public figure whose press conferences are exercises in a new kind of surrealism in which reporters ask, "Are you planning to do a movie?" and Dylan answers, deadpan, "Yes, I'm going to play my mother."

Yet, Bob Dylan, at the age of 25, has a million dollars in the bank and earns an estimated several hundred thousand dollars a year from concerts, recordings and publishing royalties. He is even more popular in England and Europe than in America. Four hours after tickets went on sale for his recent London concerts at Albert Hall, the SOLD-OUT sign was put up, and at one time five of his LP albums were selling in the top 20 in London. One paperback book on him has already been published; a hard-cover book about him by Robert Shelton, folk critic of The New York Times, will be published this winter; a third book of photographs and text by Daniel Kramer is scheduled for winter publication. A two-hour documentary of his English tours will soon be released for theater showing; he is about to begin production of his own movie; ABC-TV has signed him for a television special. A book of his writings, Tarantula, is to be published by Macmillan late this summer, with a prepublication excerpt to appear in the Atlantic Monthly.

And although he is not nearly so popular as the Beatles, who have sold nearly 200 million records in four years, his artistic reputation is so great that in the recording business Dylan is ranked as the No. 1 innovator, the most important trend-setter, one of the few people around who can change radically the course of teen music.

"Dylan," says a folk-singer friend of his, "is the king. He's the one we all look to for approval, the one we're all eating our hearts out about, the one who proved you could make it with the kids without any compromises. If I didn't admire him so much, I would have to hate him. In fact, maybe I do hate him anyway."

Born Robert Zimmerman, May 24, 1941, in Duluth, Minn., Dylan is a product of Hibbing, Minn., an iron-ore mining town of 18,000 inhabitants about 70 miles from the Canadian border. The southwestern accent in his singing voice is apparently acquired; he speaks without it. His father is a prosperous, witty, small (five-foot-six), cigar-smoking appliance dealer. His mother, a deeply tanned, attractive woman, is described by acquaintances as extremely intelligent, well informed and very talkative.

Dylan has a brother, David, 20, who attends St. Olaf College on a musical scholarship, and in the family it was always David who was thought of as "the musical one." Abe Zimmerman remembers buying a piano ("Not an expensive one," he says) when Bob was 10. Bob took one lesson and gave up in disgust because he couldn't play anything right away. David, then five, began taking lessons and has been playing ever since.

Despite his initial impatience, Bob Zimmerman soon taught himself how to play the piano, harmonica, guitar and autoharp. Once he began to play the piano, says Mrs. Zimmerman, he beat the keys out of tune pounding out rock n' roll. He also wrote – not only music but also poetry. "My mother has hundreds of poems I wrote when I was twelve years old," says Dylan.

As an adolescent, Dylan helped his father in the store, delivering appliances and sometimes attempting to make collections. "He was strong," Abe Zimmerman recently told an acquaintance. "I mean he could hold up his end of a refrigerator as well as kids twice his size, football players."

"I used to make him go out to the poor sections," Mr. Zimmerman said, "knowing he couldn't collect any money from those people. I just wanted to show him another side of life. He'd come back and say, 'Dad, those people haven't got any money.' And I'd say, 'Some of those people out there make as much money as I do, Bobby. They just don't know how to manage it.'"

In more than one way the lesson was well taken. Dylan today, while professing not to know anything about his wealth, appears to be a very good manager of money, careful sometimes to what might be considered stinginess.

A photographer friend of his recalls having to meet him at a hotel. "I called him," he says, "and asked if he wanted me to bring anything up for him". 'A container of tea', Bobby said. I said, 'Bobby, they have room service in the hotel; you can have it sent up.' He thought about that for a couple of seconds and then said no, room service was too expensive." This was in 1965 – the year that Dylan became a millionaire.

But Dylan learned more than frugality in the depressed areas of Hibbing. He learned, as Abe Zimmerman hoped he would, that there were people who knew nothing about middle-class life and middle-class values, people whose American dream had become a nightmare of installment debt. He seems to have felt a blood tie with them, based on a terrifying sense of his own peculiarity.

"I see things that other people don't see," he says. "I feel things other people don't feel. It's terrible. They laugh. I felt like that my whole life."

"My friends have been the same as me, people who couldn't make it as the high-school football halfback, Junior Chamber of Commerce leader, fraternity leader, truck driver working their way through college. I just had to be with them. I just don't care what anyone looks like, just as long as they didn't think I was strange. I couldn't do any of those things either. All I did was write and sing, paint little pictures on paper, dissolve myself into situations where I was invisible."

In pursuit of invisibility, Bob Zimmerman took to running away from home. "I made my own depression," he says. "Rode freight trains for kicks, got beat up for laughs, cut grass for quarters, met a waitress who picked me up and dropped me off in Washington." He tells of living with carnivals, of some trouble with police in Hibbing, of entertaining in a strip joint.

Be that as it may, he managed to finish high school at the appropriate time and even earned a scholarship to the University of Minnesota. Then the middle-class college boy from Hibbing began to remake his life and his image radically. He moved from his fraternity house to a downtown apartment. He began singing and playing the guitar and harmonica at Minneapolis' Ten o'Clock Scholar for two dollars a night; it is said that when he asked for a raise to five dollars, he was fired. He became Bob Dylan, and has since changed his name legally. This was not in tribute to Dylan Thomas, as the widely circulated legend maintains, but for some reason which he doesn't feel compelled to explain seriously.

"Get that straight," he says. "I didn't change my name in honor of Dylan Thomas. That's just a story. I've done more for Dylan Thomas than he's ever done for me. Look how many kids are probably reading his poetry now because they heard that story."

Dylan also gave up his very conventional college-boy dress – for his first professional appearance in Minneapolis he had worn white buck shoes – and began to develop his own personal style. At first, he was influenced by the uniform of folk singers everywhere -jeans, work shirt, boots, collar-length hair. Now that he's a rock n' roll star, the uniform has changed. The boots are still part of it, but the jeans are now tight slacks that make his legs look skinnier than they are. The work shirt has been replaced by floppy polka-dot Carnaby Street English shirts with oversized collars and long, puffed sleeves. Sometimes he wears racetrack-plaid suits in combinations of colors like green and black. His hair seems to get longer and wilder by the month.

In December, 1960, Dylan gave up on Minnesota and took off for New York to try rock n' roll, then in an uncertain state and dominated by clean-cut singers like Fabian and Frankie Avalon. It was not an auspicious time for someone who looked and sounded like Bob Dylan.

"I tried to make it in rock n' roll when rock n' roll was a piece of cream," he says. "Elvis had struck; Buddy Holly was dead; Little Richard was becoming a preacher, and Gene Vincent was leaving the country. I wrote the kind of stuff you write when you have no place to live and you're wrapped up in the fire pump. I nearly killed myself with pity, and agony. I saw the way doors close; the way doors that do not like you close. A door that does not like you needs no one to close it. I had to retreat."

Retreat for Dylan was folk music and Greenwich Village. He was strong medicine for both - nervous, cocky, different from anyone else around.

Arthur Kretchmer, a young magazine editor, remembers meeting Dylan at a party: "There was this crazy, restless little kid sitting on the floor and coming on very strong about how he was going to play Holden Caulfield in a movie of Catcher in the Rye, and I thought, 'This kid is really terrible'; but the people whose party it was said, 'Don't let him put you off. He comes on a little strong, but he's very sensitive – writes poetry, goes to visit Woody Guthrie in the hospital,' and I figured right, another one. I forgot all about him until a couple of years later he was famous and I wasn't. You can't always be right about these things, I suppose." Both Kretchmer and his wife are now Dylan fans.

Says Robert Shelton, whose book about Dylan is to be published this winter, "He was so astonishing-looking, so Chaplinesque and cherubic, sitting up on a stool playing the guitar and the harmonica and playing with the audience, making all kinds of wry faces, wearing this Huck Finn hat, that I laughed out loud with pleasure. I called over Pat Clancy [an Irish folk singer, one of the Clancy Brothers] and he looked at this cherub and broke into a broad smile and said, 'Well, what have we here?'"

Not too long after that, Shelton wrote a laudatory review in the Times of a Dylan performance. About the same time, Columbia Records executive John Hammond met Dylan at the home of folk singer Carolyn Hester, whom Dylan was going to accompany on a new record Hammond was producing. Without hearing him perform, Hammond offered Dylan a two-year contract with Columbia, and immediately hit a snag.

Dylan, a minor of 20, refused to admit to having any living relatives who could sign for him. "I don't know where my folks are," he told Hammond. "I think I've got an uncle who's a gambler in Nevada, but I wouldn't know how to track him down." Taking another chance, Hammond finally let the boy execute the contract himself.

The young folk singer's first LP was called Bob Dylan. It cost $403 to produce and sold, initially, 4,200 copies. By way of comparison, Dylan's most recent record as of this writing, Highway 61 Revisited, has sold 360,000 in the United States. All together, it is estimated that 10 million Dylan records have been sold throughout the world. His songs have been recorded in more than 150 other versions by performers ranging from Stan Getz to Lawrence Welk, and the royalties, Dylan admits, have made him a millionaire.

In achieving this success, Dylan has had powerful allies. Not the least of these was Billy James, a young Columbia public relations man who is now the record company's West Coast artist-relations director. It was through James's efforts that Dylan got his first taste of national publicity, but the singer's past was to come between them. In 1963, when Dylan was entering his first flush of fame with "Blowin' in the Wind" a song which became an unofficial anthem of the civil-rights movement and a major popular hit, Newsweek revealed that Bob Dylan was Robert Zimmerman and went on to suggest that not only was Dylan's name a fake but it was rumored another writer had created "Blowin' in the Wind." One part of the story was false – Dylan was the author of the song – but the other part, of course, was true: Bob Dylan was Robert Zimmerman.

Dylan was infuriated by the article and blamed Billy James for it. For two years the two did not speak. James won't talk about the incident at all, but people who know both of them say that Dylan attempted to get the public-relations man fired. Two years later, they met at a Party and Dylan was all friendship again. When James mentioned the Newsweek affair, Dylan put an arm around him and said, "Thousands of people are dying in Vietnam and right at this minute a man is jumping off the Empire State Building and you got that running around in your head? Forget it!"

One of the great factors in Dylan's early success was his profound ability to articulate the emotions of the civil-rights revolution, which was developing its peak of power in the early '60's. Recognition of this talent came in dramatic form at the Newport Folk Festival of 1963.

Although he had already appeared once on the program, which is a sort of Hall of Fame of folk singing in action, he was called back to the stage at the end of the final concert. Accompanied by a stageful of folk stars, from Pete Seeger, the gentle "king" of folk music, to Joan Baez, the undisputed queen, Bob Dylan sang "Blowin' in the Wind" to an audience of 36,000 of the most important folk-singing fans, writers, recording executives and critics.

"How many roads must a man walk down before you call him a man" they sang. "Yes, n' how many seas must a white dove sail before she sleeps in the sand? Yes, n' how many times must the cannon balls fly before they're forever banned? The answer, my friend, is blowin' in the wind, The answer is blowin' in the wind."

Recorded by Peter, Paul and Mary, "Blowin' in the Wind" was Dylan's first major hit, and very quickly there were 58 different versions of the song, by everyone from The Staple Singers (a screaming gospel version) to Marlene Dietrich. Almost overnight Dylan was established at the top of the folk music field. Here at last, sighed the folk critics and the civil-rights people, was a songwriter with the true "proletarian" touch, one who could really reach the masses. For two years, Dylan was the musical spokesman for civil-rights, turning up in Mississippi, in the march on Washington, at the demonstrations and rallies.

"I feel it," said Joan Baez, whom Dylan had met before Newport, "but Dylan can say it. He's phenomenal."

For a while, Joan and Bobby were to be inseparable, the queen and crown prince of folk music. When Dylan went to England for a concert tour, Joan Baez went with him. As much as anyone's, it was her voice and authority which helped to create the charismatic reputation of Bob Dylan the folk singer.

These days, Dylan and Baez are not as close as they used to be. When the rough cut of the film of his English tour was screened in Hollywood this spring, Baez was everywhere on the film, in the limousine, at the airport, singing in the hotel room. After the screening, Dylan said to the film editor, "We'll have to take all that stuff of Joan out." He hesitated and then added, "Well, it looks as if she was the whole thing. She was only there a few days. We'll have to cut it down."

Far more important to Dylan, however, was Albert Grossman, who took over Dylan's career and, to a great extent, his life. He is not only Dylan's manager, but also his confidant, healer and friend. Until recently, in fact, Dylan had no home of his own. He lived in Grossman's New York City apartment or the manager's antique-filled country home in Woodstock, N.Y.

He appears to be only vaguely aware of the extent or nature of his wealth, leaving the details to Grossman. "When I want money," Dylan says, "I ask for it. After I spend it, I ask for more."

Dylan has had his effect on Grossman, too, however. "I used to remember Albert as a nice-looking businessman, the kind of middle-aged man you would meet in a decent restaurant in the garment center," says one acquaintance. "Then, a while after he signed Dylan, I met him again. I couldn't believe it. I just couldn't believe what had happened to him. He had long gray hair like Benjamin Franklin and wire-rimmed spectacles, and he was wearing an old sweatshirt or something and Army pants. 'Albert,' I screamed, when I finally recognized him. 'Albert, what has Bobby done to you?'"

A measure of Dylan's relationship with his manager is found in the tone and style he uses in talking to Grossman. Even in the most ordinary conversation, Dylan can be almost impossible to understand. He is often vague, poetic, repetitive, confusing. But his flow of imagery can be startlingly precise and original, and the line of his thought brilliantly adventurous, funny and penetrating. So, in describing his music he will say, "It's all math, simple math, involved in mathematics. There's a definite number of Colt 45's that make up Marlene Dietrich, and you can find that out if you want to."

This kind of talk is not useful for more than a few situations. Nonetheless, it is the way Dylan speaks to fans, disk jockeys, reporters, acquaintances and, frequently, friends. It is not the way he speaks to Grossman. Then his voice often goes into a kind of piping whine, the voice of a little boy complaining to his father.

Thus, after a concert on the West Coast, at three o'clock in the morning, Dylan was told by a visitor that his voice was not heard over the blast of the electronically amplified rock n' roll instruments. Grossman lay dozing on the hotel bed, his tinted glasses still on, a slight smile of repose on his heavy face.

"Al-bert," Dylan cried, "Albert, did you hear that? They couldn't hear me. Al-bert, I mean they couldn't hear me. What good is it if they can't hear me? We've got to get that sound man out here to fix it. What do you think, Albert."

Grossman stirred on the bed and answered soothingly, "I told you in the car that the volume was too high. Just cut the volume by about a third and it'll be all right." Grossman went back to sleep, very much like an occidental Buddha, snoring lightly. Dylan was satisfied.

Grossman's formidable managerial talent is displayed most clearly when Dylan is on concert tour. From Grossman's New York office, the logistics of moving the singer and his crew from concert to concert halfway around the world are worked out with an efficiency that makes the whole operation seem effortless.

On the road the Dylan entourage usually consists of Dylan, his road manager, a pilot and co-pilot for the 19-seat two-engine Lodestar in which the group travels over the shorter distances (tourist-class commercial jets are used for overseas and transcontinental travel), two truck drivers who deliver the sound equipment and musicians' instruments from stop to stop, a sound man and five musicians – two guitarists, a drummer, pianist and organist. Grossman flies out from time to time to hear a concert or two and then returns to New York. On foreign tours he usually stays with the group throughout the trip.

Dylan's people are protective and highly attentive to his wants, and Dylan himself, given his status as a star, is neither especially demanding nor temperamental, even when things don't quite go according to schedule.

Last spring, for example, a concert in Vancouver was an acoustical disaster. The arena still smelled strongly of its last guests – a stock exhibition. It was perfectly round, with a flat dome that produced seven echoes from a sharp handclap in the center, and large open gates which let sound leak out of the hall as easily as if the concert were held in the open air. Although Dylan's $30,000 custom-designed sound system filled eight large crates with equipment, it could never fill this gigantic echo chamber with clear sound. To add to the problem, one of the small monitor speakers, placed on stage to enable the musicians to hear themselves play, was not working.

Dylan's concerts are divided into two halves. During the first, in which he played his acoustic guitar into a stage microphone, the sound was patchy; in some spots it was perfect, in others it was very bad. In the second half, however, in which rock n' roll songs were played on the amplified instruments and electric guitars, the music was a garble of reverberation, and Dylan's voice was totally scrambled by the echo. The sound man sweated and twirled his knobs, but it was no use. At one point Grossman ran up to the stage to tell Dylan to stop "eating the mike," getting too close to the microphone and contributing to the electric jumble. The musicians, deprived of the monitor, watched each other tensely as they tried to keep their beat by observation rather than sound.

"Man, that was just terrible," Dylan said when he came off stage and hurried into the waiting car. "That was just awful. I mean that was worse than Ottawa, and Ottawa was the worst hole in the universe." He turned to each person in the car and asked them separately, "Wasn't that worse than Ottawa, and wasn't Ottawa the worst hole in the universe?" Everyone agreed that it was worse than Ottawa.

"That was really worse than Ottawa, and Ottawa was the worst, terrible, miserable hole in the entire universe," Dylan repeated, with a certain satisfaction. "Worse than Ottawa," he mused, and then laughing, turned around and said, "and any one who doesn't think it was worse than Ottawa can get out of the car right now."

Later he and Grossman discussed the problem again, and it was agreed that the fault lay in the arena, not in the equipment. In a better hall or a theater there would have been no trouble. Dylan's concern now was with the hall in which he was booked in Australia.

"Albert, it's no good in those arenas," he said. "I just would rather forget arenas and play theaters. To hell with the money, I mean I would much rather have a good show. Are we going to play any arenas in Australia?"

"We have to," Grossman answered, after quickly going through the Australia situation with Dylan. "We haven't enough big concert halls or theaters there. It's not America. The country is still undeveloped."

"Well, all right," said Dylan. "I mean if we have to, but I wish we could just play theaters and halls. I mean that place was worse than Ottawa and –" "Ottawa was the worst hole in the universe," someone chimed in.

"Yeah. The worst in the universe. And this was worse."

At no time, perhaps, was Dylan's closeness with Grossman more important than in 1965, the year Dylan turned from folk music to rock n' roll. He had by this time cut three more albums, two of them, The Times They Are A-Changin' and The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan, outstandingly successful, not only in sales but in acclaim from the critics and the civil-rights activists. But he came back from a stunningly successful English tour with a feeling of malaise and a desire for change.

"After I finished the English tour," he says, "I quit because it was too easy. There was nothing happening for me. Every concert was the same: first half, second half, two encores and run out, then having to take care of myself all night."

"I didn't understand; I'd get standing ovations, and it didn't mean anything. The first time I felt no shame. But then I was just following myself after that. It was down to a pattern."

In his next album, Bringing It All Back Home, Dylan broke the pattern. Instead of playing either conventional 'protest' as it was understood then, or using the traditional folk-music modes, he electrically amplified his guitar and set surrealistic verses to the rock n' roll beat.

Ironically, it was one of the album's few nonrock songs that brought Dylan his first great success in the pop market. "Mr. Tambourine Man," recorded by The Byrds in a hard-rock version complete with falsetto, was a massive hit. "When 'Mr. Tambourine Man' broke, we didn't know anything about Bob Dylan," says "Cousin Brucie" Merrow, a disk jockey on WABC Radio, New York. "Oh, I remember a few years ago we'd listened to a single of his. It didn't seem to fit the sound then, so we didn't play it. That was all I knew about Bob Dylan until The Byrds hit with "Mr. Tambourine Man" Then everyone was asking, 'Who's this Bob Dylan?' It's the only time I can remember when a composer got more attention for a hit than the performers did."

Then when Dylan released his new single, "Like a Rolling Stone," and his new album, Highway 61 Revisited, the folk fans knew Bobby was going to be a teen-age idol, and if he was a teen-age idol he wasn't theirs anymore. For people who had thought they owned Bob Dylan it was a bitter disappointment, and Dylan lost a great many people he thought were his friends. "A freak and a parody," shrieked Irwin Silber in the folk music magazine Sing Out! At the Newport Folk Festival of 1965, Dylan was booed off the stage. At his Forest Hills concert in September, the audience listened attentively through the first, folk, half of , the program and then began to boo when the musicians came out for the rock n' roll portion. This time Dylan did not walk off the stage as he did at Newport, but fought his way through the performance, supported by 80 percent of the crowd.

"Like a Rolling Stone" finally put Dylan across as a rock n' roll star. He wrote it in its first form when he came back from England. "It was ten pages long," he says. "It wasn't called anything, just a rhythm thing on paper all about my steady hatred directed at some point that was honest. In the end it wasn't hatred, it was telling someone something they didn't know, telling them they were lucky. Revenge, that's a better word."

"I had never thought of it as a song, until one day I was at the piano, and on the paper it was singing, 'How does it feel?' in a slow motion pace, in the utmost of slow motion following something."

"It was like swimming in lava. In your eyesight, you see your victim swimming in lava. Hanging by their arms from a birch tree. Skipping, kicking the tree, hitting a nail with your foot. Seeing someone in the pain they were bound to meet up with."

"I wrote it. I didn't fail. It was straight." "Like a Rolling Stone" climbed rapidly to the top of the charts. It was followed by "Positively 4th Street" and then by "Ballad of a Thin Man" and Dylan's lead was soon followed by other songwriters released from the inane bondage of the "I Love You, Teen Queen" straitjacket. Soon the airwaves were full of songs about the war in Vietnam, or civil-rights, or the general disorder of the world and society in America. It was quickly labeled "folk-rock," and the kids wolfed it down and are listening to it.

Along with the teen-agers, Dylan got a surprising bonus audience – the adult hip intellectuals who had just found out about rock n' roll. National magazines began writing favorably about Dylan and rock n' roll, and rock concerts became the social events of the intellectuals' seasons. Allen Ginsberg said, "He writes better poetry than I did at his age... I'd say he's a space-age genius minstrel more than an old library poet." One Sunday, the magazine sections of The New York Times and The New York Herald Tribune simultaneously published long articles on the poetry of Bob Dylan, complete with learned analyses and exegeses off the most fashionable academic-journalistic-sociological kind.

Dylan's reaction is predictably thorny. "The songs are not meant to be great," he said. "I'm not meant to be great. I don't think anything I touch is destined for greatness. Genius is a terrible word, a word they think will make me like them. A genius is a very insulting thing to say. Even Einstein wasn't a genius. He was a foreign mathematician who would have stolen cars."

Some of his recent songs have brought him new criticism: it has been claimed that the lyrics of "Mr. Tambourine Man" and his latest hit, "Rainy Day Women #12 and 35" ("Everybody must get stoned!"), are all about drugs and drug experiences. Grossman denies it. Dylan won't talk about his songs. "Don't interrupt me," he says. Talking about drugs, he is typically elusive.

"People just don't need drugs," he says. "Keep things out of your body. We all take medicine, as long as you know why you're taking it. If you want to crack down on the drug situation, the criminal drug situation takes place in suburban housewives' kitchens, the ones who get wiped out on alcohol every afternoon and then make supper. You can't blame them and you can't blame their husbands. They've been working in the mines all day. It's understandable."

During the past year Dylan has got married, fathered a son, Jesse Byron Dylan, and bought a townhouse in Manhattan's fashionable East 30's. Typically, he has attempted to keep all of this a secret. When his wife, a beautiful, black-haired girl named Sara Lowndes, visited him in Vancouver and attended his concert, Dylan was faced with a problem: two disk jockeys were coming up to the dressing room to interview him, how was he to hide his wife from them? "Sara," said Dylan, opening a large closet, "when they arrive I want you to get in here." His wife looked at him quizzically but stepped reluctantly toward the open door. Dylan began to laugh, but it is a mark of the seriousness of his desire for privacy that his wife was ready to get into the closet.

The only thing anyone now will predict for certain is that Dylan will change. "I'll never decay," he says. "Decay is when something has stopped living but hasn't died yet, looking at your leg and seeing it all covered with creeping brown cancer. Decay turns me off. I'll die first before I decay."

Louise Sokół Interview, Miami, Florida

A short interview by fourteen year old Louise Sokół just before the concert at the Miami Convention Hall on March 3rd 1966. The interview was later published in the September 1966 issue of the magazine Datebook in their Teens Interview Stars series.

BEACH, FLA.

When my authorisation for an interview with Bob Dylan came, I did a little jig. Then I rang up Tom Campbell, who's a local DJ and a good friend of mine. He said he could probably get me to see Bob, but that Sam Wood, who arranged Dylan's Florida bookings would have the last word. I called Mr. Wood, and he said I could talk to Bob for an hour, when he arrived in Florida.

Two weeks passed, and the day came. When I got to Bob's dressing room, I was greeted by Sam Wood. Members of Bob's backup group and a couple of DJ's were in the room. Bob was alone on one side of the room, reading a book. He was wearing grey pants, a white shirt, and sandals. His hair was all messed up. Sam Wood introduced me to him, and I sat down. We both said, "Hello," and I began asking a few questions. They went something like this:

I read that you were secretly married. True or false?
BD: (laughing) False. I don't know where this junk comes from.
Do you think The Beatles have a lot of talent?
BD: They certainly do! No doubt about it!
Do you try to get a message across in your songs?
BD: It's not a message! Message songs are a drag. It's an expression of my feelings.
Why did you change to a rock feeling in your songs?
BD: I was getting tired, you know bored, of the old thing. You gotta change sometimes.
Do you get royalties when others record your songs?
BD: Yeah, I get a certain percentage. I don't know what happens with my money.
What's your description of folk music?
BD: Man, it's weird, legendlike, and mythlike. It takes in everything.
Is it true you once said you were sympathetic to [Lee Harvey] Oswald?
BD: Well, it's pretty sad, someone sick enough to do a thing like that.

At this point someone brought in food. Bob offered me some, but I declined saying I had to leave. When Bob walked me to the door, I was surprised to find he wasn't much taller than me.

That night I went to Bob's concert. It was delayed for a while because a harmonica couldn't be found. When Bob did come on stage with his guitar and harmonica, the applause was deafening. He looked so small and wistful standing up there, but I've never seen anybody hold an audience so quiet before. When the concert ended, I left feeling I had learned something that night.

The Robert Shelton Minnesota Transcripts

Introductory Note (by Ian Woodward)
This transcript is a bit different, being Dylan himself, and being only part of the taped interview. Shelton headed it, Bob in Denver Motel – March 1966 / Fragment referring to Hilling and family. It took place on 13 March 1966. The transcript contains corrections and it is clear that Dylan is thinking slowly.

Bob Dylan

BD: Getting back to the Hibbing thing... it's like... right now I can't give it any of my thoughts... I've thought about it some... I send money, to my mother, a lot of money. I don't come from a middle class family... what you'd call 'a great middle class family ... in the suburbs'... where I live... (did he mean live in the present? R.S.) [Note 1]... there aren't any suburbs... there aren't suburbs and there's no poor section... and there's no rich section... there just is none. There is no one side of town and another side of town, there's no wrong side of the track and right side of the track. There are farm girls and farm boys... but they're not around only because they are out on the farm... they take the bus in. There's no lines where I come from. There never was. [Note 2]. As far as I know, where I live, nobody has anything that anybody else didn't have really, and that is the truth! All the people that I knew had the same things. There wasn't that many people for somebody to be terribly off. (R.S. Very ungrammatical, perhaps it should be played up a little), you know... and having to face everybody else.

RS: Tell me, where did this Joe Williams... he told me you knew some of his songs at the age of 10. Where did you get this, off radio?

BD: Yeah

RS: Did you get all this at the radio? Were your parents musical?

BD: No! No! (Undefinable mumble) [Note 3] Minnesota, that's where I lived. It's where I live... it's hillbilly country... it sounds like the mid-west... northern... it's hillbilly country, it's all hillbilly stations... the stations you get and you get the mid-west stations on a direct route from Louisiana... it's right down the Mississippi River, there's a route to it like that's all there is to it... the communications thing... you heard all the music... it went all through the whole land... deep south all the way up to polka bands – Whoopee John and hockey players played the (mumble) [Note 3], it was all there. I didn't know any individual songs.. I knew some... I knew "Baby, Please Don't Go" and stuff like that. [Note 4]

RS: When you were taking off from home, was it more a curiosity to see what was going on or were you trying to get away from the scene there?

BD: No, there was no curiosity to see what was going on... I just wanted to get away, that's all... Yeah, get away IT WAS LIKE A (long thoughtful pause) [Note 3] VACUUM ... I WAS BORED... I JUST KEPT GOING BECAUSE I WAS BORED, ONLY I'VE NEVER SETTLED AND ACCEPTED BOREDOM... I LIKE, TO KNOW, I JUST CAN'T MAKE BOREDOM... I CAN LAY ON MY BED FOR THREE HOURS AND LOOK AT THE CEILING BUT, YOU KNOW, THAT DOESN'T MEAN BOREDOM. [Note 5]

Notes

1. To me, it is clear that Dylan talks of his family home, not his present one.
2. The underlining is in Shelton's transcript.
3. Shelton's comment in the transcript.
4. Here, Shelton has typed "(Material here about New York – get this later)"
5. The capitals are Shelton's. It isn't clear if it portrays Dylan's own emphasis or not.

April 1966
Stan Rofe interview, Radio 3KZ, Melbourne, Australia

(taken from circulating tape)

BD: You've more space in Nashville than you do in New York City. New York City is... well, you've never been to New York City but New York City is just a bunch of tenement buildings going sky high, you know. And there's very little space or air or room to breathe there, and it rubs off on recordings too you know. But Nashville is different from that. Nobody... In Nashville people sit around if they want to. If they want to make good records they just sit around and wait all night 'til you're ready. But they won't do that in New York, they get bored and talk and bring you down some kind of way. That's not a put-down of New York or anything like that, but it's true, you know. They get tired fast. It's true, you know…

SR: Sir, you're writing a book. When do expect your book to be released and what's the book all about.

BD: It should be released in August or September. It's rhythmic. As far as what happens in the book, I can't really explain that because it's all self-explanatory enough. [tape cuts]

12 April 1966
Sydney Airport Press Conference, Sydney, Australia

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 81-86.

The year, 1966, offers a wealth of interviews and press conferences, many of which are admirably covered in The Ghost Of Electricity by John Bauldie. I don't want to repeat any of them word for word (in this, the first, volume anyway). So I've chosen a few interviews to present from different angles.

The first, the Sydney Airport press conference provides an insight from one direction, that of the Australian journalist Craig McGregor. There were apparently two Sydney press conferences, this one at the airport and a subsequent one at Dylan's Kings Cross Hotel. This press conference contains several interviews within interviews as you'll see. There's a brief and shambolic television interview due to be broadcast two days later and then an impromptu interview with Dylan by Dylan himself.

No audio tape, video tape or official transcript is known to exist of what Craig McGregor calls Dylan's Crucifixion. I've taken an extract or two from McGregor's article in The Sydney Morning Herald for April 13th and expanded this considerably with details from McGregor's introductory chapter to his Retrospective: additional quotes have been taken from Bauldie's The Ghost Of Electricity.

LOOKING RATHER LIKE AN EXTRA FROM THE TEN COMMANDMENTS, MR. BOB DYLAN ARRIVED IN SYDNEY YESTERDAY AND WITHIN HALF AN HOUR HAD CONDUCTED AN ANTI-INTERVIEW, PUT DOWN THE PRESS – AND PARODIED THE WHOLE PERFORMANCE.

SYDNEY AIRPORT. Early morning. April 1966. Gulls, bitumen tarmac, hip kids in knee-high boots, camel-hair jeans, Zapata moustaches. Boeing 707, in from Honolulu. Pause. Doors open, the first passengers disgorged, blinking in the unfamiliar sunlight. Another pause. Then Dylan. I assumed it must be he, though he looked smaller and frailer than I'd imagined. Descending the gangplank he was talking to some of the Band, but walking across the tarmac he was by himself: a tiny, lonely figure. Customs. Then, at last, into the main hall, where fans besieged him. He gallantly accepted a fifty-foot pop-art fan letter glued together from magazine and newspaper clippings, signed himself "The Phantom". Black corduroy suit, black suede high-heeled calf-length zipper-sided boots, dark glasses, a halo of long ringleted hair: Dylan, 1966. He held up his hands (look, no stigmata), turned away and made it across to the press room, where the TV cameras and reporters were waiting. The Band, wearing dark glasses and sombreros, and the greying bulk of Albert Grossman followed. Dylan was smiling, being obliging. He settled himself down on a sofa for the press conference. The arc lights switched on. I sat down beside him, to his left. Downcast eyes, hooked Jewish nose. The crucifixion was about to begin.

It was soon obvious that nearly everyone there had already made up his mind about Dylan. Or their editors had. He was either a Protest Singer, or a Phony, or preferably both; and they weren't going to be put off by any of that shit about him being someone who wrote songs. Nobody welcomed him: the first questions were hostile, brutal, stupid. Dylan tried to answer seriously at first, but it was a lost cause. A few mumbles. Nobody listened. A young guy from the Sun kept interrupting with a line of questions drilled into him by his paper: get him to admit he's a phony, that all this protest stuff is bullshit...

Isn't all this protest music a fake?

BD: Huh?

It's phony isn't it?

BD: Huh?

Are you a protest singer?

BD: I haven't heard that word for a long time. Everybody knows there are no protest songs any longer – it's just songs.

If you aren't a protest singer, why does everybody say you are?

BD: Everybody? Who does?

Time magazine

BD: Oh, yeah.

Why have you started playing rock and roll?

BD: Is that what they call it?

Why have you gone commercial?

BD: I have not gone commercial. I deny it (with bible-swearing hand upraised). Commercial – that's a word that describes old grandmothers that have no place to go.

Do you always have a troupe of twelve people travel with you?

BD: Twelve?

Are they all members of your band?

BD: Er, yeah, that's right (with a sideways look at Uncle Albert standing grinning against the wall) – they're all just members of my band.

Why don't you play by yourself? Why do you need so many? Is this all a stunt? Are you a professional beatnik?

BD: Huh?

Are you a professional beatnik?

BD: Well, I was in the brigade once – you know, we used to get paid money – but they didn't pay me enough, so I became a singer.

Why do you wear those crazy clothes?

BD: I look very normal where I live. I'm conservative by their standards.

Does it take a lot of trouble to get your hair like that?

BD: No, you just have to sleep on it for twenty years.

What does your family think of you?

BD: I don't see my family anymore – they're out in the Midwest.

Why don't you see them?

BD: Well, I would never be able to find them.

What would you be if you weren't a songwriter?

BD: A ditch digger called Joe.

As the lights burned the pace warmed up.

Are you an atheist? Are you an agnostic? Are you a pacifist? Are you against war? Are you for war? What's your message? Are people important to you.

BD: People are deathly important to me.

What's your real-name?

BD: William-double-yew-Kasonavarich

Why did you change it?

BD: Wouldn't you change yours if you had a name like William-double-yew-Kasonavarich? I couldn't get any girlfriends.

Dylan kept his cool throughout, answering each question in a mumbled hip patois, and had a gracious word for everyone – including Pete Seeger ("rambustacious") and the Beatles songs ("side-splitting"). I asked a couple of questions, but they got swamped in the torrent of hostility. Dylan didn't need any help. In the end I got up and walked across to the side of the pressroom, where Grossman and the Band were standing watching the circus. "They don't even realise he's putting them down," I said to Grossman. He grinned.

Dylan made one or two attempts to get across. He wrote songs, he said, for himself; it was just an accident that other people liked them. Why didn't he write songs about Negroes? What? Why didn't he...?

He didn't write songs about Negroes because all people were different and you have no respect for me, sir, if you think I could write about Negroes as Negroes instead of as people. And he had changed his name to Dylan not because of the Welsh poet ("I don't care for Dylan Thomas") but because his mother's name was Dillon – at this stage he was still peddling that line. And the best song he'd written, he thought, was Like A Rolling Stone, because the words and music came together there and usually they didn't.

(Additional quotes from Bauldie's Ghost Of Electricity):

How does it feel to be a popular hero?
BD: I don't regard myself as a popular hero. I know I'm not, so how could I be?
How would you describe yourself?
BD: I don't describe myself. How do you describe yourself?
I have no idea, but I don't have to sell your talent.
BD: Neither do I! Write whatever you like. I'm a tree-surgeon if you like.
How do you spend the money you get from being a Folk-Pop singer?
BD: I don't know how much money I've got. I haven't begun to spend it yet. I have people to look after that. I'm not a businessman.
What do you believe in?
BD: I believe in you. I believe in things I can see. Don't you?
Your songs often have a pacifist flavor. Are you anti-war? Do you support anti-war movements?
BD: No. I have no feelings about war.
How do you feel about the acceptance of your songs and anthems by the Civil Rights Movement in America?
BD: I'm not pro-Negro. I'm not anti-Negro. I have no feeling I care to discuss with you. I don't care what people say, my songs don't deal about color discrimination or the horror of young boys being killed in wars. This doesn't disturb me at all. In fact, I'm quite happy about the state of the world. I don't want to change it. I wouldn't write about Negroes if you paid me $1,000, because all people are different and you have no respect for me, sir, if you think I would write about Negroes as Negroes instead of as people.
Is there any general theme behind your songs?
BD: Yes. They're all about the Second Coming.
When do you expect that?
BD: When people don't wear clothes any more.
How do American pressmen respond to you?
BD: They think I'm beautiful, loving, charming and clean. I'm only obscene when I get mad.
Who do you admire?
BD: A songwriter called Sheldon Orthogity. His songs are the words you say without knowing it. And Rory Calhoun, an ex-cowboy actor.
What do you think about poets such as Sandburg and Eliot?
BD: Carl Sandburg and T. S. Eliot aren't poets. Their words don't sing. They don't come off the paper. They're just super-romantic refugees who would like to live in the past. I never did admire them. They are people who have been respected as poets. It's a bad thing to say, but it's true.

Dylan Thomas

BD: I don't like him either. You can't feel Dylan Thomas.

What's your message?

BD: Don't talk to me about a message, man. I don't have any messages. Time Magazine, Newsweek, Look, Life, and the Ladies Home Journal call me a protest singer, but I'm not a protest singer. I am not a social commentator.

What are your impressions of Australia?

BD: Australia isn't a very nice place for lots of people – people like Orientals and Negroes.

Perhaps you'd better be careful what you say.

BD: I don't care what I say. I don't live here. Australia has about eleven million people, right? America is about the same size. There must be some reason why there are only eleven million people in Australia. Maybe it's 'cause they don't play baseball here.

And now back to McGregor: -

At last the reporters gave it away. (In print they all attacked him. A PHONY! A CHARLATAN! They might as well have stayed at home). Then Dylan gave a separate interview to a bland, buttoned-down, sincere-suited TV smoothie. The interviewer started well, but the pauses got longer and longer and the questions more and more distraught as he ran into Dylan's rapid-fire, surrealistic responses. Finally he asked whether Dylan, having written the well-known song "God's On Our Side" (sic) was deeply religious?

"Yes I am deeply religious," said Dylan. "But I don't ask other people what they're deeply religious about." Pause "I believe in numbers."

The interviewer ran a sticky finger around his collar, stumbled to a dead halt. Silence. The camera whirred, the lights blazed. Dylan looked thoughtfully at his boots. The interviewer opened his mouth. "CUT" he shouted at the cameraman.

There was another long, agonizing silence while the interviewer tried to think of what to say next. At last he succeeded. The cameras rolled.

"Mr. Dylan, is this your first visit to Australia?"
"Yes".
Silence
"CUT" shouted the interviewer.

By this time Grossman and Robbie Robertson were rolling in the aisles. The press disappeared. Dylan was left alone, stretched out on the settee like an Ottoman seductress. "Hey, Bob – why don't you interview yourself?" Grossman yelled at him. Immediately, moving swiftly between settee and interviewer's seat, Dylan improvised an instantaneous parody of everything that had just happened.

BD: How long is it since you saw your mother?
BD: About three months.
BD: Why don't you see her more often? Doesn't she approve of your music?
BD: Well my mother doesn't approve of it but my grandmother does.
BD: I see you've got about twelve people there with you: what's that, a band? Don't you play pure music any longer?
BD: No man, that's not a band with me. They're all friends of my grandmother...

It went on and on, a hilarious spoof, but by this time I was laughing too much to take notes.

Ron Saw Interview, Sydney, Australia

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1001-1003.

On arrival at Sydney Airport on Tuesday April 12th 1966, Dylan gave his first Press Conference of the Australian Tour. This was followed by a second and smaller Press Conference at the King's Cross Hotel. Later in the day a select band of reporters was allowed into Dylan's hotel suite but it seems that some chose to help him watch TV whilst others tried harder to search behind the enigma that was Dylan. Two of those reporters were Uli Schmetzer and Ron Saw.

Ron Saw's views of the proceedings were published in the Sydney Daily Mirror the next day, April 13th 1966.

JUST HOW DO YOU TALK TO A GENIUS?

The first picture I ever saw of Bob Dylan showed him sitting in a tree. It was one of the illustrations to a piece about him in the New York Herald Tribune, and it gave my mind a pretty bad time.

Dylan was shown sitting in a tree about ten feet from the ground. Below him, watching him, stood a small child in baggy trousers. I don't know what he was doing in that tree. Possibly he was thinking. Possibly he was just hanging on. It is even possible that he was in the tree taking refuge from the child in the baggy trousers.

I don't suppose it really matters, but it's the sort of picture that preys on the mind. A couple of times I've woken in the night thinking about Dylan in the tree, and when I went to see him yesterday, I asked him about it at once. "In a tree?" he said, "I don't recall that. In the Herald-Tribune? Well, a lot of pictures they say are of me aren't really of me at all, but of somebody else. I wouldn't have climbed a tree. I have a fear of heights." Still I insist that it was Dylan in that tree, and I refuse to believe that anyone can climb a tree and pose for a photograph without remembering it.

I didn't want to argue about it. Almost everyone came to agree that Dylan is a sort of genius, and if a genius wants to put tree-sitting out of his mind, it is simply churlish to press the matter.

I mention it only because it brought from him the only answer which was even remotely comprehensible.

It has been suggested that Dylan copied his hairstyle from the Rolling Stones. I don't believe it. From the Witch of Endor or Medusa, from Struwwelpeter or even Rosaleen Norton. But not from the Rolling Stones. Dylan's hairstyle makes a Rolling Stone look like moss.

Otherwise his get-up – dark glasses, dark jacket, chalk-striped snakeproof trousers, high suede boots – is par for the course. And were he not a genius, I'd score his conversation as bogey.

"It's been written," I said, "that your moods are many: anger, loneliness, despair, consolation, fury."

"I don't have any of those moods," he said. "Terror is my constant emotion. Terror of what? Well, that's like asking a happy man what he's happy about. I just deal in terror. I buy it, sell it and make a profit. But I couldn't say what I'm terrified of."

I tried again. "Folk-singers always seem to be singing about miseries; about the bomb and poverty and denial of human rights and so on. Wouldn't it be a good idea for someone to sing about a few cheerful things for a change? I mean, the Clancy Brothers manage to toss in a few good honest folk-songs about love and fighting and playing and booze."

"Booze." he said. "Booooze, eh. Boooooooze. It's a word. But you won't knock down any walls with it. Not that I want to knock down walls. I'd run away from a wall." Silence. I tried to think about Dylan running away from a wall, but I still kept seeing him sitting in a tree.

"Folk-singing," I said at length, "is a rather widely used term. Would you describe yourself as a folk-singer?"

"I wish," he said, "that I could come under some classification. But I don't have to, so I don't. I try to fall in line. I try not to be noticed. But somehow it doesn't work. Who wants to be an oddball?" I wrote it down carefully.

"I am," he said, "a singer whose songs are about joyful subjects. Joyful, prehistoric subjects," he laughed sharply.

I tried wretchedly to connect joy and prehistory with the buying and selling of terror, and failed.

Suddenly I realised that I hadn't understood a thing he'd said, and I cursed my shrinking wits and my lack of perception and my presumption in trying to come to cerebral grips with a genius or even a sort of genius.

I began again, bringing the conversation back to the humble earth, tossing in the one word which, it seemed, had ever struck sparks from him.

"Forgetting love and fighting and the Clancy Brothers and boooooooze, wouldn't it be a rather pleasant novelty to have a folk-song without a message?"

His dark spectacles arose like corpulent eyebrows.

"I don't sing songs with a message," he said. "A message is an insulting way of trying to put your paranoia across. Everybody asks me about messages. In England they asked me about messages. I'm here in Australia to sing songs and they ask me about messages. I don't think they know too well what I do. I don't think they know me here like they do in the States. I don't think." he said accusingly, "that they know much at all about me in this country."

In a moment crowded by guilt, apology and huge relief I realised that at last I was on a mental plane with a genius.

For the first time I was able not only to understand, but to agree.

THE NEW BREED: LITTLE BOBBY DOES A MESSAGE (FOR MANKIND)

In striped black pants, velvet boots, polka-dot shirt and blue corduroy jacket, little Bobby Dylan, singer and songwriter, was draped across his chair fondly sucking his thumb. And as Quickdraw McGraw and his kiddy cartoon characters played on the television screen, little Bobby clapped his hands and emitted gleeful, squeaky sounds of pleasure.

Pigmy-sized, pallid-faced, with long fluffy hair, Bob Dylan is the latest and strangest of the new breed of mop-haired anti-socialite, non-conformist, pseudo-beatnik comedians to invade Sydney. And although his songs, raved and written about as brilliant, have a message to mankind, little Bobby had startlingly little to say.

In fact, he bore the expression of a man being wheeled out of the operating theatre still partly under an anesthetic. Throughout the forty-five minutes of nonsensical spluttering, ho-hum mumbling and vague gabbling, I received the distinct impression he was trying to say something, but didn't know what.

In the end I chucked in the towel in my search for a person beneath the empty shell, since it appeared to be like fossicking for a pin in Sydney Harbour. And when, giggling like an amused baby, he explained his songs came to him while tubbing in the backyard and blinking at the blue sky, I could believe it.

Asked what he did before he scribbled songs and sung them, he said: "I was a thief- cats, antennas, radios, y'know." "Ever caught?" "Yeah, once by a priest – he converted me and I became a folksinger."

Little Bobby chuckled and it sounded like a jackass laughing, a teakettle boiling and a hen laying an egg... Here, the kiddies' program on the Idiot-Box changed to The Three Stooges and little Bobby stopped encouragingly fingering the sparse virgin growth on his upper lip.

"Look," he pointed. "I thought they were dead!"

His courtroom jesters, three musical gentlemen lurching upon a couch, thought this was very funny, dug each other in the kidneys, and broke into hysterical laughter. One was an elderly, grey-haired long-hair. Then there was a gaunt Italian and someone behind orange sunglasses all paying dutiful and awe-struck attention to the spoutings of their chief.

Turning his attention grudgingly away from the cartoons, little Bobby gave the room a vacant stare and asked:
"Why is everybody asking questions?"

Right on cue, laughs from the life-sized stooges.

What did he like?
"Nothing."

Where did he intend to go?
"Nowhere."

What did he think about the present?
"Little."

But if Mr. Dylan was nauseatingly boring in his studied 'act' of pseudointellectual vagueness, two open-mouthed fans in the doorway proved an interesting study. Awed, they sneaked in, hanging on their idol's words at first, but then slowly wondering.

As the ordeal continued, their jaws sagged visibly and they began to wear that stoic, blank-faced expression that usually comes from not quite comprehending.

And yet I'll bet my last pair of pants to a button that the same boys will tell their mates today: "Man, he was gas (sic), way out, a genius, a living genius man, real gas."

As for me, I would have dearly loved to ask the oracle if he used rollers or hairpins, but I was dying for a breath of fresh hair. So I stumbled out, raced down the stairs, rushed through the automatic double doors, breathed deeply the unadulterated, unpretentious, good clean air of King's Cross.

And for once it smelled like eau de cologne.

WHAT HAS HAPPENED TO BOB DYLAN
IN AN EXCLUSIVE INTERVIEW DYLAN ANSWERS QUESTIONS ALL HIS FANS (AND EX-FANS) WOULD LIKE TO ASK HIM

"Why did you come to Australia, Mr Dylan?" Someone asked.
"Well, ever since I was a little boy I had read about Australia. And I had this feeling of animosity and curiosity, you know? And I once had a friend who had an uncle who's cousin had a brother who knew someone who had heard of Australia so I decided to come and see for myself."

All the time the one-time king of folk-music talked, he rocked gently back and forward on the edge of his seat, rubbing his frail fingers together and only occasionally lifting his bleary eyes to meet the gaze of about thirty frantic reporters in the room. Maybe he was just tired, maybe it was the effect of being so high up there in the plane for so long.

The big question for folk fans is, of course, has Dylan really decided to denounce his early "social protest" songs? In Sydney he was reported as having said he was "not interested in such things no more". In Melbourne he told us the Sydney press did not understand the questions they had asked him, let alone understand the answers he gave! So what do you believe?

When asked about his private life Dylan replied
BD: I live among the sceptics.
Then you do not live in a world of reality, Bob.
BD: Living among the sceptics? That is the only real world. There's no real world, what is it?
Do you watch television, Bob?
BD: Yes, I watch Roy Rodgers.
Isn't that a bit below the intellect?
BD: It's not below mine. It might be below yours.
Are you changing your image?
BD: Yes. I'm sitting right here changing my image.
Do you see yourself as a social commentator or a pure entertainer?
BD: See myself? Do I see myself? I never see myself aright. I have no mirrors in my house.
Mr. Dylan, are you a happy man.
BD: Oh, yes.
A happy sceptic.
BD: A happy sceptic? Oh, I don't know what that word means really. I read it when I was in Sydney and I'm gonna use it.
Do you like traveling?
BD: No.
But you have said you like meeting people, surely you do this by travel?
BD: Oh no. You can sit in a room with four walls, and look at the walls, and know exactly what everybody's doing everywhere.
How important to your image are your clothes?

BD: My clothes and my hair are very conservative where I come from. I haven't seen anyone here with long hair.

Dylan was wearing charcoal grey and white pin-stripe trousers, a blue and white floral shirt, black suede boots, and a black high-collared jacket. His hair stuck inches above his head in loose strands and curls.

What is your greatest ambition?
BD: To become a meat cutter.
Would you care to enlarge on that?
BD: You mean a large piece of meat?
Do you see pop music undergoing a synthesis in the same direction as pop-art has in...
BD: (interrupting the questioner) Pop-art? Pop-art does not exist anymore. Pop-art lasted only three months.
What do you think of pop-art?
BD: Pop-art is the commercialization of soup-can labels.
What happened to it after three months?
BD: After three months people stopped painting soup-can labels. After three months people stopped buying paintings of soup-can labels. After three months people stopped buying soup! In fact, they picketed the supermarkets. I know, 'cause I was there.
Did you join the pickets, Bob?
BD: No, I was across the road buying a pack of cards.
What cards do you like, Bob?
BD: Oh, Jack of Diamonds, Ace of Spades.
No. What games?
BD: I don't know. You play it naked. That's the only part of my act I haven't got under control.
Were you drinking soup during the card game?
BD: Oh, no. But you have your mouth open all the while.
Why?
BD: It's a defence mechanism.
What do you think of Woody Guthrie?
BD: Woody Guthrie? I don't know him very well. He was a folk singer in the thirties. Ma Rainey is a better folk singer than he is. Alan Ginsberg is a better writer than he is. All his songs are on the surface.
What about your songs, Bob, are they on the surface?
BD: Oh... who knows. I don't know. They might be.
You came here to Australia for the money too, I take it?
BD: I take it.
What questions are you most seeking to answer?
BD: Questions? I'm not interested in questions.
Are you interested in answers?
BD: I'm not interested in answers. I'm a story-teller, that's all.
Are you a member of the Society for Non-Violence in America?
BD: No, no. You mean Joan Baez and all that? No.
But you gave them a substantial sum of money, didn't you?
BD: No. You've been completely misled.
When you were a young man, you ran away from home several times. Are you still running away from something?
BD: If I were running away I wouldn't be here.

And with that, Dylan and his band (together they presented a picture that makes the Rolling Stones look like conservative well-respected men about town) slunk into two huge black Buicks (with green-tinted windows) and were driven to their hotel.

Additional quotes from Bauldie's Ghost Of Electricity:

How would you describe yourself?

BD: I am a story-teller.

Is it a good thing or a bad thing that youngsters try to copy you?

BD: It's a thing.

How will you present yourself in concert?

BD: I play with my clothes on. That's the only part of my act that I haven't got under control yet. But I must admit it is not the right way to go about – with clothes on, I mean.

Robert Westfield & Jim Monaghan Interview, Sheraton Hotel, Melbourne, Australia

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 91-92

Taken from the article in the Australian magazine Go-Set of April 27 1966, and follows on immediately from a review of the Press Conference on April 17th (q. v.).

The next day, the first personal interview with Dylan in Australia took place on the tenth floor of the Hotel Sheraton. Present at this informal meeting were Bob Dylan, Robert Westfield (a young artist and photographer), Jim Monaghan (university student), Dylan's cousin Henry, and Al Grossman, Dylan's manager.

Dylan just sat like a puppet – his hair curly, eight inches high and filthy dirty. He was dressed like some weird doll, he wore a wild green-polka dot shirt, tight chalk-lined trousers and bare feet (we felt out of place, what with everyone else lying around in bare feet). At intervals Dylan would scratch all that hair with inch-long thumbnails. He wore a marcasite ring on the third finger of his right hand.

His eyes were just visible behind the pair of shades he was wearing, and he was wearing them because he was more than normally tired.

Dylan said (after ten minutes of saying "No"). "We're friends". And we sat down on the floor to talk. I first spoke to Dylan about his turn from songwriting to serious poetry, his future film and such diverse topics as communism, and a poet Dylan acclaims by the name of Shelton Aronowitz. We then began asking about pop music.

W/M: Do you rehearse for your concerts?
BD: No
W/M: What do you think of Jagger -Richard as songwriters?
BD: I don't think I like them.
W/M: Why is that?
BD: They say things – try to kid you – no, I don't like the Rolling Stones.
W/M: What do you think of their music?
BD: You hear too much of it. You get sick of it.
W/M: What about the material of Lennon-McCartney?
BD: Great! They started it all in England – they are honest, sincere in their own way.
W/M: What do you think of groups like the Beach Boys?
BD: They've been around too long.
W/M: What cause do you believe in?
BD: Cause? Cause? Oh ! *B*ecause.
W/M: Are you moved by the poetry of Yevtushenko?
BD: No.
W/M: Do you like to do concerts in Europe?
BD: I like to do them but I like to do them in Europe.
W/M: How do you feel about American R & B?
BD: That's all you hear back home. Since I was about eight, that's all I've heard.
W/M: Have you been influenced by any contemporary songwriters?
BD: No.
W/M: How do you feel about the particular vocabulary of American blues – the blues poetry.

BD: You might think it's a particular vocabulary, but back home they speak it on the streets.
W/M: Are you a poet first and a songwriter second?
BD: No, I don't think so. I've got to feed him now (pointing to cousin Henry who was in the corner stroking a TOY KOALA BEAR)
W/M: Give him some leaves, Bob.
BD: No, I mean feed cousin Henry who's holding the bear.
W/M: Have all the tickets been sold for your concerts?
BD: I hope not.

I talked to Dylan for another twenty minutes before Grossman broke up the party. Dylan spoke to me freely as he would to anyone not trying to send him up. He's kind and pathetic, but listen to his Desolation Row and Visions of Johanna and the words speak for themselves. But what about Rainy Day Women -whatever-it-is?

THE QUESTIONS FLEW

It was a hot, crowded conference at the airport. Radio interviewers, cameramen and reporters – and many followers who had sneaked in – jostled in suffocatingly on top of Bob Dylan.

Somebody thrust forward a copy of Antoine de Saint Exupery's book "The Little Prince" to be autographed.

One interviewer prattled on about a visit to Healesville Sanctuary. Another wanted "approval" for a technique used by the Beatles.

Questions – likes, dislikes, psychological, sociological, racial equality, bourgeois living, pop art and ballads – some silly, some provocative and some just insulting.

Beneath his mop of shaggy hair, Dylan, the acclaimed "king of folk music," rocked backwards and forwards on his feet as if feeling faint from the onslaught. His voice was barely audible.

Some of the queries he threw back at the questioners, others he shrugged off as if they weren't worth the physical effort of answering, and for a few he wove long answers of fairyland fancy from the beat world – nonsensical, but sharply amusing.

PATIENCE

When it was all over, enterpreneur Ken Brodziak breathed deeply: "Thank goodness he kept his patience."

If anybody has been tempted to lose his patience, it was Dylan.

His unusual appearance and thorny individualism make him the butt for conservative censure.

On the other hand, he finds himself subject to many long and far too "clever" analytical profiles in the glossier magazines.

Dylan tries without conceit to explain that he's a "watcher," embroiled in nothing. He's a talented writer, composer and singer with a sensitive touch for interpreting the feelings of the moment.

But the publicity people these days demand non-conformists who are conforming non-conformists.

Dylan arrived in Adelaide, South Australia, on Thursday the 21st of April. Contemporary newspaper accounts suggest that the press conference was unorganised and really no more than a series of encounters with various TV and radio crews. Parts of one of those interviews are still extant, and the following appears to be that which was conducted by Roger Cardwell for radio. There are interjections from other questioners.

RC: Do you think you can sing well?

BD: ...I feel I sing great. Most people underestimate my voice, but left alone in an empty room I can sing better than anybody else.

RC: How do you get on in a hall with a lot of people?

BD: Well, it's a hard question to answer. I've had voice training you know. I just sing in front of the microphones in the hall and it rings, you know. That's all. I depend on microphones in the full hall. That's a different circumstance., though, you know.

RC: Who's the man that you first got the folk cycle, or the folk kick, from? It was Woody Guthrie, wasn't it? You were a sort of devotee of Woody Guthrie?

BD: It was Hank Williams.

RC: It was Hank Williams? But he was more a cowboy sort of singer was he?

BD: No, he was a country and western singer.

RC: Well, I understand that you are a devotee of Woody Guthrie nevertheless. Is that right?

BD: Well, I know who Woody Guthrie is. I listen to his music. I even got wrapped up in the idea of him for a certain time, but not a long time, not a long time at all. No more time than, you know, I would take to learn one of his songs really.

RC: Oh, I see. I understood that you were more wrapped up in him than that, and that... Woody never ever became sort of commercial. I just wondered what his attitude would be to your...

BD: He never became commercial because he got sick. I'd be wondering what his attitude would be today if he was around.

RC: Would you say that Negroes are better musicians than the white race?

BD: Yeah, they used to be, but I don't think so any more.

RC: Now why is this? Do you think that you're up there with them?

BD: No. Most of them go to colleges now. Most of them now live in the suburbs. A lot of them do, not most of them. Negro music used to be great music 'cause it was all poverty music, you know. There wasn't any pick and choice. There wasn't any great ones, they were all great. But now I must know myself, I must know, a hundred white people who can sing blues better than two hundred Negroes.

Tape disruption.

...a lot of people are paranoid and a lot of people are afraid, and they have to prejudge things. They can't go to sleep at night unless they satisfy themselves, their minds. They have to talk at the table, you know. They have to verify their paranoia. They have to pre-judge everything. Most people do pre-judge me, but there's nothing extra special about that. Most people pre-judge everything.

RC: It's been said that you can't sing, actually, that the words are the main thing. Would you agree with this at all?

BD: No, I happen to be a very good singer sir. I happen to be an excellent singer.

RC: What about the lyrics you write? Do you think that's more important, or the singing?
BD: My voice.
RC: You like your voice?
BD: Yes sir. I'm a singer. That's why I'm here – to sing. These songs, I just happened to write them.
RC: Do you sit down and think what you're writing, or do you just go ahead and write?
BD: I've answered that question to the television camera.
RC: We didn't hear that. Can you repeat it?
BD: Watch it on television.
RC: This is radio. We wondered if you'd like to answer for this medium.
BD: I answered on the television. I can't...
RC: Which medium do you prefer, radio or TV?
BD: I prefer, er, movies really.
RC: You prefer the movies? Have you any chance of doing a movie?
BD: Any chance of doing a movie? You'll have to ask other people about that. I'm not...
RC: Would you be keen to do a movie yourself?
BD: Would I be keen? What does that mean?
RC: Would you be interested in doing a movie?
BD: I'd be interested to do a movie. I think I'd be very keen, yeah.
RC: At what stage in your life, Bob, did you find this was the sort of thing you wanted to do? I mean. Has it always been that way, or did it just seem to happen?
BD: Always been that way. Course it does.
RC: How do you know that certain feelings that you... you don't want to communicate with people do you really?
BD: No.
RC: What actually do you want to do
BD: Nothing.
RC: You'd rather do nothing, but you're sort of singing because you have to?
BD: I don't have any job that I have to do. I mean. I have nobody that's bossing me. I don't have any assignments, you understand. I don't have anything which I have to get done because I'm gonna lose something, you know. I just have nothing like that.
RC: You feel somewhat restrained? You want something?
BD: No, no. You know, if people are nice to me, I'm nice to them, but if people got something else out the back of their minds, I can destroy 'em.
RC: What, with your songs and lyrics, you mean?
BD: No, destroy 'em. Sit here and destroy 'em.
RC: What about your parents? Do you feel anything towards your parents? Some people say...
BD: I have no contact with my parents. I've never had contact with my parents.
RC: Do you miss this at all?
BD: Miss this? I've never had it.
RC: You never had it?
BD: Are you trying to make me out to be some kind of rebel – James Dean?
RC: No. I just wondered what do you think about other teenagers? Do you think it's a good idea for them to...
BD: I never was a teenager. I never played football, basketball, soccer. I never went to, you know track meets. I never had good grades in school. I never was in the honor society. I never graduated with high degrees. I never took an interest in anything, you know. There just was none there. I didn't know it, that's all.
RC: Well, what is success Bob, really, do you think?
BD: Success?
RC: What is it really?
BD: I don't know. What do you think it is? Are you successful?
RC: Well, I'm supposed to be, in my field.

BD: Well, I'm supposed to be in my field too.
RC: What is it? Money or something? I don't know. I would say it's satisfaction.
BD: I want to hear your words.
RC: Alright. My words are success is having real satisfaction in the job you're doing. Do you agree?
BD: Do I agree? Well, I agree, I guess. Sounds fine. You said it, I didn't.
RC: Do you make money a yardstick, or doesn't it matter to you at all, money?
BD: Make money a yardstick?
RC: In life, do you think that having a lot of money is a good thing or doesn't it really worry you at all having... I mean, you must have a lot of money by singing the songs you do. Do you sing songs because you can make some money out of this, or do you sing them just because you like to sing the songs, and money doesn't mean anything at all?
BD: I consider that an insult, sir.

21 April 1966
Press Conference, Adelaide Airport

Source: the Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1007-1008.

Dylan arrived in Adelaide, South Australia, on Thursday the 21st of April. Contemporary newspaper accounts suggest that the press conference was unorganised and really no more than a series of encounters with various TV and radio crews. This version which appeared in the Adelaide University Newspaper On Dit, provides a different perspective on the proceedings.

DYLAN AND THE PRESS GANG

"Y'know, if people're nice t' me, I'm nice t' them. But if people got somethin' else in the back of their minds, I can destroy 'em!

So said Mr. Zimmerman, alias Bob Dylan, as he continued mentally vivisecting his interviewers at the Press Conference in the South Australian Hotel on the day before his concert. Up until that conference, I had never had any particular thoughts about Dylan or his music. I had heard the man and his music discussed in several quarters. I had heard him damned and deified. And all this simply passed in and out of my mind at the same rate as other apparently superfluous material. However, when he entered the room in a quietly spectacular fashion, with a flowing retinue of folky bums, he could be ignored no longer.

A puff of smoke, exhaled from the region of a small, pale, bony face, announced the arrival of his diminutive figure, fashionably draped in pin stripes, corduroy and suede. Dylan gave the impression that he had just spent two or three hours staring at the reflection of his semi-dazed pupils and sagging eyelids in the mirror, and anxiously teasing his hair into the knotted, sweaty mass of curls that now bobbed into sight.

The significantly perceptible silence over, lights, cameras and microphones swung into action, and Dylan was speaking... or rather mumbling unconcernedly. My impressions of Dylan were formed in the space of half an hour, from his handling of the Press, his tone of voice, general attitude and appearance, and can perhaps best be conveyed through quoting a series of comments he made to different members of radio and television staff:

PRESS: What made you decide on this sort of music for your career?

DYLAN: It's all I can do. I can't do anything else.

PRESS: We've heard a lot about you protesting about this, that and the other. Naturally you're entitled to say you're not protesting, but your lyrics suggest that there's an air of protest.

DYLAN: Well, if they do... they do. If you wanna think they are, I'm not gonna argue.

PRESS: Deep down, you must have convictions about...

DYLAN: Nah! Deep down, there's nothin' but guts, intestines.

The reporter had approached Dylan with an air of superiority and proceeded to attempt to rubbish the man by pretending that Dylan could not understand his questions. However, on this occasion, as on all others Dylan was in a position of power and knew it. He was the master in charge. Thus, faced with the opportunity to play with the Press and their inane little questions, he did just that.

He likes playing with words – especially when they can be used to play with people.

He searched for ambiguity in the questions asked him and deliberately misinterpreted them. He feigned ignorance, necessitating the repetition and rephrasing of many questions. And he picked up sentences and threw them back at his interviewers, often achieving satisfying results...

On some occasions, when someone stumbled across something that interested him, he would perhaps take the matter seriously, as when he was asked as to how, precisely, did he write his poetry, Dylan said, "I write the same way I drink a glass of water. You know, if you're thirsty, you drink a glass of water. If you're hungry, you eat. That's how I write."

One couldn't help feeling that the Press were unimpressed. They were also embarrassed and hurt to a certain extent... that is, if their 'ers' and 'ahs' and sudden blushes were any indication. And yet, on the other hand, I'm sure he was justified in his action. He doesn't care about his image particularly. He doesn't really need to. When asked whether he liked money, he replied, "Yeh. I don't dislike makin' money." And again, in reply to the question, "What do you want to do with your money" he said, "I wanna do all the great things you're supposed to do with it. I can't spend it all. I don't know what to spend it on."

Dylan is extremely perceptive, with a weird sense of humour. He is certainly not dumb, though he may be immature in many ways, in his blatant display of selfishness and in the way he inadvertently revealed himself through his attempts to hide, and to confuse the press.

During one brief outburst, in answer to a question bearing on his early life and his opinion of teenagers today, Dylan said, "I never was a teenager. I never played football, basketball, soccer. I never was at trackmeets. I never got good grades at school. I never was in the Honors Society. I never graduated in high degrees. I never took an interest in anything." His tone of voice could have been interpreted as regretful and bitter or defiant. It didn't matter. He didn't care.

I liked Bob. I couldn't help it. The press conference was a ludicrous and tedious affair, and in my opinion he handled it with skill...

Press Conference, Perth

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 645-646.

This was the final Press conference of the Australian leg of the 1966 World Tour. It took place at Perth Airport just after Dylan flew in from Adelaide. Snippets of the proceedings were captured in this article by John Cornell which appeared in the Perth Daily News. Dylan was to perform that night at the Perth Capitol Theatre.

His hair looks like a home-perm gone wrong. It stands up in sheer terror, curls, crinkles, knots, twines and lumps and looks worse, possibly, than Medusa's. The man with the hair -Mr. Bob Dylan, the American song-writing rage. Dressed in pin-striped trousers, a polka-dotted ill-fitting shirt – and with bare feet – he had several things to say at a Press conference today after his arrival by air from the Eastern States.

This is a sample of what I managed to salvage in a mass interview conversed in a series of grunts, huhs, slurred sentences and occasional silences.

How do you write your songs?
BD: They just come-out.

Why do you write?
BD: People get thirsty they drink, people get hungry they eat. When I get hungry I write.

Does this mean you never eat before writing?
BD: I would never write before eating and I never write on Fridays or Tuesday nights.

Are you a protest singer? (He's been billed as an artist of protest).
BD: No. I protest against nothing. I'm not interested in racial troubles, or war, or nothing.

How much money have you made?
BD: Seventy-five billion.

What do you think of the war in Vietnam?
BD: Nothing. It's Australia's war.

But Americans are there.
BD: They're just helping the Australians.

Some people call you a genius. Do you agree with them?
BD: No, they're just people who haven't any grandparents.

You say you don't want to be thought of as an oddball. Why do you wear clothes like that and long hair?
BD: My clothes are traditional. Why do you wear short hair?

What interests you?
BD: Nothing.

There was more. It was a lie that he didn't wash his hair or clean his teeth. ("I have four sets of teeth").

26 April 1966
Stockholm Press Conference

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1009-1010.

Dylan's first European press conference of the 1966 tour was conducted at a restaurant in the Flamingo Hotel in Solna, a suburb of Stockholm. A tape exists with just three questions and answers and this has been published already in the March 1982 edition of Endless Road. Heylin (Stolen Moments) refers to some additional questions and a lot more, cobbled together from local press reports, have been described by Bauldie (The Ghost Of Electricity). I've used all three sources, relying most heavily on John Bauldie's account.

Q: Say, How do you manage to get your trousers this wrinkled? I mean, do you make them that way?
BD: My trousers? No, these're just pre... I just, had them pressed last week. I don't understand.
Q: Do you trust reporters?
BD: Well, you know I don't... you know I don't. I mean, if you wanna believe what you read. I mean nobody believes what they read. You know... I mean even if you're a reporter you don't believe what you read.
Q: Where do you get your inspiration?
BD: Oh, you know, everything I've ever done in my life and everything I've ever seen. That's all. It's as simple as that.
Q: Would you describe yourself as a protest singer!
BD: No, I'm not a protest singer. In the USA I haven't been called a protest singer since I was a little boy. I sing ordinary mathematical songs.
Q: What does that mean?
BD: Mathematics? It's things like adding, subtracting, dividing, multiplying. The songs are a result of hunger and thirst.
Q: Hunger? At 50,000 krowns a night?
BD: No. But then again I don't write as much as I used to.
Q: Don't you think that 40 krowns a ticket to the concert is very expensive?
BD: Uh? Do people think that it's expensive? OK, I'll check out how much I cost tomorrow.
Q: Is it true that you give money to the US Civil Rights movement?
BD: No, not at all.
Q: Do you earn a lot of money?
BD: Oh yes, an awful lot of money. I don't know exactly how much but I must have saved up about 75 billion dollars by now. I have it sewed up in my jacket, and I never spend it. I'm saving it all up to buy Australia.
Q: Aren't there political messages in some of your songs? 'Hard Rain' or 'World War III Blues' for example?
BD: Not at all. I don't care about politics.
Q: Do you have a message?
BD: No. Do you?
Q: What's your opinion of the Green Berets, the US special forces in Vietnam?
BD: I was thinking of joining them if they want me.
Q: What sort of music do you like?
BD: I like Ravel, Bartok, Beethoven, people like that.
Q: Do you like any of the protest singers who imitate you?
BD: No. Have you heard me sing?
Q: No, I haven't.

BD: Doesn't it feel strange to sit there asking questions about something you don't know anything about?

Q: The literary critics in places like Harvard say that you're a talented poet.

BD: In Hollywood?

Q: Harvard.

BD: Well, they're just about the same thing. Let them talk.

Q: They say you're very intellectual.

BD: Oh really? Well, that's OK I guess.

Q: What do you think of literary analysis of your songs?

BD: Well, that's just fine. I wish I got paid for saying that.

Q: Who are your favorite writers?

BD: Oh, Freddie McFarland, Muggsy Michaelson, Eddie Condor. You ever heard of them? I like Ingmar Bergman.

Q: If someone were to make a movie of your life, who would you like to play the title part?

BD: Oh, Tony Curtis, or Frankie Avalon – yeah, Frankie Avalon. We started to negotiate with Brigitte Bardot about playing a part, but we haven't got an answer yet. We once had a plan that Lenny Bruce should play my mother and Kruschev my father, but Kruschev wouldn't do it. You wanna hear my life story? Maybe we could meet some night in a dark alley and I'll tell it to you.

Q: Do you like Western movies?

BD: Oh sure. I am a cowboy.

Q: What do you think of sick humor?

BD: What's that exactly? Hubert Humphrey?

Q: How often do you comb your hair?

BD: Every time I'm in the bathroom. About every other day.

Q: Why is your hair so long?

BD: Well, most people know that it's warmer if you have long hair, and everybody wants to feel warm. If you think about it you'll realise that your hair is in your head; all around your brain. Mathematically speaking, the more of it that comes out the better. A lot of people who'd like to think more open-mindedly don't realise that it's easier to do that if your brain isn't smothered in hair.

Q: What are your plans for the future?

BD: My plans for the future? To make more money!

Klas Burling Interview, Stockholm, Sweden

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 379-383.

Immediately after the official press conference at the Hotel Flamingo at Stockholm, Dylan was interviewed for Swedish Radio 3: Stockholm: Radiohuset by Sweden's first disc jockey, Klas Burling. Burling asked all the questions that Dylan had clearly grown sick and tired of hearing and got a really hard time as a result. You have to give poor Burling credit for lasting the distance and carrying the interview through to the end.
Taken from the circulating tape.

KB: Very nice to see you in Stockholm Bob Dylan and, er, I wonder now when you're in Stockholm if you could explain a bit more about yourself and your kind of songs. What do you think of the kind of protest song tag?

BD: I don't, uh,... my, oh God. No (laughing). No. I'm not, I'm not gonna sit here and do that I've, uh, you know, I've been up all night, I've taken some pills and I've eaten bad food and I've read about wrong things and I've been out for hundred mile an hour car rides and, uh, I'm just not gonna sit here and talk about myself as a protest singer or anything like that.

KB: So, but, the first things you did, I mean which got really famous on singles and things like that – for example, in England they released The Times They Are A Changin' – that was supposed to be a protest song, no?

BD: Oh my God. How long ago was that?

KB: A year ago.

BD: Yeah, well. I mean, come on, a year ago! I'm not trying to be a bad fellow or anything, but I just, you know – I'd just be a liar or a fool to go on with all this, all this business. I mean, I just can't help it if you're a year behind you know.

KB: No, but that's the style. That's the style you had then and then suddenly you changed to Subterranean Homesick Blues with the electric guitars and things. Is there any special reason, I mean, the way you would tell about it yourself.

BD: No.

KB: No?

BD: No.

KB: What would you call yourself, a poet or a singer, or do you think that you write poems and then you put music to it?

BD: No, I don't know. It's so silly! I mean, you can't... well, you wouldn't ask these questions of a carpenter, would you? Or a plumber?

KB: It would not be interesting the same way, would it?

BD: I guess it would be. I mean, if it's interesting to me... it should be just as interesting to you.

KB: Well, not as being a disc-jockey anyhow.

BD: What do you think Mozart would say to you if you ever come up to him and ask him the questions that you've been asking, you know? What kind of questions would you ask him, you know, 'Tell me, Mr. Mozart... '

KB: Well, first of all, I wouldn't do it.

BD: Well, how come you do it to me?

KB: Well, because I'm interested in your records and I think the Swedish audiences is as well.

BD: Well, I'm interested in the Swedish audiences too and Swedish people and all that kind of stuff, but I'm sure they don't wanna know all these dumb things, you know.

KB: No, well, they've read a lot of dumb things about you in the papers then I suppose, and I thought you could straighten them out yourself.

BD: I can't straighten them out. I don't think they have to be straightened out. I know... I believe that they know. They know. Don't you know the Swedish people? I mean, they don't have to be told, they don't have to be explained to. I mean, you should know that. I mean Swedish people just don't have to be explained... they don't, you know. You can't tell Swedish people something which is self-explanatory. Swedish people are smarter than that.

KB: Do you think so?

BD: Oh, oh of course.

KB: Do you know any Swedes?

BD: I know plenty. I happen to be a Swede myself.

KB: Oh yeah, certainly.

BD: I happen to come from not too far away from here, my friend.

KB: Should we try to listen to a song instead?

BD: We can try.

KB: Yeah? Which one would you suggest then?

BD: Uh, you pick one out, any one you say. You realize I'm not trying to be a bad fellow. I'm just trying to make it along and have a nice... get everything to be straight, you realize that?

KB: Yeah, and that's why I asked you, and you had a chance to do it yourself.

BD: No, I don't want a chance to do it myself.

KB: OK.

BD: I don't wanna do anything by myself... for what?

KB: Or against what?

BD: Well, you know what it's against and what it's for. I don't need to tell you that. It's for, for you know, it's for... well, it's for... well, you know my songs are all mathematical songs. Now, you know what that means so I'm not gonna have to go into that specifically here. It happens to be a protest song.... and it borders on the mathematical, you know, idea of things, and this one specifically happens to be... Rainy Day Women happens to deal with a minority of, you know, cripples and orientals and, uh, you know, and the world in which they live, you realize, you know, you understand, you know. It's another sort of a North Mexican kind of a thing, uh, very protesty. Very, very protesty. And, uh, one of the protestiest of all things I ever protested against in my protest years. But, uh...

KB: Do you really believe it?

BD: Do I believe it?

KB: Yeah.

BD: I don't have to believe it, I know it. I wrote it! I mean, I'm telling you I wrote it! I should know!

KB: Yeah. Why that title? It's never mentioned in the song.

BD: Well, we never mention things that we love. And that's, where I come from that is, that's blasphemy, blas-per-for-me, you know that word? Blas-per-for-me?

KB: Yeah.

BD: It has to do with God.

KB: Shall we have a listen to the song?

BD: OK.

KB: Which is selling quite well in the States. How do you feel about that?

BD: It's, it's, it's horrible.

KB: It is?

BD: Yeah. I don't wanna, uh... because it is a protest song. Protest songs, really, shouldn't really, uh, we shouldn't really listen to protest songs.

KB: Well, I see it in the way that a lot of people buy the record and listen to it, the radio stations and so on. So a lot of people could get the message in that case.

BD: Yeah. They do get the message. I'm glad they're getting the message. That was a good record too, huh?

KB: How do you feel about earning a lot of money then, if you're not really concerned about it all?

BD: I like earning a lot of money.

KB: From the start you didn't have much, but now you got a lot. What do you do with it?

BD: Nothing.

KB: Not concerned?

BD: No, I don't really... somebody else handles it for me, you know. I just do, you know, the same old things.

KB: When you write a song, do you write the melody or the words first?

BD: Um, I write it all, you know, I write it all, the melody and the words.

KB: At the same time?

BD: Yeah. Uh, the melody is sort of unimportant really. It comes natural, you know.

KB: The very start, other artists used your songs and recorded them and got hits and things like that. How did you feel about that?

BD: Well, I didn't feel anything really. I felt happy, you know.

KB: Do you like to suddenly get famous then, first as a songwriter and then also as a singer?

BD: Uh, yeah. It's all, it's sort of all over though, you know? I don't have any interests any more. I did have interests when I was 13, 14, 15 to be a famous star and all that kind of stuff, but, I been playing, you know, on the stage, following, you know, tent shows around ever since I've been ten, ten years old. That's fifteen years I've been doing what I've been doing. I mean, I know I'm doing better than anybody else does.

KB: And nowadays, what is it you want to do?

BD: Nothing.

KB: Nothing?

BD: No.

KB: Do you enjoy traveling? Performing?

BD: Yeah. I like performing. I don't care to travel, though.

KB: What about recordings?

BD: I like to record.

KB: You got a group now, which I suppose you didn't have at the very start.

BD: Yes, I had a group at the very start. You must realize I come from the United States, you know. I don't know if you know what the United States is like. It's not like England at all. The people at my age now, you know, 25, 26, at this age, like they've all ... everybody has grown up, you know, playing rock n' roll music.

KB: Did you do that?

BD: Yes, I mean, 'cause it's the only kind of music you heard. I mean everybody has done it, you know, 'cos all you heard was rock n' roll and country and western and rhythm and blues music. Now, now at a certain time it's just the whole field got taken over into, into, into some milk, you know – into Frankie Avalon, Fabian and, you know, this kind of thing. That's not bad or anything, but it was just... there was nobody really that you could look at, and to really want anything that they had or wanna be like them, you know? So everybody got out of it. And I remember, you know, when everybody got out of it. But nobody really lost that whole thing. And then folk music came in and was some kind of substitute for a while, but it was only a substitute don't you understand? And that's all it was. Now it's different again, because of the English thing. The English thing... what the English thing did was, they just proved that you could make money, you now, at playing, you know, the same old kind of music that you used to play, and that's the truth. You know that's not a lie. It's not a come-on or anything. But, uh, you know the English people can't play rock n' roll music.

KB: How do you feel about the Beatles then?
BD: Oh, the Beatles are great, but they don't play rock n' roll.
KB: You met them quite a few times, as well in the States and in England.
BD: Yeah. I know the Beatles. They're not playing...
KB: You don't think they play rock n' roll anyhow?
BD: No, they don't play rock n' roll. They're more like... Rock n' roll is just four beats... rock n' roll is an extension of 12-bar blues. And it's a white, you know, white 17-year-old kid music. And it's kid music, that's all it is. That's what rock n' roll is. Rock n' roll is a fake, uh, fake kind of attempt at sex, you know.
KB: But what would you call your style then? The music you sing?
BD: I don't know. I've never heard anybody that plays or sings like me, so I don't know.
KB: There's no name for it that you would try to put on it yourself?
BD: Mathematical music.
KB: Yeah? OK. If you would like to choose a last, final song for this interview.
BD: You choose it.
KB: There's none in particular that you would like more than another one?
BD: No. Well, I'd rather have you play, you know, Tombstone Blues than Pretty Peggy-O! But, other than that, you know, I'll let you make your own choice.
KB: OK. Thanks a lot then.

Pi Ann Tillman-Murray Interview, Stockholm, Sweden

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 821-824.

On April 28th 1966, Bob gave his first European press conference at the restaurant of the Hotel Flamingo in Solna, a suburb of Stockholm. After the press conference was over he continued discussions with a small group of journalists elsewhere within the hotel. Later, in his suite, he played an acetate of Blonde On Blonde. Pi Ann Tillman-Murray was there in her capacity as reporter for the Swedish magazine Idolnytt. She was actually filmed by Pennebaker and appeared in Eat The Document (a scene in the bathroom of this same hotel suite). Throughout the evening he showed the author parts of the manuscript for Tarantula, which, to her, seemed to be a very important project for him at the time.

Tillman-Murray's article was originally published (in Swedish) in the summer of 1966 and later reprinted in Bob Dylan In Sweden, a limited edition booklet by Lars Hols (Good Ol Records Production No. 1.)

BOB DYLAN – an angry orphan with a starved cherub face, framed by a lot of curly hair. Husky voice etching itself into the marrow of well fed members of the Welfare State.

We know his songs – but what's the man behind them like? How does it feel to get thousands of dollars for only one gig, to have a documentary film maker with himself all the time, to always be looked at, written about?

IDOLNYTT followed Bob Dylan during his stay in Stockholm, and here comes the report:

We came to the restaurant well before he was due to meet the enormous lot of journalists, photographers and people from the Swedish Radio and TV.

After having sat there for a good while, we suddenly noticed the veritable avalanche of long haired guys in jeans, and in their midst, Bob Dylan. He was placed by a table with a soft drink and microphones in front of him, and people started asking. He answered sometimes patiently, sometimes in a crazy way if there were silly questions like "How often do you wash your hair, Mr Dylan?"

It's almost unbearably hot, partly due to the strong lamps used by Bob's film photographer. The idea is to make a one hour film of his tour for the American program "Spectacular" which is going to be sent from coast to coast.

When the press conference comes to an end, Bob and his group return to their hotel, and I bump into him in the lobby. He looks at IDOLNYTT, and I try calling our photographer by way of telepathy, but, alas, in vain.

I make small talk with Mickey, the drummer and when Bob and his friends are going to the bar they ask me to join them.

Bob, his manager, Albert Grossman, a 50-year-old graying long-haired beatnik, Mike Risvole, Tito Burn's representative, and yours truly want tea. But that can't be arranged. What we can have, though, is brandy – with tea. So there we are with four shots of brandy that nobody wants... sorry, three. Al Grossman poured his out on the carpet!

Bob's sitting there and silently sipping his tea, until he turns to me and says, do I want to be in the TV-film? I swallow five times and manage a feeble "Yes, of course". Then he is silent again, for half an hour or so. At last we start moving. The filming is going to take place in the bathroom adjacent to Bob's hotel suite, and my contribution consists in me washing my hands, speaking Swedish, while Bob jogs around the bath tub speaking English. I feel rather nervous, but smile bravely and wash myself with unflinching vigor.

When this has been going on for roughly fifteen minutes, Bob says "this will do", and asks me to make some tea. He's had enough foresight to buy tea bags, and there's a kitchenette in the suite.

So I make tea for twelve people, trying to look like that was my favorite pastime at 12.30 in the night.

Bob talks all the time. Most about music, but also of his childhood in Minnesota.

- There were a lot of Swedes where I lived, and I used to see a girl whose father was from Sweden. He shot at me with a shot-gun when I wanted to meet his daughter. Strange people, the Swedes...
- Then there was another Swedish family who had a sauna. I took a sauna there once. First you went in, and everybody brought stones that they poured water on, and newspapers they read, and then just let fall on the floor. Think of it, what a groovy sight a newspaper makes when it's been on a sauna floor for two years! They brought food too, and put it all over the place.
- It was cool, real cool. You could feel yourself getting lighter when all the dirt crawled out of you like big grey worms. You got so clean that you almost went flying. And you shrunk. You got smaller and smaller. In the end I was near a breakdown, and they then dragged me out in the snow. I yelled of course. It was nearly 30 degrees Centigrade outside. I wasn't allowed in again, they just kept rolling me in the snow until I was practically dead. Then I got pneumonia and was sick for a month and a half.

Bob's playing records. First his new one then a strange recording of Indians in northern Mexico. It's terribly late, and he asks me to make some more tea. So I make tea for five persons.

It's getting light outside, the sky is almost sky blue. Cautiously, I take out my camera and start taking pictures, Bob doesn't react.

People have started taking off, and I feel like it's getting time to leave. I make tea for three and wave farewell to Bob, who's changed his clothes for the fourth time. I promise to accompany him to do some shopping at eleven the following day, if my tasks at the magazine will allow it.

Home. Three hours of sleep, then I do some rather crummy lay-outs, for Unilla, the lay-out girl from Halmstad (a small town in the south of Sweden). It gets to be eleven o clock, and I realize that I won t have the time.

At last it's eight o clock – time for the concert.

The stage is empty of people. A set of drums, an electric organ and three microphones is all there is to see. The Concert Hall of Stockholm is packed, everybody's waiting for something to happen in the spotlight.

The curtains are moving. Bob's coming out, and he is met by a big applause. He looks very small on the big stage. He tunes his guitar, drinks some water from the glass on the table beside the mic. One has a feeling that he's doing these small things in order to postpone the moment of beginning his performance.

I'm sure that many, at least subconsciously, are asking themselves whether maybe he's a nobody, someone who's got his position thanks to smart managers, clever PR-people. Then he acts "difficult" because it's paying. That he's chosen protest songs because it's rewarding economically. This is what we think while Bob adjusts the mouth organ in its holder.

The first note is out of tune, hesitating. Then he braces himself, looking down at the guitar as if to get support. He closes his eyes, becomes a medium for the song which presses itself out of his throat, painfully, relentlessly.

One second he looks like a Belsen prisoner, the other his cheeks are round like those of a choir-boy. His hair makes his halo, further accentuated by the blinding light from the spotlights that seem able to burn to shreds the spindly little form on the stage.

And do we recognize the songs. We've heard them ever so many times, when playing his records, or on the radio. We had the possibility of switching him off if we didn't feel like listening. But here he can't be switched off. Nobody would want to anyway. The text has become alive, it isn't just a string of well chosen words any longer, meandering round the melody.

Everybody in the Concert Hall holds their breath, frowning in concentration, eyes glued to this tiny human being down there in the floodlights, singing of the injustices and meanness in our world.

Deafening applauds. It feels wrong, somehow. There ought to be a silence so that all of us might get the time to think, to digest the words, incorporate them with our own selves.

And then comes the interval. People go out to have a coke, but are considerably more subdued than usually.

Bob's band has invaded the stage with their electric guitars, organ and drums. But this must surely be wrong. How on earth could Bob Dylan's message get to us through the din of loudspeakers, the throbs of drums?

They start at once, and you realize that you were wrong again. The only way is just to let yourself go, to listen, absorb, follow Bob when he sings Desolation Row with the microphone cable trailing after him.

So at last the concert is over. A lonely spotlight shines on the curtain where they just disappeared. The applauds seem never ending. The spotlight expires. Bob Dylan doesn't linger on the stage. It is now empty of people.

A set of drums, an electric organ and three microphones is all there is to see.

30 April 1966
Press Conference, Vedbaek, Denmark

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1011-1012.

After arriving in Denmark on April 30th 1966, Dylan proceeds to Vedbaek, a town about 20 miles North of Copenhagen, to conduct a Press Conference at the Hotel Marina. Parts of this gathering are shown in Eat The Document. Like many of these 1966 Press Conferences where there are no really accurate transcripts, I have used the composite version suggested by John Bauldie in his Ghost Of Electricity.

What do you think of your audience?

BD: Which audience?

When do you write your songs?

BD: I write when I'm alone. When I'm with a lot of people I'm so alone that I have to sing my songs to find out if it's reality.

What do you do when you want to have fun?

BD: Sex. I'm a sex maniac!

Who tells you what to do?

BD: The Bell Telephone Company. The telephone rings and I do what I'm told to do.

Are there times when you can't stand yourself?

BD: How could that be possible? I don't know myself. I don't know who I am. There's a mirror on the inside of my dark glasses, otherwise I don't interfere with my own private life.

Are you married?

BD: I'd be lying if I answered that question, whatever I told you. You'd make me tell lies and you wouldn't want that would you?

What matters to you?

BD: I won't tell you. My head begins to hurt when I try to put feelings into words.

Have you ever been in the army?

BD: No. My feet hurt when I think about soldiers.

Why did you laugh at the start of Bob Dylan's 115th Dream on your LP?

BD: I don't remember... Well, wait a bit... Yeah... somebody entered the studio disguised, looking like my mother. Yes, that was it. I just started laughing.

Who are your friends?

BD: I haven't got any friends. I've always been looking for some, but I never found any.

Does the amount of money you're earning now mean much to you?

BD: I don't care about money. Nothing has changed me. I'm not a prophet. I don't care how much money I make, only you do. I don't spend my money on cars and boats and castles like an idiot, but people look at me like a poor fool. Well so I am, a man of the people.

Have you ever belonged to a political party?
BD: No.

Are you interested in politics?
BD: No. The Oracle in Delphi was political wasn't it? And people who write horoscopes make money, OK? I'm a song, not a singer.

It would seem that Bob asked as many questions of the Press as they asked of him if the following report in Land og Folk (3 May 1966), the Danish Communist daily newspaper, is anything to go by.

Having held many press conferences, Bob Dylan has learned that most of the journalists who turn up don't know the slightest thing about his music, his art, and that consequently meaningful dialogue with them is impossible. The questions that are directed towards him are usually pointless. "What do you think of Danish girls? Where are you going after this concert? Where have you just come from, and how was it there?"

When these and similar questions came raining in on Bob Dylan in the first ten minutes of the press conference, it all got too much for him. He took out a notebook and pencil himself and asked the nearest reporter: "Incidentally, when does the sun rise in this country?" The reporter replied, somewhat taken aback. Dylan nodded. "Very interesting – I see – yes" and eagerly wrote it all down. Then he turned to another reporter and asked him when the sun sets, again carefully jotting down his answer. Then he asked a third question:

"And this castle, where Hamlet lived, Kronborg, how long will it take to get there on horseback? You don't know? What do you know?"

"And your favorite music" he asked a woman reporter. "What's your favorite music?" "Beethoven," she replied in a cultured voice, "I'm very fond of Beethoven's Symphonies." "Yes, but I was thinking more of your favorite music," Dylan continued. "But it is Beethoven," the woman repeated rather brusquely. "Oh come on," said Dylan, "what's your favorite music?"

Dylan's parody of a press conference was perfect, but the journalists were furious at the end of it all. "Who does he think he is," some of them muttered.

Sven Wezelenburg had this to say about his brief encounter with Bob at the so-called Copenhagen Press Conference on May 1st 1966. The meeting was reported in New Musical Express on May 13th 1966.

SW: Are you married and to whom?
BD: If I answered that question I'd lie to you. You don't want me to be a liar.
SW: Why did you laugh at the start of Bob Dylan's 115th Dream on your LP?
BD: I don't remember... well, wait a bit... yeah... somebody entered the studio disguised and looking like my mother. Yes, that was it. I just started laughing.
SW: Who are your friends?
BD: I haven't got any. I've always been looking for some. Never found any.
SW: Does the large amount of money you get now mean much to you?
BD: I don't care about money. Nothing has changed me. I'm not a prophet. I don't care how much money I make, but you do.

Dylan asked reporters questions like "Where's Hamlet's castle?" and "How far is the nearest cow?" He got answers too.

3 May 1966
London Press Conference

Taken from the New Musical Express of Friday May 13 1966. An article by Keith Altham. Dylan had arrived in England the day before and is staying at the Mayfair Hotel in London where he gives a press conference. John Bauldie in his Ghost Of Electricity provides full details in his reconstruction based on collated press reports. I've tried to provide a better flavor of the event by quoting from one available source.

DYLAN'S PRESS DECEPTION

Hair bristling about like a Fijian suffering from a severe electrical shock, wearing a blue suede jacket and white striped trousers, Bob Dylan meandered into a suite of the Mayfair hotel last week followed by a squad of cameramen and sound engineers, the latter to record "the press reception".

A large gentleman, with a grey top hat and movie camera permanently affixed to his shoulder, lurched about the room like Quasimodo, alternately scratching his ear and his nose, with the occasional break to "whirr" the machine in the face of perplexed reporters.

A lady in grey denims waved what appeared to be huge grey frankfurters about, but they proved to be microphones attached to tape recorders. We were apparently being taped for posterity.

For some fifteen minutes, photographers exposed innumerable rolls of film at Dylan looking bored on a window sill. Finally he removed his dark glasses as a bonus to the cameramen, but somehow managed to look exactly the same.

Ken Pitt, surely the year's most optimistic publicist, announced that Mr. Dylan now would answer questions.

"Is this a microphone?" enquired Mr. Dylan about a large cylindrical object on the desk under his nose. Having ascertained that it was indeed a microphone, Dylan signified he was ready to begin by giving a slight grunt and shifting his chair a bit.

"Which musicians have you brought with you?"

After this question had been asked again, then rephrased several times, Bob replied: "You want names?".

The reporter said this might be helpful.

"Gus, Frank, Mitch..." mumbled Dylan.

POSTERITY?

For posterity's sake I framed a question which might have been construed as "being aware", as Quasimodo aimed his mechanical hump at me. Why is it that the titles of his recent singles, like Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35 apparently bore no connections with the lyric?

"It has every significance" returned Dylan. "Have you ever been down in North Mexico?"
"Not recently"
"Well, I can't explain it to you then."

It would appear that the States of Washington, Baltimore and Houston [sic] have worked out the explanation, for they have banned Rainy Day Women as being an alleged approval of LSD and marijuana drugs. A dubious honour that Dylan shares with the Byrds' Eight Miles High, also banned in those States last week.

I tried to get him to talk about Paul Simon, whom he phoned recently in the U. S. and about Bob Lind.

"Never heard of them" obliged Mr. Dylan. With that I declared my innings closed and watched with interest as the others got batted about.

"Bob, your hair has got me worried," said one lady reporter, "How do you get it like that?"
"How do I get it like that?"
"Yes, how do you get it like that?"
"I comb it like that"

Some tried shock treatment: "Are you married?"

"I don't want to lie to you. It would be misleading if I told you 'yes'," Dylan declared and in the same breath: "I brought my wife over here on the last visit and no one took any notice of her".

A suggestion was made that he was secretly married to Joan Baez.

"Joan Baez was an accident" returned Mr. Dylan.

Dylan's good friend, folk singer Dana Gillespie, was mentioned.

Dylan brightened visibly – he practically tore his face in half in his effort to smile.

"Is Dana here?" he asked. "Bring her out. I got some baskets for her".

Regretfully Dana was not there and the conversation reverted to monotone inanities again.

REVELATIONS !

We discovered in quick succession that

- Dylan cannot see too well on Tuesdays...
- his toenails don't fit him...
- he considered Peter Lorre the world's greatest folk singer...
- all his songs protest about something...
- he has just written a book in one week about spiders...
- and he didn't know who the gentleman in the top hat was.

"I thought he was with you" he returned, dead-pan.

The lady with the giant frankfurter-mike torpedoed it forward so as not to miss a syllable of this sparkling repartee.

As the reporters filed out of the suite I took one of Dylan's undercover agents to one side (I knew he was a Dylan man as he had dark glasses on) and enquired why a man with Dylan's obvious intelligence bothered to arrange this farce of a meeting.

"Man" he extolled "Dylan just wanted us to come along and record a press reception so we could hear how ridiculous and infantile all reporters are".

I stumbled brokenly back to my plasticine, the sandpit, my chalk slate at the NME! But you've got to admit there's only one Dylan – thank goodness!

Having arrived in England just the day before, Dylan gave a press conference at his London hotel, the Mayfair. The New Musical Express version has already been provided. This version is taken from John Bauldie's The Ghost Of Electricity and is a reconstruction of the press conference based on a variety of press reports.

Will you be playing an amplified guitar in your concerts?
BD: I'm not sure if I will or not.

Does the term 'folk-rock' mean anything to you?
BD: Folk-Rot?
No, Folk-Rock. It's sometimes applied to the kind of music you make.
BD: No. Well, they say a lot of things about me. I'm a folk-singer. A protest singer. A protest folk-singer – no more and no less.

Are you still making up as many songs as you used to?
BD: Yes. I'm making up as many words as I used to do. I'm only interested in writing songs. I don't want to make singles any more.

Who do you think is the best folk-singer in the world?
BD: Oh, Peter Lorrie.

Will you be doing TV shows for the BBC again this year?
BD: Yes, I'll do anything. But I don't know if I'll do them or not. I just get the word from other people to turn up somewhere, and I'm there.

You've been influenced by many blues singers – Bukka White, Son House Big Joe Williams for example – do you still listen to such people?
BD: I know Big Joe, of course, but I've never listened to these men on records too much. Lately I've been listening to Bartok and Vivaldi and that sort of thing, so I wouldn't know what's happening.

How many people are there in your backing group?
BD: Oh, fourteen, fifteen.
What? All here?
BD: Yes, they're all here.
What about Mike Bloomfield?
BD: Who?
Mike Bloomfield. He played guitar on your last album.
BD: Michael Bloomfield... no, I used him in the studio but he's not here with me.
Who is?
BD: Who is? Oh, George, Harry, Red, Jason.
What is the name of your group?
BD: I don't know. I don't believe they have a name.
What are their names?
BD: You want names?
It might be helpful.
BD: Gus, Frank, Mitch.

How much money do you make?

BD: I don't know. I don't know anything. People just phone me and tell me to turn up somewhere at a certain time and I turn up. I never knew when I was poor till I was rich.

Why don't you write protest songs any more?

BD: Ah my songs are protest songs. You name something, I'll protest about it.

Why do some of your songs bear no relation to their titles?

BD: Give me an example.

Rainy Day Women #12&35.

BD: Have you ever been in North Mexico?

Not recently.

BD: Well, I can't explain it to you then. If you had, you'd understand what the song's about.

What are these film people doing here?

BD: I don't know.

Who's the guy with the top hat?

BD: I don't know. I thought he was with you. I sometimes wear a top hat in the bathroom.

Will you be meeting The Beatles?

BD: I don't know.

What are you going to do in Britain?

BD: Nothing.

What about the book you've just completed!

BD: It's about spiders, called Tarantula. It's an insect book. Took about a week to write, off and on. There are three hundred and sixty pages. My next book is a collection of epitaphs.

Is it true you're now married? (Here, Dylan points to Jones Alk who is recording the conference with a huge microphone.)

BD: That's my wife.

(To which she replies, "I am the cameraman's wife.")

BD: It would be very misleading if I said, yes, I was married, and I would be a fool if I said no. It would be very misleading if I said no, I wasn't married, and I'd be a fool if I said yes. I'm not going to answer that because I don't want to lie to you. I might be married, I might not. It's hard to explain really.

May we assume that you are married?

BD: You can assume anything you like. I was born married – forty-five years ago.

Are you married to Joan Baez?

BD: Joan Baez was an accident.

A mistake?

BD: No, an accident. I brought my wife over last time and nobody took any notice of her.

So you are married then?

BD: I'd be a liar if I answered that.

But you just said you had a wife.

BD: That depends on what you mean by "married".

Is she a common-law wife?

BD: I don't know what you mean by 'common-law'.

Do you have any children?

BD: Every man with medical problems has children.

What are your medical problems?

BD: Well, there's glass in the back of my head. I'm a very sick person. I can't see too well on Tuesdays. These dark glasses are prescribed. I'm not trying to be a beatnik. I have very mercuryesque eyes. And another thing – my toenails don't fit.

Are you still in touch with Dana Gillespie?

BD: Yeah! Where is Dana? Come on out, Dana! I've got some baskets for her. Put your clothes on!

What do you think about Paul Simon? Or Bob Lind?

BD: Never heard of them.

Bob, your hair has got me worried. How do you get it like that?

BD: How do I get it like that? I comb it like that.

I'm from the New Musical Express...

BD: What?

The New Musical Express. It's the leading musical paper in the country.

BD: The only paper I know is the Melody Maker.

What do you think of England?

BD: England is OK, but I prefer America. America is what I know. It's all there for me.

How do you account for your success?

BD: What I did, I did because there was nobody else around at the time to do it, that's all. At the time when I started there was no folk-scene in America. There was Frankie Avalon and Fabian. Before that we were eleven and twelve and we played rock and roll. Then when I was about sixteen or seventeen, along came Odetta. When the Beatles came along there was nobody in the USA. They'd all become too old. And folk-music as you know it came along to fill up a gap in American music, that's all. Being poor when I was young didn't have a terrific influence on me. Where I came from, everyone was the same, so you didn't know you were poor, because you had nothing to compare with.

The following article appeared in Disc and Music Echo – May 14, 1966. This is one of a number of entries covering the Press Conference held in the Mayfair Hotel, London on May 3rd, 1966.

BOB DYLAN arrived in London last week and went to sleep between black sheets at the Mayfair Hotel, London.

Bob Dylan, a thin shock-haired goblin figure with a smile like Brian Jones. A modern day Rumpelstiltskin in dark glasses.

Bob Dylan arrived preceded by an almost violent reputation for being rude and uncooperative.

He is rude – to people whom he considers ask stupid questions. He is uncooperative – he doesn't like giving up his precious free time for individual interviews.

But Bob Dylan is also a very sympathetic man with a vast sense of humour.

He explained why he was wearing dark glasses.

"I have glasses at the back of my head too. Look. I'm not trying to come on like a beatnik. I have to wear them under prescription because my eyes are so bad."

He said he had brought his eight-piece backing group with him and a lot of new songs that hadn't been recorded.

Dylan has been accused of writing non-protest songs these days. His anti-war songs are few. But his anti-love songs are many.

"All my songs are protest songs." he said. "All I do is protest. You name it and I'll protest against it."

"I don't really know what I'm doing from one day to the next I just get a phone call that says be here or there and that's that."

"England is okay. But I prefer America. America is what I know. It's all there for me."

And Bob explained why he was famous.

"What I did I did because there was nobody else around at the time to do it. That's all."

"At the time when I started there was no folk scene in America. There was Frankie Avalon and Fabian. Before that we were 11 and 12 and we played rock and roll."

"Then when I was about 16 or 17 along came Odetta. When the Beatles came along there was nobody in the US. They'd all become too old."

"And folk music as you know it came along to fill up a gap in American music. That's all."

"Being poor when I was young didn't have a terrific influence on me. Where I came from everyone was the same so you didn't know you were poor because you had nothing to compare with."

At the Press conference he played with a huge ashtray and then, this man who has said more with his songs than many say in ten thousand words, was asked some of the most ridiculous questions in the world.

Things like a barrage of questioning about whether he was married as though it was the most important thing since the nuclear bomb.

No wonder he lost his patience. No wonder he said that when he was asked intelligent questions he would give interesting answers. No wonder at the end of 20 minutes he said he'd had enough. And left to go to his room and play his upright piano.

YOU NAME SOMETHING AND I'LL PROTEST AGAINST IT: SAYS BOB
by Richard Green

Bob Dylan stuck his head through the window, placed his foot on the window ledge and—from outside—asked: "Is anyone in here?" This performance was way up in the Mayfair Hotel where an alleged press conference was taking place.

For a reason known only to himself, Dylan had climbed out of a window, across a balcony and on to the ledge adjoining it. The fact that if he slipped he would almost certainly be killed didn't seem to worry him. In fact, he came close to smiling about his little adventure.

When he finally rejoined the swarm of reporters and photographers inside, he sat at a table facing them, covering his mouth with his hand and asked: "Is this a microphone?" It was.

We were told that "Mr Dylan is prepared to answer any of your questions," and the session got under way. Until then, I'd always thought that Juke Box Jury was the funniest thing ever. But Dylan's handling of the press left that standing.

"Are you married?" asked one man. "I'd be a liar if I answered that," replied Dylan. "And I don't lie." The man persisted: "Well, tell the truth, then." Said Dylan: "I can't answer your question. It would be foolish of me."

An American woman who was clutching a salami sausage which transpired to be a microphone smiled and the reported asked: "Is she your wife?"—"Who? Oh, her? Yeah, you can say she's my wife," Dylan pronounced—"No, my husband wouldn't like it," said the woman spoiling the whole game.

This sort of thing went on for a long time. When Dylan was asked why he wrote songs that bore no relation to the title, he asked for an example. He was told that 'Rainy Day Women' was a case in point and he commented: "Have you ever been in North Mexico? If you had, you'd understand what the song was about." How useful.

Someone decided to bring the marriage bit up again and wondered if Dylan was married to Joan Baez. "Joan Baez was an accident," said the singer. "A mistake?" asked the reporter. "No, an accident. I brought my wife over last time and nobody took any notice of her."

At last an admission. "So you are married, then?"—"I'd be a liar if I answered that."—"But you just said you had a wife."—"That depends on what you mean by married."—"Is she a common-law wife?"—"I don't know what you mean by common-law."

This type of exchange was repeated often, but Dylan wouldn't give or take an inch. Asked of it was fair to assume that he was married, he said: "You can assume what you like." Asked if he had any children, he said: "Every man with medical problems has children." Asked what his medical problems were, he said: "Well, there's glass in the back of my head and my toenails don't fit properly."

Dylan's bunch of assorted film cameramen and sound recordists were happily enjoying the farce which was obviously being staged for their benefit. They continually trained cameras on the reporters and pushed weird microphones at people who spoke.

"Why don't you write protest songs anymore?" somebody wanted to know. "All my songs are protest, you name something and I'll protest about it," Dylan pointed out. Then he laughed at a photographer who was sitting on the floor.

Dylan in a series of replies, informed us that he didn't have a name for his backing group, didn't know how much he earned and had no idea where he would be appearing while here.

Then somebody mentioned folk singer Dana Gillespie and at once Dylan brightened up. He laughed out loud, smiled broadly and asked: "Yeah, where is Dana. Come on out, Dana. I've got some baskets for her. Put your clothes on."

Obviously some connection there, but nobody was giving anything away. Until that night when Dylan went to Blaises to see his friend John Lee Hooker. With him was Dana Gillespie. She was smiling nervously at people and Dylan was talking a language of his own. English words but used in a sequence of phrases that could be understood only by his close friends. And there were plenty of them.

Three nights later, Dana Gillespie came up to me in the street and said: "Do you know who's coming back tomorrow? B.D." Could it be possible?

Max Jones Interview, London, England

This interview appeared in the Melody Maker of May 14th 1966. This is another version of the Mayfair Hotel Press Conference.

WILL THE REAL BOB DYLAN PLEASE STAND UP?
Max Jones meets the mystical Mr. Dylan

Chatting up Bob Dylan is not the simplest job in the world. It used to be easier, but as he gets older he seems to grow more and more fed-up. with questions.

Very difficult it is getting him alone. When you've failed in that, the next hindrance is his reluctance to impart information. It's not that he won't answer. But his replies, sometimes oblique and often designed to send-up, carry vagueness to the borders of evasion.

This is understandable with the personal stuff: are you married? Will you be meeting the Beatles? ("I don't know") or do you have a marriage certificate? ("Why are you so interested in what I've got?").

It is harder to see reason for equivocation on the subject of what instruments he'll be playing on the tour. Hearing that he was booed at a U.S. concert last year when he emerged with an electric guitar for the second half, and greeted by mass shouts of "we want the real Dylan," I wanted to know if he'd be using amplified guitar over here.

"I'm not sure if I will or not," was the best I could get.

At times the answers are amusing more often confusing. Asked if the label folk-rock, sometimes applied to his current music making, meant anything to him, he queried back at me: "Folk-rot?"

When we'd established the term, he shook his head. "No, well, they say a lot of things about me. I'm a folk singer. A purist folk singer, no more and no less."

As I had just been reading an American interview which said Dylan disowns all the folk songs he wrote and the protest songs that made him famous, this last was on the confusing side, I pressed on;

I read that you no longer sing protest songs, Why is that?

"Who said that?" he mumbled; then, warming to the theme (for him): "All my songs are protest songs. All I do is protest. You name it, I'll protest about it."

Are you still making up as many songs as you used to do?

"Lots. I'm making up as many words as I used to. I'm only interested in writing songs. I don't want to make singles anymore."

Who did Dylan think was the best folk singer in the world, someone wished to know?

"Oh, Peter Lorrie."

Why did you write songs that bore no relation to the lyrics, such as 'Rainy Day Women Nos. 12&35'?

"Oh, it's related to the song alright. But it's hard to explain it unless you've been in North Mexico for six straight months."

Will you do TV shows for the BBC again this year?

"Yes, I'll do anything. But I don't know if I'll do them or not. I just get the word from other people to turn up somewhere and I'm there."

To raise the level of the conversation a bit, I injected the names of Bukka White, Son House and Big Joe Williams. Did Dylan listen to such blues singers?

"I know Big Joe, of course. But I never listen to these men on records too much. Lately I've been listening to Bartok and Vivaldi and that sort of thing. So I wouldn't know what's happening."

Right up to opening day, there was absolute mystery about the number and identity of Bob Dylan's accompanists. So I asked him how many there were in his group,

"Oh, fourteen, fifteen," he said indefinitely. What? All here? "Yes, they're all here." What about Mike Bloomfield?

"Who?" Mike Bloomfield. He played guitar on your last album.

"Michael Bloomfield... No, I used him in the studio but he's not here with me." Who is? "Oh, George, Harry, Fred, Jason."

Before we parted, another journalist was questioned by Dylan. He mentioned his paper. Dylan looked blank. 'It's the leading musical paper in the country,' said the reporter firmly.

"The only paper I know is the Melody Maker," was Dylan's reply.

One way or another he makes it clear he's not out to win friends and influence newspaper men.

With the uncompromising Bob Dylan

To get from London to the North of England you have to take the M1 motorway, which runs straight up through the middle of the country. While I am traveling towards Sheffield to meet up with Bob Dylan's European Tour, several questions preoccupy me: how would Bob receive me? Had he changed? I knew that in London the special correspondent of Paris Match, the French Television Service and a few other French papers were kicking their heels, waiting for some authorization (which was unlikely to appear) to join the tour. As for their English colleagues, they'd given up completely. Bob would only agree to meet the Melody Maker writer. "He's even worse than last year", a press official at the London C.B.S. Office confided to me. "I can't promise you anything. You'll have to take a chance."

I arrive at the Grand Hotel in Sheffield Just as a black Rolls roars away, pursued by a crowd of screaming fans. I just have time to catch a glimpse of a halo of shaggy hair in the back seat. It was no good going to the concert hall – all the seats had been sold more than a month ago. All I can do is settle down in the hotel lounge with some English beer and wait for events to unfold. About three hours later, the totally British calm of the luxury hotel was suddenly disturbed by an enormous crowd of people, Bob flanked by two well-built beatnik types. This was the main part of the company. Bob Dylan never travels anywhere without a large number of hangers-on, with differing and sometimes unusual jobs. Last year, for example, he had a barber with him. Amongst these people I fortunately recognised two of my friends: Bob Neuwirth, Dylan's secretary and his friend for seven years, a lively fellow who I got to know well during a few memorable evenings in London; and Al Grossman, his manager, who is almost a fixture in Paris. Al is an easy-going giant of a man, who appreciates pretty girls, good wine and French cooking. With his silvery hair hanging over his shoulders, he looks like a beatnik who has aged gracefully.

Without waiting any longer, I hand him the bottle of Beaujolais wine, that I owed him, selected from my personal collection. Neuwirth rushes towards me and claps me on the shoulder. The atmosphere is decidedly relaxed. They invite me to come and sit at their table in the hotel restaurant. A few minutes later Bob Dylan comes and joins us. He's wearing a very tight pair of trousers with violet and white stripes and a blue velvet jacket. His hair flows all around his skull in straight and wiry locks which are strangely curly at their ends. But we are in England – not one of the customers present allows himself to show any surprise or to turn round. A proper gentleman isn't offended by any eccentric behavior.

Bob sits down, grabs a menu and chooses his meal: some sticks of celery and a variety of appetizers. His eating habits deserve to be mentioned. He eats very little, only some raw vegetables and fruit, some pate or some cheese (which he puts on the same plate, making a horrible mixture of food), or sandwiches, hastily swallowed. I've never seen him eat a hot meal. As the waiter leans over, taking the order away, Dylan calls him back, grabs hold of two or three forks, two or three knives and one of the plates in front of him – the table was well set out – and says to him: "Here, take all these away. I really don't need them" Then he turns towards me: "What'll they think of me in Paris? How is it that French people who don't understand English are interested in my songs?" And, without waiting for my reply, he turns towards somebody else to talk about this evening's concert. Then, turning back towards me once more, he exclaims: "Ah, yes! Anyway, that's of no importance. People who speak English don't understand me. I wonder why so many people claim to like me when they don't understand anything of what I'm doing. There's only one place in the world where I'm really south of the United States they could understand me as well, but they don't like me because of their conservative ideas. No, it's only in the south of Texas that I'm really understood. But why do all these people come to hear me? Humanity is truly made up of too many people with non-artistic temperaments."

At that moment a very young waiter passes by and he stares at our table. "Oh, you!" Bob calls towards him; "Tell me, this Cheshire cheese – it isn't very good Cheshire, is it?" "Yes it is, Sir. It's an excellent Cheshire cheese." "Ah, but there's someone here from Cheshire who tells us that this cheese wasn't really made in Cheshire. Do you come from Cheshire yourself?", and then leaves the unfortunate waiter nonplussed to pass on to another subject. The former moves away with a vague idea of having taken part in a joke, but without having really understood Bob's very unusual humor.

After the meal all the clan met up again in Bob's room: five musicians, four cameramen and soundmen, with a sound-dubbing machine, Tom (the driver of the Rolls, who acts at the same time as a bodyguard), Henry (whose job it is to look after the star's guitars), Al Grossman, Bob Neuwirth, Mr Perry (from C.B.S. London: and the tour director), Bob Dylan and myself, plus a few girls who have been picked up at the end of the concert. In all about twenty people. We have to judge and select the tapes which have been recorded during the concert. This is a small daily ceremony. Lying on the floor, sitting on cushions or on chairs, the members of the tour listen in silence, Whether they have long or short hair, whether they are well-dressed or slovenly dressed, they all have a beatnik appearance which immediately makes them different from the other guests in the hotel. The sound system plays so loud that it could burst your eardrums and confused waiters come in and out carrying trays loaded with cups of tea or bottles of beer. Indeed, the evening will go on late into the night. Bob is taking advantage of this trip to make a film for American television, and these recordings must be synchronised with the pictures. Gradually the clan thins out. One after another, the wisest of them go to bed. So we find ourselves, at about six o'clock in the morning, with just three or four people left. Bob and I amongst them, in the bedroom of one of the members of the band, discussing the respective merits of John Lennon, Mick Jagger and the present day trends in the world cinema.

Twelve o'clock the next day. Departure for Manchester. Bob, Al, Neuwirth, a cameraman and Tom get into the Rolls, the others into the tour coach. I follow them in my car. Immediately after we arrive, Dylan goes up to his room to sleep until concert time. The others make their way to the concert hall to set up the sound equipment that Bob has brought over from America: an Ampex set – ("The best there is", he says).

Three-quarters of an hour before the show, Dylan appears. He has given up his gaudy clothes for a severe suit in black corduroy and a black cotton shirt, with no tie. While he is doing a short soundcheck with his band, the two cameramen and two sound men film around him. They only stop shooting when he's asleep... and even then I'm not entirely sure if they do (it so happens that one of the film crew is sharing his room.)

It has been decided that I will stay in the wings. The first half of the concert passes without incident. Bob is alone on stage with his acoustic guitar. Of his old songs, he has kept only "She Belongs to Me", "Desolation Row", "It's All Over Now, Baby Blue" and "Mr Tambourine Man", deliberately moving away from songs protesting about social and racial unrest and moving towards more personal, introspective problems. Nevertheless he is given rapturous applause. But the second half firmly divides the audience. Bob has chosen to surround himself with a rock group, including organ, lead guitar, baas, piano and drums; all excellent musicians, however, who play remarkable music. Unfortunately thin music doesn't please everyone. I hear shouts of "Traitor", "Play some folk songs", "Go and join the Rolling Stones", "We don't need you – we've already got The Animals". However, other spectators applaud warmly. Unruffled, Bob continues his show, which closes with "Like a Rolling Stone". At that moment, a man dressed in something dark, who has been tapping his foot to the rhythm behind me, leans over my shoulder to ask: "That song is great – was that the one that reached the top of the American charts?" I turn around to say "Yes" and – what a surprise – I notice that my questioner is one of the policemen on duty at the concert. What a fantastic police force the British have.

As soon as he leaves the stage, without a wave and without an encore, Bob puts down his guitar and rushes off, flanked by two bodyguards, towards the fire exit, where the Rolls is waiting. Ten seconds after the curtain has come down, he has already left the building. An amazing technique!

In the plane that takes us to Paris, Bob was keen to have Jean-Marie and myself sitting next to him. "Can you tell me, boys, what I'm going to do in a country where no-one understands what I'm saying? Do you think they'll boo me at the Olympia too?" As we assured him that they wouldn't, he continued: "What sort of questions will they ask me at the press conference?" "Nothing original, you can be assured. What do you think about the Vietnam war?, why you've changed your style of music, what do you think about long hair? That's about it." "Good. In that case I'll reply with any silly thing, as usual. Do you think I'll be able to meet Brigitte Bardot?... Jean-Marie, will you introduce me to Francoise (Hardy), the only French female singer I like... ?"

On arrival at Le Bourget, there's a crowd of press photographers, Albert Raisner, the Olympia management and his fan club, all turned out in full force to welcome him, with streamers. I turn towards Jean-Marie, our eyes meet and we burst into laughter, Bob didn't let us down. Surrounded by a few members of the clan, he charged into the crowd with his head down, muttering: "Let me get through, you bunch of idiots. What do you all want with me?" He ducked into an enormous Cadillac and left at top speed to shut himself up in the George V Hotel. He only came out twice: once to visit Johnny Halliday and secondly to give that famous concert at Olympia, for which people paid 60F, a seat and about which no one has stopped talking to this day.

Paris Press Conference, Paris, France

The day before Dylan's 25th birthday. An account of the final press conference of the 1966 World Tour appeared in Datebook magazine (For and By Teens) Vol. 5, Issue 9 published for October 1966. This is as seen through the eyes of two French school children who were lucky enough to get inside the Hotel George V in Paris. Dylan's questions and answers were interpreted by Jacques Hess, a pop-music journalist of the time. This is the interview where Dylan has his puppet Finian (a.k.a. Charles Laughton) to hand, which he introduced as a "religious symbol".

DYLAN: "MAKING FUN?"

By Elisabeth Jaury (age 15), Lycee Jules-Ferry, Paris, France and Philippe Jaury (age 17), Lycee Condorcet, Paris, France

It was 4 o'clock. I was waiting with my friends outside Bob Dylan's hotel in Paris. Then a policeman said that the journalists and photographers could go in for the press conference. I went inside. At about 4:30 Dylan came in and sat down. How slim and pale he is!

The questioning went as follows:

Do you like jazz?
BD: No.
What do you do with your money?
BD: I wear it.
Is there anyone in Paris you wish to see?
BD: Brigitte Bardot.
What are your pleasures?
BD: Smoking and eating.
Smoking what?
BD: Anything.
How do you feel when you are not with journalists?
BD: I feel fine.
What do you think when you look at yourself in a mirror?
BD: I never look at myself in a mirror.
Do you have a special way of sleeping?
BD: One hand under my leg, the other one on my ear (he shows us at the same time).
Which American pop singers do you like?
BD: Nancy Sinatra... (plus names I didn't understand).
What do you think of death?
BD: Captivating.

(A cute girl asks a question in French, Dylan answers, "Oui, oui," then asks the translator what she said.)

Do you like girls?
BD: I like everybody.
Are you married?
BD: I'd lie if I answered.

Do you think you're living in a foolish world?

BD: Foolish? No.

Do you know what a comb is?

BD: No.

Then Dylan said, "It's all over now," got up, and left. I took a picture and asked for an autograph. I went home pleased with my day, wondering if Bob Dylan was not making fun at us.

The Paris Press Conference has already been touched on in brief (See Volume 2, page 93). In John Bauldie's The Ghost Of Electricity John provides a transcript of this happening, describing it as – "the transcript which follows is a reconstruction based on press reports of the event". I have been unable to find any recording of the Conference. For the following entry I have used the book Dylan by Ducray, Manoeuvre, Muller and Vassal the first edition of which also contains what appears to be another reconstruction from various reports. The translation which follows is my own. The versions of Bauldie and Ducray et al. have certain similarities but some substantial differences. There are many comments which only appear in the Ducray version and others, vice-versa. I have appended entries by Bauldie which do not appear in the Ducray version.

The Press Conference took place on the afternoon of Monday May 23rd at the prestigious Georges V Hotel. Dylan's interpreter was Jacques Hess.

Just a little snippet to get you in the mood – the following is an account of a discussion between Bob and a reporter from Salut Les Copains on the flight from London to Paris.

"What questions are they going to ask at the Press Conference?"
"Nothing important, don't worry. What you think about the war in Vietnam, why you changed your style, what you think of long hair, that kind of stuff."
"Good, in that case I'll say the first thing that comes into my head."

PP = Members of the Press.

PP: What did you think of your first night in Paris?
BD: It was very dull.

PP: Do you have something special to express when you sing?
BD: No.

PP: What music do you like apart from folk music?
BD: Folk music interests me in particular. I like traditional music.
PP: Do you like jazz?
BD: No.

PP: Do you consider yourself a writer?
BD: No.

PP: What do you do with all your money?
BD: I carry it on me (showing his clothes).

PP: You've been criticised about making money from the war in Vietnam when people are being killed in that same war. What do you think of that?
BD: I've not made any money from Vietnam.

PP: Who is your favorite poet and your favorite philosopher?
BD: I don't know any philosophers and only a few poets – Francois Villon.

PP: Does the artistic interest of your work justify the mass hysteria that you arouse?
BD: I don't really know what you mean by "artistic".

PP: How do you get on with Pete Seeger and Joan Baez?
BD: Neither one has anything to do with me. (Dylan raises his arms irritably)

PP: Do you like luxury?
BD: Naturally.

PP: What do you think about meeting Hugues Aufray in Paris?
BD: I don't know... But I enjoyed meeting Brigitte Bardot.

PP: What gave you the idea of singing folk songs
BD: In 1959, there were adverts everywhere – "sing folk songs".

PP: What are your pleasures in life?
BD: Smoking and eating.
PP: What do you smoke?
BD: Anything.

PP: Why do you have a puppet by your side?
BD: It's the puppet that follows me everywhere.
PP: What does it represent? A symbol? A fetish? A mascot?
BD: It's a religion, of tears and mourning.

PP: Do you have any influence on the average American?
BD: I don't know any average Americans.

PP: Do you like women?
BD: I like everybody.

PP: What do you think of death?
BD: Very interesting, fascinating.

PP: Do you recognise yourself as the leader of the protest singers?
BD: I don't know what you're saying. These are the words of journalists, not my own.

PP: Are you free?
BD: Yes, free of you. Free to believe, free vis-à-vis myself.
PP: Do you consider yourself free if you don't have freedom of movement?
BD: I don't have freedom of movement, but I am free.

PP: Have fame and fortune changed you?
BD: Not at all.

PP: What do you think of American politics with regard to Vietnam?
BD: It's not as simple as that.
PP: What do you think of American politics in 1944 when the Americans intervened in Europe?
BD: Is that an easy question for you to ask?
PP: It's very easy for me.
BD: I don't answer easy questions.

PP: There is a saying in France that “ridicule kills”.
BD: I don’t believe the truth of that saying.

PP: Do you think that narcotics can inspire?
BD: Do you, yourself, take drugs?
PP: Sometimes.
BD: Then you ought to know!
PP: What are your next topics of inspiration?
BD: I don’t get inspired.

PP: What do you think of Yul Brynner?
BD: I like his hairstyle.

PP: Do you believe that you’re being understood while you’re in France?
BD: No.

PP: Which American singers interests you most?
BD: Bessie Smith, Memphis Slim, Billie Holliday, Nancy Sinatra.
PP: Do you like folksingers?
BD: I like everybody.

Would the gentlemen of the Press who don’t know my songs abstain from asking questions about those songs.

PP: Are you aware of having been to school?
BD: No.

PP: Tomorrow, you will be 25 years old. Do you have a wish, even an impossible one?
BD: That allusion to my birthday is an insult... (pause). No, I take that back. I don’t know what I’m saying any more. I’m feeling sleepy...

PP: Are you aware of your music becoming more and more commercial?
BD: I’ve not noticed that.

PP: Are you married?
BD: I’d be lying if I replied to that question.

PP: If the public abandoned you, what occupation would you take up?
BD: I’d like to become an excellent plumber.

PP: What song would you choose to end this press conference?
BD: Hello Dolly.

PP: Do you always live like a Beatnik?
BD: What do you mean by ‘beatnik’?
PP: Someone who has no desire for money or honors, who travels when he wants to.
BD: In that case, thanks for calling me a beatnik.

PP: What’s your puppet called?
BD: It’s called Finian, and neither Finian nor Bob Dylan know why they’re going to Paris.

PP: Were you a good pupil at school?

BD: No, very bad. I failed all my exams.

PP: Is there anything about which you are certain?
BD: I'm certain of the existence of ashtrays, of doorknobs, of window panes.

PP: What are you earning from your show at Olympia?
BD: Three hundred and fifty billion dollars.

And then the extra bits from Ghost of Electricity –

PP: Why are you here?
BD: I have to be here.

PP: Who are these cameramen who follow you everywhere?
BD: It's weird. When I go out, I never know where I'm gonna go, but they're always there.
PP: The cameraman who follows you everywhere, why isn't his hair as long as yours?
BD: That's his problem.

PP: Why are you so nice?
BD: Because I feel so good. I've just woken up.
PP: Why do you sing?
BD: Because I like to sing.
PP: Do you want to express something with your singing?
BD: No.

PP: Your friends say that your earlier songs are better than your latest, more commercial recordings.
BD: Who asked that question? (the man is pointed out to him) Oh, but he's not one of my friends. You don't even know my friends!

PP: You're often called a philosopher and a poet. Are you?
BD: I don't know.

PP: How would you define folk music?
BD: It's music filled with legend, with myth, with ghosts, with the Bible, with anything in fact.

PP: Who are your favorite singers?
BD: Bessie Smith, Ma Rainey, Billie Holiday and Nancy Sinatra (note difference from earlier version – JAB).
PP: What about Woody Guthrie?
BD: Yes, Woody Guthrie.

PP: What do you think about Antoine and Hugues Aufray?
BD: I know nothing about Antoine and hardly anything about Hugues Aufray.

PP: Do you like translations of your songs?
BD: I'm not interested – as long as they sell well.

PP: What do you think when you look in the mirror?
BD: I never look in mirrors.

PP: Which song will you open with tomorrow night? (note difference from earlier version – JAB).
BD: Hello Dolly.

PP: Are you taking these questions seriously?
BD: Very, very seriously.

PP: What did you feel when all your drug songs were banned by all the radio stations because they were taken as indirect invitations to take drugs?
BD: Banned? Who said so? I don't know.

PP: What interests you in life?
BD: Nothing.
PP: What makes you happy?
BD: Oh, a bowl of soup. Being kicked in the ribs by a friend.
PP: Are you happy?
BD: Yes. As an ashtray may be.

PP: What question would you like to be asked?
BD: Hello, Bob. How are you?

PP: Are you committed to any causes?
BD: Committed? Me? I don't belong to any movement. I've only got some ideas in my head and I tell them. I don't support anybody's cause. No revolution ever came about because of songs.

Before leaving with twenty close friends who help him to carry his puppet and the despair of the world, the nice young man revealed that he sleeps with one hand under his leg and the other under his left ear.

Eat The Document Outtakes, London, England

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 575-577.

Transcript of several reels of Eat The Document footage which never quite made it to the final movie – quite obvious why – they hardly show Bob in a good light. Just picture Dylan, John Lennon (JL), Bobby Neuwirth (BN) and D. A. Pennebaker (DP) in the back of a limousine (driven by Tom [TM]) touring round London. Imagine the participants high on drugs – for Lennon, probably only cannabis, for Dylan, unquestionably something stronger.

FIRST REEL

BD: (Peering out of the limo window) There's the mighty Thames. That's what held Hitler back, the mighty Thames. Winston Churchill said that. Tom, ain't that right? (to the chauffeur) Ain't that right, Tom? Tom, I think I'm gonna turn you into Tyrone Power.

JL: Say that again, will you Bob?

BD: Tom, I think I'm gonna turn you into Ronald Coleman.

JL: That's better. That's very much better.

BD: Reginald Young. Peetie Wheatstraw. Or Sleepy John Estes, man. Or Robert Johnson. Go to medical school like J. Carroll Nash...

JL: Johnny Cash, or all the rest of them.

BD: I have Johnny Cash in my film. Are you gonna shit yourself when you see it. You won't believe it.

JL: Hey! John's gonna shit again!

BD: He doesn't know. You know what he looks like, right, Johnny Cash? Have you spent much time around him? He moves great. He moves like that. (makes descriptive gesture). You gotta cut that part of the film, man, 'cause I really like him (to Pennebaker). He moves like all good people. Like prize fighters. (smiles at camera) Johnny!

JL: Johnny! Big River, Big River! (makes gesture of approval)

DP: (Smiling at camera) That's for Johnny, too!

BD: Yeah, he's on film too. He's incredible.

JL: Quite a guy, huh?

BD: Quite a guy, John. Oh man, you shoulda been around last night, John. Today's a drag.

JL: Oh really, Bob?

BD: Haha! I wish I could talk English, man.

JL: Me too, Bobby.

BD: (Pointing to Lennon) He can talk American. (To Tom) Hey, Tom, you've heard me talk in English, haven't you? But I can't never do it around John though because (behind back of hand) John's such a great actor, man, that...

JL: ...you can't believe that it's me.

BD: Is this the mighty Thames, still, Tom? (To Lennon) Remember when I played you those tapes? Do you remember what you said to me? I played you a song and you said... what's the name of your song publishing company?

JL: Dick James.

BD: Naw, naw. Is that the name of it? That wasn't the name I heard.

JL: Northern Songs?

BD: Right, that was it. I said, 'What's Northern Songs?' And I was never told man. I had to go and find out.

JL: Didn't they tell you?

BD: No, man, they didn't tell me. Someone said, 'You wanna be on Northern Songs' and you laughed and Paul McCartney looked the other way and talked to Ringo...

JL: ...and Mick Jagger...

BD: ...blew shit from his nose...

JL: ...and Rob Roy leapt into the room with a big kilt on and said, 'Hey, Bobby, have you heard this one?'

BD: Haha! You haven't lived in Texas, man. I read in the paper that George Harrison spends a lot of time in the States. You've learned a lot from George.

JL: (In John Peel-style voice) Tell me about The Mamas & Pappas, Bob. I believe you're backing them bigly.

BD: I knew it would get to that. I knew it would get to that. Naw. You're just interested in the big chick, right? She's got hold of you, too. She's got a hold of everybody I know. Everybody asks me the same thing. you're terrible, man.

JL: Do you know Ralph Donner? He's another great one.

BD: No, I only know the lesser known ones.

JL: Barry McGuire's a great war hero.

BD: Barry McGuire? He's a good friend of yours, John, I understand.

JL: He met me through you, Bob, remember that. He's a great buddy, Sergeant Barry.

BD: Haha! Tell me about The Silkies.

JL: Naw. We've missed all the good 'uns.

BD: Tell me about this pain in my side.

JL: Why don't you take something?

BD: I've taken a few milligrams of Silkie once. Barry McGuire tells me he's a great friend of yours.

JL: Well, I hate to say this about Barry, Bobby, but I don't know him at all personally, but I did have a letter from his manager saying he was very close to you, being on the bosom of the current folk-a-rock-a-boom.

BD: Yes, yes.

JL: That's the first thing I did hear about Barry himself.

BD: But you've never really exchanged correspondence... (now talks to Pennebaker) Oh, get those two lovers over there... (and back to Lennon)... You never did, as one of your friends would wish you, you never did meet the chap. Haha!

REEL TWO

BD: (Looking very ill) I wanna go back home. I wanna go back home, man, see a baseball game, all-night TV. I come from a land of paradise, man.

JL: (Sarcastically) Sounds great.

BD: Well, I could make it sound so great that you wouldn't have the capacity to speak. Hey, I'm very sick, man. I'll be glad when this is over, 'cause I'm getting very sick here.

JL: With the tremors?

BD: Are you getting sick here? Is it pouring yet? Hey, that's a good shot, (to Pennebaker who's leaning out of the window and filming Bob back through it) but why don't you bring it back in 'cause it's cold. Aw! How far are we from the hotel, Tom?

TM: Five minutes.

BD: Oh, wow.

JL: Permission to land, Tom.

BD: Oh God, I don't wanna get sick here. What if I vomit into the camera? I've done just about everything else into that camera, man, I might just vomit into it.

DP: It'd make a nice ending, wouldn't it? Cooking With Dylan we'll call it.

BD: But I never throw up. So tell me John, how long have you had a partnership with Macy's?

JL: The Macy Brothers themselves, we've had a partnership of 13, 14 years I guess.

BD: And you're a new cat, a new youngster, from Canada, right?
JL: Canada, yes, rootin' tootin' Quebec, you know.
BD: Aw, I'm very sick. How far are we out of town?
TM: About ten minutes.
BD: Awww!
TM: Do you want to head back?
BD: Yeah! Hurry!
BN: In approximately fifteen seconds from now BBC2 going on the air, in approximately fifteen seconds from now, an interview with Mr Dylan... Mr Dylan, you must remember me from the Jamaicas, I went to school with Bobby Babwebba Babbabably Bawebbly.
BD: Aw, don't do it to me, man.
BN: All the soul brothers from the BBC will be there. The BBC good guys are at the airport. The BBC bad guys are waiting downtown for you when you get there.
(Dylan looks increasingly more and more unwell)
JL: Do you suffer from sore eyes, groovy forehead, or curly hair? Take Zimdon!
BD: Aw, no, man.
JL: Come, come, boy, it's only a film. Come, come, pull yourself together. Another few dollars, eh? That'll get your head up. Come on, come on, money, money!
BD: Haha! Huh! Where are you, Tom?
BN: We're in Sherwood forest, Rob. Friar Tuck.
BD: (Appearing as if about to vomit) Please go back to the hotel.
TM: I'm on the way back now.
BN: What's the altitude in here?
TM: Two thousand feet.

Dylan On Stage, London, England

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1023-1024.

The final show of the 1966 World Tour at the Royal Albert Hall, London and Dylan had quite a few things to say to the audience from the stage. The following accounts show how it was all perceived by reporters from Melody Maker and Disc & Music Echo (Ray Coleman) respectively. These articles appeared the following week on June 4th.

DYLAN VIEW ON THE BIG BOO

In an amazing speech from the stage of London's Albert Hall Bob Dylan denied suggestions that some of his songs are "drug songs." He attempted to explain his changing music and indicated he wouldn't appear in Britain again. This all came out in his concert there last Friday.

After Dylan had been singing for some minutes accompanying himself on guitar and harmonica, he stopped and started talking to the huge hushed audience,

"I'm not going to play any more concerts in England," he announced. "So I'd just like to say, this next song is what your English musical papers would call a drug song. I never have and never will write a drug song, I don't know how to. It's not a drug song, it's just vulgar."

Dylan carried on with songs like "Desolation Row" and "It's All Over Now, Baby Blue". Then he was joined by the group for his electric sound songs.

Explained Dylan, "I like all my old songs. It's just that things change all the time. Everybody knows I never said they were rubbish (he pronounced the word in a Northern accent). That's not in my vocabulary. I wouldn't use the word rubbish if it was lying on the stage and I could pick it up. This music you are going to hear – if anyone has any suggestions on how it could be played better or how the words could be improved...? – we've been playing this music since me were ten years old. Folk music was just an interruption and was very useful. If you don't like it, that's fine."

"This is not English music you are listening to. You have not really heard American music before. I want now to say what you're hearing is just songs, You're not hearing anything else but words and sounds. You can take it or leave it. If there's something you disagree with that's great I'm sick of people asking: 'What does it mean?' It means nothing." Here Dylan was interrupted by shouts, including "Woody Guthrie would have turned in his grave" and "Rubbish," but most of the audience wanted to hear Dylan out and shouted down the hecklers.

Melody Maker – June 4, 1966

UPROAR AT BOB DYLAN CONCERT

"This is my last visit here," said an angry Bob Dylan at his final British concert at London's Albert Hall on Friday. Certainly some of the audience didn't seem to care. They hooted, barracked and stalked out in protest then, after the interval Bob appeared with his electrifying backing group. Dylan's, excursion into rock and roll angered them. They wanted only the pure guitar accompanied folk-singing of the first half.

Dylan handled the aggressors extremely well. "Oh you beautiful people," he said sending them up and referring to the songs "Ah, it's all the same stuff..."

"Go home," "Get the creep off," "Drop dead Dylan". Bob suffered some appalling treatment from some hecklers. But he battled on. And though the reception he got was unforgivable the rowdies had some justification.

We don't mind the wailing backing group, but must it be so loud. A lot of Dylan's talent lies in his words, and few could be heard above a caterwauling din, appallingly tasteless thudding drumming, and electrification gone mad.

The electrified performance was a shamble of noise – a vivid contrast from the first half which was great Dylan with guitar at his best singing with more clarity than ever, putting across beautiful songs like "Desolation Row" with a sensitivity sadly lacking from the band backed mess.

True, some of the second half had a bit of ferocious appeal, when he rang up with "Like A Rolling Stone" he sang the words "You're gonna have to get used to it" as if they had some hidden meaning. Lets hope he either changes his mind or rethinks his group function. Dylan is great but with that sort of row going on behind him he insults his own talents.

Michael Iachetta Interview, Woodstock, New York

This article appeared in the May 8, 1967 issue of the New York Daily News.

After the motorcycle accident, Dylan secreted himself away in Woodstock. In May 1967, Michael Iachetta of the Daily News tracked him down to his out-of-the-way retreat and, after several attempts, managed to meet Dylan who, apparently recognizing Iachetta from an earlier interview (New York Daily News, October 20th 1963), granted him an audience. Although others had tried, this was the first reporter to gain an interview with Dylan since his accident. Iachetta describes Dylan as scarred, emotionally and physically, but, according to Albert Grossman, this was supposedly due to Iachetta being unable to recognize Dylan's "put-ons" and interpret the messages correctly.

WOODSTOCK, N. Y., May 7 (Special): For the first time since the motorcycle accident that almost cost him his life more than nine months ago, folk music's emotionally and physically scarred Bob Dylan spoke out yesterday about life since his crackup.

"What I've been doin' mostly is seein' only a few close friends, readin' little 'bout the outside world. Porin' over books by people you never heard of. Thinkin' about where I'm goin' and why am I runnin' and am I mixed up too much and what am I knowin' and what am I givin' and what am I takin'. And mainly what I've been doin' is workin' on gettin' better and makin' better music, which is what my life is all about."

In an exclusive interview – the first he has granted since his accident – Dylan flavored his words with bittersweet poetry about his record contract, his TV special, his book – and rumors that the accident had ended his career. He spoke at his mountain hideaway near his art colony about a hundred miles from New York.

He will be twenty-six on May 24. His occupation is song-writer, poet, singer and electric-guitar player. He is a hung-up middle-class kid who has put poetry on juke boxes with such songs as Blowin' in the Wind and Like a Rolling Stone.

His works have been recorded by artists ranging from Lawrence Whelk to the Byrds and he is credited with starting the folk-rock craze. His royalties have made him a millionaire, yet he lives like a hermit and hasn't cut a record since his accident.

Bobby goes almost into a trance as he described being thrown from the motorcycle: "The back wheel locked, I think," he said. "I lost control, swerving from left to right. Next thing I know I was in some place I never heard of – Middletown, I think – with my face cut up so I got some scars and my neck busted up pretty good. Just began movin' it around a month ago. New X-rays should be comin' through any day now. I know I won't be able to ride a motorcycle anymore."

"But songs are in my head like they always are," said Dylan, "And they're not goin' to get written down until some things are evened up. Not until some people come forth and make up for some of the things that have happened."

As he talked, his slender fingers rubbed the new beard and moustache that make his face look strangely sensitive. A blue bandanna covered the top of his head – "Some scars on my face from the accident," he explained offhandedly.

His words indicated that the record world has left him with a few scars too. "Somethin' has got to be evened up is all I'm going to say," Dylan drawled. "Meanwhile, whatever is happenin' in the world is happenin' just fine without me, and I'm going to just have to get better before I do any singin' on records, but the time is right for a new record."

He says he has been working on two musical sounds, described as "staccato" and "resoundin'." "The description belongs to my lead guitarist and one of my old drummers," says Dylan. "I don't use words like that, but they do the job."

He owes Columbia a record on a contract that expired not long ago. And he has been suspended for refusing to cut it. "But everything had been settled amicably and Bobby will be recording for us as soon as he is able to," said a Columbia spokesman.

Bobby doesn't seem to be in any hurry – even though MGM records has reportedly offered him a cool million to jump labels. "What's money?" said Dylan with the nonchalance of someone who has it. "A man is a success if he gets up in the mornin' and gets to bed at night and in between he does what he wants to. What I want to do is make music." He also wanted to make a film and write a book and accepted advances to do the job, but the ABC-TV special he was working on has been cancelled. "The film is finished." That's all Dylan will say. "It's different."

As for the book, "word got round I had one when all I was doin' was writin' some things down," explained Bobby. "Editors kept makin' – what do they call it? – revisions, and makin' it wrong and it just can't be printed until it's right."

In Woodstock there is a story that Bobby's wife was following him at the time of the accident and rushed him to a doctor. "I don't remember that," said Bobby, as always reluctant to talk about his personal life. "Lots of things I don't remember about that day."

Dylan stared for a long moment down at his gray cowboy boots. He was a gypsy-like figure in faded dungarees, lavender shirt with collar turned up to cover his neck and a purple-and-blue striped blazer. His sandy hair seemed longer and wilder than ever. He laughs at the stories that he has gone three-button Ivy and cuts his hair short, but he doesn't laugh at the cruel rumors that have made the rounds from hippie haven to California to the git-fiddle Mecca that is Gerde's Folk City in Greenwich Village.

The rumor mill had it that the accident had finished Bobby's career; that he was a vegetable; that he was so badly scarred he refused to come down from the top floor of his hideaway – speaking only to his friends and then only through an intercom.

Try to check the rumors in New York City and all Bobby's manager, Albert Grossman, will say is that Bobby broke his neck in a motorcycle accident. "He is still recovering," said Grossman, "and he is not seeing anybody." You are left with a clicking sound and a phone receiver in your hand. So you dial Columbia Records. "We don't know where Bobby is," says a spokesman. "Somewhere in Bearsville, we think, but you'll never find him. Why waste your time?"

Maybe it is because of the anxiety in Abe Zimmerman's voice when you call him person-to-person in Hibbing, Minn., and ask him about his son, Bobby Dylan. "Bobby's fine," says Abe, a prosperous appliance dealer whose oldest son preferred the name of a poet to the name he was given at birth in Duluth. "Yes, I heard about the accident," says Abe, "but Bobby's been up since then. He went to the last Cassius Clay fight. He is fine, isn't he? What does the New York office say?"

The New York office says little. So the next thing you know you are driving upstate towards a town that will create a conspiracy of silence around the mysterious Mr Dylan. As the hundred miles roll away, you find yourself thinking about a line from a Dylan song – Ballad of a Thin Man. The line is "Something is happening here, but you don't know what it is, do you Mr Jones?" It bothers you, as it was intended to, and you find yourself remembering the first time you met Dylan.

Even then, he shied away from talking about himself. "I'm writing about myself and that's the only way I can do it," he said, coming on like the original wandering troubadour. There was no mention that he has grown up as Bobby Zimmerman in the Jewish society whirl around Minneapolis—St Paul and that he had done the three-button bit for six months as a scholarship student at the University of Minnesota. He dropped out and begun hustling a buck in a coffee house called the Ten o'clock Scholar in Dinkeytown, a small business section on the edge of campus.

There is no explaining the coffee house kick, just as there is no explaining why he began running away from home when he was ten. The cops collared him nine hundred miles away. Before he was nineteen he had lived in Duluth, Minnesota; Gallup, New Mexico; Cheyenne, South Dakota; Phillipsburg, Kansas; and, finally, Hibbing.

Along the way, he taught himself to play the piano, the harmonica, the autoharp and the guitar. He knew that he liked to write poems, and the poems became songs that were in the air around him, and he just had to write them down before somebody else did. "I'm tryin' to be like the medium at a seance," he explained. "There's a mystery, magic, truth and the bible in great folk music. I can't hope to touch that, but I'm goin' to try."

In Woodstock you run into vague answers about the whereabouts of Bob Dylan. You spend forty-eight hours talking to teenagers, local merchants and the cop on the beat. Woodstock is an artistic community and the people appreciate a man trying to do a job as best he knows how, especially when he promises not to reveal the location of Bobby's house. Finally someone lets slip the name of the man who sold the house to Dylan and you have something to work on.

After four hours of driving up narrow mountain trails, running from watch-dogs, getting stuck in the mud and winding up hopelessly lost, you get a straight answer and you are there, impressed by the brooding wealth of the mahogany-stained estate you see in front of you.

Dylan's black Cadillac limousine is in a garage off the end of the driveway and there is a miniature playground for Bobby's young son, Jesse Byron, you identify yourself and ask for Dylan. "Never heard of Dylan," a voice says. "There's nobody here but my wife and child and me," says the gent at the door. "Now will you get out of here."

You leave, but as you do another car swings in and out of the driveway. It turns out to be the house's previous owner showing the place to friends. "Is that the Dylan house?" you ask as your car blocks his on the narrow road. "Yes," he replies.

The next day it is snowing in May and you believe anything is possible, so you go back to the house and knock on the door until a figure stares out at you from behind the grating. Bobby is standing in front of you and you are so genuinely glad to see that he is all right that you blurt out: "It's great to see you're up and around and the rumors aren't true."

He looks at your face curiously, trying to place it, and then he remembers that long-ago interview in his manager's office. "We can't just stand here talking," he says, inviting you in for coffee.

And then he talked about life since the accident. Thin, almost emaciated, his lips clutched a cigarette. At the end of the talk he was asked about a News photographer taking his picture. "I'd rather not," he said. "It's one thing facing a writer, but I have this hang-up about cameras now."

Winter 1968
Hubert Saal Interview, Woodstock, New York

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 833-836.

Dylan was interviewed by Hubert Saal, music editor of Newsweek, at his Woodstock home early in 1968. It appeared in the February 26th 1968 issue of Newsweek under the banner

Dylan is back

Saal was invited expressly by Grossman probably to heal the rift with Newsweek caused by the 1963 Svedberg article.

"I won't be giving any concerts for a while," declared Bob Dylan. "I'm not compelled to do it now. I went around the world a couple of times. But I didn't have anything else to do then." So the hunger of an adoring public, famished by Dylan's eighteen-month retirement after his near-fatal motorcycle accident in 1966, is feasting on his new record, John Wesley Harding.

It has broken all Dylan records, its sales already verging on half a million and the gold disc that it took Dylan's three previous albums a year to achieve. In a month it has leap-frogged up the Billboard hit parade to number two, eclipsing the Rolling Stones and challenging the front-running Beatles.

Each Dylan album mapped new directions, alienating or delighting old admirers, enlisting armies of fresh recruits. In Another Side of Dylan he turned deaf ears to the protest idiom to which he had contributed such classics as "Blowin' in the Wind" and "The Times They Are A-Changin'"' And then, when he exchanged his acoustical guitar for electric, used a rock beat and invented a form called folk rock – and such songs as "Like a Rolling Stone" the folk purists called him "traitor." "It's just development," Dylan says. "We're always changing. You use new imagination and you get a new look."

John Wesley Harding is no exception. Dylan likes change so much he even added a g to the name of the legendary Texas desperado. A few people have suggested that Dylan was trying to make up for all the g's he's dropped while singing his songs but when asked he replied: "No, that's just the way the name always sounded to me."

The obvious change in the new album is Dylan's return to the acoustical guitar and his train-wail harmonica. "I was always with the traditional song." Dylan says. "I just used electricity to wrap it up in. Probably I wasn't ready yet to make it simple. It's more complicated playing an electric guitar because you're five or ten feet away from the sound and you strain for things that you don't have to when the sound is right next to your body. Anyway it's the song itself that matters, not the sound of the song."

The simplicity and brevity of most of the songs in the new album happily reverse the tangled, surrealistic prolixity that characterises such previous songs as "Desolation Row" and "Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands." The new songs are carefully crafted, the imagery vivid and direct, the language concise, the rhymes often consonantly sophisticated. But concision inspires its own enigmas, demanding that the listener fill in between the lines -and sometimes provide the ending to a narrative ballad "I Dreamed I Saw St. Augustine" burns with fervent evangelism and "All Along the Watchtower" mixes the symbolic, the pedestrian and the mystic to present a vision of irresistible evil.

An unusual quality of the new album is its fervent morality. Three of the songs actually end preaching a moral. "A song is moral just by being a song," Dylan comments. "We're all moralists. We all believe the same things in the same places." But Dylan's morality here is no longer concerned with specific causes, individual victims or, as in "The Gates of Eden" or "It's Alright, Ma (I'm Only Bleeding)," with unrelieved pessimism. Rather it is more philosophical, insisting in "The Wicked Messenger" and "I Pity the Poor Immigrant" on a fundamentalist approach to good and evil.

The two love songs that end the album reveal a new sexual maturity in Dylan. In earlier love songs women were usually portrayed as selfish, fickle and even contemptible. But now he shows an adult and mutual tenderness. At the same time he gives the songs an amusing added dimension by slyly playing with love words that apply as easily to mother and son as to lovers. The simple, witty, lovely "I'll Be Your Baby Tonight" begins "Close you eyes/Close the door/You don't have to worry any more/I'll be your baby tonight" and ends "Do not fear/Bring that bottle over here/I'll be your baby tonight."

In a rare interview, a slender smiling and bearded Bob Dylan, who wears octagonal-shaped rimless Ben Franklin glasses, expressed a surprising attitude toward his songs, which accounted in part for the obscurity surrounding so many of his lyrics. "I only look at them musically," he said, in a soft, Mid-western drawl. "I only look at them as things to sing. It's the music that the words are sung to that's important. I write the songs because I need something to sing." He elaborated: "it's the difference between the words on paper and the song. The song disappears into the air, the paper stays. They have little in common. A great poet, like Wallace Stevens, doesn't necessarily make a great singer. But a great singer always – like Billie Holiday – makes a great poet."

Dylan appeared much more concerned with his performance of the songs themselves. "I could have sung each of them better. I'm not exactly dissatisfied but I'm not about to brag about the performance. In writing songs I have one great trouble. I'm lazy. I wish I could but you're not going to find me sitting down at the piano every morning. Either; it comes or doesn't. Of course some songs, like "Restless Farewell," I've written just to fill up an album. And there are songs in which I made up a whole verse just to get to another verse."

He didn't do this in John Wesley Harding. "It holds together better. I've always tried to get simple. I haven't always succeeded. But here I took more care in the writing. In Blonde on Blonde I wrote out all the songs in the studio The musicians played cards, I wrote out a song, we'd do it, they'd go back to their game and I'd write out another song." He wasn't composing on the spot but merely writing down songs he had carried around in his head for some time.

Dylan prefers Nashville, where the new album was recorded, to New York. "I've cut seven albums in New York. You have to put up with all that taxicab nonsense and that hi-city confusion which disables you a lot. It's always cold and you can't go outside when you want. You get a boxed-in feeling. And, though New York has top-quality people, musicians sure know how to play in Nashville."

Dylan's dislike of being boxed in apparently accounts for his seclusion in Woodstock, New York. Since his recovery from the motorcycle accident he's made only one brief appearance – at a memorial concert for Woody Guthrie at Carnegie Hall, where he received a hero's ovation. Shying at personal questions, he would only say about the accident: "I stared at the ceiling for a few months. But since I've often sat around staring at ceilings it didn't bother me much. I haven't been in retreat. I'm a country boy myself and you have to be let alone to really accomplish anything. The reason I wasn't recording was some confusion over the contract"

(Columbia Records suspended Dylan and he was reportedly offered a million dollars by MGM to switch companies. He didn't. "It was just some misunderstanding between the parties," he said.)

Dylan's current reluctance to give concerts has nothing to do with the accident from which he appears fully recovered. "I have more responsibilities now," he says. They include a wife and at least one child. Asked how long he had been married, Dylan said: "If you ask me or my wife we'd say eternity, but if you ask somebody else he'd probably say three or four years." How many children does he have? "Some," he replied.

He was more communicative about the book he's writing, which is not the long-delayed "Tarantula." "You see," he said, "that was an opportunity for me to write a book rather than a book I wanted to write. I just put down all these words and sent them off to my publishers and they'd send back the galleys, and I'd be so embarrassed at the nonsense I'd written I'd change the whole thing. And all the time they had a hundred thousand orders." He shook his head in wonder. "Why, that is an audience for lots of writers' dreams. The trouble with it. it had no story. I'd been reading all these trash books, works suffering from sex and excitement and foolish things which only happen in a man's mind."

"I've discovered," Dylan continued, "that there are many many ways to write a story. Sensationalism isn't the way. Now I do have a story, the way Charlie Chaplin would think of it. It's all in here," he said, clutching the sides of his head. He hoped that the new book could be ready by July. Publication of "Tarantula" is indefinitely postponed.

Dylan's innocent approach to writing is both touching and oddly persuasive. His way with words is indisputable, from the frequently effective poems on his record jacket to the songs themselves, so many wonderful songs that it's amazing that he is just twenty-six years old. What is encouraging is the evidence supplied by his new album. A few songs are weak. None of them can match the incandescence of "Blowin' in the Wind" or "A Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall" But the album displays Dylan the craftsman, the artist, who if he smacked no towering home runs, got a few extra base hits and got on base nearly every time. "I used to think," he says, "that myself and my songs were the same thing. But I don't believe that any more. There's myself and there's my song, which I hope is everybody's song."

June/July 1968
John Cohen And Happy Traum Interview, Woodstock, New York

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 389-408.

John Cohen (JC) and Happy Traum (HT) conducted three interviews at Woodstock during June and July 1968 and these were published in Sing Out in October that year. Apparently it was Dylan's suggestion to Traum for the interviews to help Sing Out over some major financial difficulties. Traum recruited Cohen, a painter and musician who lived in the Woodstock area. The interview did not go the way Traum had expected with Dylan showing a lack of commitment to anything outside of his immediate environment.

The film discussed at the beginning of the interview is, if you can't guess, Eat The Document.

CONVERSATIONS WITH BOB DYLAN

JC: I didn't realize how good that film was when I saw it last.

BD: You thought it was good?

JC: It wasn't finished – I liked it because of that. But I didn't see Dont Look Back.

BD: It's just as well. The difference between the two would be in the editing... the eye. Mr. Pennebaker's eye put together Dont Look Back, whereas someone else's eye put together this film which you saw.

JC: Wasn't one of the "eyes" involved yours?

BD: Not entirely. Don't forget, Mr. Pennebaker shot all the film, and Mr. Alk was under direction from him. The (edited) cut was under the direction of, well... I was one of them. What we had to work with was not what you would conceive of if you were going shooting a film. What we were trying to do is to make a logical story out of this newsreel-type footage... to make a story which consisted of stars and starlets who were taking the roles of other people, just like a normal movie would do. We were trying to do the same thing with this footage. That's not what anyone else had in mind, but that is what myself and Mr. Alk had in mind. And we were very limited because the film was not shot by us, but by the eye, and we had come upon this decision to do this only after everything else failed. And in everything else failing, the film had been cut just to nothing. So we took it and tried to do it this way because it was a new method and it was new to us, and we were hoping to discover something. And we did. People might see it and say it's just a big mess. Well, it might seem like a mess, but it's not. It starts with a half hour of footage there, that is clean: the film is sloppy and it looks like a lot of cutting in it, thirty second cuts to ten second cuts. But what we tried to do was to construct a stage and an environment, taking it out and putting it together like a puzzle. And we did, that's the strange part about it. Now if we had the opportunity to re-shoot the camera under this procedure, we could really make a wonderful film.

JC: I liked this quality of having things that would normally not be used, that would be discarded, suddenly put together in such a way...

BD: Well, we had to do that because it's all we had. The reason it didn't get seen was that the program (TV) folded and by the time we handed it in, they had already a statewide search begun to confiscate the film, because it was the property of ABC. So we were a little pressured here and there. What you saw was a rough work print.

JC: What I liked was that the trip had such wildness, such insanity, it looked to me like things could only get worse, they couldn't get better while you were on such a thing. As the film built up, everything seemed to contribute to that. The nature of the crowds, the nature of the reporters... I don't know if it was the film, or if it was where we were sitting when we saw it, but... well I'm sure one person is capable of doing both things...

BD: The subject and the Director?

JC: ...or the editor.

BD: Well the editor and director were two different people.

JC: Let's say the subject and one of the editors was the same person.

BD: Well, you have a lot of major films where the subject himself might be the director. Marlon Brando. Charlie Chaplin. Frank Black.

JC: But the nature of the person in the film... maybe to you that wasn't so wild.

BD: I can imagine something a lot wilder... maybe not a on a singing tour, but as a film. On the screen, what do you say is wild, and what do you say when wildness turns into chaos? Cecil B. De Mille made Samson and Delilah... that's pretty wild.

JC: But that was a stage set... I had the feeling that your film was really happening. You didn't set up the reporters... well, that girl who maybe jumps out the window, and maybe doesn't... it's hard to draw the line where play leaves off.

BD: It's hard to do a tour, and in the after hours make a movie. What we were doing was to try to fulfill this contract, to make a television show, and the only time I had to do it was when I was on tour, because I was on tour all the time.

JC: I never saw you perform when you were touring with an electric band, except the last time I saw you which was at Newport, in 1965, when the public first became fully aware of what you'd been writing and thinking. But by the time this movie was shot in England, why you were really flying... your hands going all over, above the mouth harp... I got the feeling that you don't have to necessarily predetermine these things, that they grow by themselves. When reporters ask such questions, and audiences scream at nothing, it invites you to become something that you don't necessarily intend to be.

BD: That's true, but I know quite a few people who accept it as a challenge. I used to see people who'd take off their tie and dangle it over the first row, and it would be almost hypnotic. P.J. Proby used to do that, there are people who actually invite it, who actually enjoy being pulled, you know... it's something having to do with contact. It's very athletic in a way.

JC: I take that film as very different from the new record you made... it might be opposite sides of the same coin. I think it's great, that in the period of three years, you can be the same person who did both.

BD: Well, you can do anything if it's your job. When I was touring, it was my line of work, to go out there and deliver those songs. You must accept that in some way. There's very little you can do about it. The only other thing to do is not to do it. But you certainly can't tell what's going to happen when you go on the stage, because the audiences are so different. Years ago the audience used to be of one nature, but that's not true anymore.

JC: You talked of it in the past – that was your job. But is it necessarily now your job?

BD: It is in a way. I like to play music on the stage. I expect to be playing music endlessly. So this period of time now isn't important to me; I know I'm going to be performing again, it's just a matter of the right time. And I'll have different material – so there'll be a change there.

JC: I recall a conversation we had in 1962... I don't know if I was seeing something, or wishing something on you – but I had just come back from Kentucky and you showed me Hard Rain, at Gerde's or upstairs from the Gaslight...

BD: I believe at the time, you were wondering how it fit into music. How I was going to sing it.

JC: That was my initial reaction. That's really ancient history now because a whole aesthetic, a whole other approach has come into music since then, to make it very possible to sing that kind of song.

BD: Yes, that's right.

JC: Before then it wasn't so possible. The question I asked you on seeing this stream of words was, if you were going to write things like that, then why do you need Woody Guthrie? How about Rimbaud? And you didn't know Rimbaud... yet.

BD: No, not until a few years ago.

JC: Back then, you and Allen Ginsberg met.

BD: Al Aronowitz, a reporter from the Saturday Evening Post, introduced me to Allen Ginsberg and his friend Peter Orlovsky, above a bookstore on 8th Street, in the fall of '64 or '65. I'd heard his name for many years. At that time these two fellows had just gotten back from a trip to India. Their knapsacks were in the corner and they were cooking a dinner at the time. I saw him again at Washington Square, at a party...

JC: At that time, for you, was there a stronger leaning towards poetry, and the kind of thing that Allen had dealt with?... as opposed to what Woody had dealt with.

BD: Well, the language which they were writing, you could read off the paper, and somehow it would begin some kind of tune in your mind. I don't really know who it was, but you could see it was possible to do more than what... not more... somewhat different than what Woody and people like Aunt Molly Jackson and Jim Garland did. The subject matter of all their songs wasn't really accurate for me; I could see that they'd written thousands of songs, but it was all with the same heartfelt subject matter... whereas that subject matter did not exist then, and I knew it. There was a sort of semi-feeling of it existing, but as you looked around at the people, it didn't really exist the way it probably existed back then, there was no real movement, there was only organized movement. There wasn't any type of movement which was a day by day, livable movement. When that subject matter wasn't there any more for me, the only thing that was there was the style. The idea of this type of song which you can live with in some kind of way, which you don't feel embarrassed about twenty minutes after you've sung it; that type of song where you don't have to question yourself... where you're just wasting your time.

JC: I don't know which was the cart and which was the horse, but people were asking about your music (and Phil Ochs' and others), "Is this stuff poetry or is this song?"

BD: Yes, well you always have people asking questions.

JC: What I'm trying to get at is whether you were reading a lot then, books, literature? Were your thoughts outside of music?

BD: No, my mind was with the music. I tried to read, but I usually would lay the book down. I never have been a fast reader. My thoughts weren't about reading, no... they were just about that feeling that was in the air. I tried to somehow get a hold of that, and write that down, and using my musical training to sort of guide it by, and in the end, have something I could do for a living.

JC: Training!

BD: Yes, training. You have to have some. I can remember traveling through towns, and if somebody played the guitar, that's who you went to see. You didn't necessarily go to meet them, you just went necessarily to watch them, listen to them, and if possible, learn how to do something... whatever he was doing. And usually at that time it was quite a selfish type of thing. You could see the people, and if you knew you could do what they were doing, with just a little practice, and you were looking for something else, you could just move on. But when it was down at the bottom, everyone played the guitar, when you knew that they knew more than you, well, you just had to listen to everybody. It wasn't necessarily a song; It was technique and style, and tricks and all those combinations which go together – which I certainly spent a lot of hours just trying to do what other people have been doing. That's what I mean by training.

JC: It's hard for me, because this is an interview and can't be just a conversation... like the tape recorder is a third element... I can't just say to your face that you did something great, that I admire you...

BD: Well in my mind, let me tell you John, I can see a thousand people who I think are great, but I've given up mentioning any names anymore. Every time I tell somebody who I think is pretty good, they just shrug their shoulders... and so I now do the same thing. Take a fellow like Doc Watson, the fellow can play the guitar with such ability... just like water running. Now where do you place somebody like that in this current flow of music? Now he doesn't use any tricks. But that has to do with age, I imagine, like how long he lives.

JC: I think it's also got to do with the age he comes from, he doesn't come from yours or mine.

BD: No, but I'm a firm believer in the longer you live, the better you get.

JC: But Doc is different from you and me. I know people who hate your voice. They can't stand that sound, that kind of singing, that grating. The existence of your voice and people like you, like Roscoe Holcomb, it challenges their very existence. They can't conceive of that voice in the same breath as their own lives.

BD: Well my voice is one thing, but someone actually having hate for Roscoe Holcomb's voice, that beautiful high tenor, I can't see that. What's the difference between Roscoe Holcomb's voice and Bill Monroe's?

JC: I don't think Bill likes Roscoe's voice. Bill sings with such control. Roscoe's voice is so uncontrolled.

BD: Well Bill Monroe is most likely one of the best, But Roscoe does have a certain untamed sense of control which also makes him one of the best.

JC: I don't think Doc Watson's voice and your voice are compatible, it doesn't bother me.

BD: No, no... maybe some day, though.

JC: I'd like to talk about the material in the songs.

BD: All right.

JC: Well, I mean your music is fine, it's complete... but what I'm asking you about is the development of your thoughts... which could be called "words". That's why I was asking about poetry and literature. Where do these things come upon a person? Maybe nobody asks you that.

BD: No, nobody does, but... who said that, it wasn't Benjamin Franklin, it was somebody else. No, I think it was Benjamin Franklin. He said (I'm not quoting it right) something like, "For a man to be – (something or other) – at ease, he must not tell all he knows, nor say all he sees." Whoever said that certainly I don't think was trying to cover up anything.

JC: I once got a fortune cookie that said "Clear water hides nothing"... Three or four years ago, there was an interview with you in Playboy. One particular thought stuck with me. You said it was very important that Barbara Allen had a rose grow out of her head, and that a girl could become a swan.

BD: That's for all those people who say, "Why do you write all these songs about mystery and magic and Biblical intonations? Why do you do that? Folk music doesn't have any of that." There's no answer for a question like that, because the people who ask them are just wrong.

JC: They say folk music doesn't have this quality. Does rock and roll music have it?

BD: Well, I don't know what rock and roll music is supposed to represent. It isn't that defined as a music. Rock and roll is dance music, perhaps an extension of the blues forms. It's live music; nowadays they have these big speakers, and they play it so loud that it might seem live. But it's got rhythm... I mean if you're riding in your car, rock and roll stations playing, you can sort of get into that rhythm for three minutes – and you lose three minutes. It's all gone by and you don't have to think about anything. And it's got a nice place; in a way this place is not necessarily in every road you turn, it's just pleasant music.

JC: You're part of it aren't you?

BD: Well, music is part of me, yes.

JC: From what I saw in that film, you were really in it.

BD: I was in it because it's what I've always done. I was trying to make the two things go together when I was on those concerts. I played the first half acoustically, second half with a band, somehow thinking that it was going to be two kinds of music.

JC: So acoustic would mean "folk" and band would mean "rock and roll" at that moment?

BD: Yes, rock and roll is working music. You have to work at it. You just can't sit down in a chair and play rock and roll music. You can do that with a certain kind of blues music, you can sit down and play it... you may have to lean forward a little.

JC: Like a ballad, or one of your "dreams".

BD: Yes, you can think about it, you don't necessarily have to be in action to think about it. Rock and roll is hard to visualize unless you're actually doing it... Actually too, we're talking about something which is for the most part just a commercial item; it's like boats and brooms, it's like hardware, people sell it, so that's what we're talking about. In the other sense of the way which you'd think about it, it's impossible.

JC: But the kids who are getting into it today, they don't want to sell brooms.

BD: It's an interesting field...

(aside to daughter)

Hello, did you just get home? Well maybe you better ask mamma. How was school? You learn anything? Well that's good. "My shoes hurt right here." Well, we'll see what we can do about it.

JC: Could we talk about your new record John Wesley Harding?

BD: There were three sessions: September, October and December, so it's not even a year old. I know that the concepts are imbedded now, whereas before that record I was just trying to see all of which I could do, trying to structure this and that. Every record was more or less for impact. Why, I did one song on a whole side of an album! It could happen to anybody. One just doesn't think of those things though, when one sees that other things can be done. It was spontaneously thought out, all those seven record albums. It was generously done, the material was out there. Now, I like to think that I can do it, do it better, on my own terms, and I'll do whatever it is I can do. I used to slight it off all the time. I used to get a good phrase or a verse, and then have to carry it to write something off the top of the head and stick it in the middle, to lead this into that. Now as I hear all the old material that was done, I can see the whole thing. I can't see how to perfect it, but I can see what I've done. Now I can go from line to line whereas yesterday it was from thought to thought. Then of course, there are times you just pick up an instrument – something will come, like a tune or some kind of wild line will come into your head and you'll develop that. If it's a tune on a piano or guitar - you'll just uuuuuuhhhh (hum) whatever it brings out in the voice, you'll write those words down. And they might not mean anything to you at all, and you just go on, and that will be what happens. Now I don't do that anymore. If I do it, I just keep it for myself. So I have a big line-up of songs which I'll never use. On the new record, it's more concise. Here I am not interested in taking up that much of anybody's time.

JC: That's why I gave you Kafka's Parables and Paradoxes, because those stories really get to the heart of the matter, and yet you can never really decipher them.

BD: Yes, but the only parables that I know are the Biblical parables. I've seen others. Khalil Gibran perhaps... It has a funny aspect to it – you certainly wouldn't find it in the Bible – this type of soul. Now Mr. Kafka comes off a little closer to that. Gibran, the words are all mighty but the strength is turned into that of a contrary direction. There used to be this disc jockey, Rosko. I don't recall his last name. Sometimes at night, the radio would be on and Rosko would be reciting this poetry of Khalil Gibran. It was a radiant feeling, coming across it on the radio. His voice was that of the inner voice in the night.

JC: When did you read the Bible parables?

BD: I have always read the Bible, though not necessarily always the parables.

JC: I don't think you're the kind who goes to the hotel, where the Gideons leave a Bible, and you pick it up.

BD: Well, you never know.

JC: What about Blake, did you ever read...?

BD: I have tried. Same with Dante, and Rilke. I understand what's there, it's just that the connection sometimes does not connect... Blake did come up with some bold lines though.

JC: A feeling I got from watching the film – which I hadn't considered much before folk music and rock & roll got so mixed together – is about this personal thing of put-ons, as a personal relationship. Like with the press, they ask such idiotic questions that they are answered by put-ons.

BD: The only thing there, is that that becomes a game in itself. The only way to not get involved in that is not to do it, because it'll happen every time. It evens happens with the housewives who might be asked certain questions.

JC: It's become a way of imparting information. Like someone will come with an idea, a whole thesis, and then they'll ask, "Is this so?" and you might not have thought of it before, but you can crawl on top of it.

BD: It's this question and answer business. I can't see the importance of it. There's so many reporters now. That's an occupation in itself. You don't have to be any good at it at all. You get to go to fancy places. It's all on somebody else.

JC: Ridiculous questions get ridiculous answers, and the ridiculous response becomes the great moment.

BD: Yes, well you have to be able to do that now. I don't know who started that, but it happens to everybody.

JC: I wouldn't have mentioned it, but to me, you've moved away from it... gotten beyond it.

BD: I don't know if I've gotten beyond it. I just don't do it any more, because that's what you end up doing. You end up wondering what you're doing.

JC: Hey. In the film, was that John Lennon with you in the car, where you're holding your head? He was saying something funny, but it was more than that... it was thoughtful.

BD: He said "Money"...

JC: Do you see the Beatles when you go there or they come here? There seems to be a mutual respect between your musics – without one dominating the other.

BD: I see them here and there.

JC: I fear that many of the creative young musicians today may look back at themselves ten years from now and say "We were just under the tent of the Beatles." But you're not.

BD: Well, what they do... they work much more with the studio equipment, they take advantage of the new sound inventions of the past year or two. Whereas I don't know anything about it. I just do the songs, and sing them and that's all.

JC: Do you think they are more British or International?

BD: They're British I suppose, but you can't say they've carried on with their poetic legacy, whereas the Incredible String Band who wrote this October Song... that was quite good.

JC: As a finished thing – or did it reach you?

BD: As a finished song it's quite good.

JC: Is there much music now that you hear, that reaches you?

BD: Those old songs reach me. I don't hear them as often as I used to. But like this other week, I heard on the radio Buell Kazee and he reached me. There's a lot... Scrapper Blackwell, Leroy Carr, Jack Dupree, Lonnie Johnson, James Ferris, Jelly Roll Morton, Buddy Bolden, Ian and Sylvia, Benny Fergusen, Tom Rush, Charlie Pride, Porter Wagoner, The Clancy Brothers and Tommy Makem... Everything reaches me in one way or another.

JC: How do you view the music business?

BD: I don't exactly view it at all. Hearing it and doing it, It'll take part in that – but talking about it... there's not much I can contribute to it.

JC: I recall in Billboard, a full page ad of you with electric guitar like in the movie...

BD: Sure, I was doing that.

JC: I'm interested how you talk of it in the past tense, as if you don't know what's coming next.

BD: Well, I don't in a sense... But I've been toying with some ridiculous ideas – just so strange and foreign to me, as a month ago. Now some of the ideas – I'll tell you about them – after we shut off this tape recorder.

JC: I was pleased that you know the music of Dillard Chandler, and that you were familiar with some unaccompanied ballads on a New Lost City Ramblers record. Do you think you'll ever try to write like a ballad?

BD: Yes, I hope so. Tom Paxton just did one called The Cardinal, quite interesting... it's very clean... sings it unaccompanied. The thing about the ballad is that you have to be conscious of the width of it at all times, in order to write one. You could take a true story, write it up as a ballad, or you can write it up in three verses. The difference would be, what are you singing it for, what is it to be used for. The uses of a ballad have changed to such a degree. When they were singing years ago, it would be as entertainment... a fellow could sit down and sing a song for half an hour, and everybody could listen, and you could form opinions. You'd be waiting to see how it ended, what happened to this person or that person. It would be like going to a movie. But now we have movies, so why does someone want to sit around for a half hour listening to a ballad? Unless the story was of such a nature that you couldn't find it in a movie. And after you heard it, it would have to be good enough so that you could sing it again tomorrow night, and people would be listening to hear the story again. It's because they want to hear that story, not because they want to check out the singer's pants. Because they would have a conscious knowledge of how the story felt and they would be a part of that feeling... like they would want to feel it again, so to speak.

JC: It must be terrific to try to write within those dimensions.

BD: Well once you set it up in your mind, you don't have to think about it any more. If it wants to come, it will come.

JC: Take a song like The Wicked Messenger. Does that fit?

BD: In a sense, but the ballad form isn't there. Well the scope is there actually, but in a more compressed sense. The scope opens up, just by a few little tricks. I know why it opens up, but in a ballad in the true sense, it wouldn't open up that way. It does not reach the proportions I had intended for it.

JC: Have you ever written a ballad?

BD: I believe on my second record album, Boots Of Spanish Leather.

JC: Then most of the songs on John Wesley Harding, you don't consider as ballads.

BD: Well I do, but not in the traditional sense. I haven't fulfilled the balladeers job. A balladeer can sit down and sing three ballads for an hour and a half. See, on the album, you have to think about it after you hear it, that's what takes up the time, but with a ballad, you don't necessarily have to think about it after you hear it, it can all unfold on you. These melodies on the John Wesley Harding album lack this traditional sense of time. As with the third verse of the Wicked Messenger, which opens it up, and then the time schedule takes a jump and soon the song becomes wider. One realizes that when one hears it, but one might have to adapt to it. But we are not hearing anything that isn't there; anything we can imagine is really there. The same thing is true of the song All Along The Watchtower, which opens up in a slightly different way, in a stranger way, for here we have the cycle of events working in a rather reverse order.

JC: One suggested interpretation of Dear Landlord is that you wrote it to bring out the line "each one has his own special gift"...

BD: I don't know about that. These songs might lay around in your head for two or three years, and you're always writing about something previous. You learn to do that, so that the song would not tend to be a reaction, something contemporary would make it a reaction. I don't know what it seems to explain any more than anybody else. But you always have to consider that I would write the song for somebody else. He might say something, or behave in a certain manner, or come right out and offer information like that. And if it's striking enough, it might find an opening. And don't forget now John. I'll tell you another discovery I've made. When the songs are done by anybody on a record, on a strange level the songs are done for somebody, about somebody and to somebody. Usually that person is the somebody who is singing that song. Hear all the records that have ever been made and it kinda comes down to that after a while.

JC: Could you talk about where you were going when you first started out from home?

BD: As I think about it, it's confusing to me to think of how I reached whatever place this is. I tend not to wonder about it anyway. It's true, I have no goal so to speak. I don't have any more intentions than you do.

JC: I intend to do my work.

BD: Yes, me too, and to make the world interesting enough, in order to keep doing it. That's what has kept it up so far. I really can't do it if it's not interesting. My intention would be not to think about it, not to speak about it, or remember any of it that might tend to block it up somehow. I've discovered this from the past anyway. There was one thing I tried to do that wasn't a good idea for me. I tried to write another Mr Tambourine Man. It's the only song I tried to write "another one". But after enough going at it, it just began bothering me, so I dropped it. I don't do that anymore.

JC: A danger of such a position is that you can be accused of only living in the present. People will say you're just living for the minute – with no plan and no care for the past.

BD: I have more memories for the past than for the future. I wouldn't think about the future. I would only have expectations, and they'd all be very good. For the past I just have those memories. We were just talking of this "past" business the other night. Say this room is empty now, except with just myself. Now you enter the room, but you're bound to leave, and when you do, what's to guarantee that you've been in this room. But you were in this room, if I want to reconstruct it, sit here for the rest of the day... if I take enough notes while you are in the room, I could possibly sit here for a week, with you in the room... something like that anyway.

JC: It's elusive. Anyway, back to the thought of "each one has his own special gift".

BD: That would be... just a fact.

JC: But if everybody felt it, perhaps the American army wouldn't be so capable of killing, and Kennedy might not be killed – King might not be killed.

BD: But we're talking now about things that have always happened since the beginning of time, the specific name or deed isn't any different than that which has happened previous to this. Progress hasn't contributed anything but changing face... and changing situations of money, wealth... that's not progress really. Progress for disease – that's progress... but putting in a new highway through a backyard is getting rid of the old things.

JC: The real progress each person makes is not going outwards but going inwards. I have the feeling that a change has come over you... seem to have discovered that same idea.

BD: Well, I discover ideas here and there, but I can't put them into words.

JC: You mean, that by the time they are songs, they're said?

BD: Well, the songs are a funny thing. If I didn't have the recording contract and I didn't have to fulfill a certain amount of records, I don't really know if I'd write down another song as long as I lived. I'm just content enough to play just anything I know. But seeing as how I do have this contract, I figure my obligation is to fill it, not in just recording songs, but the best songs I can possibly record. Believe me, I look around. I don't care if I record my own songs, but I can't sometimes find enough songs to put on an album, so then I've got to do it all with my songs. I didn't want to record this last album. I was going to do a whole album of other peoples songs, but I couldn't find enough. The song has to be of a certain quality for me to sing and put on a record. One aspect it would have to have is that it didn't repeat itself. I shy away from those songs which repeat phrases, bars and verses, bridges... so right there it leaves out about nine-tenths of all the contemporary material being written, and the folk songs are just about the only ones that don't... the narrative ones, or the ones with a chorus like Ruben's Train. I don't know, maybe then too I'm just too lazy to look hard enough.

JC: Do you consider that there's been a change of pace in your life over the past three years?

BD: "Change of pace" if you mean what I was doing before. I was touring for a couple of years. That's a fast pace, plus we were doing a whole show, no other acts. It's pretty straining to do a show like that, plus a lot of really unhealthy situations rise up. I was just going out there performing these songs. Everyone else was having a good time. Right now I don't think about it anymore. I did it, and I did it enough to know that there must be something else to do.

JC: In a way, you had the opportunity to move into it and move out of it at your own choice.

BD: It wasn't my own choice. I was more or less being pushed into it – pushed in and carried out.

Enter Happy Traum

HT: Has anyone picked up on your new approach – like on the album, clear songs and very personal, as opposed to the psychedelic sounds?

BD: I don't know.

HT: What do you know?

BD: What I do know is that I put myself out of the songs. I'm not in the songs anymore, I'm just there singing them, and I'm not personally connected with them. I write them all now at a different time than when I record them. It used to be, if I would sing, I'd get a verse and go on and wait for it to come out as the music was there, and sure enough, something would come out, but in the end, I would be deluded in those songs. Besides singing them, I'd be in there acting them out – just pulling them off. Now I have enough time to write the song and not think about being in it. Just write it for somebody else to sing, then do it – like an acetate. At the moment, people are singing a simpler song. It's possible in Nashville to do that.

JC: I heard Blowin' In The Wind played on the radio after the most recent assassination.

BD: By who?

JC: It was muzac style... music to console yourself by.

BD: Airplane style.

JC: Do you think you'll ever get a job playing for muzac? The best musicians do that work, Bob.

BD: Well I'd give it a try if they ask.

JC: No one calls you into the studio to "Lay down some music" as they say.

BD: Before I did the new album, I was waiting to meet someone who would figure out what they would want me to do. Does anybody want any songs written about anything? Could Bob be commissioned, by anybody? Nobody came up with anything, so I went ahead and did something else.

JC: For a while a number of years ago, the songs you were writing, and that others were writing along similar lines, were played a lot on popular radio. Today it's not completely disappeared, but it certainly is going in some other direction.

BD: You just about have to cut something tailor-made for the popular radio. You can't do it with just half a mind. You must be conscious of what you're involved in. I get overanxious when I hear myself on the radio, anyway. I don't mind the record album, but it's the record company, my A&R man, Bob Johnston – he would pick out what's to be played on the radio.

HT: Did you ever make a song just to be a single?

BD: Yes I did. But it wasn't very amusing because it took me away from the album. The album commands a different sort of attention than a single does. Singles just pile up and pile up; they're only good for the present. The trend in the old days was that unless you had a hit single, you couldn't do very well with an album. And when you had that album, you just filled it up. But now albums are very important.

JC: You've tried movies and books...

BD: In both cases, in shallow water.

JC: In that book of photographs of you that was published, when I finished looking at it, I came away knowing not one bit more than when I started.

BD: Yes, well what can you know about anybody? Book or photographs, they don't tell you too much about a person.

HT: For years now, people have been analyzing and pulling apart your songs. People take lines out of context and use them to illustrate points, like on Quinn The Eskimo... I've heard some kids say that "Quinn is the bringer of drugs." Whatever you meant doesn't matter... the kids say "Dylan is really into this drug thing... when the drugs come, everybody is happy." This kind of thing is always happening with all of your songs.

BD: Well, that's not my concern.

JC: Many of the songs have set up conditions where people can read whatever they want into them.

HT: People pull them apart and analyze them.

BD: It's not everyone who does that – just a certain kind. People I come in contact with don't have any questions.

HT: Perhaps that's come back lately in the very spontaneous art, in the whole multi-media kind of thing. Response to impulses... you can't respond any other way.

JC: I think it's to anyone's favor that they can follow what's on their mind, what comes from within them, rather than getting swept up in all these other possibilities... which might be just a reaction against the analytic approach anyway. There is another way... someone might just follow his inner course... without being unaware of what is going on. Bob, how do you respond to multi-media?

BD: When you say multi-media, would that be like the clothes stores?

JC: Never having been to one, I'll say yes.

BD: I've never been to one either.

HT: It's also stage presentations where music, dance, lights and the rest are jumbled together, piled on the viewer, where all the senses are used.

JC: In that context of multi-media, where are you?

BD: Well I'm a very simple man. I take one, maybe two... too much just confuses me. I just can't master confusion. If I don't know what's happening and everyone who goes and tells me just says that they don't know what happened any more than I do, and they were there, then I'd say that I didn't know where we were.

HT: Do you feel the same way about the psychedelic sound on records?

BD: No, I don't.

HT: A lot of the music today is not only very loud and very fast, but it's structured in such a way that a lot of instruments are playing at once, with a lot of distortion.

BD: That's fine. A lot of people playing it.

HT: You seem to have made a conscious effort away from that on your last record.

BD: It was a conscious effort just to begin again. It wasn't a conscious effort to go in a certain direction, but rather like put up or shut up so-to-speak. So that's all.

JC: I see that picture of Muhammed Ali here. Do you know him?

BD: No, I've seen him perform a few times.

HT: Do you follow the fights?

BD: Not any more. When he came down to Bleeker Street to read his poetry, you would have wished you were there.

JC: He really made a point that lasted afterwards – beyond that someone got conked.

HT: Not being particularly interested in fighting, what impressed me is how he stayed true to himself – his own stand as a human being was more important to himself than the championship.

JC: Could you talk about some of the diverse elements which go into making up one of your songs, using a song from which you have some distance?

BD: Well, there's not much we could talk about – that's the strange aspect about the whole thing. There's nothing you can see. I wouldn't know where to begin.

JC: Take a song like I Pity The Poor Immigrant. There might have been a germ that started it.

BD: Yes, the first line.

JC: What experience might have triggered that? Like you kicked the cat who ran away, who said "Ouch!" which reminded you of an immigrant.

BD: To tell you the truth, I have no idea how it comes into my mind.

JC: You've said there was a person usually in it.

BD: Well, we're all in it. They're not any specific people... say, someone kicks the cat, and the cat writes a song about it. It might seem that way, during some of the songs, and in some of the poetry that's being passed around now-a-days. But it's not really that way.

JC: You said that often a song is written for a certain person.

BD: That's for a person, not about him. You know, you might sometimes be with someone who's got no song to sing, and I believe you can help someone out, that's the extent of it really.

JC: Well, Quinn The Eskimo wasn't that way.

BD: You see, it's all grown so serious, the writing-song business. It's not that serious. The songs don't painfully come out. They come out in a trick or two, or from something you might overhear. I'm just like any other songwriter, you pick up the things that are given to you. Quinn The Eskimo, I can't remember how that came about. I know the phrase came about, I believe someone was just talking about Quinn, the Eskimo.

JC: Someone told me there was once a movie with Anthony Quinn playing an Eskimo. Did you know of that?

BD: I didn't see the movie.

JC: But that could have triggered it.

BD: Of course.

JC: This makes a lot of sense, in the sense that you can travel down a road, and see two signs advertising separate things, but where two words come together, it will make a new meaning which will trigger off something.

BD: Well, what the songwriter does, is just connect the ends. The ends that he sees are the ones that are given to him and he connects them.

HT: It seems that people are bombarded all the time with random thoughts and outside impulses and it takes the songwriter to pick something out and create a song out of them.

BD: It's like this painter who lives around here – he paints the area in a radius of twenty miles, he paints bright strong pictures. He might take a barn from twenty miles away, and hook it up with a brook right next door, then with a car ten miles away, and with the sky on some certain day. A person passing by will be painted alongside someone ten miles away. And in the end he'll have this composite picture of something which you can't say exists in his mind. It's not that he started off willfully painting this picture from all his experience... That's more or less what I do.

JC: Which and where is Highway 61?

BD: I knew at one time, but at this time it seems so far away I wouldn't even attempt it. It's out there, it's a dividing line.

JC: Is it a physical Highway 61?

BD: Oh yes, it goes from where I used to live... I used to live related to that highway. It ran right through my home town in Minnesota. I traveled it for a long period of time actually. It goes down the middle of the country, sort of southwest.

JC: I think there is an old blues about Highway 61.

BD: Same highway, lot of famous people came off that highway.

JC: Can you keep contact with the young audiences who perhaps buy most of your records?

BD: That's a vague notion, that one must keep contact with a certain illusion of people which are sort of indefinable. The most you can do is satisfy yourself. If you satisfy yourself then you don't have to worry about remembering anything. If you don't satisfy yourself, and you don't know why you're doing what you do, you begin to lose contact. If you're doing it for them instead of you, you're likely not in contact with them. You can't pretend you're in contact with something you're not. I don't really know who I'm in contact with, but I don't think it's important.

JC: Well, on the airplanes, they have these seven channels of stereo, and your music is marked as "for the kids" rather than anywhere else, and it sort of bothered me. Do you have a chance to meet the kids?

BD: I always like to meet the kids.

JC: Do you get a chance?

BD: Not so much when I'm touring as when I'm not touring. When you're touring, you don't get a chance to meet anybody. I've just been meeting people again in the last few years.

JC: It's a strange phenomenon, for you reach them the most when you are on tour yet you can't reach them at all.

BD: Well yes, but the next time I go out, it's going to be a little bit more understandable. Next time out, my hopes are to play the music in a different way.

HT: How can you get around the problems you encountered last time?

BD: I'm not really aware of those problems. I know they exist because it was very straining, and that's not the way work should be. But it's a situation that's pretty much all over... the screaming. Even some musician like Jimi Hendrix gets people seeing him who aren't coming there to scream – they're coming to hear him.

HT: Do you see any way you can approach your music in a public way, that would give a different perspective to an audience?

BD: Yes. Just playing the songs. See, the last time we went out, we made too much of a production of the songs. They were all longer, they were all my own songs, not too much thought had gone into the program, it just evolved itself from when I was playing single.

JC: And the film we've been discussing, is that a fair summary of that kind of tour?

BD: Yes it was. I hope people get a chance to see that film.

JC: Why do you think your music appeals to American Indians?

BD: I would hope that it appeals to everybody.

JC: I know suburban people can't stand it.

BD: Well, I wish there was more I could do about that.

JC: We just heard your record being played at an elegant store in New York City, as the background for people shopping.

HT: Pete Seeger told me the John Wesley Harding album is great to skate to. He said some records are good to skate to and some aren't, and that's a good one.

BD: I'm awfully glad he feels that way about it.

JC: What is your relationship to student groups, or black militants, like the kids at Columbia or at Berkeley?

BD: If I met them at all, I would meet them individually; I have no special relationship to any group.

JC: Do you follow these events, even from a distance, like reading a newspaper?

BD: Just like anyone else. I know just as much about it as the lady across the street does, and she probably knows quite a bit. Just reading the papers, talking to the neighbors, and so forth.

JC: These groups feel more about you than they do about that lady next door.

BD: I can assure you I feel the same thing. There are people who are involved in it and people who are not. You see, to be involved, you just about have to be there, I couldn't think about it any other way.

JC: Someone like Pete Seeger, who is different from all of us in this room, he reaches out.

BD: But how much of a part of it is he?

HT: Do you foresee a time when you're going to have to take some kind of a position?

BD: No.

HT: You don't think that events will ever reach you?

BD: It's not that events won't reach me, it's more a case of what I, myself would reach for. The decisions I would have to make are my own decisions, just like anyone else has to make his own. It doesn't necessarily mean that any position must be taken.

JC: Although I asked it, this is not really the kind of question I'm really concerned with. After all, if someone asked me, I could only say I do what I can, I sing my own music, and if they like to hear it, well, fine.

BD: Yes, but I don't know... What was the question again? You must define it better.

HT: I think that every day we get closer to having to make a choice.

BD: How so?

HT: I think that events of the world are getting closer to us, they're as close as the nearest ghetto.

BD: Where's the nearest ghetto?

HT: Maybe down the block. Events are moving on a mass scale.

BD: What events?

HT: War, racial problems, violence in the streets.

JC: Here's a funny aspect; we're talking like this here, but in a strange way, Bob has gone further than you or I in getting into such places. I just have heard from Izzy Young that the songs they were singing at Resurrection City were Blowin' In The Wind and The Times They Are Changin'. So in a sense by maintaining his own individual position, Bob and his songs are in the ghetto, and the people there are singing them – to them they mean action.

HT: Well, the kids at Columbia University are taking a particular stand on what they see as the existing evils. They're trying to get their own say in the world, and in a way trying to overcome the people ruling them, and there are powerful people who are running the show. They can be called the establishment, and they are the same people who make wars, that build the missiles, that manufacture the instruments of death.

BD: Well, that's just the way the world is going.

HT: The students are trying to make it go another way.

BD: Well, I'm for the students of course, they're going to be taking over the world. The people who they're fighting are old people, the old ideas. They don't have to fight, they can sit back and wait.

HT: The old ideas have the guns, though.

JC: Perhaps the challenge is to make sure that the young minds growing up remain open enough so that they don't become the establishment that they are fighting.

BD: You read about these rebels in the cartoons, people who were rebels in the twenties, in the thirties, and they have children who are rebels, and they forget that they were rebels. Do you think that those who are rioting today will somehow have to hold their kids back from doing the same thing.

JC: Are your day-to-day contacts among the artists, crusaders, businessmen or lumberjacks?

BD: Among the artists and lumberjacks.

JC: Crusaders?

BD: Well, you mean the people who are going from here to there, the men in long brown robes and little ivy twines on their head? I know quite a few crusaders but don't have much contact with them.

JC: How about leaders of the student groups? Did you know Malcolm X, or the kids from SNCC?

BD: I used to know some of them.

JC: Social crusaders, someone like Norman Mailer.

BD: No.

JC: What about businessmen?

BD: I get a lot of visitors and see a lot of people, and who's a businessman? I'm sure a whole lot of businessmen have passed by the past few hours, but my recollection really isn't that brilliant.

JC: Does your management serve as a buffer in translating your artistic works into business?

BD: I'm just very thankful that my management is there to serve what purpose a management serves. Every artist must have one these days.

JC: Would you talk of any of the positive things that drugs have to offer, how they might have affected your work?

BD: I wouldn't think they have anything to offer. I'm speaking about drugs in the everyday sense of the word. From my own experience they would have nothing positive to offer, but I'm not speaking for anyone else. Someone else might see them offering a great deal.

JC: But in the way of insights or new combinations, it never affected you that way?

BD: No, you get those same insights over a period of time anyway.

JC: For a while you were working on a book, they gave it a name Tarantula. Have you tried any other writing since then, or did you learn anything from the experience of trying?

BD: Yes, I do have a book in me, it'll be out sometime. MacMillan will publish it.

JC: Did you learn from the one you did reject?

BD: I learned not to do a book like that. That book was the kind of thing where the contract comes in before the book is written, so you have to fulfill the contract.

JC: In thinking over this interview thus far, it seems like that has happened to you several times over the recent years, not necessarily of your choosing.

BD: Yes, that's true. But it happens to other people and they come through. Dostoevsky did it, he had a weekly number of words to get in. I understand Frederick Murray does it, and John Updike must... For someone else it might be exactly what they always had wished.

JC: In trying to write it, was it a difficulty of structure or concept?

BD: No, there was no difficulty in writing it at all. It just wasn't a book. It didn't have that certain quality which now I think a book should have. It didn't have any structure at all, it was just one flow. It flowed for ninety pages.

JC: I'm thinking of a parallel. You know some of these old crazy talking blues? They go on where just the last phrase of a sentence connects up to the next sentence, but the two thoughts aren't related. "Slipping up and down the mantle piece, feet in a bucket of grease, hunting matches, etc." Did it go that way?

BD: More or less. They were short little lines, nothing within a big framework. I couldn't even conceive of doing anything within a big framework at that time. I was doing something else.

HT: Do you think future writings will use the poetic form or the novel?

BD: I think I will have everything in it.

JC: Listening to the car radio, I heard you have a song on the country music stations, I'll Be Your Baby Tonight. I can't remember the singer's name, but I understand that Burl Ives has also recorded it.

BD: A lot of people recorded them, they always do a good job.

JC: When did you first hear Burl Ives?

BD: I first heard Burl Ives when I was knee-high to a grasshopper.

JC: Was that folk music to you when you first heard it?

BD: Yes, I guess everybody's heard those old Burl Ives records on Decca, with a picture of him in a striped T-shirt, holding a guitar up to his ear, just wailing.

JC: Did you know that his first recordings were for Moe Asch (of Folkways Records)? Alan Lomax had brought him in. Who made the first recordings you are on?

BD: I recorded with Big Joe Williams.

JC: Where did this Blind Boy Grunt thing come in?

BD: Someone told me to come down 'cause they were doing some kind of an album. So I was there and singing this song, and it only had a couple of verses and that's all, so someone in the control booth said, "Do some more." I said well, there is no more, I can't sing no more. The fellow says "If you can't sing, GRUNT." So I said "Grunt?" Then someone else sitting at a desk to my left says, "What name shall I put down on this record?" and I said "Grunt." She said "Just Grunt?" Then the fellow in the control booth said "Grunt." Somebody came in the door then and said "Was that Blind Boy Grunt?" and the lady at the desk said "Yes it was".

JC: Was this Moe Asch and Marion Distler?

BD: It could have been.

JC: My last question is really a rehash of one aspect we've already discussed; at the moment, your songs aren't as socially or politically applicable as they were earlier.

BD: As they were earlier? Could it be that they are just as social and political, only that no one cares to... let's start with the question again. (JC repeats question) Probably that is because no one cares to see it the way I'm seeing it now, whereas before, I saw it the way they saw it.

HT: You hear a lot about the word "engaged" artists. Painters, film makers, actors, they're actively involved in current events, through their art.

BD: Well, even Michelangelo though...

HT: Many artists feel that at this particular time in history, they can't just do their thing without regarding the larger scale around them.

BD: The thing is, if you can get the scales around you in whatever you create, that's nice. If you physically have to go out there and experience it time and time again, you're talking about something else.

HT: Probably the most pressing thing going on in a political sense, is the war. Now I'm not saying any artist or group of artists can change the course of the war, but they still feel it their responsibility to say something.

BD: I know some very good artists who are for the war.

HT: Well I'm just talking about the ones who are against it.

BD: That's like what I'm talking about; it's for or against the war. That really doesn't exist. It's not for or against the war. I'm speaking of a certain painter, and he's all for the war. He's just about ready to go over there himself. And I can comprehend him.

HT: Why can't you argue with him?

BD: I can see what goes into his paintings, and why should I?

HT: I don't understand how that relates to whether a position should be taken.

BD: Well, there's nothing for us to talk about really.

JC: Someone just told me that the poet and artist William Blake harboured Tom Paine when it was dangerous to do so. Yet Blake's artistic production was mystical and introspective.

HT: Well, he separated his work from his other activity. My feeling is that with a person who is for the war and ready to go over there, I don't think it would be possible for you and him to share the same basic values.

BD: I've known him for a long time, he's a gentleman and I admire him, he's a friend of mine. People just have their views. Anyway, how do you know I'm not, as you say, for the war?

JC: Is this comparable? I was working on a fireplace with an old local stone mason last summer, while running off to sing at the New Politics Convention. When I returned I was chopping rocks with him, and he says, "All the trouble today is caused by people like Martin Luther King." Now I respect that man, not for his comments on Dr. King, but for his work with stone, his outlook on his craft, and on work and life, in the terms he sees it. It is a dilemma.

HT: I think it is the easy way out, to say that. You have to feel strongly about your own ideas, even if you can respect someone else for their ideas. (to Bob) I don't feel there is that much difference between your work now and your earlier work. I can see a continuity of ideas, although they're not politically as black and white as they once were. Masters Of War was a pretty black and white song. It wasn't too equivocal. You took a stand.

BD: That was an easy thing to do. There were thousands and thousands of people just wanting that song, so I wrote it up. What I'm doing now isn't more difficult, but I no longer have the capacity to feed this voice which is needing all these songs. I know the force exists but my insight has turned into something else. I might meet one person now, and the same thing can happen between that one person (and myself) that used to happen between thousands.

JC: This leads right to the last statement on my interview list: On your latest album, the focus has become more on the individual, axioms and ideas about living, rather than about society's doings or indictments of groups of people. In other words, it's more of how one individual is to act.

BD: Yes, in a way... in a way. I would imagine that's just the way we grow.

Dylan's Country Pie

> Raspberry, strawberry, lemon and lime,
> What do I care?
> Blueberry, apple, cherry, pumpkin and plum,
> Call me for dinner, honey, I'll be there.

These lines from "Country Pie" one of the ten songs on Bob Dylan's new Columbia album, Nashville Skyline, are a kind of declaration of independence, just as the song itself, with its country lyrics and jaunty Nashville sound, illustrates the character of the new record. When Dylan talks of eating pies, all kinds, he means writing songs, all kinds. And when he goes on in the song to say "Ain't runnin' any race" he seems to be rejecting the musical direction his many admirers have chosen for him in the past or would choose for him in the future.

Like almost every Dylan album, Nashville Skyline is full of surprises, perhaps even more than Another Side of Bob Dylan in 1964, in which he half turned away from topical protests like "Blowin' in the Wind," or the shock of 1965's Bringing It All Back Home, when he fused folk and rock and electrified both his instruments and his audience, or last year's John Wesley Harding, in which Dylan switched to a series of narrative ballads, simple, mournful and mystical.

This new album is country Dylan, a collection of unaffected and highly tuneful love songs, riding comfortably cushioned on the Nashville sound, which sometimes, as in "To Be Alone With You" or "One More Night," is pure Country and Western, but which for the most part is just a relaxed get-together of expert musicians who seem to know each other's – and Dylan's – moves as if they were playing at the Grand Ole Opry.

And just to make his point clear, Dylan starts the album off in a duet with the great country singer Johnny Cash, singing an old Dylan song called "Girl From The North Country." The blend of Dylan's light voice and Cash's melodious baritone is as rough in texture and as unassuming as if they happened to meet on the street and burst into song. As a matter of fact, they almost did. When Dylan was asked how this duet with Cash came about, his first reply was. "He happened to be in Nashville at the time." His follow-up was. "It's a great privilege to sing with Johnny Cash."

The great charm of the album is in the variety of pretty songs and the ways Dylan, both as composer and performer, has found to exploit subtle differences on a deliberately limited emotional and verbal scale. In the oddly syncopated "Lay Lady Lay," in the mocking musical figures of the plaintive "Tell Me That It Isn't True" and in the bluesy "Tonight I'll Be Staying Here With You" each melody is distinct and distinctive, the rhythms varied and complex, the music delicately and expressively colored. "Peggy Day" is almost a pastiche of the Thirties – its rhythms recall "swing" and Dylan sings with the kind of light-hearted showmanship that used to come from college bandstands. And if in the songs the words are plain and direct, they do not lack cunning: "Love to spend the night with Peggy Day" and, later, "Love to spend the day with Peggy Night."

Bob Dylan is still staying pretty much out of public sight in Woodstock, New York, although he confesses that plans for public appearances are afoot. He expects to appear on Johnny Cash's television show this summer: "Fair is fair," says Dylan. In his diffident way, he is apparently pleased with his new album. "These are the type of songs that I always felt like writing when I've been alone to do so." he says. "The songs reflect more of the inner me than the songs of the past. They're more to my base than, say John Wesley Harding. There I felt everyone expected me to be a poet so that's what I tried to be. But the smallest line in this new album means more to me than some of the songs on any of the previous albums I've made."

The base that Dylan refers to is the musicians and the music he knew before he came to New York. "The people who shaped my style were performers like Elvis Presley, Buddy Holly, Hank Thompson." He sank back on his couch recalling the earlier years, out of which came "Blowin' in the Wind," "A Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall" and "The Times They Are A-Changin'." "Those songs were all written in the New York atmosphere. I'd never have written any of them – or sung them the way I did – if I hadn't been sitting around listening to performers in New York cafes and the talk in all the dingy parlors. When I got to New York it was obvious that something was going on – folk music – and I did my best to learn and play it. I was just there at the right time with pen in hand. I suppose there was some ambition in what I did. But I tried to make the songs genuine."

Among the things that Dylan was willing to say pleased him on the new record were the venturesomeness of the music, the extra and unusual guitar chording, the growing melodic nature of his songs. "I admire the spirit to the music," he says. "It's got a good spirit." Good? "Yes, like a good door, a good house, a good car, a good road, a good girl. I feel like writing a whole lot more of them too. "

Ray Connolly Interview, Woodstock, New York

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 103-104.

Connolly, an English reporter, traveled to Woodstock shortly before the Isle of Wight festival to conduct this interview which was printed in the London Evening Standard on August 16 1969.

DYLAN'S TICKET TO RIDE

It is the time for the rekindling of what we loosely describe as the legends of contemporary music. At the beginning of this month, the biggest legend of them all, Elvis Presley, re-emerged in a place as unlikely as the International Hotel, Las Vegas, and at the end of the month it will be the turn of Bob Dylan in an even more unlikely place – the Isle of Wight. This is Dylan's first appearance in Britain for over three years, and his biggest engagement since he retreated into the life of a semi-recluse following his motorcycle accident, and he's working hard at the moment rehearsing for his re-entry into the public spotlight.

I spoke to him this week at his Woodstock, New York, home, a large estate in the mountains just to the West of the Hudson River. He's been living up there in comparative seclusion with just his wife and family (which increases at regular yearly intervals) since shortly before his accident in 1966.

"I don't really live such a secluded life as they'd have you believe," he drones, and one is immediately brought up short by his obvious willingness, no – anxiety, to be friendly. "I'm just living a normal happy life like any other guy."

The apparent bonhomie of the man is indeed a shock. Last time he visited Britain he avoided the Press like they had the bubonic plague, and since his semi-incarceration, he's hardly been the most gregarious of persons. But now he's looking forward to his appearance at the Isle of Wight Festival of Music on August 31 and he's about as benign and friendly as anyone can remember.

"I'm very anxious to get back on the stage. Singing and playing my music is just what I like to do. When I come back I'll be with the Band, of course, but I'll be doing some of those old songs with just the guitar and harmonica, too. My range of songs should be much bigger this time than on my last tour. Really I hope to be able to sing just whatever the people want to hear, including something from my last album. I think I like that the best of all I've done.

"The reason I started off playing with just that acoustical sound was an economic one. Between about 1958 and 1963 it wasn't possible for a big rock band to make a living because they went out of fashion. But when the Beatles came along they opened it all up and made it respectable again. It's economic again too, and I'll have the Band to play with me.

"People say I'm a poet and I'd sure like to be one. I think I could write a poem or two if I wanted to. But when I do songs I usually fit the words around the music, and it's the music which determines the words. I like to be considered a poet, but I think it's more flattering than truthful."

Staying with Dylan on the Isle of Wight will be his wife and probably the older two of their four children. "I don't really want to have them in any publicity until they get old enough to play with me. Then when they're older maybe we'll have the Dylan family playing and singing together on stage."

About the moody introverted Dylan image he had this to say: "When I first started singing an awful lot of people were singing those audience-type songs and I went along with this. But as time went on I got back to doing what I would have been doing if I hadn't been successful. The reason I looked so miserable in all the pictures was because when I asked the photographers how to look, they'd always say to me: "Don't smile," So I didn't."

"The accident I had still bothers me a bit. My bones ache in the cold weather, or when it gets too humid. But in many ways it was good for me. It really slowed me down. Touring had been such a pace to keep up. And I was getting into a rut."

The signing of Dylan for the Festival is a considerable coup for the organizers, Ron and Ray Foulk who are confidently expecting an audience turn-out of well over 100,000 at the 100-acre Woodside Bay site, near Ryde.

A village of tents and marquees is being erected for accomodation purposes and British Railways will be running special trains and ferries.

Among the other acts at the Festival, now planned to run for four days, will be Richie Havens, Tom Paxton, the Pretty Things, The Who, Joe Cocker, Julie Felix, the Moody Blues, the Nice, the Bonzo Dog Band, Election and the Paris cast of Hair.

Don Short Interview, Woodstock, New York

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 99-101.

Short, an English reporter on the staff of the Daily Mirror, traveled to Woodstock shortly before the Isle of Wight festival to conduct this interview which was printed in the Melody Maker on August 23 1969.

The second life of Bob Dylan is about to begin. The legend is to live again. But can he change the pattern of folk history as he succeeded in doing in the years 1961 – 1966?

That question, and all the curiosity, intrigue and compassion Dylan has aroused among fans and sceptics alike through the years, will be dissolved at the end of this month. For it is then that Dylan has chosen to emerge from the green-clad obscurity of his countryside lodge and sail to England to appear at the Isle of Wight festival.

It may not seem a particularly significant venue for the great Dylan to choose as his comeback platform; but it is ideally Dylan if one takes into account his unpredictability. And as Dylan says, "That's a little island of yours I always wanted to go to. It seems okay by me."

It's okay by Julie Felix, Ritchie Havens, The Who, Joe Cocker, Marsha Hunt, the Moody Blues and Family who appear on the festival bill, too.

Dylan talked to me in New York as he was preparing to leave; it was his first interview since he survived a horrific car crash which halted his career three years ago.

Until then his music, poetry and philosophy had gained tremendous influence. "Not so much here at home, but in England and various points abroad my music did well," concedes Dylan in modest strain today.

Nevertheless, his influence directly inspired many other artists and broadened the musical attitude of fans, tired of mundane pop and through Dylan found a new language of communication.

Today the world has gone folk and it's precisely at this moment that Dylan, the original master from Minnesota, returns.

What of the others – what of Donovan I ask Dylan? Did he consider Donovan who superseded him an imitator ?

Says Dylan cautiously: "No, I wouldn't say that. He has developed his own style and his own kind of feel. Sometimes his lyrics get a bit corny and the arrangements gather a bit of fuzz, but I don't know of anyone who is doing what he is doing today."

Dylan, although in hibernation all this time, has obviously kept his finger on the pulse; for he talks of The Cream, too, and the headway they were making and their surprising decision to split. "Just when they were goin' big as a group in America," he said. "That's a shame..."

Just how has Dylan been spending his lost three years? He has been writing new music, "reams of it and with deeper perception," says his closest friends. Says Dylan: "I don't know about that, except that I'll be playing it at the Isle of Wight but all I can say is I'm happy with my new songs. They make me feel good."

Dylan, long known as his own best critic, has never said that before and this indicates his zest to return, as indeed was illustrated last month when he leaped on stage at a St. Louis concert and ad-libbed into an act completely unconcerned.

"I just had to do it. The music called and I went," reflected Dylan. "Yeah – I'm rarin' to go. But don't believe I'm not nervous. Gee – I am. It's been a long time."

In these past few weeks Dylan has been rehearsing with The Band who have stamped their own fame in America and elsewhere and the five-strong combo will be doubling up on a wide range of different instruments to provide the backing sounds for Dylan's Isle of Wight show.

"We're getting together a brand new repertoire and we may be on stage for a full three hours," declared Dylan.

His accident scars are now healed and he only gets minor symptoms when the weather is cold or he moves awkwardly or suddenly. "Otherwise I feel fit and strong again and I think my voice is best as it's ever been," Bob tells me.

Through the last three years Bob has been nursed by his wife Sara Lownds. It was not generally known Bob was married, or that the couple have four children: Maria (4), Anna (3), Sam (2) and year old Jesse.

It's a disclosure which once more shows how Dylan has clung to protection from any intrusion on his personal life. But now he tells the story:
"Sara and I grew up as kids together in Minnesota. Then some years back we met again in a New York restaurant where Sara was working as a waitress."

"We fell in love – although it was not love at first sight and five years ago we were married in New York State."

Said Bob: "We didn't advertise the fact as we feel our personal lives are what they mean. Otherwise we would have gone to Hollywood to live and become members of the showbiz set, which we hope we will never be."

Bob is going to bring Sara and possibly the two elder children to Britain with him and while he is here he hopes to fulfil other plans.

"It is possible I will record in London," he told me: "George Harrison has offered to let us use the Apple Studios and we hope to take up that opportunity while we are there."

After Britain, Dylan and the Band will appear on a major city tour – "although it won't be like the old days when we fell from exhaustion."

He is also eyeing the prospects for his first film. "That is something I would like very much, but the story line has got to be very strong... You know I wouldn't mind working for someone like Alfred Hitchcock. He wouldn't do anything thin... "

I leave Dylan to get back to his rehearsal with the Band. "So much for the future," he says. "Now for the present and believe me the Isle of Wight show is the start of a new life for me..."

To concur with his arrival CBS are to release Lay Lady Lay as a single track slipped from Dylan's latest album Nashville Skyline and Dylan is pleased to hear it; "although there may be better singles in the fresh material."

Dylan will get 50,000 dollars for the one night show and a cut of the profits and as we part the 28-year-old American spiritual folk leader laughs: "And I can tell you man after all this time I need the money!"

Money is an incentive, even to a genius.

27 August 1969
Richard Green Interview, Isle Of Wight, U.K.

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, p. 105.

From the Isle of Wight press conference at the Halland Hotel. Printed in the New Musical Express on August 30 1969.

"I want to see the home of Alfred, Lord Tennyson." That is the reason Bob Dylan gave at his Isle of Wight Press Conference on Wednesday for coming to Britain. Beyond that he would not elaborate, but he did say that the songs he will perform at the festival on Sunday might well be "things you'll have heard before but with new arrangements."

Sitting in the middle of a line of ten chairs, Dylan, looking a lot like Fidel Castro with his short beard and hair style, and continual tapping his sunglasses on his right knee, told me he had last appeared in St. Louis a month ago.

Asked what he felt about a report that the Beatles, the Rolling Stones, Blind Faith and the Bee Gees wanted to jam with him, he smiled and replied: "Great, great!"

Did he think, I asked, he had changed a lot since we last saw him at the Royal Albert Hall –
"I believe there's a conscious thing since the accident.
"I haven't really changed. It had more to do with the show I was doing than anything else. It really had nothing to do with me personally."

Does he feel that his days of "protesting" are over? "I don't want to protest anymore. I never said I am an angry young man."

Then I asked him why the acetates he made with the Band had never been released. At this point, road manager Bert Block broke in and said: "Those songs were for the publishing company. Dylan and the Band record for different companies."

Because of his lack of public appearances I wondered if he liked doing shows. He replied: "The more the better."

That was all I could ask him in the fifteen minutes I had with him on Wednesday afternoon at the beachside Halland hotel, Sea View, Isle of Wight, where the Stones are staying during the festival. I'm staying here, too, so I should have lots of news for you next week.

How did I find Bob Dylan? About the same as in 1965 when I last saw him. He's still shy and inclined to be cynical. Perhaps if one could get him alone he might relax. But surrounded by his helpers, it was difficult to communicate freely with him. But I was very happy to have spoken to him on behalf of the NME.

Isle Of Wight Press Conference

From the Isle of Wight press conference at the Halland Hotel, four days before the celebrated concert. This is Dylan's first press conference since May 1966.

Ronnie Burns (RB) from BBC TV South kicks off the questioning.

RB: Why did you come to the Isle of Wight?
BD: I wanted to see the home of Alfred, Lord Tennyson.
RB: Why?
BD: Just curious.
RB: Can I have your general views on the situation of drug taking among teenagers and young people these days?
BD: I don't have any of those views... I wish I did, I'd be glad to share them with you, but I... I think everyone should lead their own lives you know.
RB: You used to, I believe, make public pronouncements on your views on things, like Vietnam, and it has been noticed in certain quarters you haven't been doing that recently, making your views known on big political and international issues. Is this deliberate policy on your part?
BD: No... I think that's more a rumor than a fact. You check your old newspapers, you won't be able to find too many statements I've made on those issues.
RB: I've heard it said here today by some of your fans that the new Bob Dylan is a bit of a square... Is that true?
BD: You'll have to ask the fans (amidst general laughter).

And now for the general press pack, including Lon Goddard (LG) of the Record Mirror.

Do you feel that your days of protesting are over?
BD: I don't want to protest any more. I never said I'm an angry young man.
LG: Can you tell us exactly what happened when you suffered an accident a while ago?
BD: Rikki... where are you?... (silence from Dylan for a moment) It's true I suffered a broken neck. It's awful hard to explain. I have to take it easy sometimes.
Bob.
BD: Yes, Ken (general laughter from press).
Do you think you have changed very much since we last saw you in London? Your clothes and hair have changed?
BD: I believe there's a conscious thing since the accident. I haven't really changed... It had more to do with the show I was doing than anything else. It really had nothing to do with me personally... that stuff was all for publicity. I don't do that kind of thing any more.
Can you tell us what songs you will be performing?
BD: Everything we will do is on record. I'm not going to sing anything new... Things you will have heard before but with new arrangements
Because of your lack of public appearances, do you still like doing shows?
BD: We appeared a month ago in St Louis... the more shows the better.
Who are you looking forward to meeting while you're here?
BD: I'm hoping to meet anybody who's around. I'd like to meet The Who and maybe Georgie Fame.
What about the Beatles?

BD: George Harrison has come to visit me. The Beatles have asked me to work with them. I love the Beatles and I think it would be a good idea to do a jam session.
What about reports that various people will perform with you on stage?
BD: Great, great.
Do you feel that cameras are like guns?
BD: I don't know.
LG: Do you feel this change that has come over you and your music is due to domestic effects? Are you chiefly a family man now?
BD: I would think so.
There is a very large crowd expected here for your performance. Any comments on that?
BD: I just hope it's a good show.
Do you have a personal message for the kids today?
BD: Take it easy and do your job well.
What exactly then is your position on politics and music?
BD: My job is to play music. I think I've answered enough questions.

2 September 1969
Kennedy Airport Press Conference, New York City, New York

Comments made to the waiting press at Kennedy Airport, New York, on his return from the Isle Of Wight Festival – as reported in the Liverpool Echo (UK) on September 3rd, 1969.

I HAD A GRAND TIME, SAYS BOB DYLAN

American folk singer Bob Dylan returned home to the United States yesterday declaring that he had had a "grand time" at the giant pop, folk and rock festival held on the Isle of Wight over the weekend.

Dylan, a semi-recluse in recent years, told reporters at Kennedy Airport, New York, where he arrived by air from London that he had gone to the festival to "get away from it all" and to give himself a "chance to break back in."

Asked why he had disappointed the 170,000 fans gathered on the island by staying on stage for only one hour instead of anticipated two or three, Dylan noted that he had been scheduled to perform from 8:30 to 11 p.m.

He said he had arrived a 8.30 p.m. but because of delays, had only gone on stage at about 11 p.m.

"I performed. I did what I do", he said, adding that although he could not see his audience in the darkness, he "gathered the reception was pretty good."

Asked what he planned to do next, Dylan said: "I'm going to put the show together and put it on the road."

The folk singer said his show at the festival had been recorded and he hoped an album would be made of it.

Dylan added that he and his wife, Sara, who was with him, had both had "rather a grand time" at the festival.

Dylan said he had not yet seen any of the £35,000 he was reported to have received for his concert.

He said he had no wish to perform again in England. "No more", he declared. "They make too much of singers over there. Singers are front-page news. When the Bee Gees split it was all over the front page."

29 November 1969
The Rolling Stone Interview, New York City, New York

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 109-136.

Jann Wenner, editor of Rolling Stone, finally sat down with Dylan on June 26th 1969 after trying to make arrangements for an interview for over a year. The article was published that year in the November 29th issue of Rolling Stone. Dylan says that the interview was conducted at a time when he did not have the energy to concentrate on it and, according to Scaduto, Dylan was not paying much attention to what he was saying. For this reason the interview, although lengthy, was somewhat superficial and was badly received, proof, according to Heylin, that Dylan had lost touch with the real world.

They say Bob Dylan is the most secretive and elusive person in the entire rock and roll substructure but after doing this interview I think it would be closer to the point to say that Dylan, like John Wesley Harding, was "never known to make a foolish move".

The preparations for the interview illustrate this well. About eighteen months ago, I first started writing Bob letters asking for it. Then a little over a year ago, the night before I left New York, a message came from the hotel operator that a "Mr. Dillon" had called.

Two months later I met Bob for the first time at another hotel in New York. He casually strolled in wearing a sheepskin outfit, leather boots, very well put together but not too tall, y'understand. It was ten in the morning and I rolled out of bed stark naked – sleep that way, y'understand – and we talked for half an hour about doing an interview, what it was for, why it was necessary. Bob was feeling out the situation, making sure it would be cool.

That meeting was in late 1968. It took eight months – until the end of June this year – to finally get the interview. The meantime was covered with a lot of phone calls, near misses in New York City, Bob's trips to California which didn't take place and a lot of waiting and waiting for that right time when we were both ready for the show.

The interview took place on a Thursday afternoon in New York at my hotel, right round the corner from the funeral home where Judy Garland was being inspected by ten thousand people, who formed lines around several city blocks. We were removed from all that activity, but somehow it seemed appropriate enough that Judy Garland's funeral coincided with the interview.

Bob was very cautious in everything he said and took a long time between questions to phrase exactly what he wanted to say, nothing more and sometimes a little less. When I wasn't really satisfied with his answers, I asked questions another way, later, but Bob was hip.

Rather than edit the interview into tight chunks and long answers, I asked Sheryl to transcribe the tapes with all the pauses, asides and laughs left in. So much of the time it's not what is said but how it is said, and I think you will dig it more just as it went down.

To bring this up to date after all that, August through September was spent trying to get Baron together with Bob to get some new photographs of him, in a natural, nonperformance, situation. But it proved fruitless. Perhaps if we had had another six months to work on getting the photographs but Bob was simply not to be rushed or pushed into something he really didn't feel like doing at the time. ("I'll have Baron meet you in New York tomorrow." "Well, tomorrow I might be in Tucson, Arizona". "Baron will fly to Tucson." Etc.)

The photographs we have used are from rehearsals for the Johnny Cash Show and from the Isle of Wight, ones you probably have not seen yet, and some photos of Bob from a long time ago. Bob promised that we would get together soon to take some photos, and if we do, you'll see them as soon as we get them. But don't hold your breath.

Meantime here's the interview.

JW: When do you think you're gonna go on the road?
BD: November... possibly December.
JW: What kind of dates do you think you'll play — concerts? Big stadiums or small concert halls?
BD: I'll play medium sized halls.
JW: What thought do you have on the kind of back-up you're going to use?
BD: Well, we'll keep it real simple, you know... drums... bass... second guitar... organ... piano. Possibly some horns. Maybe some background voices.
JW: Girls? Like the Raylettes?
BD: We could use some girls.
JW: Do you have any particular musicians in mind at this time?
BD: To go out on the road? Well, I always have some in mind. I'd like to know a little bit more about what I'm gonna do. You see, when I discover what I'm gonna do, then I can figure out what kind of a sound I want. I'd probably use... I'd want the best band around, you know?
JW: Are you going to use studio musicians or use some already existing bands?
BD: I don't know... You see, it involves putting other people on the bill, full-time. I'd only probably use the Band again... if I went around.
JW: And they'd do the first half of the show?
BD: Sure... sure.
JW: Are you thinking of bringing any other artists with you?
BD: Well, every so often we do think about that. (Laughter) We certainly do. I was thinking about maybe introducing Marvin Rainwater or Slim Whitman to "my audience".
JW: Have you been in touch with either of them?
BD: No... no.
JW: What did you think when you saw yourself on the Cash show?
BD: (Laughs) Oh, I'd never see that... I can't stand to see myself on television. No.
JW: Did you dig doing it?
BD: I dig doing it, yeah. Well, you know, television isn't like anything else... It's also like the movie business, you know, where they call you and then you just sit around. So by the time you finally do something, you have to do it three or four times, and usually all the spirit's gone.
JW: You didn't watch it on TV?
BD: (Laughs) I did watch it on TV... Just because I wanted to see Johnny. I didn't realize they slowed Doug Kershaw down, too. They slowed his song down to... His song was like this... (taps out steady beat)... And they slowed him down to... (taps slow rhythm)... you know?
JW: Just by slowing down the tape?
BD: They just slowed him down. I don't know what happened. I think the band slowed him down or something, but boy he was slowed down. During rehearsal and just sitting around, he played these songs... The way we was going at it, maybe three-quarter time, and they slowed him down to about two-thirds time, you know?
JW: Did you have any difficulty working with the TV people doing something like that?

BD: Oh no, no, they're wonderful people... They really are. It was by far the most enjoyable television program I've ever done. I don't do television just because you get yourself in such a mess... So I don't do it.

JW: You told me once that you were going to do a TV special?

BD: That's what I'm talking about.

JW: In Hollywood?

BD: No, I'm talking about CBS.

JW: In New York?

BD: Well, we don't know that yet. They don't have in mind exactly what they would like. They kind of leave it wide open, so we're trying to close the gap now.

JW: What do you have in mind for it?

BD: Oh, I just have some, free-form type things in mind. A lot of music.

JW: Presenting other artists?

BD: Sure... I don't mind. I don't know who, but...

JW: Why haven't you worked in so long?

BD: Well, uh... I do work.

JW: I mean on the road.

BD: On the road... I don't know, working on the road... Well, Jann, I'll tell ya – I was on the road for almost five years. It wore me down. I was on drugs, a lot of things. A lot of things just to keep going, you know? And I don't want to live that way anymore. And, uh... I'm just waiting for a better time – you know what I mean?

JW: What would you do that would make the tour that you're thinking about doing different from the ones you did do?

BD: Well, I'd like to slow down the pace a little. The one I did do... The next show's gonna be a lot different from the last show. The last show, during the first half, of which there was about an hour, I only did maybe six songs. My songs were long, long songs. But that's why I had to start dealing with a lot of different methods of keeping myself awake, alert... Because I had to remember all the words to those songs. I've written 'em for the road, you know. So I'll be doing all these songs on the road. They're gonna sound a lot better than they do on record. My songs always sound a lot better in person than they do on the record.

JW: Why?

BD: Well, I don't know why. They just do.

JW: On Nashville Skyline – who does the arrangements? The studio musicians, or...

BD: Boy, I'd wish you could've come along the last time we made an album. You'd probably enjoyed it... 'Cause you see right there, you know how it's done. We just take a song. I play it and everyone else just sort of fills in behind it. No sooner you got that done, and at the same time you're doing that, there's someone in the control booth who's turning all those dials to where the proper sound is coming in... And then it's done. Just like that.

JW: Just out of rehearsing it? It'll be a take?

BD: Well, maybe we'll take about two times.

JW: Were there any songs on Nashville Skyline that took longer to take?

BD: I don't know... I don't think so. There's a movie out now, called Midnight Cowboy. You know the song on the album Lay Lady Lay? Well, I wrote that song for that movie. These producers, they wanted some music for their movie. This was last summer. And this fellow there asked me, you know, if I could do some music for their movie. So I came up with that song. By the time I came up with it, though, it was too late. (Laughs) It's the same old story all the time. It's just too late... So I kept this song and recorded it.

JW: There's something going on with Easy Rider – you wrote the lyrics for a song that Roger McGuinn wrote the music for, or something? Something... writing a song for Easy Rider, the Peter Fonda film? Were you involved in that at all?

BD: They used some of my music in it. They used a song of the Bands too. They also used Steppenwolf music. I don't know anything more about it than that.

JW: Do you know which song of yours they used?

BD: It's Alright, Ma – but they had Roger McGuinn singing it.

JW: Have you been approached to write music for any other movies?

BD: Uh-hum.

JW: Considering any of them?

BD: Unh-unh.

JW: Why? Scripts?

BD: Umm... I don't know. I just can't seem to keep my mind on it. I can't keep my mind on the movie. I had a script awhile ago, that was called Zachariah and the Seven Cowboys. (Laughs) That was some script. Every line in it was taken out of the Bible. And just thrown together. Then there was another one The Impossible Toy. Have you seen that? (Laughs) Let's see, what else? Umm... No, I'm not planning on doing any music for movies.

JW: When are you going to do another record?

BD: You mean when am I going to put out an album?

JW: Have you done another record?

BD: No... Not exactly. I was going to try and have another one out by the fall.

JW: Is it done in Nashville again?

BD: Well we... I think so... I mean it's... Seems to be as good a place as any.

JW: What first got you involved with or attracted you to the musicians at the Columbia Studios?

BD: Nashville? Well we always used them since Blonde on Blonde. Well we didn't use Pete on Blonde On Blonde.

JW: What was Joe South like to work with?

BD: Joe South? Well, he was quiet. He didn't say too much. I always did like him though.

JW: Do you like his record?

BD: I love his records.

JW: That album, Introspect?

BD: Um-hmm. I always enjoyed his guitar playing. Ever since I heard him.

JW: Does he have any solos on Blonde On Blonde?

BD: Um-hmm. Yes he does. He has a... He's playing a high guitar lick on... Well, if you named me the songs, I could tell you which one it was, but it's catchin' my mind at the moment. He was playing... He played a big, I believe it was a Gretsch, guitar – one of those Chet Atkins models. That's the guitar he played it on.

JW: Absolutely Sweet Marie?

BD: Yeah, it could've been that one. Or Just Like A Woman... one of those. Boy he just... he played so pretty.

JW: On Nashville Skyline, do you have any song on that that you particularly dig? Above the others.

BD: Uh... Tonight I'll Be Staying Here With You. I like Tell Me That Isn't True, although it came out completely different than I'd written it. It came out real slow and mellow. I had it written as sort of a jerky, kind of polka-type thing. I wrote it in F. I wrote a lot of songs on this new album in F. That's what gives it a kind of a new sound. They're all in F... not all of them, but quite a few. There's not many on that album that aren't in F. So you see I had these chords... Which gives it a certain sound. I try to be a little different on every album.

JW: I'm sure you read the review of Nashville Skyline. Everybody remarks on the change of your singing style...

BD: Well, Jann, I'll tell you something. There's not too much of a change in my singing style, but I'll tell you something which is true... I stopped smoking. When I stopped smoking my voice changed... So drastically, I couldn't believe it myself. That's true. I tell you, you stop smoking those cigarettes (laughter)... and you'll be able to sing like Caruso.

JW: How many songs did you go into Nashville Skyline with?

BD: I went in with uh... The first time I went into the studio I had, I think, four songs. I pulled that instrumental one out... I needed some songs with an instrumental... Then Johnny came in and did a song with me. Then I wrote one in the motel... Then pretty soon the whole album started fillin' in together and we had an album. I mean, we didn't go down with that in mind. That's why I wish you were there... You could've really seen it happen. It just manipulated out of nothing.

JW: How many songs did you do with Johnny?

BD: Well, we did quite a few. We just sat down and started doing some songs... But you know how those things are. You get into a room with someone, you start playing and singing, and you sort of forget after a while what you're there for. (Laughs)

JW: You must have a lotta songs with him on tape... Are you thinking of putting out a collection of them?

BD: Well, I'm not, no. But you usually have to leave those things in the hands of the producers.

JW: Is there one afoot?

BD: A tape?

JW: No, an album.

BD: No... Not that I know of. If there was an album, I believe that we would have to go back into the studio and record some more songs.

JW: There's not enough there already... or it's just not good enough?

BD: Well, it's uh... What it comes down to is a choice of material. If they wanted an album – a joint album – they could probably get a lot more material with a broader range on it. If we went there with actually certain songs in mind to do... See, that didn't happen last time.

JW: Why did you make the change of producers from Tom Wilson to Bob Johnston?

BD: Well, I can't remember, Jann. I can't remember... All I know is that I was out recording one day, and Tom had always been there – I had no reason to think he wasn't going to be there – and I looked up one day and Bob was there. (Laughs)

JW: There's been some articles on Wilson and he says that he's the one that gave you the rock and roll sound... And started you doing rock and roll. Is that true?

BD: Did he say that? Well, if he said it... (laughs) more power to him. (Laughs) He did to a certain extent. That is true. He did. He had a sound in mind.

JW: Have you ever thought of doing an album... a very arranged, very orchestrated album, you know, with chicks and...?

BD: Gee... I've thought of it... I think about it once in a while. Yeah.

JW: You think you might do one?

BD: I do whatever comes naturally. I'd like to do an album like that. You mean using my own material and stuff.

JW: Yeah, using your own material but with vocal background and...

BD: I'd like to do it. Who wouldn't?

JW: When did you make the change from John Hammond... or what caused the change from John Hammond?

BD: John Hammond. He signed me in 1960. He signed me to Columbia Records. I think he produced my first album. I think he produced my second album too.

JW: And Tom Wilson was also working at Columbia at the time?

BD: He was... you know, I don't recall how that happened... or why that switch took place. I remember at one time I was about to record for Don Law. You know Don Law? I was about to record for Don Law, but I never did. I met Don Law in New York, in 1962... and again recently, last year when I did the John Wesley Harding album, I met him down in the studio. He came in... He's a great producer. He produced many of the earlier records for Columbia and also for labels which they had before – Okeh and stuff like that. I believe he did the Robert Johnston records.

JW: What did you do in the year between Blonde On Blonde and John Wesley Harding?

BD: Well I was on tour part of the time... Australia, Sweden... an overseas tour. Then I came back... And in the spring of that year, I was scheduled to go out – it was a month off, I had a one-month vacation – I was gonna go back on the road again in July. Blonde On Blonde was up on the charts at this time. At that time I had a dreadful motorcycle accident... which put me away for a while... and I still didn't sense the importance of that accident till at least a year after that. I realized that it was a real accident. I mean I thought that I was just gonna get up and go back to doing what I was doing before... But I couldn't do it anymore. What did I do during that year? I helped work on a film... Which was supposed to be aired on Stage 67, a television show which isn't on anymore. I don't think it was on for very long. What change? Well, it... it limited me. It's hard to speak about the change, you know? It's not the type of change that one can put into words... besides the physical change. I had a busted vertebrae, neck vertebrae. And there's really not much to talk about. I don't want to talk about it.

JW: Laying low for a year, you must have had time to think. That was the ABC-TV show? What happened to the tapes of that? How come that never got shown?

BD: Well, I could make an attempt to answer that, but... (laughs)... I think my manager could probably answer it a lot better.

JW: I don't think he answers too many questions.

BD: Doesn't he? He doesn't answer questions? Well he's a nice guy. He'll usually talk to you if you show some enthusiasm for what you're talking about.

JW: So what happened to the tapes?

BD: You mean that film? As far as I know, it will be sold... or a deal will be made, for its sale. That's what I'm told. But you see, Jann, I don't hold these movie people in too high a position. You know this movie, Dont Look Back? Well, that splashed my face all over the world, that movie. I didn't get a penny from that movie, you know... So when people say why don't you go out and work and why don't you do this and why don't you do that, people don't know half of what a lot of these producers and people, lawyers... they don't know the half of those stories. I'm an easy-going kind of fellow, you know... I forgive and forget. I like to think that way. But I'm not interested in finding out anymore about any film.

JW: Did you like Dont Look Back?

BD: I'd like it a lot more if I got paid for it. (Laughter)

JW: There was supposed to be another film that Pennebaker shot – I don't know when or where -maybe it was the ABC film...

BD: That was it. Sure it was. That's the one you're talking about.

JW: Is it a good one?

BD: Well, we cut it fast on the eye. I'd have to let you see it for yourself, to think about if it's a good one. For me, it's too fast for the eye... But there are quite a few people who say it's really good. Johnny Cash is in it. John Lennon's in it. The Band's in it. Who else... A lot of different people from the European capitals of the world are in it.

JW: Princes and princesses? (Laughs)

BD: Well, not princesses (laughs) but presidents (laughs) and people like that.

JW: What is the nature of your acquaintance with John Lennon?

BD: Oh, I always love to see John. Always. He's a wonderful fellow... and I always like to see him.

JW: He said that the first time that you met, in New York, after one of the concerts or something like that, it was a very uptight situation.

BD: It probably was, yes. Like, you know how it used to be for them. They couldn't go out of their room. They used to tell me you could hardly get in to see them. There used to be people surrounding them, not only in the streets, but in the corridors in the hotel. I should say it was uptight.

JW: How often have you seen them subsequently?

BD: Well, I haven't seen them too much recently.

JW: What do you think of the bed-ins for peace? Him and Yoko.

BD: Well, you know... Everybody's doing what they can do. I don't mind what he does, really... I always like to see him.

JW: Do you read the current critics? The music critics, so-called "rock and roll writers"?

BD: Well I try to keep up. I try to keep up-to-date... I realize I don't do a very good job in keeping up to date, but I try to. I don't know half the groups that are playing around now. I don't know half of what I should.

JW: Are there any that you've seen that you dig?

BD: Well I haven't seen any.

JW: I mean like Traffic, and...

BD: See, I never saw Traffic... I never even saw Cream. I feel bad about those things, but what can I do?

JW: See them? (laughs)

BD: Well, I can't now. I'm going to see this new group, called Blind Faith. I'm going to make it my duty to go see them... 'Cause they'll probably be gone (laughter) in another year or so. So I'd better get up there quick and see them.

JW: Do you like Stevie Winwood singing?

BD: Oh sure, sure... Stevie Winwood, he came to see us in Manchester. Last time we were in Manchester... That was 1966. Or was it Birmingham? His brother – he's got a brother named Muff – Muff took us all out to see a haunted house, outside of Manchester, or Birmingham, one of those two. Or was it Newcastle? Something like that. We went out to see a haunted house, where a man and his dog was to have burned up in the thirteenth century. Boy, that place was spooky. That's the last time I saw Stevie Winwood.

JW: Have you heard the Traffic records?

BD: I heard them doing Gimme Some Loving. I love that. I didn't get all the names... after that. I seem to recall hearing a Traffic record. I know I've heard the Traffic... the group, Traffic, on the radio. I've heard that.

JW: Have you heard the San Francisco bands?

BD: Jefferson Airplane? Quicksilver Messenger Service? Yeah, I've heard them. The Grateful Dead.

JW: Do you like them?

BD: Yeah, sure do.

JW: Is there anything happening on the current rock and roll scene that strikes you as good?

BD: Yeah, I heard a record by Johnny Thunder. It's called I'm Alive. Never heard it either, huh? Well, I can't believe it. Everyone I've talked to, I've asked them if they've heard that record.

JW: Is it on the radio right now?

BD: I don't know. I heard it on the radio a month ago, two months ago... three months ago. It was one of the most powerful records I've ever heard. It's called I'm Alive by Johnny Thunder. Well, it was that sentiment, truly expressed. That's the most I can say... If you heard the record, you'd know what I mean. But that's about all...

JW: Do you like the stuff that Ray Stevens is doing?

BD: Oh, I've always liked Ray Stevens. Sure.

JW: Have you had occasion to go to Memphis, you know, when you're down there... or Muscle Shoals or Pensacola, any of the great musical centers of the South?

BD: No, I've never been in any of the recording studios there.

JW: Have you ever met Ray Stevens?

BD: Uh, I've been in the same building as Ray Stevens. He was behind another door... But I've never met him. I've never shook his hand. No.

JW: I don't want to get nosy or get into your personal life but there was a series recently in the Village Voice about your growing up, living, and going to high school. Did you read that series?

BD: Yeah I did. At least, I read some of it.

JW: Was it accurate?

BD: Well, it was accurate as far as this fellow who was writing it... this fellow... I wouldn't have read it if I thought... he was using me to write his story. So I feel a little unusual in this case, 'cause I can see through this writers aims. But as far as liking it or disliking it, I didn't do neither of those things. I mean it's just publicity from where I am. So if they want to spend six or seven issues writing about me (laughs)... as long as they get it right, you know, as long as they get it in there, I can't complain.

JW: You must have some feelings about picking up a newspaper that has a hundred thousand circulation and seeing that some guy's gone and talked to your parents and your cousins, and uncles...

BD: Well, the one thing I did... I don't like the way this writer talked about my father who has passed away. I didn't dig him talking about my father and using his name. Now that's the only thing about the article I didn't dig. But that boy has got some lessons to learn.

JW: What did he say?

BD: That don't matter what he said. He didn't have no right to speak about my father, who has passed away. If he wants to do a story on me, that's fine. I don't care what he wants to say about me. But to uh... I got the feeling that he was taking advantage of some good people that I used to know and he was making fun of a lot of things. I got the feeling he was making fun of quite a few things... this fellow, Toby. You know what I mean, Jann? Soooo... we'll just let that stand as it is... for now.

JW: I've gone through all the collected articles that have appeared, all the early ones and Columbia records' biographies, that's got the story about running away from home at eleven and twelve and thirteen-one-half... Why did you put out that story?

BD: I didn't put out any of those stories!

JW: Well it's the standard Bob Dylan biography...

BD: Well, you know how it is, Jann... If you're sittin' in a room, and you have to have something done... I remember once, I was playing at Town Hall, and the producer of it came over with that biography... You know, I'm a songwriter, I'm not a biography writer, and I need a little help with these things. So if I'm sitting in a room with some people, and I say "Come on now, I need some help. Gimme a biography". So there might be three or four people – maybe they'll come up with something, come up with a biography. So we put it down it reads well, and the producer of the concert is satisfied. In fact, he even gets a kick out of it. You dig what I mean? But in actuality this thing wasn't written for hundreds of thousands of people... It was just a little game for whoever was going in there and getting a ticket, you know, they get one of these things too. That's just show business. So you do that, and pretty soon you've got a million people who get it on the side. You know? They start thinkin' that it's written for all of them. And it's not written for them – it was written for someone who bought the ticket to the concert. You got all these other people taking it too seriously. Do you know what I mean? So a lot of things have been blown out of proportion.

JW: At the time when all your records were out and you were working and everybody was writing stories about you, you let that become your story... You sort of covered up your parents, and your old friends... You sort of kept people away from them...

BD: Did I?

JW: Well, that was the impression it gave...

BD: Jann, you know, my best friends... you're talking about old friends, and best friends... if you want to go by those standards, I haven't seen my best friends for over fifteen years. You know what I mean? I'm not in the business of covering anything up. If I was from New Jersey, I could make an effort to show people my old neighborhood. If I was from Baltimore, same thing. Well, I'm from the Midwest. Boy, that's two different worlds. This whole east coast... there are a few similarities between the east coast and the Midwest and, of course, the people are similar, but it's a big jump. So, I came out of the Midwest, but I'm not interested in leading anybody back there. That's not my game.

JW: Why do you choose to live on the east?

BD: Well, because we're nearer New York now. We don't choose anything... We just go with the wind. That's it.

JW: Most people who become successful in records, especially artists, start wondering at some point about whether they're becoming businessmen, taking care of contracts, and making money... did you ever get that?

BD: Yeah, I certainly did. I'd love to become a businessman. (Laughs) Love it. Love it.

JW: What do you think of the music business?

BD: I'd love to become a businessman in the music business.

JW: Doing what?

BD: Well, doing that same thing that other businessmen are doing... talking about recording, publishing, producing...

JW: Have you ever wanted to produce an album for some other artist?

BD: I have.

JW: Which one?

BD: Uh... It's been a long time. I can't even remember which one. I saw somebody once, it was down in the Village. Anyway...

JW: Are there any artists around today that you'd like to produce?

BD: Well, there was some talk about producing Burt Lancaster doing the hymn I Saw St. Augustine...

JW: Well, the movie business being what it is... going back to reviews that you've gotten for various albums; everybody has a lot of strange interpretations and decisions... have you ever read any criticisms about that that you liked or thought was accurate – or possibly got close to what you were trying to do?

BD: Mmm... I can't say that I have. I don't recall. Like I say, Jann, I don't keep up with it as much as I should.

JW: At the time when Highway 61 and Bringing It All Back Home were coming out... do you remember anything from them?

BD: Do you?

JW: Yeah, the liner notes.

BD: What did you like about those liner notes?

JW: I think they were very groovy. They explained what was going on in the album and how the album came to be recorded and how it all came to be said. Why didn't you publish Tarantula?

BD: Why? Well... It's a long story. It begins with when I suddenly began to sell quite a few records and a certain amount of publicity began to be carried in all the major news magazines about this "rising young star". Well, this industry being what it is, book companies began sending me contracts because I was doing interviews before and after concerts and reporters would say things like "What else do you write?" And I would say: "Well, I don't write much of anything else." And they would say: "Oh, come on, you must write other things. Tell us something else. Do you write books?" And I'd say: "Sure, I write books." After the publishers saw that I wrote books, they began to send me contracts... Doubleday, MacMillan, Hill and Range (laughter)... we took the biggest one, and then owed them a book. You follow me? But there was no book. We just took the biggest contract. Why? I don't know. Why I did, I don't know. Why was I told to do it, I don't know. Anyway, I owed them a book. So I sat down and said: "Wow, I've done many things before. It's not so hard to write a book." So I sat down and wrote them a book in the hotel rooms and different places, plus I got a lot of other papers laying around that other people had written, so I threw it all together in a week and sent it to them. Well, it wasn't long after that when I got it back to proof-read it. I got it back and I said: "My gosh. Did I write this? I'm not gonna have this out." Do you know what I mean? I'm not gonna put this out. The folks back home just won't understand this at all. I said: "Well, I have to do some corrections on this," I told them, and set about correcting it. I told them I was improving it. Boy, they were hungry for this book. They didn't care what it was. They just wanted... people up there were saying "Boy, that's the second James Joyce" and "Jack Kerouac again" and they were saying "Homer revisited"... And they were all just talking through their heads. They just wanted to sell books, that's all they wanted to do. It wasn't about anything... and I knew that – I figured they had to know that, they were in the business of it. I knew that, and I was just nobody. If I knew it, where were they at? They were just playing with me. My book. So I wrote a new book. I figured I was satisfied with it and I sent that in. Wow, they looked at that and said: "Well that's another book." And I said: "Well, but it's better." And they said: "Okay we'll print this." So they printed that up and sent that back to proffered it. So I proofread it – I just looked at the first paragraph – and knew I just couldn't let that stand. So I took the whole thing with me on tour. I was going to rewrite it all. Carried a typewriter around... around the world. Trying to meet this deadline which they'd given me to put this book out. They just backed me into a corner. A lot of invisible people. So finally, I had a deadline on it and was working on it, before my motorcycle accident. And I was studying all kinds of different prints and how I wanted them to print the book, by this time. I also was studying a lot of other poets at this time... I had books which I figured could lead me somewhere... and I was using a little bit from everything. But still, it wasn't my book. It was just to satisfy the publishers who wanted to print something that we had a contract for. Follow me? So eventually, I had my motorcycle accident and that just got me out of the whole thing. 'cause I didn't care anymore. As it stands now, Jann, I could write a book. But I'm gonna write it first, and then give it to them. You know what I mean?

JW: Do you have any particular subject in mind, or plan, for a book?

BD: Do you?

JW: For yours or mine?

BD: (Laughs) For any of them.

JW: What writers today do you dig? Like who would you read if you were writing a book? Mailer?

BD: All of them. There's something to be learned from them all.

JW: What about the poets? You once said something about Smokey Robinson...

BD: I didn't mean Smokey Robinson. I meant Arthur Rimbaud. I don't know how I could have got Smokey Robinson mixed up with Arthur Rimbaud. (Laughter) But I did.

JW: Do you see Allen Ginsberg much?

BD: Not at all. Not at all.

JW: Do you think he had any influence on your song-writing at all?

BD: I think he did at a certain period. That period of... Desolation Row. That kind of New York Type period, when all the songs were just "city songs". His poetry is city poetry. Sounds like the city.

JW: Before, you were talking about touring and using drugs. During that period of songs like Mr Tambourine Man and Baby Blue, which a lot of writers have connected to the drug experience, not in the sense of them being "psychedelic music", or drug songs, but having come out of the drug experience.

BD: How so?

JW: In terms of perceptions. All level of perceptions... awareness of the songs...

BD: Awareness of the minute. You mean that?
JW: An awareness of the mind.
BD: I would say so.
JW: Did taking drugs influence the songs?
BD: No, not the writing of them. But it did keep me up there to pump 'em out.
JW: Why did you leave the city and city songs for the country and country songs?
BD: The country songs?
JW: The songs... you were talking about Highway 61 being a song of the city, and songs of New York City...
BD: What was on the album?
JW: Highway 61? Desolation Row, Queen Jane...
BD: Well, it was also what the audience wanted to hear too... Don't forget that. When you play every night in front of an audience you know what they want to hear. It's easier to write songs then. You know what I'm talking about?
JW: Who do you think your current audience is? Who do you think you're selling records to? What kind of people?
BD: Well I don't know, when I go out on the road, I'll find out, won't I?
JW: Did you get any indication of that from who showed up in the audience in Nashville?
BD: No, they were just people. I find every audience more or less the same, although you can have a certain attachment or disattachment for one because it may be bigger or smaller. But... people are just people.
JW: Many people – writers, college students, college writers – all felt tremendously affected by your music and what you're saying in the lyrics.
BD: Did they?
JW: Sure. They felt it had a particular relevance to their lives... I mean, you must be aware of the way that people come on you.
BD: Not entirely. Why don't you explain to me.
JW: I guess if you reduce it to its simplest terms, the expectation of your audience – the portion of your audience that I'm familiar with – feels that you have the answer.
BD: What answer?
JW: Like from the film, Dont Look Back – people asking you "Why? What is it? Where is it?" People are tremendously hung-up on what you write and what you say, tremendously hung-up. Do you react to that at all? Do you feel responsible to those people?
BD: I don't want to make anybody worry about it... but boy, If I could ease someone's mind, I'd be the first one to do it. I want to lighten every load. Straighten out every burden. I don't want anybody to be hung-up... (laughs) especially over me, or anything I do. That's not the point at all.
JW: Let me put it another way... What I'm getting at is that you're an extremely important figure in music and an extremely important figure in the experience of growing up today. Whether you put yourself in that position or not, you're in that position. And you must have thought about it... and I'm curious to know what you think about that...
BD: What would I think about it? What can I do?
JW: You wonder if you're really that person.
BD: What person?
JW: A great "youth leader"...
BD: If I thought I was that person, wouldn't I be out there doing it? Wouldn't I be, if I was meant to do that, wouldn't I be doing it? I don't have to hold back. This Maharishi, he thinks that – right? He's out there doing it. If I thought that, I'd be out there doing it. Don't you... you agree, right? So obviously, I don't think that.
JW: What do you feel about unwillingly occupying that position?
BD: I can see that position filled by someone else... not by... the position you're speaking of... I play music, man. I write songs. I have a certain balance about things and I believe there should be an order to everything. Underneath it all. I believe also, that there are people trained for this job that you're talking about – "youth leader" types of thing, you know? I mean, there must be people trained to do this type of work. And I'm just one person, doing what I do. Trying to get along... Staying out of people's hair, that's all.

JW: You've been also a tremendous influence on a lot of musicians and writers, they're very obviously affected by your style, the way you do things...

BD: Who?

JW: Well, somebody like Phil Ochs, for example... A lot of people like that.

BD: Phil Ochs, uh... was around the same time I was, I remember when he came to town. He had his... he was doing his Stand Tall Billy Sol type songs. I mean, he had it then. I think he made it, there being a certain amount of momentum – he pushed – from being on the scene. But he did bring his own thing in, when he came in. He didn't – as some people come in – come in as a dishwasher to dig some sounds and suddenly put down the broom and pick up the guitar. You know what I mean?

JW: I'm thinking also of other singers, of people who were singing before and playing the guitar.

BD: Do you see any influence in the Motown? All those things that the Motown records are doing right now? Like Runaway Child and those kind of things. I mean, Motown wasn't doing those kind of records a few years ago, were they? What do you think they're doing, Jann? Are they really sincere and all that kind of thing?

JW: I think they're sincere about making good records, and they're going to sell a lot of them. I dig that. Do you like the Motown records?

BD: Well, yeah... I like them...

JW: Do you like the ones today better than the ones they were doing before?

BD: Oh, I have always liked the Motown records. Always. But because I like them so much, I see that change.

JW: Have you got anything to do with that change?

BD: Have I? Not that I know of.

JW: Do you think that you've played any role in the change of popular music in the last four years?

BD: I hope not (laughs).

JW: Well, a lot of people say you have.

BD: (Laughs) Well, you know, I'm not one to argue. (Laughs)

JW: There's a lot of talk about you and Albert Grossman, your relationship with Albert Grossman, and whether he's going to continue to manage you.

BD: Well... as far as I know, things will remain the same, until the length of our contract. And if we don't sign another contract, or if he doesn't have a hand in producing my next concerts or have a hand in any of my next work, it's only because he's too busy. 'Cause he's got so many acts now... It's so hard for him to be in all places all the time. I mean you know, it's the old story... you can't be in two places at once. That old story. You know what I mean?

JW: When does your contract with him expire?

BD: Some time this year.

JW: You were supposed to leave Columbia and sign with MGM? A million dollars... what happened to that?

BD: It... went up in smoke.

JW: Did you want a new label?

BD: I didn't, no.

JW: Who did?

BD: I believe my advisers.

JW: I take it you haven't had any recent trouble with Columbia, like you used to have in the beginning...

BD: No... no.

JW: Do you know approximately how many songs that you've recorded that have not been released? Like songs left over from recording John Wesley Harding or Blonde On Blonde? Do you have any idea how many?

BD: Well, we try to use them all. There may be a few lying around.

JW: What do you think was the best song, popular song, to come out last year?

BD: Uh... I like that one... of Creedence Clearwater Revival – Rolling On The River?

JW: Any others?

BD: George Jones had one called Small Town Laboring Man.

JW: You've been very reluctant to talk to reporters, the press and so on... Why is that?

BD: Why would you think?

JW: Well, I know why you wouldn't go on those things.

BD: Well, if you know why, you tell 'em... 'Cause I find it hard to talk about that. People don't understand how the press works. People don't understand that the press, they just used to sell papers. And, in a certain way, that's not bad... But when they misquote you all the time, and when they just use you to fill in some story. And when you read it after, it isn't anything the way you pictured it happening. Well, anyhow, it hurts. It hurts because you think you were just played for a fool. And the more hurts you get, the less you want to do it. Ain't that correct?

JW: Were there any writers that you met that you liked? That you felt did good jobs? Wrote accurate stories...

BD: On what?

JW: On you. For instance, I remember two big pieces – one was in the New Yorker, by Nat Hentoff...

BD: Yeah, I like 'em. I like that. In a way, I like 'em all, whether I feel bad about 'em or not, in a way I like 'em all. I seldom get a lick out of them, Jann, but... I mean, I just can't be spending my time reading what people write. (Laughter) I don't know anybody who can, do you?

JW: How much of the day do you think about song-writing and playing the guitar?

BD: Well, I try to get it when it comes. I play the guitar wherever I find one. But I try to write the song when it comes. I try to get it all... 'Cause if you don't get it all, you're not gonna get it. So the best kinds of songs you can write are in motel rooms and cars... places which are all temporary. 'Cause you're forced to do it. Rather, it let's you go into it. You go into your kitchen and try to write a song, and you can't write a song – I know people who do this – I know some songwriters who go to work every day, at eight-thirty and come home at five o'clock. And usually bring something back... I mean, that's legal too. It just depends on... how you do it. Me, I don't have those kind of things known to me yet, so I just get 'em when they come. And when they don't come, I don't try for it.

JW: There's been a lot of artists who have done your songs... songs that you have released and songs that you haven't released. Have you written any songs lately for any other artists to do, specifically for that artist? Or any of your old songs.

BD: I wrote To Be Alone With You – that's on Nashville Skyline – I wrote it for Jerry Lee Lewis. (Laughter) He was down there when we were listening to the playbacks, and he came in. He was recording an album next door. He listened to it... I think we sent him a dub. Peggy Day – I kind of had the Mills Brothers in mind when I did that one. (Laughter)

JW: Have you approached them yet?

BD: (Laughter) No. unfortunately, I haven't.

JW: During what period of time did you write the songs on Nashville Skyline? During the month before you went to do it or...

BD: Yeah, about a month before we did it. That's why it seemed to be all connected.

JW: Your going to do your next album in Nashville?

BD: I don't know, Jann. I don't know where I'm gonna be doing the next album. Sometimes I envy the Beatles... They just go down to the studio, and play around... I mean, you're bound to get a record. You know what I mean? Bound to get a record. Their studio is just a drive away... Boy, I'd have an album out every month. I mean, how could you not?

JW: Have you ever thought about getting four- or eight-track equipment up where you live?

BD: Well, everyone's talking about that now. But it's just talk as far as I know. I would come to New York if I wanted to use the studio, because it's all here... if you need a good engineer, or if you need a song, or somebody to record it, an artist... Whereas someplace like up in the country there, in the mountains, you could get a studio in, but that doesn't guarantee anything else but the studio. You can get violin players, cello players, you can get dramatic readers... You can get anybody at the drop of a hat, in New York City. I imagine it's that way over in London, where the Beatles make their records. Anything they want to put on their record, they just call up and it's there. I'd like to be in that position.

JW: What do you look for when you make a record... I mean, what qualities do you judge it by when you hear it played back?

BD: Umm... for the spirit. I like to hear a good lick once in a while. Maybe it's the spirit... Don't you think so? I mean, if the spirit's not there, it don't matter how good a song it is or...

JW: What do you think of the current rock and roll groups doing all the country music?

BD: Well, once again, it really doesn't matter what kind of music they do, just so long as people are making music. That's a good sign. There are certainly more people around making music than there was when I was growing up. I know that.

JW: Do you find any that are particularly good – country rock, or merely rock and roll bands, doing country material, using steel guitars?

BD: As long as it sounds good.

JW: Do any particular one of those groups appeal to you?

BD: Who... who are in those groups?

JW: Oh, Flying Burrito Brothers...

BD: Boy, I love them... The Flying Burrito Brothers, unh-huh. I've always known Chris, you know, from when he was in the Byrds. And he's always been a fine musician. Their records knocked me out. (Laughs) That poor little hippie boy on his way to town... (Laughs)

JW: What about the Byrds... they did a country album...

BD: Sweetheart? Well, they had a distinctive sound, the Byrds... they usually were hanging in there...

JW: Of all the versions of This Wheel's On Fire, which do you like the best?

BD: Uh... the Band's. Who else did it?

JW: Julie Driscoll... the Byrds did it?

BD: I remember hearing the Julie Driscoll one... I don't remember hearing the Byrds.

JW: What was the origin of that collection of songs, of that tape?

BD: The origin of it? What do you mean?

JW: Where was that done?

BD: Well, that was done out in... out in somebody's basement. Just a basement tape. It was just for...

JW: Did you do most, did you write most of those songs, those demos, for yourself?

BD: Right.

JW: And then decide against them?

BD: No, they weren't demos for myself, they were demos of the songs. I was being pushed again... into coming up with some songs. So, you know... you know how these things go.

JW: Do you have any artists in mind for any of those particular songs?

BD: No. They were just fun to do. That's all. They were a kick to do. Fact, I'd do it all again. You know... That's really the way to do a recording – in a peaceful, relaxed setting – in somebody's basement. With the windows open... And a dog lying on the floor. Let me explain something about this interview. If you give one magazine an interview, then the other magazine wants an interview. If you give one to one, then the other one wants one. So pretty soon, you're in the interview business... You're just giving interviews. Well, as you know, this can really get you down. Doing nothing but giving interviews. So the only way you can do it is to give press conferences. But you see, you have to have something to give a press conference about. Follow me? So that's why I don't give interviews. There's no mysterious reason to it, there's nothing organized behind it... it's just that if you give an interview to one magazine, then another one'll get mad.

JW: Why have you chosen to do this interview?

BD: 'Cause this is a music paper. Why would I want to give an interview to Look magazine? Tell me, why?

JW: I don't know... to sell records.

BD: To sell records, I could do it. Right. But I have a gold record without doing it, do you understand me? Well, if I had to sell records, I'd be out there giving interviews to everybody. Don't you see? Mr. Clive Davis, he was president of Columbia Records, and he said he wouldn't be surprised if this last album sold a million units. Without giving one interview. Now you tell me, Jann, why am I going to go out and give an interview?

JW: To get hassled...

BD: Why would I want to go out and get hassled? If they're gonna pay me, I mean... who wants to do that... I don't.

JW: Do you have any idea how much money your publishing has brought in over the last five years?

BD: Well now, that's difficult to answer because my songs are divided up into three, no, four companies. So there you have it. There you have it right there.

JW: Which companies?

BD: Well, I've got songs with Leeds Music. I've got songs with Witmark Music. I've got a bunch of songs with Dwarf Music. I've got songs in Big Sky Music. So you see, my songs are divided up, so...

JW: Do you own Big Sky Music wholly yourself?

BD: It's my company. I chose to start this company.

JW: If you put all the estimated income from those four companies together, or estimated gross income from publishing from those, it must be considerable...

BD: Not as much as the Beatles.

JW: Yeah, but other than the Beatles?

BD: Not as much as those writers from Motown.

JW: Other than the writers from Motown...

BD: You know there are many more musical organizations than me. They've top staffs of writers bringing in more money than you can dream of.

JW: What song writers do you like? Do you like any of the teams like Holland, Dozier, Holland or Hayes and Porter...

BD: Yeah, I do. I know that fellow – what's his name, Isaac Hayes? – he does a real nice song called The Other Woman. I believe that's the title to it. It's on his album. I think it's on his new one. I don't believe he wrote it, though.

JW: Otis Redding was playing at the Whiskey A Go Go a coupla years ago. You came in and talked to Otis. What was that all about?

BD: He was gonna do Just Like A Woman. I played him a dub of it. I think he mighta cut it for a demo... I don't think he ever recorded it, though. He was a fine man.

JW: Why did you think Just Like A Woman would be a good song for him to do.

BD: Well, I didn't necessarily think it was a good song for him to do, but he asked me if I had any material. It just so happened that I had the dubs from my new album. So we went over and played it. I think he took a dub... That was the first and only time I ever met him.

JW: I take it you dug Otis real well. Are there any other soul singers that you dig as much as Otis?

BD: You mean rhythm and blues pop? Well, you know I've always liked Mavis Staples ever since she was a little girl. She's always been my favorite... She's always had my favorite voice.

JW: Have you heard their new Stax album?

BD: I heard one of those... The ones they're doing with other people. Yeah, I heard that, that one that Pop Staples did. (Laughs) It's ridiculous. Oh, Steve Cropper did do a nice song on that album... that he wrote, called Water.

JW: On his own album?

BD: No, not on his own album. On the Jammed Together album. I find it interesting seeing... Mr Staples being referred to as "Pop". (Laughter)

JW: Have you heard the Steve Cropper solo album?

BD: Yeah, I heard that too.

JW: Do you like that?

BD: Sure, I've always dug Steve Cropper... his guitar playing. Ever since the first Booker T. record. I heard that back in the Midwest. Yeah, everybody was playing like him.

JW: What records of Otis' did you dig?

BD: I've got one that contained that song where he was born in a tent by the river – (hums and sings) A Change Is Gonna Come*. Yeah, I like that one.

JW: What is your day-to-day life like?

BD: Hmm... there's no way I could explain that to you, Jann. Every day is different. Depends on what I'm doing.

JW: Do you paint a lot?

BD: Well, I may be fiddling around with the car or I may be painting a boat, or... possibly washing the windows. I just do what has to be done. I play a lot of music, when there's a call in... I'm always trying to put shows together, which never come about. I don't know what it is, but sometimes we get together and I say, "Okay, let's take six songs and do 'em in, let's say, forty minutes"... We got 'em in, let's say forty minutes... We got a stopwatch timing 'em. But I mean nothing happens to it. We could do anything with it, but I mean... Boy, I hurried... I hurried for a long time. I'm sorry I did. All the time, you're hurrying, you're not really aware as you should be. You're trying to make things happen instead of just letting it happen. You follow me?

JW: That's the awkwardness of this interview.

BD: Well, I don't find anything awkward about it. I think it's going great.

JW: The purpose of any interview is to let the person who's being interviewed unload his head.

BD: Well, that's what I'm doing.

JW: And trying to draw that out is...

BD: Boy, that's a good... That'd be a great title for a song. Unload my head. Going down to the store... going down to the corner to unload my head. I'm gonna write that up when I get back. (Laughter) Going to Tallahassee to unload my head.

JW: What do you think can happen with your career as a singer?

BD: What are the possibilities?

JW: Go on the road, continue to make records... For instance, do you foresee continuing to make records?

BD: If they're enjoyable. I'm going to have to receive a certain amount of enjoyment out of my work pretty soon. I'd like to keep a little closer to the studios than I am now. It's awful hard for me to make records when I've got to go four thousand miles away, you know? Like I say, when you do have these companies around who're just there to serve...

JW: Are you thinking of moving to Nashville? I mean that would be...

BD: Well, if I moved to Nashville, I'd still have to book studio time, wouldn't I?

JW: But still, you'd have the accessibility of the session men and the engineers...

BD: That's true. But I'd have to do everything with that same sound, wouldn't I? I couldn't really use a variety of techniques.

JW: Can you see a time when you would stop making records?

BD: Well, let's put it this way: making a record isn't any more than just recording a song, for me. Well, that's what it's been up till now. Not necessarily going into the studio for any other reason than to record a song. So, If I were to stop writing songs I would stop recording. Or let's say If I was to stop singing I guess I would stop recording. But I don't foresee that. I'll be recording 'cause that's a way for me to unload my head

JW: You said in one of your songs on Highway 61... "I need a dump truck, mama, to unload my head". Do you still need a dump truck or something? (Laughter)

BD: What album was that?

JW: It was on Highway 61. What I'm trying to ask is what are the changes that have gone on between the time you did Highway 61 and Nashville Skyline or John Wesley Harding?

BD: The changes. I don't think I know exactly what you mean.

JW: How has life changed for you? Your approach to... your view of what you do...

BD: Not much. I'm still the same person. I'm still uh... going at in the same old way. Doing the same old thing.

JW: Do you think you've settled down, and slowed down?

BD: I hope so. I was going at a tremendous speed... at the time of my Blonde on Blonde album, I was going at a tremendous speed.

JW: How did you make the change? The motorcycle accident?

BD: I just took what came. That's how I made the changes. I took what came.

JW: What do they come from?

BD: What was what coming from? Well, they come from the same sources that everybody else's do. I don't know if it comes from within oneself anymore than it comes from without oneself. Or outside of oneself. Don't you see what I mean? Maybe the inside and the outside are both the same. I don't know. But, I feel it just like everyone else. What's that old line – there's a line from one of those old songs out... "I can recognize it in others, I can feel it in myself." You can't say that's from the inside or the outside, it's like both.

JW: What people do you think from the outside have influenced a change?

BD: Uh... what change are you talking about?

JW: The change from Highway 61 to Nashville Skyline...

BD: I'm not probably as aware of that change as you are, because I haven't listened to that album Highway 61... I'd probably do myself a lot of good going back and listening to it. I'm not aware of that change. I probably could pinpoint it right down if I heard that album but I haven't heard it for quite a while.

JW: Are there any old albums that you do listen to?

BD: Well, I don't sit around and listen to my records, if that's what you mean.

JW: Like picking up a high school yearbook, and just...

BD: Oh, I love to do that... Every once in a while. That's the way I listen to my records – every once in a while. Every once in a while I say "Well, I'd like to see that fellow again."

JW: Are there any albums or tracks from the albums that you think now were particularly good?

BD: On any of my old albums? Uh... As songs or performances?

JW: Songs.

BD: Oh yeah, quite a few.

JW: Which ones?

BD: Well, if I was performing now... If I was making personal appearances, you would know which ones, because I would play them. You know? But I don't know which ones I'd play now. I'd have to pick and choose. Certainly couldn't play 'em all.

JW: Thinking about the titles on Bringing It All Back Home.

BD: I like Maggi'es Farm. I always liked Highway 61 Revisited. I always liked that song. Mr Tambourine Man and Blowin' In The Wind and Girl From The North Country and Boots Of Spanish Leather and The Times They Are A-Changin'... I liked Ramona...

JW: Where did you write Desolation Row? Where were you when you wrote that?

BD: I was in the back of a taxi-cab.

JW: In New York?

BD: Yeah.

JW: During the period where you were recording songs with a rock and roll accompaniment, with a full-scale electric band, of those rock and roll songs that you did, which do you like?

BD: The best rock and roll songs... which ones are there?

JW: Uh... Like A Rolling Stone...

BD: Yeah, I probably liked that the best.

JW: And that was the Tom Wilson record... how come you never worked with that collection of musicians again

BD: Well, Michael Bloomfield, he was touring with Paul Butterfield at that time... And I could only get 'em when I could. So I wouldn't wait on Michael Bloomfield to make my records. He sure does play good, though. I missed having him there, but what could you do?

JW: In talking about the songs as performance, which of the performances that you did, that were recorded...

BD: I like Like A Rolling Stone... I can hear it now, now that you've mentioned it. I like that sound. You mean, which recorded performances?

JW: Yeah, I mean in your performance of the song...

BD: Oh... I like some of them on the last record, but I don't know, I tend to close up in the studio. After I've... I could never get enough presence on me. Never really did sound like me, to me.

JW: On Nashville Skyline you see a lot of echoing and a lot of limiting. What made you decide to alter your voice technically and use those kind of studio tricks? Rather than doing it more or less flat?

BD: Well, how would you have liked it better? Would you have liked it flat?

JW: I dig the echo.

BD: I do too. I dig the echo myself. That's why we did it that way. The old records do sound flat. I mean there's just a flatness to them, they're like two-dimensional. Isn't that right? Well in this day and age, there's no reason to make records like that.

JW: Nashville Skyline Rag – was that a jam that took place in a studio or did you write the lyrics before?

BD: Umm... I had that little melody quite a while before I recorded it.

JW: There's a cat named Alan Weberman who writes in the East Village Other. He calls himself the world's leading Dylanologist. You know him?

BD: No... Oh, yes, I did. Is this the guy who tears up all my songs? Well, he oughta take a rest. He's way off. I saw something he wrote about All Along The Watchtower and boy, let me tell you, this boy's off. Not only did he create some type of fantasy – he had Allen Ginsberg in there – he couldn't even hear the words to the song right. He didn't hear the song right. Can you believe that? I mean this fellow couldn't hear the words... or something. I bet he's a hard working fellow, though. I bet he really does a good job if he could find something to do but it's too bad it's just my songs, 'cause I don't know really if there's enough material in my songs to sustain someone who is really out to do a big job. You understand what I mean? I mean a fellow like that would be much better off writing about Tolstoy, or Dostoevsky, or Freud... Doing a really big analysis of somebody who has countless volumes of writings. But here's me, just a few records out. Somebody devoting so much time to those few records, when there's such a wealth of material that hasn't even been touched yet, or hasn't even been heard or read... that escapes me. Does it escape you? I understand putting time into it, but I read this, in this East Village Other. I read it... and it was clever. And I got a kick out of reading it (laughter) on some level, but I didn't want to think anybody was taking it too seriously. You follow me?

JW: He's just representative of thousands of people who do take it seriously.

BD: Well, that's their own business. Why don't I put it that way: that's their business and his business. But... I'm the source of that and I don't know if it's my business or not, but I'm the source of it. You understand? So I see it a little differently than all of them do.

JW: People in your audience, they obviously take it very seriously, and they look to you for something...

BD: Well, I wouldn't be where I am today without them. So, I owe them... my music, which I would be playing for them.

JW: Does the intensity of some of the response annoy you?

BD: No, no, I rather enjoy it.

JW: I'm trying to get back to the thing about being a symbol of youth culture... What're your opinions or thoughts on that? At some point you pick up the paper or the magazine and find out that this is happening and you know that you're considered like this. That people are watching you for that... And you've got to say to yourself, "Am I hung-up?"

BD: Well, not any more than anybody else is who performs in public. I mean, everyone has his following.

JW: What do you think your following is like?

BD: Well, I think there are all kinds... I imagine they're... You would probably know just about as much about that as I would. You know, they're all kinds of people. I remember when I used to do concerts, you couldn't pin 'em down. All the road managers and the sound equipment carriers and even the truck drivers would notice how different the audiences were, in terms of individual people. How different they... like sometimes I might have a concert and all the same kind of people show up, I mean, what does that mean?

JW: Did you vote for president?

BD: We got down to the polls too late. (Laughter)

JW: People are always asking about what does this song mean and what does that song mean, and a lot of them seem to be based on some real person, just like any kind of fiction, you expect... Are there any songs that you can relate to particular people, as having inspired the song?

BD: Not now I can't.

JW: What do you tell somebody who asks: "What is Leopard-Skin Pillbox Hat about?"

BD: It's just about that. I think that's something I mighta taken out of the newspaper. Mighta seen a picture of one in a department store window. There's really no more to it than that. I know it can get blown up into some kind of illusion. But in reality it's no more than that. Just a leopard skin pillbox. That's all.

JW: How did you come in contact with the Band?

BD: Well. There used to be this young lady that worked up at Al Grossman's office – her name was Mary Martin, she's from Canada. And she was a rather persevering soul, as she hurried around the office on her job. She was a secretary, did the secretarial work, and knew all the bands and all the singers from Canada. She was from Canada. Anyway, I needed a group to play electric songs.

JW: Where did you hear them play?

BD: Oh, I never did hear them play. I think the group I wanted was Jim Burton and Joe Osborne to play bass, and Mickey Jones. I knew Mickey Jones, he was playing with Johnny Rivers. They were all in California, though. And there was some difficulty in making that group connect. One of them didn't want to fly and Mickey couldn't make it immediately and I think Jim Burton was playing with a television group at that time.

JW: He used to play with Ricky Nelson?

BD: Oh, I think this was after that. He was playing with a group called the Shindogs and they were on television. So he was doing that job. Anyway, that was the way it stood and Mary Martin kept pushing this group who were out in New Jersey – I think they were in Elizabeth, New Jersey, or Hartford, Connecticut, or some town close to New York. She was pushing them and she had two of the fellows come up to the office so we could meet. And it was no more... No more, no less. I just asked them if they could do it and they said they could. (Laughs) These two said they could. And that was how it started. Easy enough, you know.

JW: How come you never made an album with them?

BD: We tried. We cut a couple of sides in the old New York Columbia studios. We cut two or three and right after Positively Fourth Street, we cut some singles and they didn't really get off the ground. You oughta hear 'em. You know, you could find 'em. They didn't get off the ground. They didn't even make it on the charts. Consequently, I've not been back on the charts since the singles. I never did much care for singles 'cause you have to pay so much attention to them. Unless you make your whole album full of singles. You have to make them separately. So I didn't really think about them too much that way. But playing with the Band was a natural thing. We have a real different sound. Real different. But it wasn't like anything heard. I heard one of the records recently... It was on a jukebox. Please Crawl Out Your Window.

JW: That was one of them? What were the others?

BD: There were some more songs out of that same session... Sooner Or Later – that was on Blonde On Blonde. That's one of my favorite songs.

JW: What role did you play in the Big Pink album, the album they made by themselves?

BD: Well, I didn't do anything on that album. They did that with John Simon.

JW: Did you play piano on it or anything?

BD: No.

JW: What kind of sound did you hear when you went in to make John Wesley Harding

BD: I heard the sound that Gordon Lightfoot was getting, with Charlie McCoy and Kenny Buttrey. I'd used Charlie and Kenny both before, and I figured if he could get that sound, I could. But we couldn't get it. (Laughs) It was an attempt to get it, but it didn't come off. We got a different sound... I don't know what you'd call that... It's a muffled sound. There used to be a lot of friction in the control booth, on these records I used to make. I didn't know about it, I wasn't aware of them until recently. Somebody would want to put limiters on this and somebody would want to put an echo on that, someone else would have some other idea. And myself, I don't know anything about any of this. So I just have to leave it up in the air. In someone else's hands.

JW: The friction was between the engineer and the producer...

BD: No, the managers and the advisers and the agents.

JW: Do you usually have sessions at which all these people are there or do you prefer to close them up?

BD: Well, sometimes there's a whole lot of people. Sometimes you can't even move there's so many people... Other times, there's no one. Just the musicians.

JW: Which is more comfortable for you?

BD: Well, it's much more comfortable when there's... Oh, I don't know, I could have it both ways. Depends what kind of song I'm gonna do. I might do a song where I want all those people around. Then I do another song and have to shut the lights off, you know?

JW: Was Sad-Eyed Lady Of The Lowlands originally planned as a whole side?

BD: That song is an example of a song... it started out as just a little thing, Sad-Eyed Lady Of The Lowlands, but I got carried away, somewhere along the line. I just sat down at a table and started writing. At the session itself. And I just got carried away with the whole thing... I just started writing and I couldn't stop. After a period of time, I forgot what it was all about, and I started trying to get back to the beginning. (Laughs) Yeah.

JW: Did you plan to go down and make a double record set?

BD: No. Those things just happen when you have the material.

JW: Do you like that album?

BD: Blonde On Blonde? Yeah. But like I always think that a double set could be made into a single album. But I dig Blonde on Blonde and the Beatles thing. They are like huge collections of songs. But a real great record can usually be compacted down... Although the Beatles have that album, and Blonde On Blonde... I'm glad that there's two sides, that there's that much...

JW: How long did that take to record?

BD: Blonde On Blonde? Well I cut it in between. I was touring and I was doing it whenever I got a chance to get into the studio. So it was in the works for a while. I could only do maybe two or three songs at a time.

JW: How long did John Wesley Harding take?

BD: You mean how many sessions? That took three sessions, but we did them in a month. The first two sessions were maybe three weeks to a month apart, and the second one was about two weeks from the third.

JW: John Wesley Harding – why did you call the album that?

BD: We... I called it that because I had that song John Wesley Harding. It didn't mean anything to me. I called it that, Jann, 'cause I had the song John Wesley Harding, which started out to be a long ballad. I was gonna write a ballad on... Like maybe one of those old cowboy... You know, a real long ballad. But in the middle of the second verse, I got tired. I had a tune, and I didn't want to waste the tune, it was a nice little melody, so I just wrote a quick third verse, and I recorded that. But it was a silly little song (laughs)... I mean, it's not a commercial song, in any kind of sense. At least, I don't think it is. It was the one song on the album which didn't seem to fit in. And I had it placed here and there, and I didn't know what I was gonna call the album anyway. No one else had any ideas either. I placed it last and I placed it in the middle somewhere, but it didn't seem to work. So somehow that idea came up to just put it first and get done with it right away, and that way when it comes up, no one'll... You know, if someone's listening to All Along The Watchtower and that comes up and they'll say "Wow, what's that?" (Laughs)

JW: You knew that cowboy...

BD: I knew people were gonna be brought down when they heard that and say "Wow, what's that?" You know, a lot of people said that to me, but I knew it in front. I knew people were gonna listen to that song and say that they didn't understand what was going on, but they would've singled that song out later, if we hadn't called the album John Wesley Harding and placed so much importance on that, for people to start wondering about it... If that hadn't been done, that song would've come up and people would have said it was a throwaway song. It would have probably got in the way of some other songs. See, I try very hard to stop my songs from interfering with each other. That's all I'm trying to do. Place 'em all out on the disc. Sometimes it's really annoying to me when I listen to all these dubs. I listen to one and then I put on another one and the one I heard before is still on my mind. I'm trying to keep away from that.

JW: Why did you choose the name of the outlaw John Wesley Harding?

BD: Well, it fits in the tempo. Fits right in the tempo. Just what I had at hand.

JW: What other titles did you have for the album?

BD: Not for that one. That was the only title that come up for that one. But for the Nashville Skyline one, the title came up John Wesley Harding, Volume II. We were gonna do that... The record company wanted to call the album Love Is All There Is. I didn't see anything wrong with it, but it sounded a little spooky to me...

JW: What about Blonde On Blonde?

BD: Well, that title came up when... I don't even recall how exactly it came up, but I do know it was all in good faith. It has to do with just the word. I don't know who thought of that. I certainly didn't.

JW: Of all the albums as albums, excluding your recent ones, which one do you think was the most successful in what it was trying to do? Which was the most fully realized, for you?

BD: I think the second one. The second album I made.

JW: Why?

BD: Well, I got a chance to... I felt real good about doing an album with my own material. My own material and I picked a little on it, picked the guitar and it was a big Gibson -I felt real accomplished on that. Don't Think Twice. Got a chance to do some of that. Got a chance to play in open tuning... Oxford Town, I believe that's on the album. That's open tuning. I got a chance to do talking blues. I got a chance to do ballads, like Girl From The North Country. It's just because it had more variety. I felt good at that.

JW: Of the electric ones, which do you prefer?

BD: Well, sound-wise, I prefer this last one. 'Cause it's got the sound. See, I'm listening for sound now.

JW: As a collection of songs?

BD: Songs? Well, this last album maybe means more to me, 'cause I did undertake something. In a certain sense. And... There's a certain pride in that.

JW: It was more premeditated than the others? I mean, you knew what you were gonna go after?

BD: Right.

JW: Where did the name Nashville Skyline...

BD: Well, I always like to tie the name of the album in with some song. Or if not some song, some kind of general feeling. I think that just about fit because it was less in the way, and less specific than any of the other ones there. Certainly couldn't call the album Lay Lady Lay. I wouldn't have wanted to call it that, although that name was brought up. It didn't get my vote, but it was brought up. Peggy Day – Lay Peggy Day, that was brought up. A lot of things were brought up. Tonight I'll Be Staying Here With Peggy Day. That's another one. Some of the names just didn't seem to fit. Girl From The North Country. That was another title which didn't really seem to fit. Picture me on the front holding a guitar and Girl From The North Country printed on top. (Laughs) Tell Me That It Isn't Peggy Day*. I don't know who thought of that one.

JW: What general thing was happening that made you want to start working with the Band, rather than working solo?

BD: I only worked solo because there wasn't much going on. There wasn't. There were established people around... Yeah, the Four Seasons... There were quite a few other established acts. But I worked alone because it was easier to. Plus, everyone else I knew was working alone, writing and singing. There wasn't much opportunity for groups or bands then; there wasn't. You know that.

JW: When did you decide to get one together, like that? You played at Forest Hills, that was where you first appeared with a band? Why did you feel the time had come?

BD: To do what? Well, because I could pay a backing group now. See I didn't want to use a backing group unless I could pay them.

JW: Do you ever get a chance to work frequently with the Band? In the country?

BD: Work? Well, work is something else. Sure, we're always running over old material. We're always playing, running over old material. Testing out this and that.

JW: What do you see yourself as – a poet, a singer, a rock and roll star, married man...

BD: All of those. I see myself as it all. Married man, poet, singer, songwriter, custodian, gatekeeper... All of it. I'll be it all. I feel "confined" when I have to choose one or the other. Don't you?

JW: You're obligated to do one album a year?

BD: Yes.

JW: Is that all you want to do?

BD: No. I'd like to do more. I would do dozens of them if I could be near the studio. I've been just lazy, Jann. I've been just getting by, so I haven't really thought too much about putting out anything really new and different.

JW: You've heard the Joan Baez album of all your songs...

BD: Yeah, I did... I generally like everything she does.

JW: Are there any particular artists that you like to see do your songs?

BD: Yeah, Elvis Presley. I liked Elvis Presley... Elvis Presley recorded a song of mine. That's the one recording I treasure the most... It was called Tomorrow Is A Long Time. I wrote it but never recorded it.

JW: Which album is that on?

BD: Kismet.

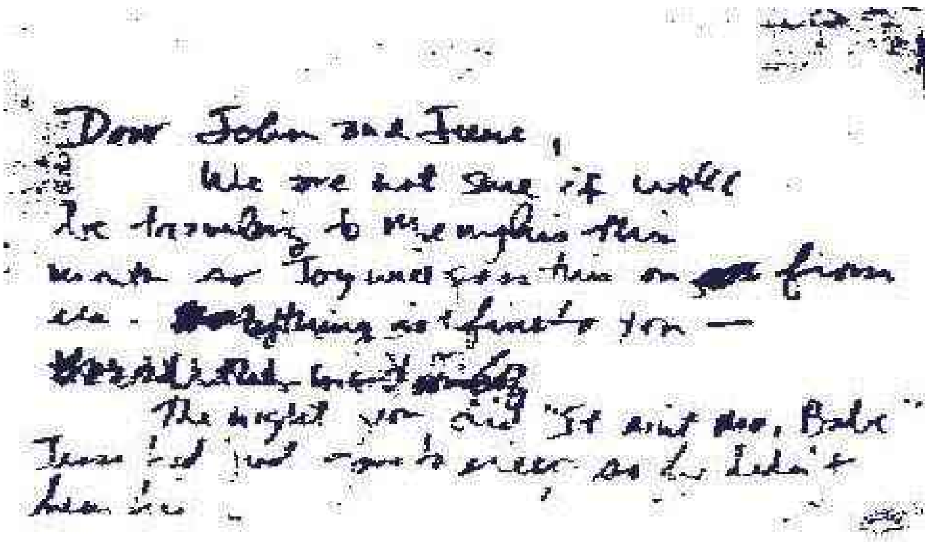
JW: I'm not familiar with it at all.



BD: He did it with just guitar.

Michelle Enghien Interview, Paris, France

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1025-1026.

This item appears in the Wicked Messenger item 298 of October 7, 1986 with the comment – this "comes from an unknown and undated English language magazine". It would seem, judging from the style, that the interview was originally published in French and that the following is a 'good-as-possible' translation back into English. I have no further details about the interview, at present.

DYLAN – 'I'M A NEW MAN'

BOB DYLAN – RARELY INTERVIEWED – TALKS TO MICHELLE ENGHIEN OF THE FRENCH POP WEEKLY SUPER HEBDO POP MUSIC.

ME: Why such long silence?

BD: (Laughs and replies with a long silence).

ME: Why do you go for months and months without making any personal appearances without giving any sign of life as if you'd disappeared off the face of the earth?

BD: I believe that at certain periods in a persons existence it is necessary, if not vital, to bring about a change in your life so as not to go under. I felt that I needed to stop in order to find something new, in order to create – and then again I wanted to live part of my life without being continually disturbed for no valid reason. I have children and I want to watch them grow up – to get to know them, and for them to get to know me and know that I'm their father.

ME: You spoke about creating, and it seems that what you are doing now is different from the last record you did before you withdrew from the scene, "Lay, Lady, Lay". And yet I have the impression that you haven't really changed since "I Want You". Why?

BD: First of all I want to say that I did not withdraw after that record, and secondly that I realised that people preferred what I was doing before. That's why I reverted to my earlier style. Nevertheless my last LP is not in the style of "I Want You". I use the harmonica a lot less.

ME: What is the innovation?

BD: There isn't an innovation as such – except for the meeting with Al Kooper for the next LP.

ME: Why did you decide to work with Al Kooper?

BD: I knew Al Kooper before I worked with him and I appreciated him as a musician. One day we met in the home of a mutual friend where we spent the weekend, and we had fun playing together – it was amusing and interesting. So, why not try it?

ME: Will you continue to work together?

BD: I don't know. But why not? Others split up – me, I do the reverse – I find you learn more that way.

ME: Many journalists and writers predict that the revolution, in all its forms, will come in America, especially through the medium of music and its exponents; yet the music seems far less committed, less valid today than it was two years ago.

BD: I don't really think there'll be a revolution, but possibly just simply an evolution of the music. The possibilities in America are so vast. I think that there is very little good music around in relation to the large number of groups which exist in the USA. But the blame lies with the men who employ the groups; these men are pretty well incapable of distinguishing between good and bad musicians. They run around all over the country and as soon as they hear something which they think might bring them in some bread, they buy the group, throw them onto the market, make them a success – without stopping to see if there is anything behind them, or to ask if they are ready to make a career in music.

It's for this reason that there are so many lousy records; sooner or later you have to sort out the wheat from the chaff- and that is an evolution of the spirit.

ME: How do you think you differ as a man today from what you were a year ago?

BD: I'm a new man with a number of new projects, a great deal of work to do and very happy to be living and to be able to express myself in the way I do. I feel freer than before. In short, I'm a musician through and through.

ME: When do you plan to come back to Europe?

BD: I don't know exactly, nothing is definitely fixed at present – and I don't want to leave my children. But perhaps I'll come over with them next spring.

January 1971
Weberman Telephone Conversations, New York City, NY

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 137-162.

Alan J. Weberman, a former devoted fan, by now an ex-fan disillusioned with the new-style Dylan, has visions of converting Dylan back to his former protest ways. A. J. is now the self-styled leader of the Dylan Liberation Front and by the time of this interview has already published his "garbage" article – an attempt at interpreting Dylan, the man, by analyzing the contents of his garbage can.

The following occurred in January 1971. Initially, the Dylan vs. Weberman confrontation took place outside Dylan's Greenwich Village apartment during a demonstration organized by Weberman. The next day Dylan rang Weberman and invited him to his studio to listen to some session recordings and to continue the discussion. It is clear that Dylan wanted to exercise some control over AJ. 's activities. Weberman had other ideas, using both meetings to construct an article for publication in the underground press. Unhappy with Weberman's plans Dylan makes his first telephone call on January 6th and asks to see a copy of the intended article before publication. Having perused a draft of the said article Dylan again phoned Weberman on January 9th for a much longer call, attempting to get the article modified to his liking.

These conversations, taped by Weberman, appeared in edited form on a Folkways record in 1977 by the title Bob Dylan vs. A. J. Weberman. This was hastily withdrawn for legal reasons: Dylan sued and settled out of court. They were also released in fuller form in 1985 on the bootleg album Robert Zimmerman vs. A. J. Weberman (The Historic Confrontation). The following has been taken directly from the circulating tape containing the full discussions.

The next article (see page 163) is Weberman's actual publication as it appeared in the East Village Other and a comparison of the two will show exactly how Weberman modified his draft in response to Dylan's demands.

FIRST PHONE CALL

BD: Uh, you called Naomi?

AW: Yeah.

BD: Told her about some tape. What tape was that?

AW: No I didn't say... any tape. What I did was I typed out my recollections of our conversation together, and I'm gonna use it as an interview. I'm gonna send it out to every underground paper in America for free rather than selling it to...

BD: You didn't tell me there was an interview.

AW: Ah well, didn't you, like, uh, didn't you...

BD: Hey man, you wanna have an interview with me – let me know. I'll give you the interview. Don't take uh...

AW: Okay, okay, okay, fine. I was gonna let you see it beforehand and... er, 'cause I realized that, you know, it wasn't taped and I don't wanna misquote you – put words in your mouth.

BD: Well, what about the tape? You had a tape in your jacket?

AW: No, no tape. I didn't have a tape in my jacket. I don't have the money for one of those concealed tape recorders... Uh, so I just typed up, uh...

BD: Okay, look, man, you wanna have an interview... You know, have an interview, but don't uh...

AW: Yeah.
BD: You know, that's sneaky shit, man.
AW: What kinda sneaky shit, man?
BD: I mean you come and talk to somebody and type it up, right?
AW: But you know I'm a cat who writes about, who specializes in writing about you.
BD: Yeah man, I understand that, but uh, you know, if you wanna have an interview, we can have an interview above the table, you know, and, uh, you know, just keep it on top of the table. That's all I'm talkin' about. I mean, I think that I deserve that right.
AW: Sure, sure, that's fine with me. I'd prefer it that way, you know. That would even make it better, although this isn't bad. What I have here is really...
BD: I would like to see it anyway. Can you bring it around?
AW: Yeah, I will.
BD: Like, uh, well...
AW: Should I bring it around now, or...?
BD: No, no, I'm tied up the weekend. How about, like, on Monday or Tuesday?
AW: Ah... see the trouble is that these people are expecting ah... these people are expecting ah... expecting something from me Monday. All right...
BD: I'm workin' man. Like I'm buildin' some shit, you know? And I really gotta get it built. Just, you know, some tables and some shelves and some stuff, an' I gotta get it done, man, I put it way off.
AW: Uh... Okay. I'll tell 'em that they'll have to wait.
BD: Just like, one week, or a day or two. Two days, just let me see it.
AW: Okay, let me bring it over today. I'll just leave it in your mailbox, okay? And then you can...
BD: Well I'll be there. I'll be at the studio today, so bring it by and give it to me, but I can't read it...
AW: Okay.
BD: I'll be able to do that. And then I'll call you back.
AW: Okay, groovy.
BD: All right, bye-bye.
AW: Okay, so long.

SECOND PHONE CALL

AW: You rang?
BD: Yeah, and you know you asked me about corrections, and all that? I noticed that you just had a big pile of 'em in your hand, you know, an' I was wond'rin' like, if you're fuckin' around with me, like er... you know.
AW: Wait, wait, wait, wait. What're you sayin' man?
BD: ...like you had a big pile of 'em in your hand, man. You obviously had a whole lot printed up. So, I mean like...
AW: No, no, I had the concordance. I had two, I had two xeroxes made. It cost me a dollar four cents. I had two xeroxes of this made.
BD: Okay, like there's a couple of things into that article man...
AW: Let me tell you how, yeah...
BD: ...That I kind of object to.
AW: What? What?
BD: Ah, one thing there about Johnny Cash, man. I don't think that's right. And then there's another thing...
AW: You were saying Johnny Cash is in the past.
BD: Yeah, well I didn't, you didn't – I didn't say it like that man. I didn't quite understand the article, like, like if you said, if you said in the article, you said, "That's past" – that was the quote. But like, you didn't really make specific whether that pertained to... whether Johnny Cash's y'know, playing for the White House was in the past, or whether I was digging Johnny Cash, whether that was in the past... the whole thing was kinda vague, man. I didn't want... you know I didn't want it printed that I didn't dig Johnny Cash, man, because I do.

AW: Okay, okay. I'll say... you know, so I'll put down...

BD: Okay. The other thing was Dear Landlord, man. Like, I couldn't have said that song was written for Grossman.

AW: No, you told me that. You said it was for Al Grossman. I remember that specifically. I said it's... oh, he's giving me the...

BD: Well, man, like it wasn't all the way for Al Grossman. In fact, he wasn't even in my mind. Only later man, only later when people pointed it out to me that the song might've been written for Al Grossman, I thought well, maybe it could've been.

AW: That's a good story to use, you know, you're just puttin' me on, man, you're givin' me the, uh...

BD: No, I'm not puttin' you on.

AW: ...the usual line, man.

BD: No, I don't want you to print that that was in for Grossman, because it wasn't.

AW: Who should I say...?

BD: It wasn't written for anybody, man, it's an abstract song. It sure as hell wasn't written for you!

AW: It wasn't?

BD: It sure as hell wasn't, no. I was not even aware of you at that time.

AW: Isn't landlord 'critic' though, in your symbolism?

BD: No man, like I wasn't aware of you at that time.

AW: Right, right, that's how I... that's... yeah.

BD: So I mean, I don't care what you have to figure out what to say, but it was not written for Grossman, so don't say it. I mean, you know, it's just not right.

AW: How about if I make it, like, sarcas...

BD: The other thing, man, it's like there's some lies in there, man, – there's some lies in that article, though. I don't have the article with me, but there's some lies in there.

AW: Like what.

BD: Well, I was going to... I had the article. I called you before, man, and you weren't home. I had the article in front of me. I left your article at the studio, but there's some lies in there man – I couldn't believe it.

AW: Want me to read you the article now.

BD: Yeah.

AW: I was really fucking hassled.

BD: No, no, no, it's there's some place round in the, in the like, third, fourth page.

AW: Third or fourth page. One, two, three... "somewhat taken aback by... I told him that all this evidence in your poetry"... So we talked... Dylan said he didn't dig the Panthers because of their position on the Mideastern situation – "little Israel versus all those"... I started to explain how to Dylan, how the Panthers believed that everyone has a right to live: Jews, Arabs and Palestinian refugees, when this kid from my class comes over and says he wants to talk to Dylan. I told him that that was cool but to wait until we got done... I had something important to say to Bob and I didn't know if I'd ever see him again. (I was seizing the time). So the punk says – "You're full of shit and so is Dylanology". So I grabbed him by the collar and screamed SPLIT ASSHOLE! He left but as he was going he yelled out in grade school intonations – WEBERMAN'S BOOTLEGGING TARANTULA (Dylan's suppressed novel). Dylan said I only had half of the book – the other half was up in Woodstock – and that I should never worry about running out of things to interpret.

BD: California, man, California.

AW: California?

BD: California, man.

AW: You don't want people rippin' you off, eh?

BD: It's not in Woodstock. That's right. Also I don't want people, you know, up there, asking questions.

AW: Okay, "out in California" okay.

BD: Well, you just do it.

AW: What's the difference? Woodstock, California, it doesn't make, you know, it doesn't affect my thesis one way or the other.
"...that I should never worry about running out of things to interpret. He said he was gonna invite me up to Woodstock a couple of months ago. I asked him "How come you didn't, how come I had to have a demonstration in front of your house to get you to negotiate... you know how dedicated I am and how well I know your work." "I know, Al, and one day we'll go for a ride together and I'll interpret all my poems for ya'." "We ain't goin' by the docks, are we?..." I didn't say that but, you know, what difference does it make?... "No, Al, you scared my kids..."

BD: See, that's another one.

AW: You did say I...

BD: Did I say that, man? Well, it's not true...

AW: You told Carrie I scared your kids, man.

BD: I didn't mean 'scare'. You know what I'm talkin' about? I didn't really mean 'scare', because they weren't really aware and I don't wanna insinuate that...

AW: Sure.

BD: ...but like, I didn't mean that, really. I might've said it, man, but I didn't really mean that. Because my kids aren't really aware of this or that. You know, I said that because, like, it could've been possible, but it wasn't possible. And like, I don't wanna, I don't wanna throw that out, I really don't.

AW: So what shall I put down?

BD: I don't know. But, like, uh... I don't know, but, like...

AW: How about "you shook up my kids"?

BD: No, no, not even my kids. Leave my kids out of it.

AW: Leave your kids out of it?

BD: Because, er, you know... that was me, that was my thing imposed on them, and that was my thing, you know what I mean? So I don't know what you can say, but... anything, I don't... "You shook up my landlord" or "My superintendent" or whatever, I don't know. Well, figure it out, anything. It don't matter. But like, that's not really... that doesn't really speak for me.

AW: Ah... but you did say that though...

BD: If I did say it man, I'm sorry – I shouldn't have said it. You know, I'm sorry to my kids that... I mean, because it's not true, man. Like, it's just I mouthed of, that's all. And I shouldn't have said it for their sake, 'cause it's just not true.

AW: Yeah, the kids didn't look scared really.

BD: No, no, they weren't man, and like, I don't wanna even... y'know, I don't wanna say it. My wife'll fuckin' hit me, man. Like, I don't really wanna get into that.

AW: All right. No, "Al, you scared my kids", you don't like that. "Sorry man. I didn't mean to drag your kids into it, I wouldn't hurt them. They'll be with us soon anyway... "

BD: Will you take that out?

AW: Yeah, I'll take that out. "...dig like these radical freaks were staying over at The Archives and I told them where you were at and they thought about trashing your place but I told them don't do it... it ain't fair to the kids". Ah...

BD: Oh man, take all that shit out, please! Like, I mean, you can leave all the radical stuff in there, you can say it ain't fair to me, but not to the kids, because it's...

AW: Yeah, but, you know... what I was saying at the time is that the only thing that... see, what I'm saying there is the only thing that was preventing me from telling them...

BD: Yeah, well, I made a mistake man – I shouldn't have said it. I mean, it was one of them things that I shouldn't have said. I thought I could use it as a weight.

AW: All right. "Al, I know a lotta people who want to hurt you, especially after that 'Garbage' thing – you know, all these college kids come round to my garbage and take some of it back to their dorms – you wouldn't like these kids either..." "Get a garbage compactor and I'll come round and pick it up once a week." "I don't like machines... No, that's not true."

"Bob, you wouldn't have me offed would you?" "You scared?" "Sure I am, this is an oligarchy, the more money you have, the more power." "I wouldn't do it, Al, don't worry. It's too late anyway." "I didn't think so, man, it would be like GM offing Nader, but if you do, you'd better do a good job."

"I went on and I gave Dylan a rap against Imperialism, Racism and sexism (he didn't seem like he was listening) and then I told him that Nashville Skyline sucked while Self Portrait was a stone rip-off since many people bought it, played it once, and stuck it on their shelf. Neither album related to objective reality. Dylan responded quietly – "Well, there were two good songs on Self Portrait- Days Of Forty-Nine and Copper Kettle..."

BD: Ah... hey... look, you know you don't have to change this, man, but I'd say there were more than two. I would still say there more than two.

AW: You said there were two.

BD: I did say that there were two but I mean, you know, you don't have to change it, you can leave it like that, but there were more than two.

AW: "...without those two LP's there'd be no New Morning, anyway I'm just starting to get back on my feet as far as my music goes... Al, do you use amphetamine?" "No, man, the reason I have so much energy is because I'm tuned into the life force that's trying to assert itself here on earth – I'm alive man". "Why worry so much about earth when there's..." "What do you want me to do, worry about if Mars invades us?" "What drugs do you use?..."

I found somethin' else in the thing. Uh... you know... first it wasn't me... well, let me finish the paragraph:

"What drugs do you use, Al?" "Just reefer and caffeine – you?" "No drugs." "Bullshit" "Well, so long, Al".

Oh, then I'm gonna put, "No drugs" and I'm gonna put "and it looked true because Dylan's eyes looked normal" and "Bullshit! but I must admit that his eyes looked normal", 'cause I'd made reference to your pupil size in other articles, you know, and I feel I should put that in to be fair.

"Well, so long, Al, you're an interesting fellow, see you in a few weeks." I gave him the power handshake and he split. When I got home I was fucking wasted. I was rapping with Harvey, a lawyer friend, when the phone rang – "Hello Al, this is Bob." Suddenly the phone began to look like my record player. "Want to come over here and visit me tomorrow?" "That's like asking a strung-out junkie if he wants a fix". "Al, I want to thank you for helping me sell a lot of records – your articles have helped me get it, keep it going." "Yeah, that's one aspect of Dylanology I don't dig... I may cancel it out soon." "Al, do you have a driver's license?" "No, never learned to drive." "Too bad, I know of this chauffeur's job that's open." "Are you trying to buy me out? Stop right there. It's im-fucking-possible." "No, I wasn't trying to buy you out, I just wanted you to see life from another seat. You've been on the streets too long." "Hey, Bob, you know that song Champaign, Illinois you wrote and gave to Carl Perkins?" "Yeah, I figured Carl needed a song." "He needed something, anyway, why not write a song called Carbondale, Illinois, 'cause that's where the pigs just murdered this black man who was gonna testify against them." Dylan remained silent. "You there?" "Call ya tomorrow". I hung up. The next day he called me and told me to come over to his midtown studio with a tape deck and an amplifier if I wanted to hear some rare Dylan tapes 'cause all he had in the studio was a record player. My old lady, Ann, helped me take the stuff uptown and then split 'cause Dylan said he wanted to see me alone. Dylan began – "I've seen you around a lot, Al." "Bob, let's set up the equipment, okay?" I went over to the speaker and asked him to disconnect it and he started unscrewing the terminal which had no lead on it. "Let me do it, man", and I did the thing. (This little bit of play acting and riff about not having a tape-recorder in his studio was a clever ploy designed to convince me Dylan wasn't into recording conversations, but I didn't go for it and maintained my cool when it came to saying self-incriminating things).

We began – "What do you think of Tim Leary?" Dylan asked. "I think he's great – a revolutionary, etc... a mystical... national hero of Woodstock Nation. What do you think?" "I don't follow politics". "How come I found newspapers in yer garbage..." "Not my garbage... mix all the garbage together"... "your politics... genocidal... a lot of people I talk to say, uh, you know... the Sing Out interview... you support the war in Vietnam". "I only did that to get back at the freaks who wouldn't leave me alone... up in Woodstock... I don't dig the fame thing..."

BD: I don't dig the what? Oh...

AW: Fame thing.

BD: Yeah, okay.

AW: "... freaks find me everywhere." "Get a long-haired wig, they'd never recognize you." "Buy me one". "Cash – That lackey was so conservative at the time you did things together that Nixon later invited him to sing at the White House..."

BD: Okay.

AW: "...and Cash still goes out of his way to praise Nixon's genocidal policies at his concerts". Now what should I say, that's past, or...

BD: No, you could say, uh...

AW: That's what you said.

BD: Well, I think I might have said that for him, but not for me. I might've said that for him, like, but I don't think I should actually say that for him, anyway.

AW: All right, then, what should I say?

BD: You should say, uh, well, uh, "too bad". Ah, well, that ain't good either, man, like what... what the... Well, I don't know what to say, man, so what am I supposed to say? I mean, I'm not gonna...

AW: So what d'you think about Cash? So what do you think about Johnny Cash? He's your friend right?

BD: Well, I can't even answer that, man, I mean, you know, I mean Johnny Cash has been, uh, I've heard Johnny Cash since I was a kid.

AW: Right, but things are changed. In the...

BD: Yeah, but his music hasn't changed, man, I mean I still listen to, uh...

AW: See, I'm not putting Cash down that much, man. I'm saying at the time that, uh, like uh...

BD: I dig him, man.

AW: ...at the time Nashville Skyline was coming out...

BD: Hey, that was...

AW: Cash was a more, a very conservative musician. That's why Nixon invited him to the White House. He changed – Cash was going through a change, whether it be motivated by financial, or motivated, you know, just being exposed to, uh... the music people, the way they are today. Uh... he went through some kind of a change, right? So what I'm saying is – at the time, you did things together. I'm not attacking Cash now that he...

BD: Hey, I love him, man. I mean, that's it... that's it. I just don't... I got nothin' else to say.

AW: Okay. "Man, almost all the other rock poets put you down in their songs – in yer own language – for yer politics." "They're just using my phrasing". "No man, they understand what you say... from studying your poetry... Man, if you really believe in yer current bag and want to continue to remain in it, how come you copped out on yourself in your poetry? And the poetry is simple enough that many people understand it. Isn't that indicative of a contradiction in yer personality?" Now I had Dylan going. He suddenly became very... "This is a composite of two conversations. No, I'm gonna say that, uh, you know... I have a little preface to put that isn't an exact quote, and it's a composite. I didn't do... uh, get to that yet, as I didn't finish the last part plus a little news release about "don't expose me" on, uh, New Morning. "Isn't that indicative of a contradiction in yer personality? Now I had..."

BD: What did you just say, man? What does all that have to do... that wasn't in the article.

AW: That's gonna be in the article... this isn't complete, it's about ninety percent complete. What's left is a little thing saying, "this is not Dylan talking, this is my, uh... "

BD: I never said "Don't expose me" in New Morning, what's that?

AW: Backwards, backwards. You need to play a part of it backwards.

BD: And it says "Don't expose me"?

AW: Yeah.

BD: Oh fuck, man! Jesus!

AW: It's the same part that, uh, it's the same part that, uh, you did...

BD: Shit, why don't you play an Andy Williams record backwards, man, see what it says.

AW: If you play the whole record backwards, man, it really makes sense in, uh, two places. "When Mars invades us" and, uh... only when you slur the words, you know? "When Mars invades us" and "Ain't no reason to go into town", and that says "Don't expose me" backwards. You know, like, uh...

BD: Jesus!

AW: You know that as well as I do, man 'cause you put it there.

BD: Oh! Oh! Okay. Go ahead, man.

AW: Uh, ha ha. "They're just using my phrasing". "No man. They understand what you're saying the same way I do – from studying your poetry... How come you copped out on yourself in your poetry? And the poetry is simple enough that many people understand it. Isn't that indicative of a contradiction in yer personality. Now I had Dylan going. He suddenly became very depressed and didn't say anything. He looked hurt. I almost felt sorry for him..."

BD: Wh, what's that? What's that all insinua.. what's all that shit, man, you just sort of slipped in?

AW: That was the second day, that other time, the second meeting, man. You just, after I said that, you just sat there and...

BD: I was thinkin' about somethin', man, if I ever just sat there. I mean, I don't...

AW: It's a positive fact, man. When I say somethin', then all of a sudden you go into a fit of depression, man.

BD: No man, I don't go into fits of depression...

AW: Well, I figured maybe I'd said something that hit home.

BD: ...don't have 'em, man, don't have 'em. You can print it man, but it's a lie.

AW: I didn't say you looked... No, that's not true, man. After I said that, you just sat there, and I said "Hey Bob, what's happenin' man?"

BD: Hey man, haven't you ever just sat there?

AW: Not when I'm in a conversation. It's to give you a reaction time man, when they do tests with people, you know, psychological tests, they say, "what do you think of this word"... boy, dog, you know, this, that, you know, and then they come out with a heavily-weighted word – mother's tits – you know. And the guy says, oh you know, something like...

BD: Okay, go ahead, go ahead.

AW: "...I almost felt sorry for him. "Hey Bob, you okay, man?" "Okay. Like, a lot of these cats are full of shit – putting you down for not doing anything when they don't do shit themselves." "Remember, Al, I'm not like them... not fresh out of college..."

BD: I don't get that statement at all.

AW: That doesn't make sense, but that's what you said.

BD: Yeah? I don't get it.

AW: You said, "Remember Al, I'm not like them".

BD: Well, let's just cut it right there – I'm not fresh out of college man, that's just, er...

AW: But you said, you said, "fresh out of college" and the next time, the next day, you said, "Al, all these kids are fresh out of college", and we were talkin' about what you... all right I'll cut that.

BD: I think you put that out of context.

AW: It's dots, there's dots in between it.

BD: Okay.

AW: "Man, you've been telling everyone my interpretations are 'way off... let's hear you interpret one of your songs, then I'll interpret it and we'll see whose interpretation is better... how about Tonight I'll Be Staying Here With You?" "Okay, but I feel stupid. Throw my ticket out the window – so we going..."

BD: Oh? Stop just for a minute. There was another thing, back there someplace on Rolling Stone. You asked me about Rolling Stone. I think you passed it, I don't think you read it.

AW: I didn't get to that yet.

BD: Oh, you didn't get to it, okay. I'm sorry.

AW: "Let's hear you..." "Okay, but I feel stupid... Throw my ticket out the window... so we were down in Nashville and the train was leaving and I didn't want to go so I said..." "Hey, man, didn't you once sing 'You hand in your money' for the line 'You hand in your ticket' at a concert in England?" "Yeah". "So doesn't ticket symbolize money?" "A ticket is anything you want it to be". "You mean your symbolism isn't consistent?" "It's as consistent as me." "So isn't it money?" "It could be". Dylan then changed the subject – "You sure you didn't write me letters about my race?" "No man. How many times do I have to tell you... like every letter I wrote was on Dylan Archives stationery – was that?" "Yes, I got it right here." He couldn't find it. "Did you ever write any songs to me?" "Absolutely not". "How about Dear Landlord... "

BD: I guess they know about that...

AW: "It wasn't written to Grossman as many people think..." "You see, I wanna get into where you said, "Grossman used to speak for me". I wanted to get that in there."

BD: Yeah, but that wasn't about Dear Landlord. That was about something else!

AW: All right. So I'll say so, okay I'll say that, okay, I'll say...

BD: He used to act on my behalf.

AW: Even if it wasn't about you, I didn't know, I didn't know, uh...

BD: Didn't know who you... I wasn't aware of you then.

AW: Right – "I wasn't aware of you then" – okay. "Throughout our conversation the phone rang constantly, and at one point someone came to the door and handed Dylan a fan letter and a book of poems. He read the fan letter right then and there and handed me the book – "Take a look at it – tell me what you think – advise me – you're a knowledgeable cat and I could use some advice – even on politics". "Bullshit". "I should have a book of my poems out in two years and a book containing all my songs should be out soon and I'm planning to release that song you have a rare tape of – She's Your Lover Now – as a single". "Bullshit..."

BD: That's true, man!

AW: I say it's bullshit – we'll see when it happens, man.

BD: Okay.

AW: "... What do you think about my work, man". "Your approach is sincere". Hang on for a second, Bob, I wanna turn the cassette over.

BD: You got this whole thing on tape, huh?

AW: Uh...

BD: I can't believe you Weberman. I just can't believe you.

AW: Well, I'm not... I didn't... look, I can't do anything with it man, right? I can't do anything with it, so...

BD: So you got the whole thing on tape, huh?

AW: No I don't, just a part of it. The tape machine fucked up.

BD: What part did you get?

AW: I don't know. I don't know.

BD: So are you gonna play this for your class?

AW: No, I'm...

BD: I ain't never gonna call you again, man. Never, ever fucking again.

AW: No. I'm not gonna play it to my class. I'm not gonna play it to my class, man. I'm gonna, you know... "And then I began to tell Bob why I feel the way I do about Third World liberation. I went into a riff about my visit with a very poor cat in Mexico. "Let's write a song together about your trip and we'll split the royalties". "Send my cut to Caesar Chavez, man". No, that's not true, I didn't say that, but, you know, that's how I feel now. "So you just tell me what happened to you and I'll do the writing". "I was down in Progresso in Yucatan, and I stayed with this laborer, a typical Third World scene, poverty, famine, disease, like being born into a nightmare, prolonged death agony – anyway the cat became a 'bracero', a migrant farm worker so that he wouldn't starve to death – bracero rhymes with sombrero. And this cat thought the communists were 'little people' – he was brainwashed -his pad was next to a garbage dump. Now we got to convince Americans, through this song, that they should support wars of national liberation". Dylan came up with a song that went like this – "Down in Progresso, a brac..."

I don't know, this is, you know... "A bracero lived in a sombrero full of espresso". You know, how's that?

BD: Yeah, that's all right.

AW: "What the fuck is this, man? No one is ever gonna be convinced of anything when you write that abstractly." "That's my thing, Al. Know anything about the other books being written about me?" "Well, Robert Shelton, Tony Scaduto and Toby Thompson are doing books. I know Tony. He says he's goin' around talkin' to all yer friends, Jack Elliott, the McKenzies, etc., and yer old lovers, Suzie Rotolo, Joanie Baez, collecting information about you. He said he would have studied yer lyrics but he knew he couldn't get permission to reprint them". "That's not the reason – he could have never figured them out – he'll only come up with rumors." "He did a pretty good job though. Man, I think you're a fucking reactionary. You don't use your influence to save lives. Man, look at all the death around us. Look what just happened in Pakistan – that was the result of capitalism – the people were so poor they couldn't cope with a natural disaster." "I wonder why the good Lord wanted all those people to die?" "You don't..." "I do..." "But how about With God On Our Side?" "I wasn't thinking then".

BD: Ah... I don't think I said that. I think you made that up.

AW: I said... I made up "how about With God On Our Side" – I said, "How about that interview back in '64 with Mr Jones of Melody Maker magazine is what I said you know, but I didn't, uh, but I figured that it would be better. More people would be hip to With God On Our Side, you know. But you did say, "I wasn't thinking then". In other words I didn't say... I said, "How about that; what you said to Mr Jones is supposed to be very esoteric".

BD: Uh... let's see, well...

AW: But that's what you said, man. "I wasn't thinking then". So what should I say? So what do you want me — I'll change it, you know.

BD: Yeah, I don't know what you should change it to, but, uh I didn't, uh, I don't remember saying that in that context.

AW: So what should I change it to? You do believe in God, don't you?

BD: Yeah. I sure do.

AW: So uh, so you know, see, evidently, you, at one time you didn't, right?

BD: Ah...

AW: You said, that's what you said in some statements, right? You said. "I don't believe in God".

BD: Yeah, yeah, uh.

AW: Evidently, if you do now and don't then, you weren't thinking then.

BD: Yeah, I must have done, I must have then, too.

AW: What?

BD: I must have then, too.

AW: Okay, I'll put that in. "How about using some of your five million dollars to save lives?" "I don't have that much". "Bullshit, I got inside information, you millionaire, pig." I didn't call you a pig, but, uh, you know, that's how I felt. "And you never do any benefits. Then there's your apolitical lyrics. Everyone who heard Nashville Skyline said 'Dylan's in a mellow head, he's singing about love.' You cut your hair, cut off all your hair. You only help apolitical rock people with their careers: you're a punk and me and the DLF are gonna do a number on you. We got some shit planned that's gonna blow your mind. Not only that, but everyone in rock with a political consciousness is gonna come down on you. Lennon has started already by calling you Zimmerman; McGuinn just put you down." "Where?" "In Creem". "How?" That's a little literary memory, 'cause it's like that song I'm Not There, you know? "Where?" "Down town". "When?" "Last night", you know. "Where?" "In Creem". "How?" "By saying you wrote Ballad Of Easy Rider even though you had told him not to." "What? Well tell..."

BD: You can just say, "Fuck him", man, you don't have to say the rest of that stuff.

AW: Okay. Fine.

BD: You don't have to say "I wanna get him", or anything like that. Just say "fuck him".

AW: But that's what you said. You went through that whole riff, man. You said, "I'm gonna get these people". That's what you said. You said it about five times.

BD: Okay, well you just add "fuck him" to it.

AW: All right. Well, what I want to know – who's gonna do this, uh, 'cause... "I'm not gonna take it. I'm gonna get them motherfuckers. I'm gonna get them". "Hey Bob, why not show the people..."

BD: You could even add it again. Another one.

AW: Okay. A couple of "fuck you's" in there. Well, you know, it's the underground press.

BD: They'll never get out of it.

AW: "Hey, Bob, why not show the people your heart's in the right place and do a benefit for John Sinclair?" "But, I don't have my thing together." "Bullshit, all you gotta do is show up and plunk your guitar a little and a hundred thousand freaks will come out of their pads and go anywhere you are —"

BD: I-I don't want to say "I don't have my thing together", man. I got my thing together!

AW: So, why don't y'do the thing?

BD: Well, I want to get back to that statement first.

AW: Yeah.

BD: I don t want to say that thing that "I don't have my thing together."

AW: Right.

BD: See, you, you can make somethin' else up, but, uh... don't leave that in there.

AW: What should I say, then?

BD: Let's see, what's the statement? (pause). How 'bout, uh... let's see... how 'bout —

AW: You said you don't have your thing together. You said, you know.. you're not ready to... you —

BD: Oh yeah, right! I'm not ready to go play concerts, man. That's th...

AW: All right, I'm not ready...

BD: That's not the same thing as saying...

AW: All right...

BD: I don't have my thing together.

AW: I'm not ready to go play concerts.

BD: I'm not about to...

AW: I'm not about to... go play concerts. All right?

BD: At this time.

AW: Right, I don't blame you, man, you know. You, uh... you know... you don t want to be part of the scene... you know... uh, all kinds of terrible things could happen to you in that hour, man... y-know.

BD: No, man... like, what for? Why should I go play for twenty thousand people, man? I mean, what...

AW: ...it would be…

BD: ...you know...

AW: ...more than twenty thousand.

BD: Hey, I've been there before...

AW: You make people happy, man...

BD: I've been there before, I...

AW: You make people happy.

BD: I've done it before...

AW: You set the whole trend in rock, man.

BD: I did —

AW: If you started doing things like that...

BD: You shoulda been at the Isle of Wight, man. I'd just like to see how much you'd still be talking...

AW: The Isle of Wight...

BD: ...if you were at the Isle of Wight.

AW: ...was a capitalist rip-off, man. I'm not talking about that kind of a scene, I'm talking about...

BD: Were you at Woodstock? (pause) Were you at Woodstock?

AW: I-I wasn't at Woodstock, man.

BD: Well, then you never did...

AW: I'm not talking about Woodstock.

BD: ...see those kind of things —

AW: I'm not talking about a free concert, man. I'm not talking about that... I'm talking about a benefit, you dig, in Madison Square Garden, or something like that, man...

BD: Go, on let's finish the article.

AW: (pause) Uh, you know — "but I don't have my thing together". "Bullshit."

BD: Uh, no, no, we're going to change that.

AW: Uh, right, right... uh, something in what you said before. But, you gotta... "all you gotta do is show up and plunk your guitar a little then a hundred thousand freaks will come out of their pads and go anywhere you are..." "Sorry, Al, I can't do it. But I will write a song about political prisoners on my next album." "I don't want promises for nine months later. I wanna see some action, now. See, Bob, you set the trends in rock and if you become, like, a human being a lot of other performers will go along. The sun had set and Dylan's wife had called him for dinner on the phone a couple of times."

BD: Oh, that, that whole last paragraph there man, I didn't think that was necessary.

AW: "Bob gave me his phone number and asked me to call him when I'm on the radio, or if something comes up. Ever hear me on the radio, Bob?" "Just a couple of times on Alex Bennett's show. I dug it when he asked if you had any personal messages for me". "What do you think of Bob Fass?" "He's a revolutionary brother, but he don't dig it when I attack you 'cause you were an old friend of his." "Well, Al, so long... Uh, one more thing – you're not gonna get into my life".

BD: Hey, those two sentences, man. I don't get them at all. I don't understand them, even.

AW: "Why, if you do, I might gain a soul".

BD: Yeah, well, that's shit, those last two sentences. I don't think I said that.

AW: Yes, you did. That's just what you said, man. You said, "You re not gonna get into my life"... I said, "Why?" Then you said, "If you do, I might gain a soul."

BD: I don't understand that, do you?

AW: Uh, I don't know, I don't know – it could be looked at in a number of ways, man -you could even BD: Yeah, why don't you... why don t you take it out of your article and look at it in a number of ways, and let's uh – you know, and... and roll it around a while, and then when you know what it means, why don't you tell me? And then uh, let's see if it's worth putting in an article.

AW: (Pause) Uh...

BD: Is that fair? I don t know what it means man.

AW: So, how would you have me in the article?

BD: I don't know. It's your article, (pause) Shit, I mean...

AW: But, I mean, you're supposed to... all right, man, like, that's what happened during our...

BD: I know that's what happened.

AW: ...first conversation...

BD: But that ain't what happened, man... like, that last, uh, that last sentence don't end in any article, you know that. That didn't happen like that. I remember...

AW: ...all right...

BD: ...saying something like that, but it didn't have anything to do with how you're using it. You're just taking it out of context, like any of those things you find in Look Magazine.

AW: D'you want me to put it into context? D'you want me to put it back into context – then I say, "Is that a threat?", and then you say, you know "no, it isn't, but I know people who can kill you". That's what I remembered...

BD: Oh no, man!

AW: Or something like that, man.

BD: No!

AW: I was very paranoid, in a very paranoid mood, man.

BD: Well, don't take it out on me, man. I mean, come on...

AW: Well, that's why I changed it around, man. I don't have you, uh... comin' on like that. That's why I took it out, you know. So, I left it, I left it... other interpretation — "I might gain a soul." You couldn't...

BD: I don't wanna say that man, 'cause I don't know...

AW: ...You couldn't?

BD: ...'cause I don't... that sounds shitty...

AW: That's what you said. So fucking quotable, man!

BD: Well, what does that mean? I mean, like, is that, uh, that don't – aoh -- it leaves me cold, man, like, uh – it's, uh – doesn't even sound like me.

AW: But you said it, those were your exact words.

BD: "I gained a soul"... uh... what could that mean?

AW: Man, you know, you oughta stand behind things that you say.

BD: Yeah, man, but that was taken...

AW: That's the truth.

BD: ...right outta, right out of... I do stand behind most of what I say, man... but you know, I mean... a lot of time you just say stuff, you know.

AW: Oh, you don't stand behind anything you say, man.

BD: Sure, I do... sure, I do. I just don't dig it...

AW: You don't stand behind your old songs, man, that's for sure —

BD: Man, I'm gonna do an article on you, man. I think I'm gonna write a song about you, too.

AW: Well, I could use the publicity.

BD: Yeah, well... that's one reason why I wouldn't, man —

AW: (Laughter)

BD: ...but, uh...
AW: (Laughter)
BD: ...I got a good song, man — if I ever want to do one —
AW: What s it called?
BD: It s called 'Pig' --
AW: I'm a pig, eh?
BD: Yeah.
AW: Aw, bullshit, I'm a...
BD: ...yeah, man...
AW: ...pig, man.
BD: Yeah, man!
AW: You're the one who's a pig —
BD: Oh, no. Not at all...
AW: Oh, yeah !
BD: ...not at all, (laugh) man, not at all. I don't think I wanna write it, though, just because of that publicity thing. I don't dig that at all. But, I got the song, man.
AW: You re killing me.
BD: I'll sing it for you. (pause) Well, I don't have it finished, actually.. but, uh...
AW: I'm a pig, man?
BD: Hey, man.
AW: I don't have a million fucking dollars, man.
BD: I don't, but what does that have to do with it?
AW: 'Cause you have a million fucking dollars, man. See, you ain't – you ain't that much better than the cat who has nothing, man. You dig it. The cat who's walking around the Bowery, man. It's true, like, you know...
BD: (whisper) Whaaat?
AW: ...in some ways you're better, but you ain't a million dollars better worth, you know what I mean? Like, in times like this people, you know, like, when you have a million dollars in this society, man, it means, that other people don't have it, you know... (pause). Uh, don't you dig what I mean? Nobody should have, like, a million dollars, man. Nobody should be allowed to accumulate that much wealth. You know, that much surplus wealth, when there are other people around that don't have shit. You know, and not 'cause of their fuckin' skin color, man... not because of, uh, of anything else, 'cause they're despised 'cause they're not like straights, like hate anyone who's different than them in any kind of a way, right...
BD: Yeah, man, I think you're over... you're overlooking...
AW: ...No! I m telling you, man.
BD: ...a lot, man. You're overlooking a lot...
AW: I've had friends, man... I've had friends that got a lotta money together, you know, and, uh, I told them, man "you... you should put some of this fuckin' money back in the community – most of it, enough that, you know, keep enough so that you can live decently but don't fuckin'" , uh... you know, they didn't have peanuts compared to you, man. You know, and I told them to go fuck themselves if they're gonna fuckin' rip off, uh the, you know, people not putting anything back... but you're just a capitalist, that's all, man. 'Cept, instead of producing, uh... you know, yah... instead of producing, uh, uh, cars, or guns you produce, uh, you know, records, music.
BD: Hey man, that's, uh, that's something, though.
AW: It s something, man... but lately, it's nothin'. 'Cause lately not only do you keep the money, but the lyrics themselves have no kind of, uh, redeeming value, you know. You're, they're just, in fact, they're reactionary, you know. You're just, uh, every, all the shit is hitting the fuckin' fan... and you're singin'; "Hope it... looks like nothin' but rain", you know, uh.
BD: That's a good song, man.

AW: What are you?
BD: Like...
AW: A weatherman?
BD: A what?
AW: A weatherman?
BD: Do you mind?
AW: "It looks like nothing but rain nothin' but rain..."
BD: (laugh)
AW: ...But I wanted, uh... if I want to fuckin', uh...
BD: Is your tape recorder still on, man?
AW: ...and it...
BD: Is it still running?
AW: Yeah.
BD: Oh, it didn't break down?
AW: Uh... no, no, it's.. it's a good one.
BD: Yeah, well, I ain't gonna call you no more, man, just because of that. I mean, I don't trust yah.
AW: Why, wuh... don't tell me you didn't tape-record my conversation...
BD: No, man, I... would, uh...
AW: ...any conversations with me, man...
BD: No, what do I want to do that for?
AW: You asked your secretary to tape record a conversation with me.
BD: She's not into that.
AW: She is, man.
BD: Nah...
AW: I heard a click.
BD: Oh, come on!
AW: You're tellin' me she's not into it, is that...
BD: Well, her phone's probably tapped, that's all.
AW: No, her phone isn't tapped. The Government, they love you man, they love you, man, they love you. I'm surprised Nixon didn't call you instead of Johnny Cash to...
BD: I am too, man (laughs)
AW: It's like, uh…
BD: Yeah.
AW: Uh... you know I was talkin' to her – she says, "Let me..." I call up, the television's going, she says, "Let me get myself together" – click. You know...
BD: Well, she probably went to another phone.
AW: Yeah, I told her, man. I said, "We must be on a party line with Jose Greco".
BD: Nah, she didn't, uh, tape you, man.
AW: Yeah, she taped me, man. I heard the click. She's incompetent. Then she flipped out, she thought I was gonna take her to court or something – she's so straight, you know. She say's, "I didn't do it! I'd never do it in a million years. I'd never do it" You know, 'cause I caught her committing an illegal act, you know. Uh...
BD: Well, well.
AW: You know. Whatever the scene is, man, like, uh... you know, I played this... there were a couple of women from, uh... Women's Lib... you know, militant women's thing over at my place, and, uh... I played that tape for' em, man, and they started yellin' at me! They said I shouldn't have attacked Naomi, 'cause she was a woman.
BD: That's true, man.
AW: Uh.. you know, and it wasn't her fault, you, know, she would've been a... if she was a man maybe she would've been Dylan, not just Dylan's secretary.
BD: Oh, you shouldn't go around taping people, man. I mean, that's just... that makes you no better than...

AW: You taped me!

BD: No man, that's not true, man. You shouldn't... I mean, that's gonna put you in the same league with all the uh... you know, with all the uh, government phone-tappers, man! Not only that, but you go through garbage like a pig, and you know...

AW: I go through garbage like a pig – but what I was doin' man, was a good thing.

BD: You tap phones, you go through garbage like a pig, you do a lot of things, man, which aren't really on the up and up.

AW: You taped me!

BD: No, man. They're not on the up and up.

AW: No, you pick all these things up, but what did I do with it, man? Did I... you see, I may have gone through yer garbage, man, but I didn't sell it to Life Magazine. I didn't sell yer garbage to Life Magazine.

BD: You think Life Magazine's gonna buy my garbage?

AW: I haven't printed it up yet, man, or made a book out of it, Dylan's Garbage's Collected Works.

BD: You must get money from all these magazines that you... uh, send all these articles to.

AW: I don't, I don't. I send out all my articles for free, man. No, I'm not like you, man. Like, I send out all my articles for free, you dig, 'cause I believe that things should be free, an' I'm gonna start the ball rollin' with my articles, right? So I send 'em out all for free. I get all these letters – "Thanks a lot Weberman. We love ya", you know, and that's all I want to hear, man. When I'm fuckin' starving, you know, then I'm gonna fuckin'... then I'll, you know, then I'll have to find something to get money. I wouldn't be lying. I'll get a fuckin' job as a dishwasher at the Café Wha?, somethin' like that, man, you know. And I'll still send out my articles for free. Uh... you know, that's what I've chosen to do.

BD: Well, God bless you.

AW: D'you know how much I made from Dylanology, man? Like, twenty five dollars three years ago from EVO around Christmastime. And I'm proud of it, man, you know?

BD: No reason not to be.

AW: And like, uh... so I send out my articles for free and, uh, you know... so going through your garbage, I wasn't... what I was tryin' to do with that, man, was make you look ridiculous – and vulnerable, man. You know, and, uh, because you know, like... there's so many people who are, like, unhappy with you, and, you know, what you're doing, man. All the people in rock, you know... I listen to the songs over and over again, man, and you've made so many people unhappy by doing what you did.

BD: Made 'em happy too, made 'em happy too. I've made more happy than I've made unhappy.

AW: Yeah that's what John Lennon says but, uh, you know, like, uh...

BD: What did he say? Say that again.

AW: "...and in the end the love that you take will equal the love that you make" or somethin', but the love that you make will be bigger than the love that you take you know...

BD: Well, I've made a lot of 'em happy, man, more happy than unhappy. Their happiness has great... greatly overpowered their unhappiness.

AW: Uh... that's true. You've like, you've never really, you know, renounced any of the old songs, uh, except implicitly, you know. Uh... what can I tell you, man? Like you know...

BD: I think you oughta expand your thing, man, like, if you put some of that energy, and spread it out a little bit, you could get, uh... you know, you could get involved in a whole new thing.

AW: Dylanology's workin' out fine for me.

BD: Oh, I don't know if there's gonna be enough there, man, I mean just to be honest with you...

AW: Oh shit, man.

BD: I mean there is, but I mean, after you get your...

AW: Oh, I can interpret Creedence, man. I can interpret the Beatles, I can interpret the Stones...

BD: I'm not tryin' to tell you what to do, man, you know, but, uh...

AW: See, the only thing is, it all fuckin' comes back to you, you know, to Dylanology. I go...

BD: You know why it always comes back to me, man? Because, like, uh...

AW: Creedence's new record, man, I hear, uh...

BD: They're not doin' what I'm doin' that's all, that's why it comes back to...

AW: Did you hear Creedence's new record, man?

BD: No, I haven't.

AW: They have all these references to you there, man.

BD: What does he say about that? What does... what's his... what's his name...?

AW: He'll deny it, man. He'll deny it.

BD: Why would he deny it? I mean why?

AW: 'Cause it's a secret language, man, you know he's not gonna say it. Why, because he said you're a junkie, man. He's not gonna say, "Yeah, Dylan's a junkie and we don't dig..." 'cause it's informing.

BD: Well, why don't you go out and, and... meet with him face-to -face about it man?

AW: 'Cause he... they won't see me.

BD: Oh well, see him, when he comes to the city. Just go up and pound on his door, man.

AW: He could deny his ass off, he can deny his ass off, man, from today 'til tomorrow.

BD: Well, what if I deny it all? I've denied a lot of it to you too.

AW: So everybody can deny it; as long as you don't come up with another system that's more complicated and makes more sense, as far as I'm concerned mine stands, my system stands. You see what I mean?

BD: No.

AW: It's like, you could tell me it doesn't mean anything, but okay, you know, I have all this fuckin' information, you know, like, uh... and that's what I work on, the information. All this is secondary. I haven't even read the Lennon interview in Rolling Stone. I don't take these things seriously. All I do is read... all I do is listen to the lyrics and interpret them. I know what the fuck is happening, man, and, you know, it's a drag, you know, and everybody else thinks it's a drag, and I don't see how you can, like...

BD: Who's this "everybody else", man?

AW: Everybody else thinks it's a drag.

BD: But who? Everyone on your block, or, er...?

AW: Everyone on the street (laughs).

BD: What street? Second Avenue, Fourth Street?

AW: It's true. The mass media.

BD: What mass media, man?

AW: The mass media, man. The records, the telephone...

BD: Wow!

AW: Hey, you know, speaking of knocking on somebody's door, man, one time I was trying to find John Lennon. I know this woman who works in a booking agency, you know. She said "I know where John Lennon is". So we go up there – nobody's home – I leave this note on the door, It say's, "A friendly stranger would like to talk to you about your dream!" This fuckin' businessman calls up my old lady (laughs), and says, "What is this shit?, you want to talk to me, a friendly stranger wants to talk to me about my dreams you know, my dreams are of a sexual nature".

BD: Who said that?

AW: Just some guy which she... see, this woman got the, uh, room... Lennon's room mixed up...

BD: Oh.

AW: You know, it wasn't Lennon's room and I stuck this note under the door, written in what I think is the secret language of rock...

BD: Yeah.

AW: ...but this guy didn't know about it, being a conventioneer in the food industry.

BD: Oh, I see.

AW: But that, you know... it gets you into trouble, sometimes, man.

BD: Yeah, it must.

AW: But, uh, you know... but I know... I know what's happening, man, and, uh, you know, I have so much information.

BD: Well, why don't you just get a guitar, man, and write some songs yourself, man?

AW: 'Cause there's a need for someone like myself, man, you know? There's a need for someone like myself. Nobody else is doin' it, not even the...

BD: Oh, but you're so extreme, man, you're so extreme. I mean, you know, like you're off on one end. There's no...

AW: Well, I consider that a compliment.

BD: There's no-one on, like... there's no-one balancing your other end, man.

AW: Sure! There's all them lame rock critics, man.

BD: No, they're all in the middle, man. There's no-one.

AW: Greil Marcus say's I'm full of shit, man. All the other rock critics think I'm full of shit. They're full of shit. They're corrupt, man.

BD: Greil Marcus is or isn't, did you say?

AW: He's full of shit.

BD: Yeah, I think so too.

AW: Uh... anyway... like...

BD: Did you see the thing he wrote about Self Portrait?

AW: I didn't read it, I just...

BD: Oh, that was really bullshit, man.

AW: Ah... he's a prick, man. He's in cahoots with Grossman.

BD: Is he?

AW: I think so, man. He gets... I think he gets tapes from... I say, Greil, could I have a fuckin' tape from you man? I want the outs from the Basement Tape, you know – I'm Not There, Clothesline. He said, (that's serious) he says, "I have to call Sam Gordon and ask him". I says "What?" Is this one big fuckin' conspiracy, man? You know, like...

BD: Oh, wow!

AW: ...he say's "No, no, I didn't get 'em from Sam Gordon, but I gotta call him anyway and ask him if I can give 'em to you."

BD: Oh, man.

AW: Uh... you know, so finally I got 'em out of the office, you know, by hook or by crook. I got 'em eventually myself, but, uh, fuckin' Greil Marcus wouldn't give 'em to me. He's a cocksucker, man you know, and then he fuck... all the tapes he has... he hoards his tapes, you know, he hoards 'em, doesn't give 'em out to anybody. Keeps 'em, you know, among the, uh, elite or whatever, what he considers to be the elite. So fuck him, he balances me out. Jann Wenner balances me out, man. Uh... they would never print my stuff in Rolling Stone in a million years. Uh, let's see, who else? Uh, David Whalley. All the fuck... every other rock critic is there balancing me out, man, you know. An' I'm goin' up to New Haven, Connecticut tonight.

BD: Oh yeah. For what?

AW: With David Peel. We're gonna be on the radio there.

BD: On Dylanology?

AW: Uh... Dylanology... yeah, Dylanology.

BD: In New Haven?

AW: New Haven, Yale, I got a lotta friends up there.

BD: Jesus!

AW: Any messages for New Haven? There is a telephone phone in...

BD: No, man, not really, but don't, uh... don't get, you know, you know, about, uh... I don't know, man, I have no messages really. You know, not really. I don't really care. Don't matter to me man, like, it's just...

AW: Got no messages anymore, that's for sure... no more messages any more.

BD: Huh. What do you mean?

AW: Messages, you know. Like message songs, you know.

BD: Oh... uh, I don't.

AW: Remember those?

BD: Yeah, man. I remember them. They were just messages to me, though. I told Scaduto that.

AW: You talked to Scaduto?

BD: Yeah, I did, and I told him that...

AW: Why?

BD: ...and that knock... that fucked him up, man. He had no idea about that. That just wiped him out. He said he was gonna have to go back down to listen to all those songs.

AW: Well, I wish him luck, man. Tell him also to change his life-style, if he wants to understand 'em.

BD: Yeah, it's off.

AW: Like, you know, that's the scene, man. I'm, uh... Dylanology...

BD: Yeah, well, how much time do you have... how much time do you have tonight on Dylanology?

AW: All night.

BD: You got all night? What is it, underground radio?

AW: College... no, no, it's a stereo station, big fuckin'... it's... uh, Yale station. You know, I was there, last time I was there I was fuckin' gassed, you know, I was being fuckin' gassed by the pigs. Wait a minute – but I'm a pig!

BD: Is it all... yeah, you are. Is it all on Dylanology...?

AW: Oh no, no, I'm not a pig...

BD: Yeah, of course you are, man...

AW: I do my thing, man...

BD: Of course you're a pig, man.

AW: I went through garbage 'cause I vamped on a fuckin' pig... I'm a pig, man...?

BD: More than that, man. You have a pig mentality, yeah. Shit, man, if I was a kid growin' up, man, I'd have to look out for you. I would keep my eyes open for you if I was a kid growin' up. I'd make sure that... whatever street I went down, I'd have to go on the other side of the street when you came down, man.

AW: Yeah, sure man (laughs).

BD: I got 'em covered, man. I've had 'em covered since I was a little kid.

AW: I'm fighting against the fuckin' pigs, man, I'm fighting against the fuckin' pigs. I'm not a pig myself, man.

BD: You're a pig... mentality, man. Mentality is what makes a pig.

AW: No, I wouldn't have gone through your garbage, man... I told you...

BD: Shit, man. You might as well put a badge on you, man. You might as well just wear a badge.

AW: Uh...

BD: Right under, right under your leather coat, just a little badge right above your heart there.

AW: I do – my button, that's my badge. Like... that's really not true, man. And I'm not gonna take it seriously coming from you. Comin' from somebody who wrote... who writes songs like you write, man.

BD: Hey, man, who writes better songs than I do? Name me somebody.

AW: I can name you a hundred fuckin' people, man.

BD: Oh, come on. You can't. You know you can't.

AW: Uh... let's see, uh... Creedence Clearwater...
BD: Oh, bullshit!
AW: ...Uh... I think Memo To Turner, uh, was as good as, uh...
BD: ...Oh just a bunch of faggot bullshit all wrapped up in about two or three lines, and then dumped out with...
AW: You're the one he calls a faggot in there, man.
BD: What?
AW: He says, "He's a faggy little leather boy with a smaller piece of stick".
BD: He's talkin' about himself, man (laughs).
AW: No he's not, he's talkin' about you, man.
BD: Oh, get out of here.
AW: And, uh... let's see... Gordon Lightfoot ain't bad.
BD: Uh?
AW: Gordon Lightfoot ain't bad.
BD: Yeah, well, he's all right.
AW: Uh... he writes good songs. Let me see, there was some cat who... I was doin' my concordance – she uses a very, very... a lotta imagery just like Tarantula. Ah, Barbara Keith.
BD: Uh... don't know.
AW: Uh... Ken Lauber.
BD: Oh, he's all right, yeah, he's okay.
AW: Jack Elliott.
BD: Jack doesn't write songs.
AW: John Lennon.
BD: No, never.
AW: George Harrison.
BD: Mm, maybe.
AW: Uh... Jim McGuinn.
BD: Never.
AW: Procol Harum. Keith Reed or what's his name...
BD: Yeah, well, they're all right.
AW: They're a bunch of fuckin' junkies.
BD: Yeah, I guess, if you say so.
AW: How about Grace Slick? Too political.
BD: I don't know. Does she write stuff?
AW: Sure. Too political, man.
BD: Mm, probably. If you say.
AW: Country Joe, too political. Phil Ochs, too political. They're all lame man. They're writing songs about what's goin' down now. That's nowhere, that's... a bunch of assholes do that kinda shit, man. What you gotta do is write songs like what went down thirty years ago in the fuckin' escapist music industry. That's where it's at, man. Because people dying... you know, being fucked up, is really a good thing. They may not know it, you know, they may not understand what is happening to them, but it's really a good thing, and we should let it happen. And, you know, the last thing in the world that you wanna do is say something about it, you know, because then, you know, especially, you know, if you have a lot of influence, because then people might, you know, begin to think, you know, and, uh... you don't want that to happen because if people begin to think, maybe they'll stop buying your records. Your later records, you know.
BD: That's gonna make me think.
AW: It's gonna make people think, man, like... you're fuckin' irrational. Nothin' is gonna fuckin' happen to you if you speak out, you know. Nothing is going to happen to you.
BD: Hey, dig, I've got to, uh... I gotta go.
AW: Okay.

BD: Did we get it straightened out about the interview or the article?
AW: Right, so I'll change all the stuff you want me to change and then I'll mail it out.
BD: Where's it gonna be?
AW: Where's it gonna be?
BD: Yeah.
AW: Uh... it's gonna... I'm... It's going to every underground newspaper in America, for free.
BD: Wow. Hey, can I... when are you gonna mail 'em out?
AW: Uh... Monday.
BD: Uh... what time?
AW: Well, I'm not doin' it. UPS is doin' it, Underground Press Syndicate. They're like a, you know, White Panther-type operation.
BD: Could I see it after you make some corrections?
AW: Sure, sure.
BD: Uh... okay.
AW: Okay, Monday.
BD: Yeah. What time?
AW: Any time that's convenient for you.
BD: Oh, can you bring it by, like...
AW: I gotta pick up some buttons on Monday.
BD: Oh yeah?
AW: They're gettin' some buttons printed up.
BD: Who? What does it say on the buttons?
AW: Free Bob Dylan...
BD: That's far out, man.
AW: ...DLF.
BD: I'm havin' some made up for you too, man.
AW: What, Fuck Of A. J. Weberman?
BD: No, man.
AW: A. J.'s a pig.
BD: A. J.'s a pig. Right.
AW: Well, you know, that's...
BD: Or I'm just gonna have a pig, man, with a picture of you on it.
AW: Where would you get the picture of me (laughing)?
BD: Oh, we're gonna take it out of an underground newspaper.
AW: Well... like...
BD: It's okay, man, you'll live through it.
AW: You don't have my permission to use that picture.
BD: You don't have my permission to do any of this shit, man.
AW: Uh... I don't? Holy shit, what am I gonna do? I gotta fuckin', uh, take my bank account out and put it in a safe deposit box in case I get sued.
BD: Nah. You won't get sued. But, uh, you'll live through it. I'm sure you're gonna live through all of it.
AW: Oh, I hope so, man.
BD: Yeah you will. It won't be nothin', just, you know,... it'll be good for you man, it'll be good for you.
AW: Why will it be good for me?
BD: You'll have your picture with pig written on it, man, you know...
AW: I'm not a pig, man. I don't see how you could fuckin' call me a pig.
BD: Hey... come on, don't give me that.
AW: I fuckin', I fuckin' fight, man.
BD: You're fightin' to go through... you're only fightin' to go through my garbage, man.
AW: I fight pigs, man, I fight pigs. Yeah, but, like, a lotta people believe that you've become a pig, man. And here I am, a Dylanologist in...

BD: A Dylanologist pig, man.

AW: ...in a certain position, man, in a certain position, you know, where I could do a number on a cat, you know, who's become a pig, who's become a fuckin' sell-out, you dig? You just, know, you know... like, that's the way it goes, man. You write all these songs. Some jerk is gonna fuckin' believe 'em, man. You know? And he's gonna get pissed-off when he finds out that you didn't believe 'em, or you don't believe 'em anymore.

BD: I believe 'em.

AW: You know. It's, you know, like, uh... not only...

BD: Yeah. I'll see you later, man.

AW: Okay. So long.

BD: On Monday?

AW: What?

BD: Monday.

AW: Yeah, Monday.

BD: All right. Bye-bye.

January 1971
A.J. Weberman Interview, New York City, New York

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 163-175.

This interview was first published in the East Village Other on January 19 1971. In it's original format, this interview is very difficult to follow so I have taken the liberty of reformatting it, in part, to allow the content to flow more readily – not a word has been changed. See the previous article (Page 137 et seq.) for a background to this interview.

A Dylan interview conducted by A. J. Weberman, Dylanologist & Minister of Defence, Dylan Liberation front.

The following interview is actually a series of conversations I had with Dylan in early January 1971. Since D wouldn't let me record them, I had to reconstruct them through my recollections. When I showed Bob what I had come up with, he said, "There's lies in there and that's sneaky shit talkin' to a cat, then writing about it." We corrected my errors over the phone and D gave me some direct quotes (I recorded the phone call and I have included parts of it). I think I caught the leap of D's bound to some extent. NOTE: D stands for Dylan. CB stands for current bag.

I WAS REALLY fucking hassled the day I met Dylan. Pigs. Heavy shit. I was goin' fucking crazy. I made it to the D class that I teach each week at the Alternate U & gave a shirt rap & then said – "Tonight's the field trip to D's pad." About fifty of us headed down Sixth Avenue towards McDougal St. When we got to Fourth Street I pointed out the pad D lived in from 62-64 and tried to explain how it related to D's single – POSITIVELY FOURTH STREET – but this drunk wouldn't let me get a word in edgewise. We continued to march & picked up a couple of street kids along the way (that's the dangerous part about doing something like this – like I could trust the people in my class, but these kids were full of undirected violence). Soon we were all standing in front of D's. I began to yell, HEY BOBBY PLEASE CRAWL OUT YOUR WINDOW. Someone else screamed – OPEN THE DOOR BOBBY. The lights started to go on and off and one of D's kids came to the window & started playing with his blocks on the sill, building a sort of wall against us. We stopped yelling. I invited the class into D's lobby in order to show them where D "came down into the lobby to make a small call out" but by this time the class had split into two groups – the hardcore Dylan Liberationists were with me in the hall, while the people with groupie tendencies were standing across the street. Then Eric Williams (DLF) said – "Hey man, I saw someone look out from on top of the stairs for a flash." Dylan was home.

We went outside and I decided to go through D's garbage with the class, & so they formed a circle around me. David Peel (DLF) pointed out that his garbage bags were green, like his money. My "Garbage Article" had already come out so there was nothing of interest to be found, but we did the thing anyway. Then one of the street kids decided he was gonna enter D's thru a window. I was explaining what we'd do to him if he tried it (I wasn't ready for an illegal demo – yet) when Sharon (DLF – groupie tendencies) comes over and says: "There's someone standing across the street who looks JUST LIKE DYLAN." "Holy shit" I thought. "What the fuck am I going to do? D's caught me red-handed going through his garbage. He's gonna be pissed off... He may get violent. I may have to beat the shit out of that slimy bootlicker here and now." I looked up and saw Bob standing directly across the street from – me – he was dressed in denim, wearing rimless glasses and it looked like smoke was coming out of his head. I just stood there. David Peel came over and pushed me forward. It was like High Noon. "Do not forsake me oh my Dylanology." I eventually walked over to D, who looked like a cross between someone in his "current bag" and a Talmudic scholar and said:

AW: How are you, man?
BD: Turn off the tape recorder. (I had one with me and I did). Al, why'd ya bring all these people around my house for?
AW: It's a field trip for my Dylan class, man... but actually it's a demonstration against you and all you've come to represent in rock music.
BD: Alan, let's go and talk about this.
He took me by the arm (I knew that very instant he meant to do me harm) & he started putting on the pressure and I had no other choice except for to go.
AW: Cool it man, that fuckin' hurts – no violence – unless you want to fight it here and now.
BD: Al, did you ever write anything about my karate? Ever write anything about my race and stuff it my mailbox?
AW: I knew you took karate but I never wrote anything about it... and your race...?
BD: What race are you Alan?
AW: The human race.
BD: And what race were your parents?
AW: Well, they considered themselves Jewish, I guess.
BD: You sure you never wrote anything about my race?
AW: No, man, it ain't yer race I object to, it's yer politics and lifestyle.
BD: Well, I didn't think ya would, Al.
AW: Hey Bob, what do you do with all your money?
BD: It all goes to kibbutzim in Israel and Far Rockaway.
AW: But you were one of the first Jews to put down Israel.
BD: Where?
AW: In the liner notes to ANOTHER SIDE OF D.
BD: Don't remember!... You know, Al, you've been in the city too long, the city does something to your thinking – I know how it is.

D sat down on this stoop a few blocks from his pad and we continued the conversation.

AW: What about your CB, Bobby?

He denied it and did something that would make people believe he was telling the truth. But not A. J. Like he says –

BD: We'll fly over the ocean JUST AS THEY SUSPECT

("Fly over ocean" is a metaphor for D's CB from other contexts). Later on he told me -

BD: Everyone's been asking me about your writing.
AW: The man in Dylan would do nearly any task when asked for compensation... Just give him his current bag. From my TOES up to my HEELS. Dig what I mean.
(Somewhat taken aback by D's willingness to co-operate, I told him)
Man, but there's all this evidence in your poetry – I could stand here for hours and hours running it all down... and then there's all the songs written to you by other poets in yer own language putting you down for your CB.
BD: Al, you've got to keep in mind that my poetry doesn't reflect the way I'm feeling, now, it's like years behind.
AW: Well, bullshit...

So we talked. D said he didn't dig the Panthers because of their position on the Mid-East situation -

BD: Little Israel versus all those...

I started to explain to D how the Panthers believed that everyone has a right to live: Jews, Arabs and Palestinian refugees, when this kid from my class come over and says he wants to talk to D. I told him that was cool but to wait until we got done... I had something important to say to Bob & I didn't know if I'd ever see him again. (I was seizing the time). So the punk says – "You're full of shit and so is Dylanology." So I grabbed him by the collar and screamed SPLIT, ASSHOLE! He left but as he was going he yelled out in grade-school intonation – WEBERMAN'S BOOTLEGGING TARANTULA (D's suppressed novel). Dylan said I only had half the book – the other half was out in California – & that I should never worry about running out of things to interpret. He said he was gonna invite me up to Woodstock a couple of months ago. I asked:

AW: How come you didn't? How come I had to have a demonstration in front of yer house to get you to negotiate?... You know how dedicated I am & how well I know your work.

BD: I know, Al, and one day we'll go for a ride together and I'll interpret all my poems for ya.

AW: We ain't goin' down by the docks, are we?

BD: No... Al, you scared my tenants yelling like that.

AW: Sorry, man, I didn't mean to drag yer innocent people into it... dig like these radical freaks were staying over at the Archives & I told them where you were at & they thought about trashing your place but I told them DON'T DO IT... It ain't fair to Dylan's kids.

BD: Al, I know a lot of people who want to hurt you, especially after that 'garbage' thing – you know, all these college kids come to my garbage & take some of it back to their dorms – you wouldn't like these kids either...

AW: Get a garbage compactor and I'll come round and pick it up once a week.

BD: I don't like machines... no, that's not true.

AW: Bob, you wouldn't have me offed, would you?

BD: You scared?

AW: Sure I am, this is an oligarchy, the more money you have the more power.

BD: I wouldn't do it, Al, don't worry, it's too late anyway.

AW: I didn't think so man, it would be like GM offing Nader, but if you do, you BETTER do a good job.

I went on and gave D a rap against imperialism, racism and sexism (he didn't seem like he was listening) and then I told him that Nashville Skyline sucked while Self Portrait was a stone rip-off since many people bought it, played it once, and stuck it on their shelf. Neither album related to objective reality. Dylan responded quietly –

BD: Well, there were two good songs on S. P., DAYS OF FORTY-NINE and COPPER KETTLE... and without those two LPs there'd be no New Morning. Anyway I'm just starting to get back on my feet as far as my music goes... Al, do you use amphetamine?

AW: No, man, the reason I have so much energy is because I'm tuned in to the life force that's trying to assert itself here on earth – I'M ALIVE MAN.

BD: Why worry so much about earth when there's...

AW: What do you want me to worry about: if Mars invade us?

BD: What drugs do you use, Al?

AW: Just reefer and caffeine, and you?

BD: No drugs.

AW: BULLSHIT! (Although I must admit that D's eyes looked normal almost every time we met).

BD: Well, so long, Al, you're an interesting fellow, see you in a few weeks.

I gave him the power handshake & he split.
When I got home I was fucking wasted. I was rapping with Harvey, a lawyer friend, when the phone rang -

BD: Hello Al, this is Bob.

Suddenly the telephone began to look like my record player.

BD: Want to come over and visit me tomorrow?
AW: That's like asking a strung-out junkie if he wants a fix.
BD: Al, I wanted to thank you for helping me sell a lot of records – your articles have helped to keep it going.
AW: Yeah, that's one aspect of Dylanology I don't dig... but I may cancel it out soon.
BD: Al, do you have a driver's license?
AW: No, never learned to drive.
BD: Too bad, I know of this chauffeur's job that's open.
AW: Are you trying to buy me out, man? STOP RIGHT THERE. It's im-fucking-possible.
BD: No, no, I wasn't trying to buy you out, I just wanted you to see me from another seat, you've been on the streets too long.
AW: Hey Bob, you know that song CHAMPAGNE, ILLINOIS you wrote and gave to Carl Perkins?
BD: Yeah, I figured Carl needed a song.
AW: He needed something, anyway, why not write a song called CARBONDALE, ILL. 'cause that's where the pigs just murdered this black man who was gonna testify against them... (Dylan remained silent).
You there?
BD: Call ye tomorrow.

I hung up. The next day he called me & told me to come over to his midtown studio with a tape-deck and an amplifier if I wanted to hear some rare D tapes cause all he had at the studio was a record player. My old lady, Ann, helped me take the stuff uptown & then split cause D said he wanted to see me alone. D began -

BD: I've seen you around a lot, Al.
AW: Bob, let's set up the equipment, okay?
I went over to the speaker and asked him to disconnect it & he started unscrewing the terminal with no lead on it.
AW: Let me do it, man,
& I did the thing. (This little bit of play acting and the riff about not having a tape recorder in his studio was a clever ploy designed to convince me D wasn't into recording conversation, but I didn't go for it & maintained my cool when it came to saying self-incriminating things.) We began -
BD: What do you think of Tim Leary?
AW: I think he's great – like he was into revolution all along but felt he could attract a lot of the middle class by talking about it in mystical terms. He's a national hero of Woodstock Nation. What do you think?
BD: I don't follow politics.
AW: How come I found newspaper in yer garbage every day?
BD: It's not my garbage – everyone in my building – we mix all the garbage together.
AW: Sure ye do!... hey man, I'll tell you something about yer politics – they're fucking genocidal – cause I talk to a lot of people when I'm out on the streets selling Tarantula and most of the people I talk to got the impression from that Sing Out interview that you support the war in Vietnam.

BD: I only did that to get back at the freaks who wouldn't leave me alone & let me do my thing up in Woodstock – every five minutes there was someone at my door. I mean this fame thing got out of hand. I never expected to become this famous. I DON'T DIG IT. Everywhere I go – man, even if I go to some small town somewhere – a bunch of freaks always manages to find me and then they go ape-shit.

AW: Get a long-haired wig, they'd never recognize you.

BD: Why don't you buy me one, Al...

AW: Hey man, how come you associated yourself with Cash – that lackey was so conservative at that time you did things together that Nixon later invited him to sing at the White House & Cash still goes out of his way to praise Nixon's genocidal policies at his concerts.

BD: I've heard Cash since I was a kid... I love him.

AW: Bob, yer so fucking conservative lately, I'm surprised Nixon didn't invite you to sing fer him.

BD: I am too, man.

AW: Man, almost all the other rock people put you down in their songs – in yer own language – for yer politics.

BD: They're just using my phrasing.

AW: No, man, they understand what you're saying the same way I do – from studying yer poetry.

BD: Why don't you ask them about it?

AW: Man, they'd deny it cause it's a secret language & 'cause of the controversial nature of your CB which they sing about – anyway it's poetry & it's up to the listener or critic to figure it out.

BD: I deny it's happening and so do they.

AW: Hey, Dylan, man, all of you can deny your asses off, but as long as ya don't come up with another system that's more consistent, makes more sense, etc., MINE STANDS, DIG?

BD: No.

AW: And, man, if you really believe in your current bag and want to continue to remain in it, how come you copped-out on yourself in your poetry? And the poetry is simple enough that many people understand it. Isn't that indicative of a contradiction in yer personality?

Now I had Dylan going. He suddenly became very depressed and didn't say anything. He looked hurt. I almost felt sorry for him.

AW: Hey Bob, you okay, man? like a lot of these cats are full of shit – putting you down for not doing anything when they don't do shit themselves.

BD: Remember, Al, I'm not like them... not fresh out of college...

AW: Man, you've been telling everyone my interpretations are 'way off'... let's hear you interpret one of your songs, then I'll interpret it and we'll see whose interpretation is better... how about TONIGHT I'LL BE STAYING HERE WITH YOU?

BD: Okay, but I feel stupid... Throw my ticket out the window... so we were down in Nashville and the train was leaving and I didn't want to go so I said...

AW: Hey man, didn't you once sing 'You hand in your money' for the line 'You hand in your ticket' (from MR JONES) at a concert in England?

BD: Yeah.

AW: So doesn't ticket symbolize money?

BD: A ticket is anything you want it to be.

AW: You mean your symbolism isn't consistent?

BD: It's as consistent as me.

AW: So isn't it money?

BD: It could be.

Dylan then changed the subject.

BD: You sure you didn't write any letters about my race?
AW: No, man, how many times do I have to tell you... like every letter I ever wrote you was on Dylan Archives stationery – was that?
BD: Yes, I got it right here.

He couldn't find it. (Since "letter" symbolizes "article" in D's symbology, he may have been referring to part of my East Village Other "garbage article", where, after finding cards and thank-you notes from D's family, I wrote – "Good to see Dylan is still a Zimmerman. What I meant by that was: "Good to see D still associates with middle-class lames like his straight relatives." It was a riff in the Lenny Bruce LIMA OHIO & – John Lennon "don't believe in Zimmerman" tradition & not anti-semitic.)

AW: Did you ever write a song to me?
BD: Absolutely not.
AW: How about Dear Landlord, or was that to Grossman?
BD: Grossman wasn't in my mind when I wrote it. Only later when people pointed out the song may have been written for Grossman I thought it could have been... It's an abstract song... Sure as hell wasn't written for you.
AW: Does Albert still act in your behalf?
BD: No.

Throughout our conversation the phone rang constantly and at one point someone came to the door and handed D a fan letter and a book of poems. He read the fan letter right then and there and handed me the book.

BD: Take a look at it – tell me what you think – advise me – you're a knowledgeable cat and I could use some advice – even on politics.
AW: Bullshit.
BD: I should have a book of my poems out in two years & a book containing all my songs should be out soon & I'm planning to release that song you have a rare tape of – SHE'S YOUR LOVER NOW – as a single.
AW: Bullshit... What do you think about my work, man?
BD: Your approach is sincere.
AW: You know, if I lived in another age I might have been a Talmudic scholar.
BD: So would I.
AW: I guess so – you say 'I'm sincere.' Why didn't you say that in the Rolling Stone interview instead of saying I was 'way-off?
BD: I'm thru with that. The only reason I gave them an interview was because they hounded me for years.
AW: Do you follow the rock criticism scene closely?
BD: No.
AW: How come I found all those rock papers in yer garbage?
BD: I only read them when Al Kooper brings them over... Wanna hear a tape?
He played one cut – it was D singing DON'T YE TELL HENRY, a song the band often does at concerts – this lent support to my theory that D ghosts for the band.
AW: We got a better fidelity version of this tape back in the Archives.

Then D offered me all this stuff that would help my "career" as a rock critic; I could sit in on recording sessions, he hinted I could call him up & get info on his new records thusly making my review "straight from the horses mouth" so to speak. I kind of got the feeling that I'd get all these privileges if I behaved. FUCK THAT SHIT.

BD: Want to see the rest of the studio?

We walked into his room filled with the band's instruments and D's paintings. They were these impressionistic abysslike things.

BD: What do you think of my paintings?
AW: Stick to poetry.
BD: I paint what's on my mind.
AW: Yeah, empty.

For the first time D laughed – IT TAKES A LOT to make Dylan LAUGH – but he could relate to emptiness. Then I decided to lay it on the line -

AW: Dylan, you've got to live up to your responsibility as a culture hero – you're DYLAN, man, every freak has a soft spot in their heart for ya, they love ya, you're DYLAN, DYLAN, DYLAN.
BD: I'm not Dylan, you're Dylan.
AW: I know, you're some other man, right?
We went back into the front of the studio -
BD: Want some records, Al?
AW: No, I get them for free from the record companies.
BD: Want a rare picture of me?
AW: I told you we got all that shit back in the Archives... Getting back to the subject at hand, did you ever think that maybe your wealth has corrupted you – you once said that the more of a stake you have in the system the more conservative one becomes - 'Relationships of ownership they whisper in the sings,' etc. And man, you used the struggle of black people for a decent life to make you famous, remember BLOWIN' IN THE WIND and you ripped the blacks for their music – YOU OWE THEM QUITE A BIT – any truth to what I'm saying man?
BD: Could be.

Then I began to tell Bob why I feel the way I do about Third World Liberation & went into a riff about my visit with a very poor cat in Mexico.

BD: Let's write a song together about your trip & we'll split the royalties.
AW: Send my cut to Caesar Chavez, man.
BD: So you just tell me what happened to you and I'll do the writing.
AW: I was down in Progresso, in the Yucatan, & I stayed with this labourer, a typical Third World scene, poverty, famine, disease – like being born into a nightmare – prolonged death agony – anyway, the cat became a 'bracero' – rhymes with sombrero. And this cat thought the Communists were 'little people' – he was brainwashed – his pad was next to a garbage dump. Now we got to convince Amerikans – thru this song – that they should support wars of national liberation.

Dylan came up with a song that went like this – "Down in Progresso a bracero lived in a sombrero full of espresso."

AW: What the fuck is this, man? No one is ever gonna be convinced of anything when you write that abstractly.
BD: That's my thing, Al. Know anything of the other books being written about me?

AW: Well, Robert Shelton, Tony Scaduto and Toby Thompson are doing books. I know Tony. He says he's goin' around talkin' to all your old friends (Jack Elliott, the McKenzies etc) and yer old lovers (Suzie Rotolo, Joanie Baez, etc) collecting 'information' about you – he said he would have studied yer lyrics but he knew he couldn't get permission to reprint them.

BD: That's not the reason – he could have never figured them out – he'll only come up with rumors.

AW: He did a pretty good job, tho.
Man, I think you're a fucking reactionary. You don't use your influence to save lives. Look at all the death around us. Look what just happened in Pakistan – that was the result of capitalism – the people were so poor they couldn't cope with a natural disaster.

BD: I wonder why the good Lord wanted all those people to die?

AW: You don't believe in God... !

BD: I sure do...

AW: But how about WITH GOD ON OUR SIDE... Did ya believe in God then?

BD: I must have then, too.

AW: How about using some of your five million dollars to save lives?

BD: I don't have that much.

AW: Bullshit, I got inside info, you multimillionaire PIG. Anyway, you were a self-proclaimed millionaire in '65. And you never do any benefits. Then there's your apolitical lyrics – everyone who heard Nashville Skyline said – 'Dylan's in a mellow head. He's singing about love.' You cut your hair, you only help apolitical rock people with their careers - you're a punk and me and the Dylan Liberation Front are going to do a number on you. We got some shit planned that's gonna blow your mind. Not only that but everyone in rock with a political consciousness is gonna come down on you. Lennon has started already by calling you Zimmerman. McGuinn just put you down.

BD: Where?

AW: In Creem.

BD: How?

AW: By saying you write BALLAD OF EASY RIDER even tho you told him not to.

BD: What? Well, I want to know who's gonna do this (getting angry) 'cause I'm not gonna take it. I'm gonna get them. I'm gonna get them. They'll never get out of it. Too bad for them... punks!

AW: Hey Bob, why not show the people your heart's in the right place and do a benefit for John Sinclair?

BD: I'm not about to help Sinclair by doing a concert, nor am I about to do any concerts at this time man.

AW: All you got to do is show up and plunk your guitar a little and a hundred thousand freaks will come out of their pads and go anywhere you are...

BD: Sorry, Al, I can't do it. But I will write a song about political prisoners on my next album...

AW: I don't want any promises for nine months later, I WANT TO SEE SOME ACTION NOW... see, Bob, you set the trends in rock and if you become like a human being a lot of other performers will go along...

BD: Al, a lot of the things you do aren't on the up and up. You tap phones and ya go thru garbage like a pig.

AW: But I don't sell the garbage to Life magazine.

BD: You must get money for your articles.

AW: I'm not like you, man. I send em all out fer free... everything should be free... money equals slavery. I'm proud I do it.

BD: No reason not to be but Al I'm gonna write a song about you.

AW: I could use the publicity.

BD: That's one reason why I wouldn't... but I got a good song called PIG.

AW: I can't take that seriously coming from you, multimillionaire who hoards his bread. No matter how you cut it, when you have all that bread and most people in the world have shit, you're the enemy – THE PIG. Bobby, you're just another capitalist, but instead of producing cars, guns, etc., you produce culture.

BD: That's something.

AW: Sure it is... 'Blue Moon, you left me standing alone'...

BD: Al, if I was a kid growing up I'd have to look out for you... I'd keep my eyes open for you. I'd make sure whatever street I went down I'd have to stand on the other side of the street when you came down, man. Al, why don't you get a guitar and put some of this energy to good use?

AW: But there's a need for someone like myself – no one else is doing the thing.

BD: But yer so extreme...

AW: Thanks.

BD: Off on one end – there's no one balancing the other end...

AW: How about lame rock critics...

BD: They're in the middle...

AW: Hey Bob, they all say I'm full of shit, Greil Marcus, Richie Goldstein, Christgau... They're all CORRUPT.

The sun had set & Dylan's wife had called him for dinner on the phone a couple of times. Bob gave me his phone number and asked me to call him when I'm on the radio or when something comes up.

AW: Ever hear me on the radio, Bob?

BD: Just a couple of times on Alex Bennett's Show – I dug it when he asked you if you had any personal messages for me. What do you think of Bob Fass?

AW: He's a revolutionary brother but he don't dig it when I attack you 'cause you were an old friend of his.

BD: Well, Al, so long, and one more thing – you're not going to get into my life.

AW: Why?

BD: If you do I might gain a soul.

AW: Is that a threat?

Talking to Dylan was like talking to a ghost. The old Dylan, full of ideas and stories was gone, replaced with a shell. It was also like talking to a con-man who was really conning himself. I know D's still into his CB & he was trying to cool me out by using his charisma & offering me his "friendship". Trying to co-opt me & the Dylan Liberation Front but we will fight on – till we win.

POWER TO THE PEOPLE

May/June 1971
Catherine Rosenheimer Interview, Herzliya, Israel

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 841-842.

Catherine Rosenheimer interviewed Dylan on the beach at Herzliya, near Jerusalem, sometime during May or June 1971 (Heylin states May 31st); her brief article appeared in the Jerusalem Post Magazine on June 4th 1971. The article has also been reprinted in Stephen Pickering's Praxis: One.

This story might be called "Dylan and the Detectives" – or perhaps the "Day of Dozens of Fruitless Phone Calls" – or even "Robert Zimmerman Incognito."

It all started with two lines in The Jerusalem Post "Arrivals" section the Sunday-before-last, reading "American folk singer Bob Dylan, for a short private holiday with Mrs. Dylan (by El Al)." Dylan protested to reporters at Lod Airport that he was amazed that they knew he was coming, that he was here strictly incognito and that he wouldn't talk to journalists anyway.

CBS Records, who have sentimental attachments towards Dylan, since his was one of the first LPs they released in Israel, knew nothing about his visit. They did a little rapid research, noted that May 24 was Dylan's 30th birthday and placed an advert in The Post wishing him Happy Birthday wherever he was, inviting him to call them if he felt like it. He didn't.

Back in Greenwich Village outside the Dylan family home all his fans were frenziedly celebrating his birthday, regardless of his absence. (Only his four children, their nanny and Sasha the dog were at home.) He spent his first couple of nights in a quiet anonymity at the Sharon Hotel, still firmly refusing to be interviewed and then gave them – not to speak of his travel agents – the slip too.

This reporter finally tracked down the elusive, reddish-haired, bearded Bob Dylan on Herzliya Beach bright and early one morning. Not that he was so easy to identify as one might have thought; glimpsed back view plunging in and out of the surf he looked remarkably like most of the other bathers braving the "Life-guards on Strike" warnings. Whatever else was not already evident, it became clear that he enjoyed the sea.

I can hardly claim to have received the warmest reception ever when he eventually emerged from the waves dripping, but he did talk – a little. In view of all the stories about his love of privacy, his hatred of journalists, it was all remarkably easy – not to speak of relaxed. Anecdotes about Dylan and the press include occasions like the one when, asked how his parents related to his becoming a singer, he replied that he didn't know his parents and they didn't know him; and there was the time when a reporter asked why he kept a bodyguard, to which came the answer "to keep away people I don't care for – like you!"

Perhaps he was just in the holiday mood. He was certainly polite, almost friendly, even if his manner was hardly conducive to a long conversation. "Where have you been?" was the opening – and obvious – question. "Traveling around" was the non-committal reply. North? South? "All over the place – we've been here for a long time." (It was then eight days, to be precise, though he did venture that had been here several times before. The purpose of the trip was, he-said, to collect material for what he calls "my journal." A journal to be published in book form it appears, including some songs too, to be released some time.

"Actually that's the main reason why we're here incognito – it's impossible to get down to work with dozens of people milling around you all the time," he ventured. "Apart from which

I didn't think my records were officially released here and so didn't want any publicity." I asked if there were likely to be any Israel-inspired songs as a result of his visit – no, but he had written one about Yugoslavia, he said with a smile.

As to official appearances in Israel, the answer was "maybe." He had seen CBS's birthday greetings "but I doubt if they'd really like to see me – my next record won't be released through them in any case." And how had spent his momentous 30th birthday: "We went to see a Gregory Peck movie – I'm quite a fan of his," he said with a laugh.

Unsuccessful attempts at interviewing Bob Dylan of late have led to the publication of a number of stories in the local press regarding a certain Alan Jules Weberman. Weberman, who calls himself a "Dylanolog," whose life's work is to collect and file every item he can salvage from the dustbin which stands outside Dylan's house. He is also reportedly the compiler and proud possessor of a fat volume containing a complex cross reference on every word ever to have been used in Dylan's songs – all of which he knows by heart, needless to say.

Dylan confirms that Weberman has a remarkable collection of his garbage, but that there wasn't much he could do about it – "We can't fence ourselves in – it's a family house with kids coming and going all the time."

He had not, he said, seen the Time article on him, and was intrigued to hear what it said. What it said, among other things, was that he was "thinking about" changing his name back to the one he grew up with: Robert Allen Zimmerman; that, having become Dylan (out of his admiration for the poet Dylan Thomas) about nine years ago because "I had a lot to run away from. Now I've got a lot to return to"- he was "returning to his Jewishness." Rumors about changing his name were, he said, "pure journalese and not a word of truth." No comment was forthcoming about Time's report of his great admiration for the Jewish Defense League and Rabbi Meir Kehane.

Michael Watts interview for Melody Maker, Mexico

reprinted in NME Originals: Bob Dylan and the Folk Rock Boom 1964-1974, p. 122-123.

THE MAN CALLED ALIAS
Wearied by the music business, Dylan tries his hand at film acting and knife-throwing

The scene is Durango, a dusty mining town with the highest murder rate in Mexico. Here, Sam Peckinpah, master of super violence (Wild Bunch, Straw Dogs) is directing Pat Garrett & Billy The Kid. All eyes are on the man who plays Billy's sidekick. For the man is Bob Dylan, bringing to his first acting role a dedication which suggests he has found the new direction which has eluded him for so long.

It is more than two years since he made his last album, 'New Morning', and there are apparently no plans for another solo venture. He has consistently intimated to friends that he is tired of the music business, and he takes little active part in it.

He is Bob Dylan. But who is Bob Dylan? As the myth of the musician and the generational symbol rises like creeping fog he casts about for a new purpose to it all.

He sees other pre-eminent musicians, like Lennon and Jagger, involved in movies. An old mentor is Andy Warhol. Down in Mexico, a newer friend, Kris Kristofferson, is starring in a film, as Billy The Kid.

Dylan was fascinated with the idea of a movie part as much as daunted. But he went down with Kristofferson's manager Bert Block to Mexico to exorcise his doubts. He was shown around the set. He was particularly captivated by the wardrobe of Western clothes, trying on the hats and costumes like a kid dressing for a fancy dress party.

He looked around for a while and then quietly picked up a guitar and sang a song he'd written about Billy The Kid to Kris and Coburn, and Peckinpah offered him a part there and then.

He plays, with the most fitting of poetic justices, the part of Alias. In the public life of the musician he is the man of uncertain identity. In the movies he is the man with no name.

Maggie Netter, an MGM publicist, tells me as we drive out on Saturday morning for the location site, El Sauz, that Dylan talks to no one, unless he wishes to.

"It's not just that he's picking on you, but, he's..." she searches for the right adjective, "he's just rude." Ah! The mucho mysterioso quality.

The car pulls into a large open space in front of the preserves of a big, crumbling stone building constructed as a cavalry fort some hundred years ago.

In one of the fort buildings, Peckinpah was shooting and rehearsing his actors. He was out of sight, but the authority in the voice left no doubt as to its identity.

"Dylan is great," Rudy Wurlitzer, the writer of the screenplay, told me as filming went on. "He's come down here to learn, he's turning in stuff, and it's been really impressive. I don't know what he really wants to do but I hope he would do his own film because he's an artist."

"The really interesting thing," he continued thoughtfully, "is what's going on between Dylan and Peckinpah. Sam is really Western, like an outlaw, looking to the wide open spaces. Dylan, you could say, was more Eastern. He brings a different point of view, especially to a Western. The part is small, but it's important in a funny sort of way. Do the two of them have any common ground? That's the big question."

On the nightly plane back to Mexico City, I sat across the aisle from Kris Kristofferson and we cradled a bottle of Jameson between us. And there, in the seat right beside him, was a little guy from Minnesota named Bob Dylan.

He was a whole era of youth coiled into one man, and now slowly winding down into the years past 30, and the consciousness of this had escaped no-one, least of all him, with his eyes set straight and stonily to the front lest he be forced to pick up those curious sidelong glances, just as a magnet does iron filings.

As the plane was taking off, and I began to speak to Kristofferson, he got up jumpily from his seat and went to sit at the back.

We had begun to climb as he reluctantly dumped himself down again behind Kristofferson. He pulled his hat down right over his face, which was odd, because his body was rigidly upright in his seat, cocked and attentive.

"Listen," said Kristofferson as we touched down, "this guy can do anything. In the script, he has to throw a knife. It's real difficult. After 10 minutes or so, he could do it perfect."

I looked back at the crown of the straw hat in uncompromising full-frontal. I said I was too scared to talk to the man right now.

"Sheeeit, man!," Kristofferson roared, "You're scared? I'm scared, and I'm making a pitcher with him!"

I began to feel more than ever like the lead in 'Ballad Of A Thin Man'.

They recorded until seven the following morning, Dylan's 'Billy The Kid' and some other stuff he'd written in Durango. On Monday morning, Bobby got on the plane and sat towards the back with a few empty seats around him. Kris and Rita Coolidge were right down the other end. About three-quarters of an hour out from Mexico City, he saw a newspaper guy get out of his seat, walk to Kristofferson and crouch next to him talking.

Kristofferson was saying "...I was just disgusted with him. He'd start a song and just keep changing it around. He had horn players, trumpets, and they didn't know a damn thing what they had to do because he couldn't make up his mind. I left about three. No, we haven't spoken today."

Dylan saw all this, he saw the guy go back to his seat. That was when he sidled cautiously down the aisle and nudged me abruptly in the shoulder.

"You with the Melody Maker?" he demanded. Surprised nod.

"Is Max Jones still working there?" Sure he was. Dylan gave Max Jones his first ever UK interview, for Melody Maker, ten years before.

Dylan talks in this light, soft voice with a husk to it. He is also terribly shy, which he largely masks by an air of alienation he throws around himself.

Disembarking from the plane, I found him in the bar, engrossed with a camera, at almost eight in the morning.

"It's not happening in London," I said, apropos a remark made on the plane.

"New York's the place. That's what John Lennon says," he says, focusing the lens.

"I saw Eat The Document there at the Whitney," I offer.

He looks directly at me.

"Do you know Howard (Alk, who co-edited the film with Dylan)?"

"No. Was it originally supposed to be like Don't Look Back before it was re-edited?"

"No, it couldn't be. We didn't have enough good footage. There was 40 hours of it, but the camera was jumping around all the time. That was the only stuff we could salvage."

"Would you go back and play in England ever?"

Silence. He turned three-quarters and carefully placed the cup on the counter. There was no answer. Instead, taking off at a sudden tangent, he said, "Did you see Fly?"

"You mean the one about the fly crawling up the wall for half an hour? No." We all laughed.

"Did you see Hard On?" he said suddenly.

"No, but I saw Rape, the one with the girl being chased."

He nodded.

"Warhol was making movies like that years ago. I prefer the stuff with Morrissey actually." I was trying not to sound smug.

He nodded again, then asked "Did you see Lonesome Cowboys?"

"No, but I saw Heat." It was getting to be quite funny. Every time he asked me he looked so intense.

"Sylvia Miles*?"

"Yeah."

Silence once more.

"Tell me, how can you stand it down here?"

"It's not too bad because I'm making a film. If I wasn't..." The sentence was chopped off because the producer had come up and told him he could get in the car.

The next day, nerves on the set were jagged. Dylan was being put through his paces in a crucial scene.

As the cameras rolled, Dylan was sitting on a chair surrounded by half a dozen ragged Mexican kids, strumming an acoustic.

On the far right of the scene, a cowboy was leaning on his horse. Billy The Kid and his gang were around a campfire on the left. There was a lot of laughing and tomfoolery.

Then Dylan rises. He's been playing nervously with a knife, turning it round in his hand. He walks a dozen paces towards the campfire as the cowboy on the horse shouts after him, "Hey, boy, what's your name?" as if he was a piece of dirt. He stops and faces round with the knife in his hand.

"Alias," he replies shortly. His knife taps against his leg.

"Alias what?" barks the horseman.

"Alias whatever you want," comes the rejoinder. The gang laugh.

"They just call him Alias," says one. His interrogator grunts.

There's the sound of muttering – and then, in a flashpoint that takes you by surprise, Dylan's arm arcs back with the knife, and a seated outlaw gargles in the back of his throat, knocked on his side with the force of the knife supposedly sticking through his neck.

"Cut," says Peckinpah. "Aaaaaaaaah!" goes all that escaping air in relief. "Print it," grins Block.

He leaves as some kind of musical Messiah, and returns, years later, as an actor playing a small part in a movie. Yet even before the film is finished, the questions mount. Will Dylan really turn away from music to concentrate more on films? Will he start making records again? Could he ever return to doing concerts? He's unwavering, however, in his refusal to relinquish any part of his private self to his public, and this seems destined to continue.

You ask who is Bob Dylan? He is Alias, Alias whatever you want.

January 1974
Maureen Orth interview for Newsweek

Dylan—Rolling Again

Moments before Bob Dylan began his first concert appearance in eight years, the backstage area at Chicago Stadium last week was eerily quiet. Reporters, who had swarmed in from every continent, were barred—except a NEWSWEEK reporter. There were no wives, no groupies, no hangers-on. In one small room Dylan and members of his accompanying group, The Band, twanged a few chords. In another room someone had left Dylan a surreal set of props: grotesque rubber masks, a stovepipe hat, a Keystone Cop helmet—even a crown. But for this first concert of his heralded return, Dylan disdained the disguises.

When he stepped out onstage, the 32-year-old Dylan, the elusive, reclusive poet-songwriter whose songs of protest and love sparked, sensitized and inspired an entire generation, was the Dylan everyone remembered: skinny, hunched over, dressed simply in blue jeans and black wool shirt, an old muffler thrown round his neck. Time had filled out his face slightly and given his voice a strengthened authority.

This was not the teen-age Bob Dylan who in 1960 arrived in Greenwich Village from Hibbing, Minn., looking, as one critic wrote, like "a cross between a choirboy and a beatnik," and, given a push by Joan Baez, started a new era in America's pop music. For years, city kids had been sitting on the floors at parties, picking guitars and singing folk songs. Dylan took this urban-folk semitradition, married it to the emerging rock beat and turned out a stream of songs that told an uneasy young generation why the American dream had turned into "Desolation Row."

Like a poet laureate, in the early '60s Dylan found the words that expressed a prophecy and a state of mind: "A hard rain's gonna fall..." "Something's happening here. You don't know what it is, do you, Mr. Jones?" "You don't need a weatherman to know which way the wind blows" (which gave the violent Weatherman group its name). Ironically, as if to mark the end of an era, on the day Dylan opened last week Federal Judge Julius Hoffman dismissed indictments against twelve Weathermen for their "days of rage" rampage in Chicago five years ago.

The question was: what was Dylan's new message for the '70s? To get the answer, 19,000 fans, many busing, hitchhiking or driving hundreds of miles, braved a freezing Chicago evening to see and hear the minstrel who withdrew in 1966 at the height of his fame, told the world to get lost and, like Garbo, raised the status of celebrity to myth. These people in the Chicago audience were not the screaming teeny-boppers who come to the saturnalias of the new pop stars like Alice Cooper. These were eager, expectant people, mostly in their 20s, who sat patiently as the house lights went down and only an occasional whiff of marijuana arose.

When Dylan finally walked calmly out, turned his back to the audience and began tuning up with Rick Danko, Levon Helm, Garth Hudson, Richard Manuel, Robbie Robertson—the gifted members of his original backup group, The Baud—the audience cheered him not with the demoniac sounds of Mick Jagger's vicarious street-fighting men, but with the healthy gladness of friends greeting a long-absent friend.

Dylan came on without gimmicks. His songs, at their best, were dynamite, cutting through the crowd like a laser beam the substance and mastery of the lyrics standing out in stark contrast to so much of the theatricality that has taken the place of music in today's rock world. Dylan and The Band did 28 songs—all vintage Dylan except for three new ones from his forthcoming album, "Planet Waves." Like pro athletes coming off a long layoff, their playing was ragged, almost deliberately unassuming.

But the mood changed in the second half of the show when Dylan—who never spoke during the concert except to announce the intermission—walked out alone, his black shirt replaced by a snow-white tunic. When he picked up his acoustic guitar and began blowing his harmonica, Dylan started blowing a few-minds as well; when he wailed "The times they are a changin'" the audience roared. It was both a memory and a promise. When he sang "The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll," the song about the death of a black woman killed by a cane carelessly thrown by a Maryland society snob who beat the rap "through high office relations in the state of Maryland," the reference to Spiro Agnew was perfectly clear.

He closed with "It's Alright Ma (I'm Only Bleeding)." At the line "Even the President of the U.S. must have to stand naked," the crowd went wild. The lyrics even inspired one man to rip off his clothes and declare his Presidential candidacy on the spot. He was immediately tackled by rock impresario Bill Graham, producer of the tour, who had earlier worried that things were "going too smoothly." When Dylan finished, thousands in the crowd lit matches and, holding them up like tiny torches, begged him to come back. He reappeared for a finale with The Band, and the last song seemed to carry a certain message:

Time will tell who was fell
And who was left behind,
When you go your way
And I go mine.

Dylan spat out the final words like a challenge. After eight long years the most important single personality in the American popular culture of his generation was back.

"This event is the biggest thing of its kind in the history of show business," modestly declared David Geffen. the 30-year-old human dynamo, "Record Executive of the Year," chairman of the board of Elektra/Asylum Records, who just pulled off one of the great coups in the music business—signing Dylan away from Columbia Records. When newspapers carried an ad last Dec. 2 saying Dylan and The Band would be touring 21 cities for six weeks in January and February, the post office was Hooded with millions of envelopes.

Only mail orders were accepted because Dylan wanted all age groups to have an equal chance to hear him, not just the kids who would stand in line at the box office for days before. Even so, the scramble for tickets has become frantic, including magazine ads offering bodies in exchange for tickets and scattered instances of counterfeiting. The total concert capacity was 658,000, and Geffen estimated 2 million to 3 million envelopes were sent back. With prices as high as $9.50 and $10.50, the concerts will gross a cool $5 million.

Since Dylan long ago became a millionaire, it would be downright vulgar to consider money as a motive for his return. He says he just wanted to hear good music. But whose? "If there was something else out there to really give you a kick," declares Dylan, "I would have thought differently about doing this. What I want to hear I can't hear so I have to make it myself." "Bob's a street cat," says his friend Barry Feinstein. "It's not good for him to he off the street." Dylan has astrological reasons as well. "Saturn has been an obstacle in my planetary system," he explains. "It's been there for the last few ages and just removed itself from my system. I feel free and unburdened."

There are other hypotheses about his return. Super-Dylanologist A.J. Weberman, who became famous by going through Dylan's garbage cans for relics of Saint Bob, now thinks the tour smells suspiciously like a Zionist plot. "He's doing it now because of the war in the Middle East," Weberman insists. "He is an ultra Zionist. He is doing the tour to raise money for Israel. He has given large sums of money to Israel in the name of Abraham Zimmerman [Dylan's father's name]. He's very ethno-oriented." "I got blue eyes," says Dylan. "I don't know how Jewish that is."

Dylan's motives for doing anything have always been questioned by his idolatrous masses, and after a near-fatal motorcycle accident in 1966 he withdrew into seclusion in Woodstock, N.Y., with his wife, Sarah, emerging just four times to perform, most notably at the concert for Bangladesh. Since then he has shunned interviews, occasionally released albums, popped up in Sam Peckinpah's film "Pat Garrett and Billy the Kid" and moved with his family from Woodstock to the beach at Malibu.

More important than Dylan's own motives for coming back, which are obviously as mixed as anybody's from Frank Sinatra to Muhammad Ali, are the expectations of his fans. Typical of these is Jim Krizmanich, a 28-year-old part-time builder of geodesic domes who came all the way from Indianapolis to Chicago to see the Dylan concert. His face stubbled, his hair uncombed. Krizmanich explains that he intends to see at least thirteen of the concerts around the country. "I just really like the man," he told NEWSWEEK's Martin Weston, "but he's not a god; more like a genius."

Like Krizmanich, 17-year-old Andrea Deedrick has about a hundred Dylan records and tapes, including many of the pirated recordings that have become collectors' items. Andrea came from Milwaukee with a girlfriend—and her mother and father, a 47-year-old, dark-suited advertising executive. "You couldn't classify my wife and myself as rock freaks," says Don Deedrick, "bul Dylan isn't Tin Pan Alley stuff. The difference accept the protest of the '60s at the time," says Andrea's mother, Mrs. Valerie Deedrick. "Dylan was disgusted with parts of society as we all were, but he put it into music. He helped to bring a lot of my generation around to realizing some of the falseness in our society."

But for Andrea, Dylan's message isn't in the lyrics. "He's been important to me for so long," she says. "I don't get deep messages, I just get a mood." A budding painter, she has portrayed Dylan several times. "I just know him by heart, like most of his songs. I think he's the most important musician who ever lived—more important than Ludwig van Beethoven."

But there was no doubt that the older people at the concert, like Andrea's parents, were hoping for something new to chew on from Dylan. "I'm looking for a sign or a message in his coming back," says musician Mark Fishman of Milwaukee. "I think this is the start of a new era. In the fourth year of each decade since '54 a new era of music has started in America. In '54 it was Elvis, in '64 the Beatles, and we're all waiting to see if it happens again." Painter Ronald Oeller of Phoenix, Ariz., has similar expectations. "I've seen Dylan influence music, clothing, hair and everything else." says Oeller. "I'm looking for something new again. He's a leader, a pacesetter."

Back in his hotel suite after his performance, in the company of a longtime high-school friend, Louie Hern, who knows him from Hibbing days when he was Bobby Zimmerman, Dylan is quietly watching an old Western on TV. The wool muffler is still wound around his neck. In person he's not nearly so hard-looking as his photographs—he seems almost fragile. A little later when everyone has gone, Dylan is remote but not unfriendly.

He feels good about his performance. "It's as natural for me to do it as for a fish to swim," declares Dylan. "It felt just like yesterday pounding the streets." Musically, he says, he doesn't consider his taste a part of the nostalgia so fashionable today in pop. "I just carry that other time around with me," he says. "The music of the late '50s and early '60s when music was at that root level—that for me is meaningful music. The singers and musicians I grew up with transcend nostalgia—Buddy Holly and Johnny Ace are just as valid to me today as then."

Any thoughts of taking up the mantle again for a new generation are also quickie dispelled. "I am not looking to be that now messiah. That's not in the cards for me. That's all over, that's the past. I like the way Van Morrison sings it: 'You know I just can't help you now. It's not my job at all.' I go deep and far out to get my songs—that's what it is, there's no more than that."

Dylan made his original impact on a generation in which "nobody was thinking about anything. Now there's so much going on everybody's thinking the same things. There's a new generation of people now, a new time," he says. "My father had to sweat. My father lived in a lot of pain. In this earthly body he didn't transcend the pain. I've transcended that pain, the pain of material things." It helps to be a millionaire, doesn't it? "I'd be doing what I'm doing if I was a millionaire or not, whether I was getting paid for it or not. In the '60s there was a certain bunch of us who came through the wars. There was a lot of death during that time.

The '60s were filled with it. It has helped me to grow up. The '70s are more realistic, but the '60s exposed the roots of that realism."

The thought that he is an "idol" makes him uncomfortable. "Idols are old hat. They aren't people, they're objects. But I'm no object," insists Dylan. "When we think of idols we think of those carved pieces of wood and stone people can relate to—that's what an idol is. They do the same thing to someone like Marlon Brando—they attach themselves to certain people because of a need. But I'm just doing exactly what a lot of other people would be doing if they could. I'm not standing at an altar, I'm working in the marketplace."

When Dylan mentions the marketplace he knows what he is talking about. He is one of the two or three most valuable properties in the multimillion-dollar-a-year pop-music business. Columbia Records, his previous label, was not unaware of this situation. When Dylan's contract with Columbia Records ran out last year he did not renew it, switching to Asylum instead. Columbia immediately got up an album filled with Dylan "outtakes" he had discarded in the studio long ago. Columbia promised Dylan that if he re-signed with them the album would not be released. He didn't and it was.

When Dylan and The Band decided to go on tour, they worried at first that their brand of music wasn't enough to impress a new audience of people used to seeing the theatrics of "decadent" rock stars like Alice Cooper or David Bowie. And they hadn't forgotten Dylan's hectic, less than triumphant tour in 1965, when, said lead guitarist Robbie Robertson last week, "we were booed off of every stage in Europe. What happened tonight in Chicago is so reassuring for us. We don't have any fancy outfits or sparklers on our eyes, and we don't cut off any heads. I mean how many times can you set yourself on fire or rip off your shirt?"

Dylan's direct, straightforward appeal to an audience is related to his celebrated reluctance to allow the media to interpret him to the public. "I've never bargained to be accessible to the press or the media," Dylan declares. "They've yet to find anything that they're gonna get from me. What I do is direct contact between me and the people who hear the songs and that goes right to the heart of the matter. It doesn't need a translator."

But Dylan has his own kind of charm, which he can turn on even in the presence of the media. He walks around his hotel room balancing a straw boater on his head, reacting enthusiastically to stories about country singers, such as Dolly Parton's armory of wigs. He talks about books—especially books that have the word solitude in their titles—"A Hundred Years of Solitude." "A Woman Called Solitude."

When the reviews of his concert came in, he read them eagerly. "Wow," he exclaimed as he looked over the Chicago papers (which were generally raves), "this guy thinks 'Forever Young' [a song from Dylan's forthcoming album that's a kind of prayer to his children] will be big on high-school and college campuses." Dylan shook his head in genuine disbelief. "Now how could he say a thing like that?" Another column suggests that Dylan, just by dropping in, tore a local club apart. "Hey, let's call all the newspapers and say Bob Dylan is coming! We'll meet 'em on a street corner! Call the TV cameras!"

Dylan, shy, evasive, wary of "profundity" and of claims on his privacy, nevertheless is an artist in close contact with his audience. He sang "The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll" opening night because a man from his hometown had written him a letter reminding him how relevant that song was to today's politics. But feeling a responsibility toward his fans is another matter. "There's the hard core and the curious," he says. "I'm not surprised by the response we've had for tickets to the tour, but I wouldn't be surprised if they only sold 1,000 tickets. I give out a hard dose—like penicillin. People don't have to worry if Dylan's conning them. If it works, it works. If they don't like it, they don't have to try the dose again."

As an artist Dylan seems to have found confidence. As a performer he's more relaxed. "A lot of the nervousness has gone. I used to feel nervous all the time before I went onstage." As a husband and father (five children), he has found profound love.

Dylan has come back at a time when our society is starved for heroes. His problem is he doesn't want to be a hero any more. He's singing his songs in his old way, and to many in 1974 they sound fresh and welcome—daring people to think about things few of the leaders of the '70s are talking about. But this doesn't seem like the moment when a singer, no matter how charismatic, is going to change people's consciousness. A minstrel cannot compete with the whip-saw of reality in the '70s. Maybe Bob Dylan should be treated as he wants to be—as a musician pure and simple. It may be that he himself is still "a rolling stone," looking for something. As he sings in a new song:

There are those who worship loneliness—
I'm not one of them.
in this age of fiber glass
I'm searching for a gem.

TOUR'S ROARING OVATIONS LEAVE DYLAN QUIETLY PLEASED
John Rockwell

PHILADELPHIA, JAN. 7-BOB DYLAN, dressed in jeans, a zippered sweatshirt and a fur hat sat barefooted and cross-legged on the living room couch of a suite in the Sheraton Hotel this afternoon, wiping sleep from his eyes and gradually overcoming a certain frog-throatedness usually associated with the early morning hours.

Then, in one of his rare press interviews, he discussed the enthusiastic response to his current national tour, his first in eight years.

"Now that it's happened, it pleases me," he said. "But if it hadn't happened, it wouldn't have disappointed me either. Being on tour is like being in limbo. It's like going from nowhere to nowhere."

AUDIENCES ARE GOOD

"But at least the audiences are different. The audiences on this tour have been very warm," he said. "Chicago's always good. But on our last tour Stockholm and London and New York and Austin—we are not making it to Austin on this trip—they were good, too. After we finish this we'll sit down and decide what we're going to do next. Maybe we'll go to Europe."

The mood among those associated with the nationwide Dylan tour that began last Thursday in Chicago might best be described as prudently euphoric. David Geffen of Elektra/Asylum Records, who brought Mr. Dylan and the Band back together for the occasion, calls the reception at the first four concerts "fantastic." Robbie Robertson, lead guitarist and spokesman for the Band, says it's been "incredible." And even Mr. Dylan, who appears to be moving cautiously but surely out of the reclusive shell he had built up around himself, is obviously pleased.

AVOIDED PRESS

Mr. Dylan has avoided interviews in recent years. "I used to feel used by the press, but that was because no one was in control of it for me."

As he answered questions in Mr. Geffen's suite in the hotel today, however, he was friendly and straightforward, if still ultimately guarded in his responses.

Mr. Robertson, talking later in his own room, wasn't so calm. "The ticket orders and the audience response have been just great," he says. "We've all been waiting a long time, especially Bob. And when we finally get there, to have it be a disappointment would have been really heartbreaking. But it's been wonderful."

"The last tour we did, in 1965-66, was like a hurricane," Mr. Dylan recalled. "This one is more like a hard rain. The last tour, we were going all the time, even when we weren't going. We were always doing something else, which is just as draining as performing. We were looking for Loch Ness monsters, staying up for four days running—and making all those 8 o'clock curtains, besides. There won't be any of that on this tour—for me, anyway."

Mr. Dylan is obviously not personally sympathetic to the glitter-rock phenomenon that has become popular in rock of late. Although he says he has "no feelings" about the glitter rockers, he does offer on reflection that he likes David Bowie—"He probably got started listening to us, back in '65 or '66"—and even Alice Cooper—"good, basic rock n' roll."

Mr. Robertson is more explicit in his distaste. "It's heartening—the audiences' response so far. We don't take our clothes off, or hang ourselves onstage, or paint our hair. We don't have anything to offer but the music. We are not a bunch of cutie-pies; we're grown-up people."

The current tour repertory has been drawn from a group of about 50 Dylan songs that Mr. Dylan and the Band ran through loosely together last November and December in Malibu, Calif. "We've tried to do as much as possible," Mr. Dylan offers.

"We want to keep things fresh," Mr. Robertson adds. "There aren't any arrangements as such of any of the Dylan songs we are doing. There's no set beginning, or end, or key. We just play along together, and hope it comes out right."

Mr. Dylan has been experimenting with additions to the program and with the format at every concert, and plans to continue with that experimentation. He says he was surprised at the roaring ovations that have greeted the beginning and end of his solo acoustic sets, but says he doesn't plan to expand that portion beyond the present five or six numbers. Mr. Robertson says the Band will eventually begin introducing some new original songs, definitely by the New York dates late this month.

Mr. Dylan admits to being pleased about the way his new Asylum album, Planet Waves, has turned out, and Mr. Geffen—understandably but apparently genuinely—waxes downright lyrical about it.

"I particularly like the song 'Something There Is About You,'" Mr. Dylan said. "It completes a circle for me, about certain things running through my pattern. But I think they are all good," he added quickly. "I don't play favorites."

"I still write songs the same way I always did: I get a first line, the words and the tune together, and then I work out the rest wherever I happen to be, whenever I have time. If it's really important, I'll just make the time and try to finish it. I do write less songs now than I used to, though. Seems like I do a lot less of everything now. Although yes, family life [Mr. Dylan and his wife, Sara, have five children]—that takes its part, too."

The thought of his performances in the New York area—Jan. 28 and 29 at the Nassau Coliseum on Long Island and three shows Jan. 30 and 31 at Madison Square Garden—brings a smile. "Oh, I love New York," he says. "I'm not really livin' in Los Angeles—we're just passin' through. I'm gonna have places all over."

Although he says his neck is still sometimes affected by the weather since his near-fatal motorcycle accident in 1966, Mr. Dylan is clearly sanguine about his life these days, and appears genuinely glad that his days as a cult hero seem to be over.

"It had to be somebody, and it happened to be me. I just picked this suit of cards—or it was handed to me. Now I want to do a lot of different things. I'd like eventually to make my own kind of movie, but first I'll have to do two or three more to get into 'em. Eventually, my turn will come."

"And I'd like to put out a book of my drawings, and later on maybe retire to a ranch some day. What part of the country? Why, I don't even know what country. Whatever happens will just happen by itself."

12 January 1974
Ben Fong-Torres Interview, Montreal, Canada

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 177-181.

The interview was conducted January 12th in Dylan's room at the Chateau Champlain hotel in Montreal, the day of Dylan's second concert at the Montreal Forum. It appeared in Rolling Stone on February 14th 1974 and was re-issued in the Rolling Stone book Knockin' On Dylan's Door.

BF: You seem to respond to the audiences in your selection of the material. In the first show in Chicago you began with Hero Blues, which wasn't familiar to a lot of the audience, and you and the Band took turns on songs. Now you're doing six straight... standards to begin with. How do you decide what songs to do each show?

BD: Well, it's more interesting for me to be able to move things around. We chose songs that were important for us, for me, for people we knew. They're mostly the songs that've been recorded through the years.

BF: You haven't done any from Self Portrait so far.

BD: I didn't live with those songs for too long. Those were just scraped together.

BF: To, say, make a point or pay tribute to songwriters you liked?

BD: Yes.

BF: What about the Dylan album? I've heard the songs were mostly outtakes from the Self Portrait sessions.

BD: They were just not to be used. I thought it was well understood. They were just to warm up for a tune.

BF: Does Columbia have much more such material?

BD: Columbia has a lot of outtakes, but most of them have been bootlegged, I think. [Pause, returning to the Dylan album:] I didn't think it was that bad, really! [Laughs]

BF: Rolling Stone seems to stand out in the shows as a song that's celebrated more than listened to, and you seem to go along with that response.

BD: It's just as real today as it was then. The audience is reacting the same as back then. It was always the one that got the best reaction.

BF: Rolling Stone is the finale, and you seem to have begun using You Go Your Way (I'll Go Mine) as both opener and final encore. Any special reason?

BD: You Go Your Way completes a circle in some way.

BF: The tour seemed to get looser as it got to Canada. There was even mention of you on a station in Toronto that more or less claimed you as a Canadian citizen – or at least a man from the North Country of the U. S., close to Canada.

BD: Canada seems to bridge a gap between the United States and Europe – and England. It's a certain flair. And this is where I come from, this kind of setting – lakes and boats and bridges. [Looks out the hotel room window at the snowy scenery]

BF: I heard you've been reading the reviews on the shows so far, and several of them seemed disappointed at you for not... reaching out more to the audiences. They say you won't say anything and don't seem willing to respond to the emotional receptions you're getting.

BD: They just don't understand. It's got nothing to do with that kind of atmosphere. What they [the critics] expect is what they expect. It concerns me more with getting it to the people. It's basically music, not a music-hall routine.

BF: Some people also wondered why you're playing such huge places.

BD: I let other people decide that. I just let people know I was ready. Put it in Bill Graham's hands. Originally I wanted to play small halls, but I was just talked out of that.

BF: Is this new activity on your part timed at all? I mean, people sense a significance to your returning at this time, given the state of the music business and the state of the country.

BD: Well, it wasn't planned... I saw daylight; I took off.

BF: Over the past seven or eight years, did you miss being on stage?

BD: Sure. There's always those butterflies at a certain point, but then there's the realization that the songs I'm singing mean as much to the people as to me, so it's just up to me to perform the best I can.

BF: You've said that you weren't a spokesman, that "that's in the past". Now you're singing the "message" songs again. Why, and what do you feel, singing the protest songs, now?

BD: For me, it's just reinforcing those images in my head that were there, that don't die, that will be there tomorrow, and in doing so for myself, hopefully also for those people.

BF: You told me the other night that you were especially looking forward to being in Texas. Why?

BD: They're more receptive to my kind of music, my kind of style. In the old days... I hate to call them the old days [laughs], I did New York, San Francisco and Austin. The rest were hard in coming. Maybe it's just the Mexican influence.

BF: Will you play in Mexico someday?

BD: I wanted to play Mexico, but it was hard to re-route the whole tour. I also want to play South America sometime.

BF: You made a reference to astrology in explaining – in Newsweek – why you were back on the road. ["Saturn has been an obstacle in my planetary system. It's been there for the last few ages and just removed itself from my system. I feel free and unburdened."] What's your interest in astrology?

BD: I can't read anybody's chart, but the thing about Saturn is, I don't know what it was at the time or I would've gone somewhere away. It's a big, heavy obstacle that comes into your chain of events, that fucks you up in a big way. Came into my chart a few years ago and just flew off again a couple of months ago.

BF: Who told you about Saturn's existence?

BD: Someone very dear to me told me.

BF: Is Malibu pretty much your home now?

BD: We're just there temporarily. It was cold in New York and we didn't want to go back there after Mexico. I can't stay away from New York.

BF: You've done six concerts now and your voice seems to be holding up pretty well.

BD: We've been through the big tours before. Actually, I'd like to have a little club where I could go and sing when I felt like it.

BF: Why does your voice change so much? From the country albums to Pat Garrett And Billy The Kid to the way you sound on tour...

BD: [Reflective pause]... That's a good question. I don't know. I could only guess, if it has changed. I've never gone for having a great voice, for cultivating one. I'm still not doing it now.

BF: Maybe people say your voice has changed because of your reworking or rearranging well-known songs like Lay Lady Lay.

BD: You'll always stretch things out or cut it up, just to keep interested. If you can't stay interested that way, you'll have to lose track. But I'm me now. That's the way it comes out.

BF: You're meaner now?

BD: Yeah.

BF: How are you meaner these days?

BD: Oh – no, I said, "I'm me now."

BF: Well! I already had the headline made up: "Dylan beats kids. 'I'm meaner now!'" I'd like to ask you about the rumors about your giving some of the profits from this tour to the Israeli war effort. One rumor has it that you're sending money in your father's name, and you've been characterized as an "ultra-Zionist."

BD: I'm not sure what a Zionist really is. I don't know how those things get started, really. It's just gossip.

BF: Maybe so, but people do wonder about what religion means to you.

BD: Religion to me is a fleeting thing. Can't nail it down. It's in me and out of me.

BF: But it seems to be "in" you enough for religious images to become parts of your songs.

BD: It does give me, on the surface, some images, but I don't know to what degree. Like Da Vinci going in to paint the Last Supper. Until he finishes it, no one knows what the Last Supper is. He goes out and finds twelve guys, puts them around his table, and there's your Last Supper. Or Moses. He found a guy and painted him, and forever, that guy will be Moses. But why Moses or the Last Supper? Why not a flower? Or a tree?

BF: Aside from religion, people talk about how you're now a family man, how you've mellowed out, and how all that has affected your music.

BD: Yeah to a degree. But those things don't make a person settle down. A family brings the world together. You can see it's all one. Paints a better picture than being with a chick and traveling all over the world or hanging out all night. [Phone rings; Dylan answers, talks for a few seconds and hangs up] But I still get that spark. Fame threw me for a loop at first. Until I learned how to swim with it and until I learned to turn it around – so you can just throw it in the closet and pick it up when you need it... I'm still out there. In no way am I not. I don't live on a pedestal.

BF: When did you learn to turn it around?

BD: The turning point was back in Woodstock. A little after the accident. Sitting around one night under a full moon, looked out into the bleak woods and I said, "Something's gotta change." There was some business that had to be taken care of that we don't have to go into. But it was too much. It finally broke the camels back. Now it's the same old me again.

BF: In Pat Garrett And Billy The Kid, do you think that you pretty much played the role of Dylan?

BD: I don't know who I played. I tried to play whoever it was in the story, but I guess it's a known fact that there was nobody in that story that was the character I played.

BF: Would you like to be a movie star?

BD: I'm not a movie star, but I've got a vision to put up on the screen. Someday we'll get around to doing it. The Peckinpah experience was valuable in terms of getting near the big action.

BF: Will you do a couple of films on your own before producing the "vision"?

BD: The Peckinpah movie brought me as close as I'll get. I've been on sets of movies and TV shows, but they were small-time compared. They spent $4, $5 million on Billy The Kid, had all the top people. So that was really heavy. Gave me that vibration. When I finally do mine, it'll have that vibration.

BF: How'd you happen to get involved in Billy The Kid?

BD: Just one thing into another. [Pause] They took me on because I was a big name.

BF: How'd you feel, seeing the rushes of your scenes?

BD: I've seen myself on screen [Dont Look Back, Eat the Document]. Movies don't impress me. That part didn't scare me off at all. Just hoped I didn't get shot during the movie!

BF: What about Ashes and Sand, the label you were starting yourself?

BD: It only lasted a quick few minutes.

BF: Whose idea was it for you to have your own label?

BD: I advised myself it was a good thing, and then I advised myself that it wasn't. I just didn't need it.

BF: You were going to sign new artists. I hear you're interested in Leon Redbone, that you talked with his agent in Toronto.

BD: Leon interests me. I've heard he's anywhere from 25 to 60. I've been this close [indicates afoot] to him, and I can't tell. If I had a label I'd want him. He does old Jimmy Rodgers, then turns around and does a Robert Johnson.

BF: Who else have you seen that you like?

BD: A couple of guys in Chicago were good – Mickey Clark and another Mickey.

BF: You told Newsweek that there's a new generation, that "everybody's thinking the same thing." Basically, that this isn't a time when we need protest songs. I was talking to a member of the Committee back in San Francisco who said there's still a need to get people to come around, that someone out there elected Nixon again after four years and continues to support him, through Watergate. Do you really believe that "everybody's thinking the same thing" and that you no longer need to write "message" songs?

BD: There's still a message. But the same electric spark that went off back then could still go off again – the spark that led to nothing. Our kids will probably protest, too. Protest is an old thing. Sometimes protest is deeper or different – the Haymarket Square or the Russian Revolution. The Civil War, that's protest. There's always a need for protest songs. You just gotta tap it.

BF: What did you think of CBS firing Clive Davis?

BD: I thought he was a scapegoat.

BF: He was trying to re-sign you when he left. If he were still at Columbia, might you have signed with them again?

BD: He would've made no difference.

BF: Why did you leave CBS?

BD: It was long overdue. Just a feeling it was time to go on. A gut feeling. Suspected they were doing more talk than action. Just released 'em and that's all. Got a feeling they didn't care whether I stayed there or not.

BF: Why did you choose to go with David Geffen and Asylum Records?

BD: He's there. Columbia's not there.

BF: What's "there"?

BD: Whatever it takes to be there.

BF: Are you actually signed, by contract, to Asylum?

BD: I'm not so sure we signed one. I don't sign anything these days.

BF: What about your work with Leon Russell? You did only a couple of things with him.

BD: The producers that have meant the most to me are Tom Wilson, John Hammond, and Bob Johnston. They were there. They were there when... well, it's like a small group of friends. Leon and I, we didn't do that much. [Dylan couldn't remember how many songs they had produced together.] It went fine. It was as good as it could have been expected to be.

January 1974
David DeVoss interview for Time magazine

Source: Time magazine, 21 January 1974

Monday, Jan. 21, 1974
DYLAN: ONCE AGAIN, IT'S ALRIGHT MA

Only an aquiline nose and a pair of scuffy cheeks peeked out from behind the purdah of colored glasses, gray muffler, and hotel towel anchored Arab-style by a pillbox chapeau. But the imperious stare, the twitching extremities and the spindly silhouette of Bob Dylan, 32, belied the Bedouin disguise. The erstwhile revolutionary folkie, rock n' roll innovator and countrified cop-out was back after an eight-year absence from concert touring. Perched atop a hotel couch in Philadelphia (the second of 21 cities in his current six-week tour), Dylan was solidly re-ensconced as the reigning song-poet laureate of young America.

With him was TIME Correspondent David DeVoss, 26, a member of the generation that grew up on Dylan's songs and that is now returning to auditoriums and stadiums for a historical second look. De Voss's report:

"All this publicity," Dylan sniffed tiredly, following two performances in a single day. "Sometimes I think they're talking about somebody else. I take it as it comes, but I'm not certain it's beneficial to my life." He paused to rub a bare foot against his faded jeans.

For thousands of young Americans, Bob Dylan is one of the very few personalities to emerge intact from the '60s whirlwind. A vindicated Cassandra who, in crystallizing once vague discontents, transformed dissent from an intellectual hobby to a public cause, Dylan sang about the turmoil of a generation. The generation listened. Now it remembers.

Thus far on the tour, Dylan's concerts have taken on the panoply of clan reunions. Hours before his scheduled appearance, stadium parking lots become agoras for hundreds who browse about looking at Dylan T shirts, posters and songbooks hawked by local vendors. They are subdued crowds—"laid back" in the vernacular of the present—but once inside they unite to buffet Dylan with waves of applause after each song. Roaring pleas for encores and repeated standing ovations are standard features. Lighted matches, signifying the rebirth of Woodstock solidarity, are regularly held aloft.

Never in the history of American rock has a tour aroused so much public interest. Within hours after mailorder tickets were put on sale, more than 5,000,000 letters, each requesting an average of three tickets, inundated post offices along the tour route. One trade paper calculated that 7.5% of the population of the U.S. had requested tickets to see Dylan and his bluesy bayou back-up group, the Band. In Los Angeles County, the 18,700-seat Forum received about 300,000 ticket requests. In New York City, Dylan followers seeking 12:01 a.m. postmarks on first-come, first-served mail orders created frantic midnight rushes. Frazzled promoters in San Francisco, faced with an ever-growing mountain of mail, finally bought newspaper ads imploring: "Please, no more mail orders."

Most performers would be elated, but Dylan, emerging from his isolation, is almost indifferent. "I try not to deal with the audience response," he said. "Too synthetic. Besides, it would be more than I could handle. I'm just basically interested in real things."

Still, it is quite a triumph for somebody who set out from Minnesota in 1961 on a pilgrimage to the bed of the dying Woody Guthrie, his only ambition to “make it big.” The fact that along the way Dylan became an oracle was almost accidental, involuntary. While his musical contemporaries were becoming mirrors of society, Dylan, almost in spite of himself, became its conscience, a reluctant Eumenide. Instead of warbling teen-age love songs, he wrote about bigotry, nuclear destruction, war profiteers and social desolation. Dylan was background for a campus rap session, inspiration for an essay. He was the brooding presence uniting thousands of unsatisfied students, a pioneer who purged the inanities from popular music with surrealistic epigrams and metaphysical subtleties.

“When I first took my music on the road back in ‘60, it was in search of something else that wasn’t being covered,” Dylan said last week in a rare interview. “I let it happen by itself, and it grew and matured by itself. Everybody has matured, musicians included. A lot of these people [referring to his followers] and myself have a great deal in common. As for the music... I just let the rope out.”

Nasal Howl. From the moment they shamble onstage to begin their low-key performance, Dylan and the Band are in complete control of the audience. Dylan’s early folk-rock numbers, punctuated by Band standards like The Night They Drove Old Dixie Down and Up on Cripple Creek, are knocked out with an almost blase professionalism. But if Dylan is short on emotion, he makes up for it in energy. Shouting into the microphone in his haunting nasal howl, he spits out his message like a cobra. Since neither the performers nor the songs need introduction, there is no chatter between numbers. Dylan’s acknowledgment of the audience is slight: a simple bow from the waist after each song and a terse announcement of the intermission.

After the break, he walks on, sometimes clad in shining white denim, for a solo set of songs accompanied by his own acoustical guitar and ubiquitous harmonica. It is the most exciting part of the show. Dylan, his halo of curly hair limned by the iridescent hues of the stage lights, is greeted by thunderous cheers. After four or five of his early ballads, he is again joined by the Band for a crescendo of electrified folk-rock songs studded with powerful guitar riffs. From then on, the shouting seldom stops.

For those of us who first grasped for maturity during the decade past, a Dylan concert is a three-hour detour through deja vu. Like images on Plato’s cave, Clearasil coeds with Joan Baez hair and men silently hunkered inside thick pea jackets appear and quickly pass— yesterday’s graduate students, now headed toward paunch or pregnancy. Dylan concerts draw people who inhabited the fringes of campus teach-ins, rode Mississippi freedom buses and marched down endless University Avenues searching for an end to the draft.

Both Dylan and his followers have mellowed. The angry faces of the ’60s are softer now, and evidences of the future generations we were trying to save can occasionally be seen toddling along the crowded aisles. The arrogance of both poet and pupils is diminished, but the lyrics of songs like A Hard Rain’s A-Gonna Fall, Mr. Tambourine Man and Desolation Row have grown in potency. Adult perspective makes songs, like My Back Pages, more meaningful:

Yes, my guard stood hard when abstract threats / Too noble to neglect / Deceived me into thinking I had something to protect / Good and bad. I define these terms / Quite clear, no doubt, somehow. / Ah, but I was so much older then I’m younger than that now.

“He’s all of us,” cried one Pittsburgh coed, as she hurried for the subway after one of Dylan’s concerts in Philadelphia. “He’s all the things we always felt but could never eloquently express.”

Dylan's eloquence stems partly from a salutary imprecision. His throbbing harmonica, Delphic imagery and occasional Chaplinesque two-step are constants, but his message, like the times, is continually changing. "This show is definitely not nostalgia," he whispered last week between silences and long stares. "To my mind, I deal with certain problems. It's an up-to-date show."

In ending his exile, Dylan once more takes up his subtle revolution. His fans, nurtured on unstructured polemic and cinema verite, are being invited on a new journey, and if their expectant faces are to be believed, they are ready to follow. Each night on the tour, Dylan receives an ovation when he sings the line, "But even the President of the United States sometimes must have to stand naked," from It's Alright Ma (I'm Only Bleeding). In Dirge, a song from his soon-to-be-released album Planet Waves, his forceful lyrics are an eloquent, melancholy study of an individual searching for a niche in an anonymous society dominated by "progress."

I hate that foolish game we played / And the need that was expressed / And the mercy that you showed to me / Who ever would have guessed / I went out on lower Broadway / And I felt that place within / That hollow place where martyrs weep / And angels play with sin.

Yet the thrust of his performances is one of cautious optimism: a guarded belief that conditions can improve. In Forever Young, he says:

May your hands always be busy / May your feet always be swift / May you have a strong foundation / When the winds of changes shift / May your heart always be joyful / May your song always be sung / May you stay forever young.

They were exciting iconoclastic times, those'60s. "We"—the baby boomers—had the schools, the attention of the media, a good proportion of the nation's disposable income, and most important, we had a distinct music. The strange new sound of folk rock took over radio. Soon the white-middle-class blues, a lament where computers and corporations replaced landlords and scabs, was stirring an entire society.

A higher reality was at hand, but like a burst of light in a dark room, it proved to be illusory. Poverty programs, free universities and Camelot gave way to Kent State, Cambodia and urban terrorism. The toll of death and deterioration set in: The Kennedys, King, Dak To, Khe Sanh, Watergate. The clenched fist replaced the V sign as idealists turned cynical. Dylan and his followers withdrew into a more personal and private world. After a near-fatal motorcycle accident in 1966, Dylan moved to his home in Woodstock, N.Y., and switched from participant to observer to chronicle the halcyon days of "the movement" in songs like Time Passes Slowly.

Time passes slowly up here in the mountains, / We sit beside bridges and walk beside fountains, / Catch the wild fishes that float through the stream, / Time passes slowly when you're lost in a dream.

A generation of activists grew apathetic: the old spirit of Dylan and Joan Baez seemed to have evaporated. The stage was taken over by a capering rearguard of glitter rockers, demonists and hip vaudevillians.

Now, in Dylan's return, illuminated by the slow flicker of thousands of matches, the old spirit seems to emerge anew. At each concert, the hush of anticipation, the buzz of uncertainty and the applause of recognition are extensions of young people again listening to his words and looking for their meaning. Arms linked together, swaying in unison, chanting in time to the psychic current, a generation's anthem— learned in adolescence, sung in protest but not finally understood until periods of adult crisis—is being sung once more:

How does it feel, / How does it feel / To be on your own / With no direction home / Like a complete unknown / Like a rolling stone?

Mary Travers Interview, Oakland, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 409-415.

Broadcast over KNX-FM Radio, Los Angeles in the program Mary Travers and Friends on April 26th 1975. Dylan's old friend, Mary Travers, of Peter, Paul and Mary fame persuades Bob to do his first radio interview since 1966. Heylin describes Dylan as not in a very talkative mood but I get the impression that Bob just can't get a word in edgeways (By the way – see if you can spot the yawn on the tape)

Taken from the circulating tape.

MT: Hi. This is Mary Travers and you're listening to Mary Travers And Friends and today's guest is Bob Dylan. We're here in the studio with Bob and there are a lot of good musical questions to talk about. First I'd like to, to talk a little bit about some of the folks that the two of us were listening to in the early '60's, people like Woody Guthrie and let's open, if we may, with a song you wrote about Woody Guthrie.

Song To Woody plays

MT: And now let's play the real Woody Guthrie. Shall we?

Ramblin' Down The Road from Guthrie plays

MT: What about Guthrie? Did you ever meet him?
BD: Yes I did. I met him.
MT: Was he very sick then?
BD: It was. Well, I didn't meet him in his, you know, in his prime time I guess, but, when I met him he was... he had that... he was pretty laid up with... he was still alive and alert, erm... I made many visits out to see him in the... at the hospital.
MT: Right, he had Huntington's Chorea, which is...
BD: Kind of a shaky thing, you know.
MT: This is Mary Travers now and I'll be right back after this message, with Bob Dylan.

MT: You've done an album that isn't released yet called the Basement Tapes. Want to tell me about that?
BD: That was recorded in '66, '67 up in Woodstock, you know, before Woodstock, before the big Woodstock Festival, before Woodstock was discovered, exploited, I don't know. We were just all up there sort of drying out.
MT: You and the Band?
BD: Yeah. The members of the Band and various other people, up there making music and planting gardens and just watching time go by. So in the meantime we made this record, made this – actually it wasn't a record, it was just songs which we'd come, you know, to, er, this basement and record; out in the woods. That's basically it really. Uh, the records have been exposed throughout the years so somebody mentioned it was a good idea to put it out, you know, as a record, so people could hear it in it's entirety and know just exactly what we were doing up there in those years and it'll be out shortly.
MT: Do you wanna play a track off of it?
BD: We can play all the tracks.
MT: OK. Let's play one track now and play some more later.

Lo And Behold plays.

MT: Do you think that that period was a good period, a good period to hang out and kinda relax and get back to what music was about for you?

BD: For me? What do you mean?

MT: In the sense that when you're on tour and you're working hard I know, I find, I mean, I write poetry, I don't write songs, er... I find it very difficult to write on the road, er, between getting on and off a plane and bad food and taking a holiday and it leaves you very... it saps you of the kind of contemplative time you need to sit around and really think and you also don't play so much together.

BD: Yeah, well these songs basically aren't a tape, they were written like in five, ten minutes, you know. We'd just come off a ferocious tour, you know, of Australia, Europe, England.

MT: These were more...

BD: Yeah. Needed some time, needed some time to er... let it all... you know, let the...

MT: The dust settle.

BD: Let the dust settle and the waves come in, you know.

MT: Well, I think a lot of people go through periods like that where they need, need to have... If you forget how to have fun with music you've just destroyed it for yourself and I think unfortunately that's what heavy touring often does to us all. You know, it becomes a job.

BD: It becomes a business.

MT: And perhaps that's the genesis of the Basement Tapes, is to go back and have fun with music. Let's play another track from that...

This is Mary Travers and we'll be right back after this message.

In a sense this is a kind of retrospective album for you and you've had some funny albums in the sense that... well, I take that back, not funny albums, but, most people do albums because the record company says you've got to do x number of albums a year and then when you get tired or I get tired, and it's happened to me too, you throw out a "Best Of..." and, er, kind of hang around and try figure out what it is you really want to say musically.

BD: Musically? Er...

MT: Are you thinking of planning an album?

BD: No, I just play, you know, I play and whatever comes out comes out. I don't plan albums, er, all that pressures off. I don't have to go in and make an album every six months, you know. I don't think of it that way. I just continue to play my guitar and, er, you know, if there's a song in my heart to do, I'll do.

MT: Let's maybe go back to Guthrie and see if we can't explore that a little bit more. He obviously had a great, you know, effect on your music and on a great many writers of that period and you can see his influence even now. I mean, the talking blues form, I think, is a very viable and will always be viable, form of saying something. And he wrote songs like Pastures Of Plenty and This Land Is Your Land – those songs most people know and many songs that are not as familiar, but he was also a very social writer and cared very much... and came from a time of, when many artists were very involved and caring about the country and what was happening to it and I suppose Peter, Paul and Mary and Pete Seeger and the Weavers and yourself even were caught up in that social commentary way of talking, of viewing the world as we saw it at that time. There were certainly a lot of your songs that were like that. Do you feel that that's not a position, a reasonable position to take now or is it just that you're caring about other things.

BD: No, it's a very reasonable position to take now. It's just that, you know, it's just hard to be specific about, you know, about what we're even talking about here let alone try to, you know, write a song or do a play or make some kind of art form out of, er... these big situations which are happening in the world which are changing so fast now. From day to day, I mean, it's like, er, you know, they're just rolling over too fast to keep your finger on, you know, to keep your eye on or as, back then when Woody was doing all his writing, you know, things, the communication wasn't so, the media wasn't so powerful, erm...

MT: And it also took longer to get something changed.

BD: It took longer to get anywhere, you know. It took longer to get from here to there, you know, and...

MT: I guess what you're saying really is that presents a special kind of problem for people who wanna write that kind of material.

BD: Well, it can be confusing, you know, if you wanna write what you call topical songs, topical songs, hard to find the frontier.

MT: You wrote a lot of good topical songs, of course, er...

BD: Well, I wrote those songs before it was happening and, er, you know, before it's happening and you do it, it's before everybody's on your case, you know everybody gets on your case, you just don't wanna do it anymore. I mean, it's just like anything else – people tell you what to do – you don't wanna do what you're told to do. It's discouraging.

MT: Yeah, I noticed er, in...

BD: Plus you're just running over the same er... same ground.

MT: Yeah. I mean, you have said it. I don't think you have to say time's here are changing twice.

BD: Right. Say it again! Say it again! You know, that's what they want, you know.

MT: Yeah. What they want.

This is Mary Travers and I'll be right back after this message, with Bob Dylan.

MT: Did you ever meet Nina Simone?

BD: Uh? I met her at a table once somewhere in, er, in a club.

MT: She did a couple of your tunes.

BD: Yeah.

MT: And well, I thought.

BD: Yeah.

MT: I thought she booked something.

BD: Roberta Flack did Just Like A Woman but she got the words wrong.

MT: She changed the words.

BD: I don't think she changed them. I think she just got 'em wrong.

MT: I know Nina Simone did Just Like A Woman as well.

BD: Yeah.

MT: I think she makes a lyric change there.

BD: Yeah. Personally, I don't understand why anybody would want to do that song, except me.

MT: Ritchie Havens did it.

BD: Now Ritchie, it made sense coming from Ritchie.

MT: Let's play Ritchie.

BD: Yeah.

MT: I like Ritchie. When you say "I like Ritchie" that's not true – I love his work.

BD: That's an understatement, yeah.

MT: Yeah. I love his work. I love him as a human being. I love him as a musician.

BD: He's like a king.

Ritchie Havens music plays – Just Like A Woman.

MT: OK. Let's talk about the present since we can't talk about the future since it doesn't exist yet. In the future right now is...

BD: Oh, it all exists, you know, the present exists, the past exists and the future exists. It all exists.

MT: How do you see the future as existing?

BD: It exists as part of the present.

MT: In the sense that...

BD: It's connected. It just depends how far you wanna set your sights, you know. I think you could be very limited in, you know, Zen philosophy. I think it's Zen philosophy. I mean, you just live in the present, you know, but that's more complicated... that statement's more complicated than meets the eye really, meets the ear... but it's all the same, the past, the present and the future.

MT: Historically it would seem so.

BD: I think we might be crossing a line here that, er...

MT: OK. We'll drop that.

BD: I don't know if we're the right people to be talking about... maybe you should be talking about with somebody else, I should be talking about with somebody else and maybe neither one of us should be talking about it.

MT: OK. That's fine. Those questions are philosophic questions and the program really isn't about philosophy per se.

BD: Right.

MT: It's about music and although there's a lot of philosophy certainly in music, erm... and a lot in yours which is self-evident.

BD: The only philosophy in my music, I have to admit, is accidental, you know.

MT: You really think so?

BD: Yeah. None of it is pre-conceived, I can tell you that much.

MT: Well, when you say pre-conceived now I know when I write something, when I write a poem, I don't sit around all day saying "gee I'd like to write a poem about flowers", you know, whatever, or children or caring about people. I mean, I don't think about what it is I'm going to write about. I mean, when you feel like writing you sit down and out something pops. But it doesn't mean that you haven't been thinking about it. It means you haven't been consciously thinking about it.

BD: Well, yeah, well, that's thinking... that gets back to thinking again, you know. My stuff is... has to do more with feeling than thinking.

MT: OK.

BD: When I get to thinking I usually, er, you know, I'm usually in some kind of trouble and er...

MT: Well, feeling is often, if you can trust your own feelings, you're probably in better shape. Is it more truthful?

BD: Oh yeah. Well. Comes down to mutual trust.

MT: Yeah, always. On Blood On The Tracks er... I have to tell you that, needless to say, I loved the album, I really enjoyed the album, and felt that you... it was funny, because when we had talked before we talked about recording processes and how, that when they get very complex much of the truth of a piece of music is lost – it becomes something else.

BD: Hm, hm.

MT: And one of the things I enjoyed about Blood On The Tracks, as an album, was that it was very simple.

BD: Hm, hm. Well that's, you know, that's the way things are really, they are basically very simple. A lot of people tell me they enjoy that album. It's hard for me to relate to that. I mean, you know, people enjoying the type of pain, you know.

MT: It is a painful album.

BD: So, er...

MT: Well, perhaps maybe the word "enjoy" is the wrong word. Maybe a better word is to say that you're moved. I was moved by the album. You know, there were things that I could relate to in that album that grew as sense to me. You made sense to me on that album. I felt that it was a much more, well, for me, I felt it was much more "first person" as opposed to third person.

BD: Well, it makes it more clearly defined, but it still doesn't necessarily make it any better than, than, doing it, 'cause you can do it in second, third, fourth person too, you know, it's all the same, sure it is. Um. I know what you mean though.

MT: Yeah. Let's play If You See Her Say Hello 'cause I think that's a very beautiful song.

BD: Very pertinent.

If You See Her Say Hello plays

MT: For me that was a very poignant song.

BD: Hmhm.

MT: A very sad song. But, together, I mean, it wasn't, I think maybe what, one of the things I like about your work is either when you're feeling bad – it isn't self-pity bad – it's just "I don't feel good".

BD: Hm hm. Even when you're feeling down you feel up.

MT: Well, you're feeling something and that's the positive as opposed to feeling destroyed by it.

BD: Hm. Do you write songs?

MT: No! I'm writing a book. I write a lot of poetry. But somehow I've never figured out how to make poems into songs. It's just, er, it really seems to be a different way of writing.

BD: Yeah. It's confining.

MT: What, songs?

BD: Uhum.

MT: Well, yeah. But poetry seems to give you a bigger canvas to play with and you don't have to explain it, the same way. Songs seem to have to be understandable. Somehow in a poem you can ramble and deal with several thoughts and not have to necessarily connect them, the images. I know a song of yours that I think for me was most poem like, that was Hard Rain's Gonna Fall, 'cause it really wasn't a song, it was a series of images and when you see it on a piece of paper it really looked like a poem.

BD: Play Leon's version. He did it too.

Music plays.

MT: The In Concert album that you did with the Band on the last tour which was an incredible piece of business for someone who doesn't do a lot of concerts. You sure made up for it with that tour. I'd like to play something off of that album. Was there something that you thought went well.

BD: Oh, er... he played All Along The Watchtower.

Music plays.

MT: Let's finish off with a track from the Basement Tapes. Er, your choice.

BD: Er, OK. Oh, Apple Suckling Tree.

MT: OK. We'll finish with that.

BD: Yeah.

MT: And thank you.

Apple Suckling Tree plays.

Well, he ain't at home right now,
He can't come to the phone
So leave your name and number
When you hear that lonesome tone.

I'd gladly talk to you right now,
I'd like to guarantee
But I can't speak or answer now,
Since I'm not really he.

September 1975
Dylan By Travers By Miles

Source: the Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 417-419.

Despite my own personal feelings the Mary Travers interview was not perceived as a good session. For a contemporary critique there's no better article to refer to than one by Miles, published in New Musical Express on September 27th 1975.

DYLAN DOES HIS FIRST RADIO INTERVIEW IN EIGHT YEARS, AND STILL MANAGES TO SAY NOTHING

The news of a radio interview with Bob Dylan, who rarely does such, caused Dylanologists, fans and degenerates to take up their trannies recently and tune in to the deeply terrifying Mary Travers and Friends Show.

Folksie Mary, who has perfected the art of circumlocution so necessary for American talk shows, said she wanted to chat about those folks that she and Dylan had listened to in the early sixties. She played D's Song For Woody and Woody's Ramblin' Down The Road then finally turned to the Zimmerman (who had been sniffing noisily throughout her intro) and asked him in a motherly tone "What about Guthrie?"

But the Zimmerman didn't reply.

Quelle Horreur! The worst sin of all in American radio is to have dead air. Not even a sniff. In panic she waited as long as she dared before confronting him with a direct question that he just had to answer, the feeble little wimp, "Did you ever meet him?"

Real interesting stuff this. Dylan replied in a strangled sort of voice, "Yes I did, I met him." It was obvious by now that this wasn't going to be a program of intimate revelations swapped by old buddies of the early sixties. It was not the same Dylan who wrote "Everybody that hung out at the 'Gaslight' was close, yuh had to be" on the sleeve notes of Peter, Paul and Mary's In The Wind album back in 1963.

In fact she might as well have never met him before. But she struggled on, playing album tracks when Dylan answered question after question with "um-hum" but she did get him to talk about The Basement Tapes.

"That was recorded '66, '67 up in Woodstock. Before the big Woodstock Festival, before Woodstock was uh, (sniff) discovered, exploited. I don't know, we were all up there sorta drying out... members of the Band and various other people. Up there making music and planting gardens and just watching time go by. So in the meantime we made this record. Actually it wasn't a record, it was just songs which we'd come to this basement and recorded. Out in the woods. That's basically it really. The records been exposed, um, throughout the years, so somebody mentioned it might be a good idea to put it out as a record so people could hear it in it's entirety and know just exactly what we were doing up there in those years... The songs on the tape, they were written like in five or ten minutes. We'd just come off a ferocious tour of Australia, Europe and England and needed some time to, uh, let it all out (gulp) like, let the..."

Mary helped him out: "Let the dust settle?"

"...let the dust settle and the waves come in, you know."

Dylan doesn't like to be interrupted so he gulps loudly on a liquid and "ah's" through Mary's next question so she has to play another record when he "Um-hums" at the end of it.

She starts on the subject of topical songs and discovers as Jerry Leichtling said recently, "It's a lot more difficult to talk to Dylan than to play with him." Mary asked him diplomatically whether social comment songs were still a reasonable way of talking about the world. D was his usual evasive self:

"It's a reasonable position to take now, it's just that it's hard to be specific about what we're even talking about here, let alone to try to write a song or do a play or make some kind of art form out of these big situations which are happening in the world, which are changing so fast now, from day to day, you know. It's like they're just rolling over too fast to keep your fingers on, you know, keep your eye on. Whereas back then when Woody was doing all his writings, things, communications weren't so, the media wasn't so powerful. It took longer to get anywhere. It took longer to get from here to there."

And then came the old apologia as if Dave Van Ronk, Pete Seeger, Ramblin' Jack Elliott and all the others hadn't existed before Dylan arrived in New York City: "I wrote those topical songs before it was happening, and before it's happening you can do it. Before everybody is on your case, you know. Everybody get on your case and you just don't want to do it anymore, you know. It's like anything else people tell you to do, you know. You don't want to do what you're told to do. It's, uh (sniff) discouraging." (We understand, Bob).

"Roberta Flack did Just Like A Woman but she got the words wrong."

She changed them?

"I don't think she changed 'em. I think she just got 'em wrong."

Dylan is not greatly interested to hear that Nina Simone also did it with a lyric change. "Yeah? Personally I don't understand why anybody would want to do that song, 'cept me." But he agreed that it made sense when Ritchie Havens did it.

Mary spent a great deal of time telling Bobby how much she enjoyed Blood On The Tracks and finally said it was it's simplicity that she liked.

Dylan sighed, "Um-hum, well that's it, you know. That's the way things really are. They are basically very simple. A lot of people tell me they enjoy that album. It's hard for me to relate to that. I mean, it (sniff) you know, people enjoying that type of pain, you know!"

She felt that the album made sense to her because it was much more first person than third person. But you can't catch Bobby out with a line like that:

"Well, it makes it more clearly defined but it still doesn't necessarily make it any better than doing it... 'Cause you can do it second, third, fourth person too. You know it's all the same sure it is! Um, I know what you mean though."

Trouble is that Dylan doesn't like to be pinned down on anything: "Any philosophy in my music, I have to admit, is accidental. None of it is preconceived, I can tell you that much." So Weberman was lying all the time!

"My stuff has more to do with feeling than with thinking... When I get to thinking I'm usually in some kinda trouble."

Jim Jerome Interview, Manhattan, New York

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 183-186.

This appeared as a cover story in the November 10th issue of People magazine. It took place at Studio Instrument Rentals studio on 520W. 25th Street, New York during the Rolling Thunder Revue rehearsals.

BOB DYLAN:
A MYTH MATERIALIZES WITH A NEW PROTEST RECORD AND A NEW TOUR

Bob Dylan at 34: "We each have our own vision and a voice inside that talks only to us. We have to be able to hear it."

It was a windowless recording studio, six floors above a deserted Manhattan side street. The artists were sealed off, as if under a siege that would not end until the tape was finally right. Meal breaks were out-instead, carrots, crunchy cauliflower, curry sauce, Camembert, French bread, beer, wine and tequila were brought in. The mood otherwise, though, was of a warm, conspiratorial intimacy. The harsh overhead lights were replaced by soothing red and green spots. A homey floor lamp illuminated the music stand of the lead singer. The producer was supportive: "Just hold that tempo, Bobby," he encouraged from the control room. "That last take was startin' to smoke." The star leaned into his mike and responded: "We're gonna get it, man, I know we are. Let's get this thing in the can and out on the streets." Bobby was Dylan and, after his latest 18-month retreat, he was returning to the streets again.

The recording is Hurricane, a protest song with the gritty urgency and outrage that had once enflamed a whole American generation. It pleads against the controversial eight-year incarceration for murder of ex-boxer Rubin ("Hurricane") Carter. Simultaneously, Dylan was readying his first road show since his tumultuous comeback tour of 74. The itinerary would detour the megabuck impresarios, the multiseat superdomes, the computerized ticket networks and re-create the modest small-club mini-tours that characterized the years when he first left Hibbing, Minn. But his entourage includes friends like his ex-lady Joan Baez, plus Ronee Blakley, the discovery of the movie Nashville. Undeniably, Dylan creates in a genre in which minimal art is almost impossible, and so his latest comeback may live up to its ironic title – the Rolling Thunder Review.

Dylan is himself, after all, the most influential figure in American pop music (and thus pop culture) since 1960. His garbage was analyzed years before Henry Kissinger's. Every syllable or solecism of his life is subject to fearful scrutiny. Dylan, now 34 and as scruffy, wiry and taut as ever, looks back and sees it all as only a colossal accident. "It was never my intention to become a big star. It happened, and there was nothing I could do about it. I tried to get rid of that burden for a long time. I eat and sleep and, you know, have the same problems anybody else does, and yet people look at me funny."

If Dylan had his way, he would not be looked at at all. He has granted very few major interviews in eight years, and this was his first in some 18 months. "I was playing music in the '50s" he begins, "and man, it was all I did. It saved my life. I'm not a hermit. Exclusive, maybe, but not reclusive."

"I didn't consciously pursue the Bob Dylan myth," he continues. "It was given to me by God. Inspiration is what we're looking for. You just have to be receptive to it." While reports of Dylan's ardent Zionism are almost certainly exaggerated, he has unquestionably returned to his Jewish roots, or at least to a generalized spiritualism.

"I was locked into a certain generation," he says. "I still am. A certain area, a certain place in the universe at a certain time". The middle '60's, a period of drug-boosted frenzy, were reflected in Dylan's electric, clamorous rock n' roll and in his manic jet-stream imagery – and they culminated on the edge of death on a shattered motorcycle in the summer of 1966. Then followed a two-year withdrawal which only intensified the myth. "I just wanted to be alone," he now says. He surfaced in 1968-69 with the subdued self-examination of John Wesley Harding and, later his watershed country LP, Nashville Skyline. Asked if he had it to do all over again, Dylan summons his samurai-quick sardonicism: "Maybe I would have chosen not to have been born at all – bypass the whole thing."

Dylan regards himself as an artist rather than a musician ("Put my guitar playing next to Segovia's and I'm sure you could tell who was the musician"), whose role is to create, not preach. "I can move, and fake, know some of the tricks and it all applies artistically, not politically or philosophically."

He has a way of leaving reviewers as well as disciples in the dust. "I don't care what people expect of me," Dylan says defiantly. "Doesn't concern me. I'm doin' God's work. That's all I know." His classics like Blowin' in the Wind and The Times, They Are A-Changin' became anthems of the opposition, and the terrorist Weathermen took their name from his lyrics. But pressed about his influence, Dylan says only, "You'll have to ask them, those people who are involved in that state of panic where my works seen to take them. It's not for me. I wouldn't have time for that. I'm not an activist. I am not politically inclined. I'm for people, people who are suffering. I don't have any pull in the government."

The accusation that he copped out from the antiwar and other protest movements which his music catalyzed leaves him livid – especially criticism of his refusal to participate in Woodstock. "I didn't want to be part of that thing," he says. "I liked the town. I felt they exploited the shit out of that, goin' up there and gettin' 15 million people all in the same spot. That don't excite me. The flower generation – is that what it was? I wasn't into that at all. I just thought it was a lot of kids out and around wearing flowers in their hair takin' a lot of acid. I mean what can you think about that?"

"Today the youth are living in a certain amount of fantasy," he adds. "But in a lot of ways they become more disillusioned with life a lot earlier. It's a result of the overload, the mass overload which we are all gonna have to face. Don't forget when I started singin', marijuana was known only in certain circles – actors, musicians, dancers, poets, architects, people who were aware of what it could do for you. You never went down to make a phone call at a phone booth and had some cop hand you a joint. But now it's almost legal. The consciousness of the whole country has changed in a very short time."

He is impatient with fans who expected his own expression to stay the same. "Those people were stupid," he snaps. "They want to see you in the same suit. Upheaval distorts their lives. They refuse to be loose and make themselves flexible to situations. They forget they might have a different girl friend every night, that their lives change too." Certainly there were formative changes in Dylan's life: marriage in 1965 to fashion model Sarah Lowndes; the accident; the growth of his own family to five (including one child from Sarah's previous marriage).

Yet, professionally, Dylan points out, "A songwriter tries to grasp a certain moment, write it down, sing it for that moment and then keep that experience within himself, so he can be able to sing the song years later. He'll change, and he won't want to do that song. He'll go on." But Dylan is not speaking of himself. Of his own massive anthology of poems, he says, "I can communicate all of my songs. I might not remember all the lyrics," he laughs, "But there aren't any in there I can't identify with on some level."

"I write fast," he continues. "The inspiration doesn't last. Writing a song, it can drive you crazy. My head is so crammed full of things I tend to lose a lot of what I think are my best songs, and I don't carry around a tape recorder."

"Music," Dylan says, "is an outgrowth of family – and my family comes first." He moved them to the beach at Malibu from Woodstock several years ago, and has been intermittently rumored to be splitting from Sarah. He concedes, "I haven't been able to spend as much time with my wife as I would like to," but pinning Dylan down on personal matters is like collecting quicksilver. A sample colloquy:

Are you living with your wife?
BD: When I have to, when I need to. I'm living with my wife in the same world.
Do you...
BD: Do I know where she is most of the time? She doesn't have to answer to me.
So you don't live...
BD: She has to answer to herself.
Do you live under one roof?
BD: Right now things are changing in all our lives. We will always be together.
Where are you living now?
BD: I live in more than one place.
Can you be more specific?
BD: I don't want to give out my address.
Region?
BD: I live where I have to live, where my priorities are.
Right now, is that in New York City?
BD: Right now it is, and off and on since last spring.

"Traveling is in my blood," said Dylan, as he rehearsed for his latest tour. "There is a lot of gypsy in me. What I'm trying to do is set my standards, get that organized now. There is a voice inside us all that talks only to us. We have to be able to hear that voice. I'm through listening to other people tell me how to live my life." Did Bob Dylan, of all Americans, feel himself mortgaged to others? "I'm just doing now what I feel is right for me," he concludes. "For my own self."

Bob Dylan And Allen Ginsberg (From Barry Miles)

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, p. 421.

This exchange is to be found in Barry Miles' biography of Allen Ginsberg. It occurs the night of October 30, 1975, as the Rolling Thunder Review first lurched circus-like into being, after a concert and a few scenes filmed at Plymouth Rock.

AG: (To Dylan) Well, how do you like your party?

BD: It's your party, it's not mine.

AG: Well, is it giving you pleasure?

BD: Pleasure? Pleasure? No, not at all. I wouldn't want that, would you? That's too dangerous. I do what I do without thinking of pleasure.

AG: And when did you come to that state?

BD: Couple of years back. I mean, at one time I went out for a lot of pleasure, all I could get, because, see, there was a lot of pain before that. But I found that the more pleasure I got, subtly there was as much pain. And I began to notice a correspondence, the same frame. I began to experience and saw it was a balance. So now I do what I do without wanting pleasure. Or pain. Everything in moderation.

AG: Do you believe in God?

BD: God? You mean God? Yes, I do. I mean I know because where I am I get the contact with – it's a certain vibration – in the midst of – you know, I've been up the mountain, and – yes, I've been up the mountain and I had a choice. Should I come down? So I came down. God said, "Okay, you've been up on the mountain, now you go down. You're on your own, free. Check in later, but now you're on your own. Other business to do, so check back in sometime. Later."

Neil Hickey Interview, Malibu, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 191-196.

An interview with Neil Hickey during August 1976 in the Malibu, California area. This appeared in the September 11, 1976 issue of TV Guide Magazine (the most widely circulated magazine in the U.S.) as a cover story to promote the broadcast of Hard Rain.

"My being a Gemini explains a lot, I think," Bob Dylan is saying. "It forces me to extremes. I'm never really balanced in the middle. I go from one side to the other without staying in either place very long. I'm happy, sad, up, down, in, out, up in the sky and down in the depths of the earth. I can't tell you how Bob Dylan has lived his life. And it's far from over."

Outside the auto's air-conditioned shell, the Malibu coastline of California, baking in 95-degree heat, is slipping past. Dylan observes the bathers idly. "I'm not really very articulate. I save what I have to say for what I do."

What Bob Dylan does is write songs and perform them. Over the last 15 years, since he was 20, he has created a body of work unique among American artists: songs of such power and pertinence that they stand as a definition of the country and the man in those years: songs of rage over inhumanity; songs of inexpressible love, bitter vindictiveness and ribald joy; songs of spiritual longing, confusion and affirmation; songs in such extraordinary numbers that it often seemed miraculous that a largely self-educated youth, son of a Jewish furniture dealer from the Mesabi iron range of northern Minnesota, could have created them all: Blowin' In The Wind (an anthem of the 1960's civil-rights movement), Like A Rollin' Stone (one of the greatest rock songs ever written), Masters of War, With God on Our Side, A Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall, Don't Think Twice, It's All Right. He has been, in sum, the single biggest cultural influence on millions in his own generation. He has taken American music by the hand into uncharted regions.

Dylan turns from consideration of the bathers, smothers a grin, and says: "Somebody called me the Ed Sullivan of rock and roll." He laughs loudly at the thought. "I don't know what that means," he says, "but it sounds right."

Indeed, Dylan is both master and star of his own troupe, the so-called Rolling Thunder Revue, a company of strolling players who recently completed a 50-concert tour, one performance of which was taped at Colorado State University and will be visible on NBC Tuesday night (Sept. 14): Bob Dylan's first TV special, Hard Rain.

Rarely interviewed (the last full-fledged one was seven years ago) and rarely seen publicly or privately over long periods, Dylan has chosen to be one of the least accessible figures in the entertainment world. Born in Duluth, Minn., he grew up in nearby Hibbing and migrated early to New York's Greenwich Village, where he acquired a recording contract and became a major concert star.

After a motorcycle accident in Woodstock, N.Y., in July 1966, in which he almost died (indeed, rumors of his death were persistent), he remained in virtual seclusion for several years. In late 1969 he appeared at the Isle of Wight Festival of Music, his first paid concert in four years, and 200,000 people from Great Britain, the European continent, Canada and the U. S. showed up to hear him. Since then, he has toured the U. S. several times and issued a series of highly successful albums.

"I don't really talk about what I do," Bob Dylan is saying. "I just try to be poetically and musically straight. I think of myself as more than a musician, more than a poet. The real self is something other than that. Writing and performing is what I do in this life and in this country. But I could be happy being a blacksmith. I would still write and sing. I can't imagine not doing that. You do what you're geared for."

This year, along the Presidential campaign trail, Jimmy Carter has been quoting Dylan in many of his stump speeches, and even in his acceptance speech at the Democratic convention. "I don't know what to think about that. People have told me there was a man running for President and quoting me. I don't know if that's good or bad." He laughs broadly. "But he's just another guy running for President."

"I sometimes dream of running the country and putting all my friends in office." He grins at the thought. "That's the way it works now, anyway. I'd like to see Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin and a few of those other guys come back. If they did, I'd go out and vote. They knew what was happening."

Sports cars bearing upturned surfboards stream along Pacific Coast Highway in the noon sun. "Over there," says Dylan, pointing to a roadside café rimmed with tables and benches. "There's a place to stop." Striding toward the café in a bent-kneed lope, Dylan – wearing jeans, sandals, a thin, frayed, black leather jacket and white burnoose swathing longish brown curls, resembles a hip shepherd from some Biblical Brigadoon. Settled with a beer, he fixes pale blue eyes on his companion and reflects on the press and its treatment of him. "The press has always misrepresented me. They refuse to accept what I am and what I do."

"They always sensationalize and blow things up. I let them write whatever they want as long as I don't have to talk to them. They can see me any time, doing what I do. It's best to keep your mouth shut and do your work. It makes me feel better to write one song than talk to a thousand journalists."

He rarely watches television, he says, including news. "I'm not influenced by it. I don't feel that to live in this country you have to watch TV news." How does he absorb the world's information before processing it into the topical songs that are so substantial a part of his work? "You learn from talking to other people. You have to know how people feel, and you don't get that from television news." In 1963, when Dylan was a skyrocketing young folk balladeer, Ed Sullivan invited him to appear on his show and Dylan accepted. He'd sing a new composition of his own called Talkin' John Birch Society Blues, Dylan told Sullivan, a satire on the right-wing political group. Sullivan liked the song and scheduled it, but CBS censors refused to let Dylan perform it. Dylan refused to alter his choice of material and angrily chose not to appear on the show. Since then, he has consistently declined offers of network television, except for two brief appearances: one on ABC's old Johnny Cash Show, out of friendship for Cash; another on a recent PBS tribute to Columbia Records executive John Hammond, who gave him his first recording contract.

What does he read? He laughs. "You don't want to know that. It would sound stupid." Still, the on-screen credits for this week's TV special carry "thanks" to (among others) Arthur Rimbaud, the French symbolist, mystical poet; and to American novelist Herman Melville.

"Yes. Rimbaud has been a big influence on me. When I'm on the road and want to read something that makes sense to me, I go to a bookstore and read his words. Melville is somebody I can identify with because of how he looked at life. I also like Joseph Conrad a lot, and I've loved what I've read of James Joyce. Allen Ginsberg is always a great inspiration."

Dylan visited Israel in 1971, an event that triggered talk among Dylan experts that Judaic tradition was about to become an overt aspect of his art. "There was no great significance to that visit," he insists. But, he says: "I'm interested in the fact that Jews are Semites, like Babylonians, Hittites, Arabs, Syrians, Ethiopians. But a Jew is different because a lot of people hate Jews. There's something going on here that's hard to explain."

Many of Dylan's songs abound in religious mystical images: the album John Wesley Harding for example ("the first biblical rock album," he calls it, and the first to be released after his motorcycle accident), contains songs based almost entirely on stories and symbols from the Bible.

"There's a mystic in all of us," he says. "It's part of our nature. Some of us are shown more than others. Or maybe we're all shown the same things, but some make more use of it."

How does Bob Dylan imagine God? He laughs abruptly, and then says, "How come nobody ever asks Kris Kristofferson questions like that?" After a pause, he says, "I can see God in a daisy. I can see God at night in the wind and rain. I see creation just about everywhere. The highest form of song is prayer. King David's, Solomon's, the wailing of a coyote, the rumble of the earth. It must be wonderful to be God. There's so much going on out there that you can't get to it all. It would take longer than forever."

"You're talking to somebody who doesn't comprehend the values most people operate under. Greed and lust I can understand, but I can't understand the values of definition and confinement. Definition destroys. Besides, there's nothing definite in this world."

He sips at his beer and asks solicitously, "Want to go and sit on the beach for a while?" We return to the car and, Dylan driving, roll slowly northward.

Dylan reminisces about Greenwich Village in the early 1960's and its role as the spawning ground for the great "folk boom" that swept the Nation in those years. One reason he had traveled there was to track down Woody Guthrie, the folk poet and balladeer who was Dylan's idol. The village's cafes and coffeehouses were home to scores of guitar-playing folkniks whose music was filtering out to the marketplace. The enormously popular Newport Folk Festivals, ABC's overslick TV series Hootenanny and hundreds of record albums by folk-style performers all fed the public's new appetite for simple, homemade music. (The folk boom ended, effectively, when the Beatles took the U. S. by storm in 1964, and when Dylan himself turned to the use of electrified instruments at about the same time.)

"There was a lot of space to be born in then," Dylan is saying. "The media were onto other things. You could develop whatever creative interests you had without having to deal with categories and definitions. It lasted about three years. There's just as much going on now, but it's not centrally located like it was then."

A few skeptics have suggested that Dylan wrote his so-called protest songs in the 1960's because his finely attuned commercial antennae told him there was a market for them. He denies it. "I wrote them because that's what I was in the middle of. It swept me up. I felt Blowin' in the Wind. When Joan [Baez] and I sing it [as they do on the TV special], it's like an old folk song to me. It never occurs to me that I'm the person who wrote that."

"The bunch of us who came through that time probably have a better sense about today's music. A lot of people in the '70's don't know how all this music got here. They think Elton John appeared overnight. But the '50s' and '60's were a high-energy period."

And how did the Beatles fit into all this? Dylan wags his head earnestly. "America should put up statues to the Beatles. They helped give this country's pride back to it. They used all the music we'd been listening to, everything from Little Richard to the Everly Brothers. A lot of barriers broke down, but we didn't see it at the time because it happened too fast."

Dylan draws up at the curb, exits the car and walks to a 20-foot-high bluff over a near-vertical incline leading down to the beach. He scrambles down agilely and turns to catch cans of beer thrown after him. Settled in the sun, burnoose in place, peering out at the ocean, he resumes: "I consider myself in the same spirit with the Beatles and the Rolling Stones. That music has meaning for me. And Joan Baez means more to me than 100 of these singers around today. She's more powerful. That's what we're looking for. That's what we respond to. She always had it and always will, power for the species, not just for a select group."

What records does he play for his own amusement? "Personally, I like sound-effects records," he says, laughing. "Sometimes late at night, I get a mint julep and just sit there and listen to sound effects. I'm surprised more of them aren't on the charts." He is still laughing. "If I had my own label, that's what I'd record."

A teen-age girl approaches Dylan, Frisbee in hand, and asks if it belongs to him. "No," says Bob Dylan politely, and the girl nods and ambles off down the beach, obviously unaware that she has addressed (in the view of many) the generation's greatest rock-and-roll singer-writer. "I pass on crowded streets without being recognized. I don't want to be one of those big stars who can't go nowhere. Change that to anywhere. My mother might read this."

How is it, he is asked, that the Bob Dylan one encounters today, recumbent on this Malibu beach, seems so much more serene than the turbulent, often self-destructive, angry young man one recalls from the 1960's. (He's now the father of five, married to the former Sara Lowndes, living in the languor of Southern California rather than New York's bustle.) He squints toward the horizon. "Anger is often directed at oneself. It all depends on where you are in place and time. A person's body chemistry changes every seven years. No one on earth is the same now as he was seven years ago, or will be seven years from today. It doesn't take a whole lot of brains to know that if you don't grow you die. You have to burst out; you have to find the sunlight."

Where is he, musically, these days? "I play rag rock. It's a special brand of music that I play. I'll be writing some new songs soon, and then, look out! The music will be up to a whole new level." Does he write every day, and does it come easily? "Are you kidding? Almost anything else is easy except writing songs. The hardest part is when the inspiration dies along the way. Then you spend all your time trying to recapture it. I don't write every day. I'd like to but I can't. You're talking to a total misfit. Gershwin, Bacharach, those people, they've got song-writing down. I don't really care if I write." Pause. "I can say that now, but as soon as the light changes, it'll be the thing I care about most. When I'm through performing, I'll still be writing, probably for other people."

Any regrets? "The past doesn't exist. For me there's the next song, the next poem, the next performance." Any messages to the world? "I've been thinking about that. I'd like to extend my gratitude to my mother. I'd like to say hello to her if she's reading this." Ever see her? Pause. "Not as much as when I was a kid."

He plucks his beer can from the sand. "I hope there's not a snake in my beer," he says, apropos of not very much. Then he reclines languorously and watches the sun descend slowly to the Pacific horizon.

September-November 1977
Allen Ginsberg Interview, Malibu, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 843-857.

This interview was first published in issue 33 of the Telegraph (Summer 1989). Because of the special nature of its' "release", John Bauldie's introduction to the Telegraph article should be quoted;

> "When Allen Ginsberg, on his way home from Hawaii, called in to see Bob Dylan in California in September 1977, he found him hard at work putting the finishing touches to the editing of Renaldo & Clara. Intrigued and delighted by what Dylan was doing, Ginsberg promptly resolved to write a critical appreciation of the film. He asked for Dylan's co-operation, watched the film several times and then conducted a lengthy interview with him, in which the films aims, objectives and symbolism were discussed. However, at the interviews conclusion Dylan told Ginsberg that he thought he had "revealed too much" and demanded that Allen gave him the tape back. Then, between 27 October and 1 November, Ginsberg again tackled Dylan about the film. At the same time, Dylan was also interviewed by an otherwise unidentified figure named Pierre Cotrell. I have edited what follows from transcripts of those interviews. The Pierre Cotrell interview, the purpose of which is uncertain, took place in two parts on October 30. Later, in his preliminary editing work, Ginsberg mixed the Cotrell papers with his own and it is not always easy to identify the questioner. In generously giving permission for the interviews to be printed at last, Allen Ginsberg wishes it to be noted that he has had no hand in the preparation of the material for publication. Thanks are due to Allen for his generous agreement to this project, and to the equally magnanimous Miles, without whom the material might not have been preserved and who offered the papers to The Telegraph in the first place".

BOB DYLAN INTERVIEWED BY ALLEN GINSBERG (and Pierre Cotrell)

AG: What attracts you, as a poet to movies? What do you look for?

BD: To shift my consciousness somewhere – hopefully to a place that applies to my own personal experiences. I want to be entertained. If I see a movie that really moves me around I'm totally astounded, I'm wiped out. If film was around when da Vinci was operating, he'd have made film... I consider myself like da Vinci. Film is an art medium nowadays, but art didn't become Art till the 9th century; it existed 3,000 years before it was "Art". Before the 19th century people painted what they were paid to paint They weren't painting anything individual. Look at Bosch – there's no struggle. There's no struggle in any of Dali's paintings. Life is a struggle. If you want to do business and create work, then you struggle; if your struggle shows, then you make it. It's all about hard work, ploughsharing. Even van Gogh used what was there – he never painted what he would have liked to paint. He painted what was there to paint. We try to make something better out of what is real. If we want to be successful as an artist, we make it better, and give meaning to something meaningless.

AG: What's your idea of "Better" – your direction of "Better"?

BD: You can make something lasting. You wanna stop time, that's what you wanna do. You want to live forever, right Allen? Huh? In order to live forever you have to stop time. In order to stop time you have to exist in the moment, so strong as to stop time and prove your point. So that you have stopped time. And if you succeed in doing that, everyone who comes into contact with what you've done – whatever it might be, whether you've carved a statue or painted a painting – will catch some of that; they'll recognise that you have stopped time. That's a heroic feat! We have literally stopped time in this movie. Um hum. Regardless of what it's about – Renaldo and Clara, a guy selling a horse, a guy singing on a stage or fighting with a man, whatever it is -we have stopped time in this movie. We've grasped that time. And we are the only ones. I've never seen a film except one other that has stopped time.

AG: What film is that?

BD: Children Of Paradise.

AG: Yes, I thought that, sure!

BD: And this movie stops time in a way that no American movie ever has and I don't think will. What we've done is hold on to something which seemed to be escapable, and we captured it and made it real. You notice how everybody watches that movie and says, "Jesus, it just seems like yesterday; it seems like this happened just the other day."

AG: Do you want to be immortal? And why?

BD: I'd like my work to survive, yeah. Do you remember what Henry Miller wrote on that? "An artist inoculates the world with his disillusionment." It's not good enough to be an observer all the time. You have to know that you've stopped time. You think about nothing. You're totally absorbed in what you're doing. Any singer can do that. Some fake it. When it resolves itself, it's never resolved – you have to resolve it. To resolve is nothing more than letting go. Do you think Rembrandt ever finished a painting? I mention him 'cause he seems to be a perfectionist – I'm saying he let go. He has got many layers underneath. Rembrandt made mistakes too. Look how long it took to build the pyramid... When you wrote Kaddish, you had to let go.

HA: The poet has classically spoken in the First Person.

BD: I use I and me and you. It's personal. All the great movies stop time for you. You're standing in awe in front of the painting the painter has achieved. Through the art lies immortality. That makes him high, gives him everything he needs, just knowing he can do that. How many people can say that, that they've lived their life? The artist couldn't care less about who sees it. You see it, you know it, yeah. It falls off on the observer. I don't think you're a conscious artist, Allen. I don't think you know what you're doing. Anybody can be an unconscious artist. (Dylan notices the tape-recorder). Allen's got everything down!

LK: He thinks he's gonna keep the tape?

AG: What do you mean I'm not a conscious artist? Are you a conscious artist?

BD: Yes. Because I had a teacher that was a conscious artist and he drilled it into me to be a conscious artist, so I became a conscious artist.

AG: A painting teacher?

BD: Yeah.

AG: And what does a conscious artist practise?

BD: Actuality. You can't improve on Actuality. Let's say that this is what God gives you -he gives you a flower. (Dylan offers a flower). Let's see you improve it. (Ginsberg, confused, tries flower arrangement. Dylan says he means "improve" it by photographing it or singing it).

AG: What is Renaldo & Clara?

BD: Reality and Actuality transcending itself to the final degree of being more than the Actuality. Renaldo is the Actuality, and what the film is is transcending Renaldo to a higher Actuality and Clarity. Renaldo is everybody. Don't you identify with Renaldo? Renaldo is you, struggling within yourself, with the knowledge that you're locked within the chains of your own being. Actuality is what is.

AG: What is clarity?

BD: Anything that's clear.
AG: What's Renaldo's basic situation?
BD: He maintains, lying on his back. He's Everyman in the movie, and he survives. He is a man contemplating the future. His situation is he's pulling away from his past, but how does he get away from a past that doesn't exist? One of his characteristics is that he goes everywhere. At the opening of the movie he's in a mask you can see through – it's translucent. At the end, he's seen putting on face paint. Renaldo is a figure of duality. The Mexican man who traded the horse was the other side of Renaldo's duality. The man who puts the white paint on his face obviously becomes the Chorus of the movie. He has no name... The man on the floor at the end is the Dreamer. That's neither Renaldo nor the chorus nor the man on the stage – the stage is part of the Dream. A man who's walking around seeming to be alive has dreamt nothing. But the man on the floor, who's obviously dreaming, no one asks him anything – but the whole movie was his dream.
AG: What's the significance of the scene where the college kid, when asked, says he had no dream last night?;
BD: This whole movie is the dream that the college kid did not have. This whole movie has gone down and they haven't dreamt any of it. The movie that you never dreamt, that you wish you'da dreamt.
HA: The movie you haven't dreamt yet.
AG: Does Renaldo have a soul or is he a succession of disparate illusorily connected images, I like ordinary mind?
BD: At the beginning he's locked in, he's wearing a mask you can see through, he's not dreaming. Most likely he will become what he is dreaming about. Renaldo's dream almost killed him.
AG: It's at the end of the movie, when he's putting make-up on – "What you can dream about can happen".
BD: Exactly! You got it! Renaldo has faith in himself and his ability to dream, but the dream is sometimes so powerful it has the ability to wipe him out. Renaldo has no ordinary mind – he might not even have a soul. He may in actuality be Time itself, in his wildest moments
AG: What about Clara?
BD: Clara is the symbol of Freedom in this movie. She's what attracts Renaldo at the present. Renaldo lives in a tomb, his only way out is to dream. Renaldo first appears in a mask, then he's told in the cafe, "That's the way it is." Lenny Bruce said, "There isn't anything that should be, or what's supposed to be, there's only what is." All there is, is what is – we're not used to that in modern times. If you want to summarise the film, this is the way it is: "There are heroes in the seaweed".
AG: What holds Renaldo in this inescapable tomb?
BD: Compulsion. You know at the end of the movie he's about to or has broken out of that tomb... you feel that even though he may be under strenuous times, he might transcend them. Renaldo has no regard for man, woman or circumstance; it is only his dream which keeps him going.
AG: What compels Renaldo to Clara?
BD: Her abandonment. He's attracted to her freedom. I don't know if I should say superficial freedom. The entire world is in chains according to Clara – bondage to themselves, slaves to their ego. She helps Lafkesio get out of prison. Everyone is Lafkesio to her. Renaldo to her is the only person in the entire world who isn't Lafkesio – that's what attracts her to him.
AG: Why is Renaldo dreaming up all this confusion and disturbance and activity and music and masquerade?
BD: He's trying to break out of himself – not only that, he's trying to break out of himself by means of reason. He's not a logical minded person, but he does believe in the reason of his own soul and the ability of his own soul to reason, and that's why the masquerade is continuing... He's also trying to recognise his soul.

AG: What if there is no soul?

BD: (Dylan smiles) Then the whole journey has been in vain.

AG: What if it is in vain! What if that's the liberation?

BD: Then the journey that we're all on has been invalid... He's actually in the process of conquering his own soul.

AG: That could be interpreted variously.

BD: What can't be.

AG: Why end the movie with the black singer singing The Morning Of Your Life?

BD: Because it's in fact the morning of Renaldo's life. He has ceased to be Renaldo. From that moment on he will become what he wishes to become. No more will he answer to Renaldo. Renaldo wants to be free from his unforgettable past – in other words, he wants to forget his unforgettable past and something earthshaking must have happened to him.

AG: Is that earthshaking event in the film?

BD: It's represented by the whole series of events in the film.

AG: Who does Renaldo think he is?

BD: He thinks he's anybody but Renaldo. What time does he have to think? He dreams. He doesn't think. Thinking would make him a logical man. He's not thinking, he's only acting and dreaming.

AG: What comments does he make on himself in the film?

BD: He doesn't make any obvious comments. I haven't heard him make any. You don't see him as a man of obvious personality or characteristics, you see him as a man either driving or being driven – either you're hounding or being hounded. Do you remember him getting off the bus and running with the woman screaming in his head? He witnessed a lot.

AG: Did you make this movie as a representation of yourself, psychologically?

BD: Yes. Is this too intellectual?

AG: No. Mature men talk about their experiences. So these characters are all dream projections of Renaldo – all aspects of the mandala of his own ego?

BD: Yes. Exactly.

AG: Why does Renaldo think about himself so much?

BD: We don't even know if he's thinking. Renaldo doesn't even think at all. That's his aura. Renaldo might not even think. It may be that's what they're projecting on him.

AG: Everybody wants a piece of Renaldo, seeking his heart. Does he encourage it? Does he recognise and work with his creation consciously, with the characters, this appeal to their hearts and vice versa? is everyone trying to be his companion so he won't be alone or so they won't be alone?

BD: He anticipates it. They really don't care too much about Renaldo – whether he's alone or not – they're only thinking about themselves, which is exactly why Renaldo's heart is breaking. See, the thing is Renaldo comes closer to himself towards the end of the film – and there he is with Bob Dylan's wife, sitting on the train near the end of the film.

AG: What does that mean – that he's just going out with girls or something?

BD: Well, you've got to take into account the look on people's faces.

AG: What about the Woman in White?

BD: It's the ghost of Death – Death's ghost. Renaldo rids himself of death when she leaves, and he goes on, alive, with his greasepaint. He's becoming the hero of his own dream. The Woman in White, the Joan Baez persona, exists only in Renaldo's imagination in this movie. The Woman in White first appears at the end of the first half, after Renaldo restates his point that "It ain't me, it ain't me babe." That's when the god forces bring in the big cannon – The Supreme Ego, White Death – and try to make him fixate on that.

AG: When does she have the rose?

BD: Immediately. She's carrying her cunt in her hand.

AG: Her first words...

BD: You hear resonating in her head. "Once you start lying to yourself, you become an enemy to yourself." The issue at hand is lying to oneself- not just false advertising. Her first line is "Is Renaldo there?" She's come for Renaldo – he's in her mind's eye. She's traveling towards him. She won't leave when he's making it with Clara. She always seems to go, but she never goes. She must leave three or four times, but she's always back. You see her standing there.

AG: How can he get rid of her?

BD: Through transfiguration. She finally leaves, if you see the film, notice all that finally happens to her. For instance, this woman is the ghost of Clara's former self. She is this same woman who was traded for a horse. Now during that time Joan Baez and Dylan – the man in white paint and the past that's non-existable – sing a song, Never Let Me Go; and when they're looking at the newspaper, their minds are headed to the same point. Renaldo's closer then to being face to face with what he knows and loves and being able to discard it. Our ego becomes so strong sometimes that we believe it and begin to listen to it. The ego does cling to the past.

AG: Does every word in the movie count?

BD: Sometimes yes, sometimes no. There are many other elements in the movie, beyond the character of Renaldo. It's the movie of Renaldo, but there's so much action passing through his experience – like the figure of the Masked Tortilla, a guy of Heroic proportions capable of Heroic deeds: like in the nightclub where he's taking the stand for this man who can't articulate. It's an example of something he can do -a Heroic nature, a modern day Robin Hood. On the other hand, he's capable of great compassion and great self-pity – haunted by it but brave enough to break out of it. He's also a dreamer. The man who's singing in whiteface, he's a dreamer, and that is his sidekick, confidant, and he's also a dreamer. But his dream is not as big or tangled as Renaldo's. Basically, his dream is black and white, good and bad -opposites like that. Nothing is happening in the movie except one scene – the singer at the end, who's been singing since the beginning of the movie, is in another room, another time, another era, but in the same breath. It's his songs which are special, it isn't him.

AG: Isn't Renaldo like everyone, alone, flat on his back? Is this the Show of Alone? Is it a moment of Rest?

BD: It's the moment where Renaldo's beginning to understand himself and what's been happening to him. By the time he understands himself, the Woman in White has vanished completely – she no longer exists in his dream or in his reality. Now for further information you have to check the movie.

AG: The Woman in white represents Death exonerated? The Duality of... a stagnation?

BD: Renaldo's obsessed with his own freedom. Clara represents that obsession. Clara's coming out of church with a rope, to get somebody out of prison. To her, the whole world is in chains; everyone is in bondage. She herself is an example of supposedly attainable freedom, but is she really free? She's the one that's gonna stay in that room. Clara's becoming an enemy to herself. You notice she's gonna stay in that room. Renaldo, applying white greasepaint, is going to get out. Clara has no dream.

AG: How can he leave her if she symbolises freedom?

BD: She's a part of his past. In order for him to survive he must leave her behind.

AG: Is Clara free of her ego?

BD: Clara's free, but she can change – she says. We know she can change because we've seen her in different ideas of herself. Renaldo, you only see him dreaming. The man onstage clarifies Renaldo to himself. Maurice, the French Canadian, is a parallel real-life figure of an everyday man who's biding his time. He gives Renaldo a shoulder to cry on. Clara is summed up by the words of the poet as she's coming out of the church – the sorrows of the world are reflected in her eye: "With your eyes of no money/with your eyes of false China/with your eyes of Czechoslovakia/attacked by robots"*. Everyone in the movie happens to be a poet: Blue was talking about poets; the poet Father is Clara's father; Christ himself- the idea of Christ – might be Clara's brother; Clara might be Christ's sister. How many girls are mistaken for their mother? It's a common occurrence.

PC: How do you relate to Jesus?

BD: He's in the film, especially in reference to the myth of the complete man which exists inside of Renaldo's head. Renaldo's attempting to become a Complete man, to step aside of himself.

PC: Is Renaldo the brother of Christ?

BD: No, he's no relation to Christ, he only dreams of Christ. Christ is a mythological figure on which the movie hangs. There are many figures in this movie, but they go by so fast.

PC: There's the Father...

BD: The Father, the Idea of the Father, the Voice of the Father, the Necessity of the Father. The girlfriend's talking with Dylan – says her Father won't let her go off with him; her brother is played by David Mansfield, her son, the angelic boy, a musician, a parody of Christ, the Innocent Lamb. He might be Clara's brother.

PC: Parents and children never agree: does this Father agree with his son?

BD: There's no conflict. The Father cares very deeply for the Son, obviously. He wants to enlighten him into new experience, in the Bordello – the Diamond Hell.

AG: Diamond Hell?

BD: It's not a Bordello. They are part of the past which don't exist. We're all involved in our past, which didn't exist. My past doesn't exist any more than anyone else's. Why should I be different? Why should I have a past when nobody else has? The girls sitting in that room are a reflection of Nothing and Nobody. They're locked into Diamond Hell and are not giving pleasure to no-one.

PC: What's the relation of the Father to Renaldo?

BD: He's taught Renaldo what he needs to do to be a poet, but indirectly. Renaldo, of course, breaks away from the Father – he has no patience with the Father, although he respects him. The Father is actually a figure of indecision. The key line of the movie is "What comes is gone for ever every time."

PC: There are lots of ideas of death presented through the movie. Mexican Death – "We may not make it through the night", Kaddish, Kerouac's grave, the discussion about graves visited...

BD: The idea of death in the movie is really the idea of life, like in a photographic negative.

AG: Did the characters in the film pre-exist its making, or did Renaldo and Clara emerge during shooting or editing?

BD: No, no, they were there before the movie even began, otherwise there wouldn't have been a movie, they were there from the beginning.

AG: Why did Renaldo never really face the camera?

BD: You mean why are you seeing only certain sides of Renaldo? That's all he allows you to see. That's natural. He looks right at you through the mirror in the final scene. You see more dimension and depth in Renaldo than you do in most films you see. I think this film might be too simple in it's complexity.

HA: It's that you're pursuing, not that he's hiding. He becomes more accessible to you physically. He's masked at first, but the whiteface becomes more and more worn away as the film goes on.

BD: Renaldo's caught in a period of alienation from himself – caught up in the mess of not being able to compete with his other self, the man he is working to become in order to survive the hellhole he's found himself in. The man in whiteface is what Renaldo cannot become at the moment. At the Indian party that isn't Renaldo, that is the man in whiteface. He represents the compelling figure of authority which Renaldo is trying to become. Renaldo is trying to transcend himself, through the past and the present. He's trying to make it into the future, but he can't do that unless he leaves the unimaginable past behind.

AG: The Indians...

BD: That's all part of Renaldo's dream – all part of his experience. The Indian child, who's actually a medicine man, represents the Chief of Practical Purpose, the Chief of practically everything practical, the Chief of Practical Matters.

AG: Tell me about some of the other figures in the movie.

BD: The one pure figure in the movie is the girlfriend. One, she explains that she needs her fathers approval to go off with Dylan; two, she offers refuge to Renaldo; three, she tells the musician that there are no gigs left. As the film makes obvious, no one pays any attention to her; no one's going to let her stand in the way. She has all these basic principles of life – she's the figure of real Truth in the movie. She changes, in the movie, from Innocence to Beauty. She's talking to Renaldo – "Stand and bear yourself like the Cross and I'll receive you". She's actually the one person in the movie thinking more of Renaldo than of herself. She's never got a rose. Her cunt's never displayed.

AG: You've been talking about the rose.

BD: In the symbol of the rose we see the vagina traveling around. You see it a lot. You could trace it every time it comes up. Go to the movie and pick up all the signs where the rose goes. First on the table in front of the truck driver, who's almost contemplating it; then Clara in one of her former selves – a manifestation of her as desperation – picks up the rose and then travels with it. It was nobody's rose. Clara picked it up and went off alone to the train station, where she sees and lures Renaldo for the first time. We can also refer to the rose as "the dark opening". Scarlet constantly represents the vagina, the rose, the sweetness of it – always at the elusive Renaldo's right hand, that close. The man in the white face, the reasonable Renaldo, can always reach out to grab it.

AG: Hurricane has a role...

BD: He represents the Certainty of common sense. He's common sense being ostracised. There's something special about him – he's obviously a philosopher, a philosopher in chains, isn't he? We have this song Hurricane and we have this man. It comes back to the idea of getting out of prison. Clara will do what Renaldo will only dream about – get a man out of jail. Renaldo may be thinking about it, singing about it, but Clara does it, directly, in present time.

AG: The Old Woman?

BD: She's a gypsy, some kind of healer. An Influence – the Guilt Influence, the Influence of Institution, Marriage, Money, the concept of Money – it doesn't sneak through her fingers – she's a false prophet. She doesn't obviously heal the Father, but she makes the pretence of being a healer. She's very materialistic. She's got the rose wrapped up in her head, as does Scarlet. The movie deals with the transfiguration of the rose, if you can catch that going by.

AG: What quality do you see in David Blue?

BD: You know in the old Greek plays, the Chorus? David seems to know what's going on, but he's only existing in Renaldo's dream. He's the narrator who links the movie to generational history. I think, though I could be wrong, he's a figment of Renaldo's imagination that attempts to reconcile the past that never was. David Blue has no past. He represents neither past nor future. There'd be no David Blue if Renaldo didn't exist. There's the dream element. The movie is Renaldo's dream. The chorus is the reality of this movie. Take the chorus out of the movie and you'd have no movie. In the diner, the man who says if you lie to yourself you do bad time, this man lives on experience alone. That's what teaches him. He's a man who learns from experience.

AG: The Reporter?

BD: He doesn't play any role. He can't get out of the present at all; he can't get to the past or the future. He's locked in the present. He's one of the few people in the movie that survives in the present. The Girlfriend is the only other one.

AG: Bob Dylan?

BD: You don't know much about Bob Dylan, only one aspect of his personality, for obvious, almost comical reasons. His name is mentioned, he's part of the Rolling Thunder Revue – there's a disc jockey who told you: "Dylan, Baez, Neuwirth, Elliott". Bob Dylan is being used here as a famous name, so we don't have to hire Marlon Brando! But in this case we have the proof. Now he's very obviously a cowboy in a straw hat – someone else is playing Bob Dylan, with a slightly persuasive personality. His aim is to get what he deserves. He makes his intentions very clear. He's not trying to hide anything. You can hear the obvious sincerity in his voice -and also a desperate need to communicate.

AG: A belly dancer was belly dancing in the room Bob Dylan wanted to get into, and Ronson wouldn't let him pass. Why? Did he want to get into that room to watch, or to belly dance?

BD: Maybe he was going to make a connection with one of those ladies, or meet someone there at 10 o'clock. Bob Dylan exists in Renaldo's dream. Lafkesio, he's the one that doesn't. He trades his horse, unknowingly, for a woman who's at that moment existing inside a song that the singer in whiteface is singing. The man onstage happens to be Ramon, who's assaulted with a razor by Mrs Bob Dylan, who's been having an affair with another man. One man is accosting a woman who's having an affair, and her husband hasn't slept with her for three years, but he still knows who she's sleeping with. "Then I see the bloody face of Ramon." We don't even know who does Ramon in – Mrs Bob Dylan or Mr Bob Dylan. I suspect it was Mrs, but I'm speaking for the film buff here. In the context of the movie it doesn't matter. After all, if he hasn't slept with her in three years, the heck with him!

AG: So who's Ramon?

BD: Ramon actually is the memory of the dead lover, the memory of a bygone lover. Rightly or wrongly, he accuses her of taking on lovers.

AG: "The bloody face of Ramon"?

BD: The image of the dead lover. Ramon's on the stage quite a time. You see him in the mirror. He's the Hanged Man – someone who's suspended.

AG: Why does she run on him all of a sudden, when he says "I know who you've been flicking"?

BD: Why? Because he doesn't really give a shit. Mrs Dylan's song in the movie is need, need, need – that's all she does. She sings a song called New Sun Rising. She needs a new sun rising every morning and a new moon every night. She just needs a lot of that stuff.

AG: The character played by Helena Kallianiotes?

BD: Helena represents something – a true figure of mystery or purity? You never know. She really is the unattainable of the world, on the material plane – both attainable and unattainable. She never has a rose, never needs one. She's not gonna take no for an answer. She works in negatives. She doesn't want to be denied. She wants never to get where she's going. She's the lost companion, the companion you never see again.

AG: There are various other minor characters.

BD: Ungatz appears four times. He appear in the motorcycle shot on the street He seemingly doesn't know what's going on. He's a man who can be trusted with anything and it'll be safe. You won't be able to get a word out of him and any word you do get out of him you won't be able to comprehend anyway. So he will give you the time of day and that's all – as Renaldo does. He's a minor character. This is a textbook guide for when you're watching the film.

AG: What about Rodeo?

BD: He's an important character. He appears three times. He's perplexed. He exists in a vacuum. He has a preconceived idea of himself – a young man of tomorrow.

AG: Who's Jack Elliott?

BD: Longheno de Castro. He's with Renaldo at one time – with that man we can assume is Renaldo – driving a van. He used to be married. He had some kind of scene, he had his moment of blisshood somewhere down the line, and now what he's doing is hard to say – he's kinda locked up in time and space. It's hard to tell what kind of effect it's had on him, but he's looking for answers – looking for the answer that he's already had. He's a continual searcher, a rambler, a bit of a demagogue. He appears at the short scene at the end of the drive, with the woman behind the counter. He says, "I just got married". He's the man who announces to Lafkesio that he's traded his horse for a woman. He can't understand that, obviously – can't understand a man who trades a horse for a woman. The woman's a replica of Longheno de Castro's woman in marriage.

AG: Who's Bob Dylan?

BD: Nobody's Bob Dylan. Bobby Dylan's long gone. He's looking into the film editing viewer, asking "Who's this man? Who's that?"

AG: Bob Dylan had been long gone before you started the movie?

BD: Yes. Let's say that in real life Bob Dylan fixes his name on the public. He can retrieve that name at will. Anything else the public makes of it is it's business.

PC: Who are you in the movie?

BD: Me? Sitting here? I'm not in the movie. I was in the movie when you saw the movie - obviously I play Renaldo. I was Renaldo in the movie. Sometimes I just appeared on the set and happened to be Renaldo. You're concerned with Bob Dylan.

PC: But everybody will be concerned.

BD: I'm not concerned about everybody. Neither is Bob Dylan. Bobby Dylan made a movie. When you go to a movie, do you ask what does that person do in real life?

PC: Why did you need to make the movie?

BD: I don't know. If someone does something, you can't ask him why he did it. I like to go to the beach too. I can fix a flat. I think it's amazing somebody can go out and make a film that's never been made before. I've never made one before... not a big one,

PC: In Renaldo & Clara the relationship between Dream and Myth is so clouded that we confuse them.

BD: That's very true! I couldn't say it better. The disc jockey said, "If somebody told you Bob Dylan was coming to town, you probably wouldn't believe it." You notice that? "If somebody told you the truth, you probably wouldn't believe it." But the film is no puzzle, it's A-B-C-D, but the composition's like a game – the red flower, the hat, the red and blue themes. The interest is not in the literal plot but in the associational texture – colors, images, sounds.

AG: Pound's Cantos are constructed in this way – image to image.

BD: Every great work of art is when you think about it. Shakespeare. The point to get is that the film is connected by an untouchable connective link. I'm as good as anybody to tell you about it for starters. There are some things happening in this film which are literal. There are words for what this movie does, and then again there are no words. I was interested in reading Rona Barrett in the paper: "This movie will do for movies what his music has done to influence American music".

HA: The grammar of movies is broken open. Now you can make your own grammar.

BD: Individual filmmakers are hard to find these days. What filmmaker watches what other filmmakers make? Howard and I were on to this idea 12 years ago, so it's not like something which just happened yesterday – not just something we did in the basement the last two years.

HA: There are moments of classical musical comedy – some people are going to be crying, some laughing, some will shut up when the movie's shown.

BD: A crowded theatre's going to be dangerous. There's a moment in Just Like A Woman that's as close to Mr and Mrs Bob Dylan as the movie gets. The meaning of the film is the shedding of the skin, just like a snake. If a snake doesn't shed his skin, he's through – he decays. To survive, he must. The film doesn't have anything to do with decay; there's nothing decaying in this film. Basically, this film was made because the makers of it wanted to see it as a film, as an experience. I'll tell you what we artists do; we try to create what we must create, because it isn't there. When have you seen Renaldo & Clara before? If it had been done before, we wouldn't have had to do it.

AG: You chose to do it as improvisation...

BD: How else? Life itself is improvised. We don't live life as a scripted thing. Two boxers go into the ring and they improvise. You go make love with someone and you improvise. Go to sports car races, total improvisation. It's obvious everyone was acting in that movie for dear life. Nobody was thinking of time. People were told this, this, this – the rest of it is up to you, what you say in this scene is your business, but at the same time beyond that, the only directions you have are: you're trying to die in a year, or see your mother for the first time in 20 years. So far as instructions to actors go, less is more. And I made it clear to the cameraman, Paul, that it wasn't a documentary, and I told him not to shoot it like that.

AG: Would you call it a visionary documentary?

BD: No. "Documentary" pretends towards objective reality, this pretends to Truth.

AG: So how would you sum it all up?

BD: Renaldo's intense dream and his conflict with the present – that's all the movie's about. I'd like to make more movies after this. The next movie Renaldo might be working in a factory, who knows? The next one will be more socially identifiable with. The next one will be different. It will be about Corruption, about Pride, about Vanity, and about Obsession. I'm giving away a lot here. I don't want to give it away.

Ron Rosenbaum (Playboy) Interview, Burbank, California

PLAYBOY INTERVIEW: BOB DYLAN
A CANDID CONVERSATION WITH THE VISIONARY WHOSE SONGS CHANGED THE TIMES

It was in March 1966 that PLAYBOY published the first full-length interview with Bob Dylan. In the intervening years, he has talked to journalists only rarely, and, shortly before completing his first feature film, he agreed to talk with us. We asked writer Ron Rosenbaum, who grew up listening to Dylan songs, to check in with the elusive artist. His report:

"Call it a simple twist of fate, to use a Dylan line, but perhaps psychic twist of fate is more accurate. Because there was something of a turning point in our ten day series of conversations when we exchanged confidences about psychics.

"Until that point, things had not been proceeding easily. Dylan has seldom been forthcoming with any answers, particularly in interview situations and has long been notorious for questioning the questions rather than answering them, replying with put-ons and tall tales and surrounding his real feelings with mystery and circumlocution. We would go round in circles, sometimes fascinating metaphysical circles, and I'd got a sense of his intellect but little of his heart. He hadn't given anyone a major interview for many years, but after my initial excitement at being chosen to do this one, I began to wonder whether Dylan really wanted to do it.

"It's probably unnecessary to explain why getting answers from Bob Dylan has come to mean so much to many people. One has only to recall how Dylan, born Robert Zimmerman in 1941 in Duluth, Minnesota, burst upon the early Sixties folk-music scene with an abrasive voice and an explosive intensity, how he created songs such as 'Blowin' in the Wind' and 'The Times They Are A-Changin'' that became anthems of the civil rights and antiwar movements. How he and his music raced through the Sixties at breakneck speed, leaving his folk followers behind and the politicos mystified with his electrifying, elliptical explorations of uncharted states of mind How, in songs such as 'Mr. Tambourine Man,' 'Desolation Row,' 'Like a Rolling Stone' and 'Just Like a Woman,' he created emotional road maps for an entire generation. How, in the midst of increasingly frenzied rock-'n'-roll touring, Dylan continued to surround the details of his personal life with mystery and wise-guy obfuscation, mystery that deepened ominously after his near-fatal motorcycle accident in 1966. And how, after a long period of bucolic retreat devoted to fatherhood, family and country music, he suddenly returned to the stage with big nationwide tours in 1974 and, most recently, in 1976 with the all-star rock-'n'-roll ensemble known as The Rolling Thunder Revue. How his latest songs, particularly on the 'Blood on the Tracks' and 'Desire' albums, take us into new and often painful investigations of love and lust, and pain and loss, that suggest the emotional predicaments of the Seventies in a way few others can approach.

"The anthologies that chronicle all of that are littered with the bodies of interviewers he's put on, put down or put off. I was wondering if I were on my way to becoming another statistic when we hit upon the psychic connection.

"Late one afternoon, Dylan began telling me about Tamara Rand, an L.A. psychic reader he'd been seeing, because when the world falls on your head, he said, 'you need someone who can tell you how to crawl out, which way to take.' I presumed he was referring obliquely to the collapse of his 12-year marriage to Sara Dylan. (Since the child-custody battle was in progress as we talked, Dylan's lawyer refused to permit him to address that subject directly.) Dylan seemed concerned that I understand that Tamara was no con artist, that she had genuine psychic abilities. I assured him I could believe it because my sister, in addition to being a talented writer, has some remarkable psychic abilities and is in great demand in New York for her prescient readings. Dylan asked her name (it's Ruth) and when I told him, he looked impressed. 'I've heard of her,' he said. I think that made the difference, because after that exchange, Dylan became far more forthcoming with me. Some of the early difficulties of the interview might also be explained by the fact that Dylan .was physically and mentally drained from an intense three-month sprint to finish editing and dubbing 'Renaldo & Clara,' the movie he'd been writing, directing and co-editing for a full two years. He looked pale, smoked a lot of cigarettes and seemed fidgety. The final step in the moviemaking process-the sound mix-was moving slowly, largely because of his own nervous perfectionism.

"Most of our talks took place in a little shack of a dressing room outside dubbing stage five at the Burbank Studios. Frequently, we'd be interrupted as Dylan would have to run onto the dubbing stage and watch the hundredth run-through of one of the film's two dozen reels to see if his detailed instructions had been carried out. I particularly remember one occasion when I accompanied him onto the dubbing stage. Onscreen, Renaldo, played by Bob Dylan, and Clara, played by Sara Dylan (the movie was shot before the divorce—though not long before), are interrupted in the midst of connubial foolery by a knock at the door. In walks Joan Baez, dressed in white from head to toe, carrying a red rose. She says she's come for Renaldo. When Dylan, as Renaldo, sees who it is, his jaw drops. At the dubbing console, one of the sound men stopped the film at the jaw-drop frame and asked, 'You want me to get rid of that footstep noise in the background, Bob?' 'What footstep noise?' Dylan asked. 'When Joan comes in and we go to Renaldo, there's some hind of footstep noise in the background, maybe from outside the door.' 'Those aren't footsteps,' said Dylan. 'That's the beating of Renaldo's heart.' 'What makes you so sure?' the sound man asked teasingly. 'I know him pretty well,' Dylan said, 'I know him by heart.' 'You want it kept there, then?' 'I want it louder,' Dylan said. He turned to me. 'You ever read that thing by Poe, "The Tell-Tale Heart"?' I was surprised at how willing Dylan was to explain the details of his film; he'd never done that with his songs. But he's put two years and more than a piece of his heart into this five-hour epic and it seems clear that he wants to be taken seriously as a film maker with serious artistic ambitions.

"In the 'Proverbs of Hell,' William Blake (one of Dylan's favorite poets) wrote: 'The road of excess leads to the palace of wisdom.' Eleven years ago, Dylan's motorcycle skidded of that road and almost killed him. But unlike most Dionysian Sixties figures, Dylan survived. He may not have reached the palace of wisdom (and, indeed, the strange palace of marble and stone he has been building at Malibu seems, according to some reports, to be sliding into the sea). But despite his various sorrows, he does seem to be bursting with exhilaration and confidence that he can still create explosive art without having to die in the explosion."

RR: Exactly 12 years ago, we published a long interview with you in this magazine, and there's a lot to catch up on. But we'd like at least to try to start at the beginning. Besides being a singer, a poet and now a film maker, you've also been called a visionary. Do you recall any visionary experiences while you were growing up?

BD: I had some amazing projections when I was a kid, but not since then. And those visions have been strong enough to keep me going through today.

RR: What were those visions like?

BD: They were a feeling of wonder. I projected myself toward what I might personally, humanly do in terms of creating any kinds of reality. I was born in, grew up in a place so foreign that you had to be there to picture it.

RR: Are you talking about Hibbing, Minnesota?

BD: It was all in upper Minnesota.

RR: What was the quality of those visionary experiences?

BD: Well, in the winter, everything was still, nothing moved. Eight months of that. You can put it together. You can have some amazing hallucinogenic experiences doing nothing but looking out your window. There is also the summer, when it gets hot and sticky and the air is very metallic. There is a lot of Indian spirit. The earth there is unusual, filled with ore. So there is something happening that is hard to define. There is a magnetic attraction there. Maybe thousands and thousands of years ago, some planet bumped into the land there. There is a great spiritual quality throughout the Midwest. Very subtle, very strong, and that is where I grew up. New York was a dream.

RR: Why did you leave Minnesota?

BD: Well, there comes a time for all things to pass.

RR: More specifically, why the dream of New York?

BD: It was a dream of the cosmopolitan riches of the mind.

RR: Did you find them there?

BD: It was a great place for me to learn and to meet others who were on similar journeys.

RR: People like Allen Ginsberg, for instance?

BD: Not necessarily him. He was pretty established by the time I got there. But it was Ginsberg and Jack Kerouac who inspired me at first—and where I came from, there wasn't the sophisticated transportation you have now. To get to New York, you d have to go by thumb. Anyway, those were the old days when John Denver used to play sideman. Many people came out of that period of time. Actors, dancers, politicians, a lot of people were involved with that period of time.

RR: What period are you talking about?

BD: Real early Sixties.

RR: What made that time so special?

BD: I think it was the last go-round for people to gravitate to New York. People had gone to New York since the 1800s, I think. For me, it was pretty fantastic. I mean, it was like, there was a café—what was it called?—I forgot the name, but it was Aaron Burr's old livery stable. You know, just being in that area, that part of the world was enlightening.

RR: Why do you say it was the last go-round?

BD: I don't think it happened after that. I think it finished, New York died after that, late to middle Sixties.

RR: What killed it?

BD: Mass communication killed it. It turned into one big carnival side show. That is what I sensed and I got out of there when it was just starting to happen. The atmosphere changed from one of creativity and isolation to one where the attention would be turned more to the show. People were reading about themselves and believing it. I don't know when it happened. Sometime around Peter, Paul and Mary, when they got pretty big. It happened around the same time. For a long time, I was famous only in certain circles in New York, Philadelphia and Boston, and that was fine enough for me. I am an eyewitness to that time. I am one of the survivors of that period. You know as well as I do that a lot of people didn't make it. They didn't live to tell about it, anyway.

RR: Why do you think they didn't survive?

BD: People were still dealing with illusion and delusion at that time. The times really change and they don't change. There were different characters back then and there were things that were undeveloped that are fully developed now. But back then, there was space, space—well, there wasn't any pressure. There was all the time in the world to get it done. There wasn't any pressure, because no body knew about it. You know, I mean. music people were like a bunch of cotton pickers. They see you on the side of the road picking cotton, but nobody stops to give a shit. I mean, it wasn't that important. So Washington Square was a place where people you knew or met congregated every Sunday and it was like a world of music. You know the way New York is; I mean, there could be 20 different things happening in the same kitchen or in the same park; there could be 200 bands in one park in New York; there could be 15 jug bands, five bluegrass bands and an old crummy string band, 20 Irish confederate groups, a Southern mountain band, folk singers of all kinds and colors, singing John Henry work songs. There was bodies piled sky-high doing whatever they felt like doing. Bongo drums, conga drums, saxophone players. xylophone players, drummers of all nations and nationalities. Poets who would rant and rave from the statues. You know, those things don't happen anymore. But then that was what was happening. It was all street. Cafés would be open all night. It was a European thing that never really took off. It has never really been a part of this country That is what New York was like when I got there.

RR: And you think that mass communications, such as Time magazine's putting Joan Baez on the cover—

BD: Mass communication killed it all. Oversimplification. I don't know whose idea it was to do that, but soon after, the people moved away.

RR: Just to stay on the track, what first turned you on to folk singing? You actually started out in Minnesota playing the electric guitar with a rock group, didn't you?

BD: Yeah. The first thing that turned me on to folk singing was Odetta. I heard a record of hers in a record store, back when you could listen to records right there in the store. That was in '58 or something like that. Right then and there, I went out and traded my electric guitar and amplifier for an acoustical guitar, a flat-top Gibson.

RR: What was so special to you about that Odetta record?

BD: Just something vital and personal. I learned all the songs on that record. It was her first and the songs were—Mule Skinner, Jack of Diamonds, Water Boy, Buked and Scorned.

RR: When did you learn to play the guitar?

BD: I saved the money I had made working on my daddy's truck and bought a Silvertone guitar from Sears Roebuck. I was 12. I just bought a book of chords and began to play.

RR: What was the first song you wrote?

BD: The first song I wrote was a song to Brigitte Bardot.

RR: Do you remember how it went?

BD: I don't recall too much of it. It had only one chord. Well, it is all in the heart. Anyway, from Odetta, I went to Harry Belafonte, the Kingston Trio, little by little uncovering more as I went along. Finally, I was doing nothing but Carter Family and Jesse Fuller songs. Then later I got to Woody Guthrie, which opened up a whole new world at the time. I was still only 19 or 20.

I was pretty fanatical about what I wanted to do, so after learning about 200 of Woody's songs, I went to see him and I waited for the right moment to visit him in a hospital in Morristown, New Jersey. I took a bus from New York, sat with him and sang his songs. I kept visiting him a lot and got on friendly terms with him. From that point on, it gets a little foggy.

RR: Folk singing was considered pretty weird in those days, wasn't it?

BD: It definitely was. Sing Out was the only magazine you could read about those people. They were special people and you kept your distance from them.

RR: What do you mean?

BD: Well, they were the type of people you just observed and learned from, but you would never approach them. I never would, anyway. I remember being too shy. But it took me a long time to realize the New York crowd wasn't that different from the singers I'd seen in my own home town. They were right there, on the backroad circuit, people like the Stanley Brothers, playing for a few nights. If I had known then what I do now, I probably would have taken off when I was 12 and followed Bill Monroe. 'Cause I could have gotten to the same place.

RR: Would you have gotten there sooner?

BD: Probably would have saved me a lot of time and hassles.

RR: This comes under the category of setting the record straight: By the time you arrived in New York, you'd changed your name from Robert Zimmerman to Bob Dylan. Was it because of Dylan Thomas?

BD: No. I haven't read that much of Dylan Thomas. It's a common thing to change your name. It isn't that incredible. Many people do it. People change their town, change their country. New appearance, new mannerisms. Some people have many names. I wouldn't pick a name unless I thought I was that person. Sometimes you are held back by your name. Sometimes there are advantages to having a certain name. Names are labels so we can refer to one another. But deep inside us we don't have a name. We have no name. I just chose that name and it stuck.

RR: Do you know what Zimmerman means in German?

BD: My forebears were Russian. I don't know how they got a German name coming from Russia. Maybe they got their name coming off the boat or something. To make a big deal over somebody's name, you're liable to make a big deal about any little thing. But getting back to Dylan Thomas, it wasn't that I was inspired by reading some of his poetry and going "Aha!" and changing my name to Dylan. If I thought he was that great, I would have sung his poems, and could just as easily have changed my name to Thomas.

RR: Bob Thomas? It would have been a mistake.

BD: Well, that name changed me. I didn't sit around and think about it too much. That is who I felt I was.

RR: Do you deny being the enfant terrible in those days—do you deny the craziness of it all that has been portrayed?

BD: No, it's true. That's the way it was. But... can't stay in one place forever.

RR: Did the motorcycle accident you had in 1966 have anything to do with cooling you off, getting you to relax?

BD: Well, now you're jumping way ahead to another period of time... What was I doing? I don't know. It came time. Was it when I had the motorcycle accident? Well, I was straining pretty hard and couldn't have gone on living that way much longer. The fact that I made it through what I did is pretty miraculous. But, you know, sometimes you get too close to something and you got to get away from it to be able to see it. And something like that happened to me at the time.

RR: In a book you published during that period, Tarantula, you wrote an epitaph for yourself that begins: "Here lies Bob Dylan / murdered / from behind / by trembling flesh... ".

BD: Those were in my wild, unnatural moments. I'm glad those feelings passed.

RR: What were those days like?

BD: [Pause] I don't remember. [Long pause]

RR: There was a report in the press recently that you turned the Beatles on to grass for, the first time. According to the story, you gave Ringo Starr a toke at J.F.K. Airport and it was the first time for any of them. True?

BD: I'm surprised if Ringo said that. It don't sound like Ringo. I don't recall meeting him at J.F.K. Airport.

RR: OK. Who turned you on?

BD: Grass was everywhere in the clubs. It was always there in the jazz clubs and in the folk-music clubs. There was just grass and it was available to musicians in those days. And in coffeehouses way back in Minneapolis. That's where I first came into contact with it, I'm sure. I forget when or where, really.

RR: Why did the musicians like grass so much?

BD: Being a musician means—depending on how far you go—getting to the depths of where you are at. And most any musician would try anything to get to those depths, because playing music is an immediate thing—as opposed to putting paint on a canvas, which is a calculated thing. Your spirit flies when you are playing music. So, with music, you tend to look deeper and deeper inside yourself to find the music. That's why, I guess, grass was around those clubs. I know the whole scene has changed now; I mean, pot is almost a legal thing. But in the old days, it was just for a few people.

RR: Did psychedelics have a similar effect on you?

BD: No. Psychedelics never influenced me. I don't know, I think Timothy Leary had a lot to do with driving the last nails into the coffin of that New York scene we were talking about. When psychedelics happened, everything became irrelevant. Because that had nothing to do with making music or writing poems or trying to really find yourself in that day and age.

RR: But people thought they were doing just that—finding themselves.

BD: People were deluded into thinking they were something that they weren't: birds, airplanes, fire hydrants, whatever. People were walking around thinking they were stars.

RR: As far as your music was concerned, was there a moment when you made a conscious decision to work with an electric band?

BD: Well, it had to get there. It had to go that way for me. Because that's where I started and eventually it just got back to that. I couldn't go on being the lone folkie out there, you know, strumming Blowin' in the Wind for three hours every night. I hear my songs as part of the music, the musical background.

RR: When you hear your songs in your mind, it's not just you strumming alone, you mean?

BD: Well, no, it is to begin with. But then I always hear other instruments, how they should sound. The closest I ever got to the sound I hear in my mind was on individual bands in the Blonde on Blonde album. It's that thin, that wild mercury sound. It's metallic and bright gold, with whatever that conjures up. That's my particular sound. I haven't been able to succeed in getting it all the time. Mostly, I've been driving at a combination of guitar, harmonica and organ, but now I find myself going into territory that has more percussion in it and [pause] rhythms of the soul.

RR: Was that wild mercury sound in I Want You?

BD: Yeah, it was in I Want You. It was in a lot of that stuff. It was in the album before that, too.

RR: Highway 61 Revisited?

BD: Yeah. Also in Bringing It All Back Home. That's the sound I've always heard. Later on, the songs got more defined, but it didn't necessarily bring more power to them. The sound was whatever happened to be available at the time. I have to get back to the sound, to the sound that will bring it all through me.

RR: Can't you just reassemble the same musicians?

BD: Not really. People change, you know, they scatter in all directions. People's lives get complicated. They tend to have more distractions, so they can't focus on that fine, singular purpose.

RR: You're searching for people?

BD: No, not searching, the people are there. But I just haven't paid as much attention to it as I should have. I haven't felt comfortable in a studio since I worked with Tom Wilson. The next move for me is to have a permanent band. You know, usually I just record whatever's available at the time. That's my thing, you know, and it's—it's legitimate. I mean, I do it because I have to do it that way. I don't want to keep doing it, because I would like to get my life more in order. But until now, my recording sessions have tended to be last-minute affairs. I don't really use all the technical studio stuff. My songs are done live in the studio; they always have been and they always will be done that way. That's why they're alive. No matter what else you say about them, they are alive. You know, what Paul Simon does or Rod Stewart does or Crosby, Stills and Nash do—a record is not that monumental for me to make. It's just a record of songs.

RR: Getting back to your transition from folk to rock, the period when came out with Highway 61 must have been exciting.

BD: Those were exciting times. We were doing it before anybody knew we would—or could. We didn't know what it was going to turn out to be. Nobody thought of it as folk-rock at the time. There were some people involved in it like The Byrds, and I remember Sonny and Cher and the Turtles and the early Rascals. It began coming out on the radio. I mean, I had a couple of hits in a row. That was the most I ever had in a row—two. The top ten was filled with that kind of sound—the Beatles, too—and it was exciting, those days were exciting. It was the sound of the streets. It still is. I symbolically hear that sound wherever I am.

RR: You hear the sound of the street?

BD: That ethereal twilight light, you know. It's the sound of the street with the sunrays, the sun shining down at a particular time, on a particular type of building. A particular type of people walking on a particular type of street. It's an outdoor sound that drifts even into open windows that you can hear. The sound of bells and distant railroad trains and arguments in apartments and the clinking of silverware and knives and forks and beating with leather straps. It's all—it's all there. Just lack of a jackhammer, you know.

RR: You mean if a jackhammer were—

BD: Yeah, no jackhammer sounds, no airplane sounds. All pretty natural sounds. It's water, you know water trickling down a brook. It's light flowing through the—

RR: Late-afternoon light?

BD: No, usually it's the crack of dawn. Music filters out to me in the crack of dawn.

RR: The "jingle jangle morning"?

BD: Right.

RR: After being up all night?

BD: Sometimes. You get a little spacy when you've been up all night, so you don't really have the power to form it. But that's the sound I'm trying to get across. I'm not just up there re-creating old blues tunes or trying to invent some surrealistic rhapsody.

RR: It's the sound that you want.

BD: Yeah, it's the sound and the words. Words don't interfere with it. They— they— punctuate it. You know, they give it purpose. [Pause] And all the ideas for my songs, all the influences, all come out of that. All the influences, all the feelings, all the ideas come from that. I'm not doing it to see how good I can sound, or how perfect the melody can be, or how intricate the details can be woven or how perfectly written something can be. I don't care about those things.

RR: The sound is that compelling to you?

BD: Mmm-hnh.

RR: When did you first hear it, or feel it?

BD: I guess it started way back when I was growing up.

RR: Not in New York?

BD: Well, I took it to New York. I wasn't born in New York. I was given some direction there, but I took it, too. I don't think I could ever have done it in New York. I would have been too beaten down.

RR: It was formed by the sounds back in the ore country of Minnesota?

BD: Or the lack of sound. In the city, there is nowhere you can go where you don't hear sound. You are never alone. I don't think I could have done it there. Just the struggle of growing up would he immense and would really distort things if you wanted to be an artist. Well... maybe not. A lot of really creative people come out of New York. But I don't know anyone like myself. I meet a lot of people from New York that I get along with fine, and share the same ideas, but I got something different in my soul. Like a spirit. It's like being from the Smoky Mountains or the backwoods of Mississippi. It is going to make you a certain type of person if you stay 20 years in a place.

RR: With your love of the country, what made you leave Woodstock in 1969 and go back to the Village?

BD: It became stale and disillusioning. It got too crowded, with the wrong people throwing orders. And the old people were afraid to come out on the street. The rainbow faded.

RR: But the Village, New York City, wasn't the answer, either.

BD: The stimulation had vanished. Everybody was in a pretty down mood. It was over.

RR: Do you think that old scene you've talked about might be creeping back into New York?

BD: Well, I was there last summer. I didn't sense any of it. There are a lot of rock-'n'-roll clubs and jazz clubs and Puerto Rican poetry clubs, but as far as learning something new, learning to teach... New York is full of teachers, that is obvious, but it is pretty depressing now. To make it on the street, you just about have to beg.

RR: So now you're in California Is there any kind of scene that you can be part of?

BD: I'm only working out here most, or all, of the time, so I don't know what this town is really like. I like San Francisco. I find it full of tragedy and comedy. But if I want to go to a city in this country, I will still go to New York. There are cities all over the world to go to. I don't know, maybe I am just an old dog, so maybe I feel like I've been around so long I am looking for something new to do and it ain't there. I was looking for some space to create what I want to do. I am only interested in that these days. I don't care so much about hanging out.

RR: Do you feel older than when you sang, "I was so much older then, I'm younger than that now"?

BD: No, I don't feel old. I don't feel old at all. But I feel like there are certain things that don't attract me anymore that I used to succumb to very easily.

RR: Such as?

BD: Just the everyday vices.

RR: Do you think that you have managed to resist having to grow up or have you found a way of doing it that is different from conventional growing up?

BD: I don't really think in terms of growing up or not growing up. I think in terms of being able to fulfill yourself. Don't forget, you see, I've been doing what I've been doing since I was very small, so I have never known anything else. I have never had to quit my job to do this. This is all that I have ever done in my life. So I don't think in terms of economics or status or what people think of me one way or the other.

RR: Would you say you still have a rebellious, or punk, quality toward the rest of the world?

BD: Punk quality?

RR: Well, you're still wearing dark sunglasses, right?

BD: Yeah.

RR: Is that so people won't see your eyes?

BD: Actually, it's just habit-forming after a while, I still do wear dark sunglasses. There is no profound reason for it, I guess. Some kind of insecurity, I don't know: I like dark sunglasses. Have I had these on through every interview session?

RR: Yes. We haven't seen your eyes yet.

BD: Well, Monday for sure. [The day that PLAYBOY photos were to be taken for the opening page]

RR: Aside from the dark glasses, is it something in the punk quality of Elvis or James Dean that makes you dress a certain way or act a certain way?

BD: No. It's from the early Sixties. Elvis was there. He was there when there wasn't anybody there. He was Elvis and everybody knows about what Elvis did. He did it to me just like he did it to everybody else. Elvis was in that certain age group and I followed him right from Blue Moon in Kentucky. And there were others; I admired Buddy Holly a lot. But Elvis was never really a punk. And neither was James Dean a punk.

RR: What quality did Dean represent?

BD: He let his heart do the talking. That was his one badge. He was effective for people of that age, but as you grow older, you have different experiences and you tend to identify with artists who had different meanings for you.

RR: Let's talk some more about your influences. What musicians do you listen to today.

BD: I still listen to the same old black-and-blue blues. Tommy McClennan, Lightnin' Hopkins, the Carter Family, the early Carlyles. I listen to Big Maceo, Robert Johnson. Once in a while, I listen to Woody Guthrie again. Among the more recent people, Fred McDowell, Gary Stewart. I like Memphis Minnie a whole lot. Blind Willie McTell. I like bluegrass music. I listen to foreign music, too. I like Middle Eastern music a whole lot.

RR: Such as?

BD: Om Kalthoum.

RR: Who is that?

BD: She was a great Egyptian singer. I first heard of her when I was in Jerusalem.

RR: She was an Egyptian singer who was popular in Jerusalem?

BD: I think she's popular all over the Middle East. In Israel, too. She does mostly love and prayer-type songs, with violin and-drum accompaniment. Her father chanted those prayers and I guess she was so good when she tried singing behind his back that he allowed her to sing professionally, and she's dead now but not forgotten. She's great. She really is. Really great.

RR: Any popular stuff?

BD: Well, Nana Maskouri.

RR: How about the Beatles?

BD: I've always liked the way George Harrison plays guitar—restrained and good. As for Lennon, well, I was encouraged by his book [In His Own Write]. Or the publishers were encouraged, because they asked me to write a book and that's how Tarantula came about. John has taken poetics pretty far in popular music. A lot of his work is overlooked, but if you examine it, you'll find key expressions that have never been said before to push across his point of view. Things that are symbolic of some inner reality and probably will never be said again.

RR: Do you listen to your own stuff?

BD: Not so much.

RR: What about your literary influences? You've mentioned Kerouac and Ginsberg. Whom do you read now?

BD: Rilke. Chekhov. Chekhov is my favorite writer. I like Henry Miller. I think he's the greatest American writer.

RR: Did you meet Miller?

BD: Yeah, I met him. Years ago. Played ping-pony with him.

RR: Did you read Catcher in the Rye as a kid?

BD: I must have, you know. Yeah, I think so.

RR: Did you identify with Holden Caulfield?

BD: Uh,. what was his story?

RR: He was a lonely kid in prep school who ran away and decided that everyone else was phony and that he was sensitive.

BD: I must have identified with him.

RR: We've been talking about the arts, and as we've been speaking, you've been in the midst of editing your first film, Renaldo & Clara. What do you feel you can do in films that you can't do in songs?

BD: I can take songs up to a higher power. The movie to me is more a painting than music. It is a painting. It's a painting coming alive off a wall. That's why we're making it. Painters can contain their artistic turmoil; in another age, moviemakers would most likely he painters.

RR: Although Renaldo & Clara is the first movie you've produced, directed and acted in, there was a documentary made in 1966 that marked your first appearance in a film—Dont Look Back. What did you think of it.

BD: Dont Look Back was... somebody else's movie. It was a deal worked out with a film company, but I didn't really play any part in it. When I saw it in a moviehouse, I was shocked at what had been done. I didn't find out until later that the camera had been on me all the time. That movie was done by a mar. who took it all out of context It was documented from his personal point of view. The movie was dishonest, it was a propaganda movie. I don't think it was accurate at all in terms of showing my formative years. It showed only one side. He made it seem like I wasn't doing anything but living in hotel rooms, playing the typewriter and holding press conferences for journalists. All that is true, you know. Throwing some bottles, there's something about it in the movie. Joan Baez is in it. But it's one-sided. Let's not lean on it too hard. It just wasn't representative of what was happening in the Sixties.

RR: Don't you feel it captured the frenzy of your tour, even though it focused on you in terms of stardom?

BD: I wasn't really a star in those days, any more than I'm a star these days. I was very obviously confused then as to what my purpose was. It was pretty early, you know. The Times They Are A-Changin' was on the English charts then, so it had to be pretty early.

RR: And you didn't really know what you were doing then?

BD: Well, look what I did after that. Look what I did after that. I didn't really start to develop until after that. I mean, I did, but I didn't. Dont Look Back was a little too premature. I should have been left alone at that stage.

RR: You were involved in another movie around that period—1966—that was never released, called Eat the Document. How did that happen?

BD: That started as a television special. I wasn't the maker of that film, either. I was the—I was the victim. They had already shot film, but at that time, of course, I did—I had a—if I hadn't gotten into that motorcycle accident, they would have broadcast it, and that would have been that. But I was sort of—I was taken out of it, you know, and—I think it was the fall of that year. I had a little more time to, you know, concentrate on what was happening to me and what had happened. Anyway, what had happened was that they had made another Dont Look Back, only this time it was for television. I had nothing better to do than to see the film. All of it, including unused footage. And it was obvious from looking at the film that it was garbage. It was miles and miles of garbage. That was my introduction to film. My film concept was all formed in those early days when I was looking at that footage.

RR: From looking at those miles of garbage, you got your concept of film?

BD: Yeah, it was mostly rejected footage, which I found beauty in. Which probably tells you more—that I see beauty where other people don't.

RR: That reminds us of a poem you wrote for the jacket of an early Joan Baez album, in which you claimed that you always thought something had to be ugly before you found it beautiful. And at some point in the poem, you described listening to Joan sing and suddenly deciding that beauty didn't have to start out by being ugly

BD: I was very hung up on Joan at the time [Pause] I think I was just trying to tell myself I wasn't hung up on her.

RR: OK. Would you talk some more about the film concept you got from the rejected footage?

BD: Well, up until that time, they had been concerned with the linear story line. It was on one plane and in one dimension only. And the more I looked at the film, the more I realized that you could get more onto film than just one train of thought My mind works that way, anyway. We tend to work on different levels. So I was seeing a lot of those levels in the footage. But technically, I didn't know how to do what my mind was telling me could be done.

RR: What did you feel could be done?

BD: Well, well, now, film is a series of actions and reactions, you know. And it's trickery. You're playing with illusion. What seems to be a simple affair is actually quite contrived. And the stronger your point of view is, the stronger your film will be.

RR: Would you elaborate?

BD: You're trying to get a message through. So there are many ways to deliver that message. Let's say you have a message: "White is white." Bergman would say, "White is white" in the space of an hour—or what seems to be an hour. Bunuel might say, "White is black, and black is white, but white is really white." And it's all really the same message.

RR: And how would Dylan say it?

BD: Dylan would probably not even say it. [Laughs] He would—he'd assume you'd know that. [Laughs]

RR: You wriggled out of that one.

BD: I'd say people will always believe in something if they feel it to be true. Just knowing it's true is not enough. If you feel in your gut that it's true, well, then, you can be pretty much assured that it's true.

RR: So that a film made by someone who feels in his guts that white is white will give the feeling to the audience that white is white without having to say it.

BD: Yes. Exactly.

RR: Let's talk about the message of Renaldo & Clara. It appears to us to be a personal yet fictional film in which you, Joan Baez and your former wife, Sara, play leading roles. You play Renaldo, Baez plays a "woman in white" and Sara plays Clara. There is also a character in the film called Bob Dylan played by someone else. It is composed of footage from your Rolling Thunder Revue tour and fictional scenes performed by all of you as actors. Would you tell us basically what the movie's about?

BD: It's about the essence of man being alienated from himself and how, in order to free himself, to be reborn, he has to go outside himself. You can almost say that he dies in order to look at time and by strength of will can return to the same body.

RR: He can return by strength of will to the same body... and to Clara?

BD: Clara represents to Renaldo everything in the material world he's ever wanted. Renaldo's needs are few. He doesn't know it, though, at that particular time.

RR: What are his needs?

BD: A good guitar and a dark street.

RR: The guitar because he loves music, but why the dark street?

BD: Mostly because he needs to hide.

RR: From whom?

BD: From the demon within. [Pause] But what we all know is that you can't hide on a dark street from the demon within. And there's our movie.

RR: Renaldo finds that out in the film?

BD: He tries to escape from the demon within, but he discovers that the demon is, in fact, a mirrored reflection of Renaldo himself.

RR: OK. Given the personalities involved, how do you define the relation ship between you, your personal life, and the film?

BD: No different from Hitchcock making a movie. I am the overseer.

RR: Overseeing various versions of yourself?

BD: Well, certain truths I know. Not necessarily myself but a certain accumulation of experience that has become real to me and a knowledge that I acquired on the road.

RR: And what are those truths?

BD: One is that if you try to be anyone but yourself, you will fail; if you are not true to your own heart, you will fail. Then again, there's no success like failure.

RR: And failure's no success at all.

BD: Oh, well, we're not looking to succeed. Just by our being and acting alive, we succeed. You fail only when you let death creep in and take over a part of your life that should be alive.

RR: How does death creep in?

BD: Death don't come knocking at the door. It's there in the morning when you wake up.

RR: How is it there?

BD: Did you ever clip your fingernails, cut your hair? Then you experience death.

RR: Look, in the film, Joan Baez turns to you at one point and says, "You never give any straight answers." Do you?

BD: She is confronting Renaldo.

RR: Evasiveness isn't only in the mind; it can also come out in an interview.

BD: There are no simple answers to these questions...

RR: Aren't you teasing the audience when you have scenes played by Baez and Sara, real people in your life, and then expect the viewers to set aside their preconceptions as to their relationship to you?

BD: No, no. They shouldn't even think they know anyone in this film. It's all in the context of Renaldo and Clara and there's no reason to get hung up on who's who in the movie.

RR: What about scenes such as the one in which Baez asks you, "What if we had gotten married back then?"

BD: Seems pretty real, don't it?

RR: Yes.

BD: Seems pretty real. Just like in a Bergman movie, those things seem real. There's a lot of spontaneity that goes on. Usually, the people in his films know each other, so they can interrelate. There's life and breath in every frame because everyone knew each other.

RR: All right, another question: In the movie, Ronnie Hawkins, a 300-pound Canadian rock singer, goes by the name of Bob Dylan. So is there a real Bob Dylan?

BD: In the movie?

RR: Yes.

BD: In the movie, no. He doesn't even appear in the movie. His voice is there, his songs are used, but Bob's not in the movie. It would be silly. Did you ever see a Picasso painting with Picasso in the picture? You only see his work. Now, I'm not interested in putting a picture of myself on the screen, because that's not going to do anybody any good, including me.

RR: Then why use the name Bob Dylan at all in the movie?

BD: In order to legitimize this film. We confronted it head on: The persona of Bob Dylan is in the movie so we could get rid of it. There should no longer be any mystery as to who or what he is—he's there, speaking in all kinds of tongues, and there's even someone else claiming to be him, so he's covered.

This movie is obvious, you know. Nobody's hiding anything. It's all right there. The rabbits are falling out of the hat before the movie begins.

RR: Do you really feel it's an accessible movie?

BD: Oh, perfectly. Very open movie.

RR: Even though Mr. Bob Dylan and Mrs. Bob Dylan are played by different people...

BD: Oh, yeah.

RR: And you don't know for sure which one he is?

BD: Sure. We could make a movie and you could be Bob Dylan. It wouldn't matter.

RR: But if there are two Bob Dylans in the film and Renaldo is always changing...

BD: Well, it could be worse. It could be three or four. Basically, it's a simple movie.

RR: How did you decide to make it?

BD: As I said, I had the idea for doing my own film back in '66. And I buried it until '76. My lawyer used to tell me there was a future in movies. So I said, "What kind of future?" He said, "Well, if you can come up with a script, an outline and get money from a big distributor." But I knew I couldn't work that way. I can't betray my vision on a little piece of paper in hopes of getting some money from somebody. In the final analysis, it turned out that I had to make the movie all by myself, with people who would work with me, who trusted me. I went on the road in '76 to make the money for this movie. My last two tours were to raise the money for it.

RR: How much of your money are you risking?

BD: I'd rather not say. It is quite a bit, but I didn't go into the bank. The budget was like $600,000, but it went over that.

RR: Did you get pleasure out of the project?

BD: I feel it's a story that means a great deal to me, and I got to do what I always wanted to do—make a movie. When something like that happens, it's like stopping time, and you can make people live into that moment. Not many things can do that in your daily life. You can be distracted by many things. But the main point is to make it meaningful to someone.

Take Shane, for example. That moved me. On the Waterfront moved me. So when I go to see a film, I expect to be moved. I don't want to go see a movie just to kill time, or to have it just show me something I'm not aware of. I want to be moved, because that's what art is supposed to do, according to all the great theologians. Art is supposed to take you out of your chair. It's supposed to move you from one space to another.

Renaldo & Clara* is not meant to put a strain on you. It's a movie to be enjoyed as a movie. I know nothing about film, I'm not a film maker. On the other hand, I do consider myself a film maker because I made this film: So I don't know... If it doesn't move you, then it's a grand, grand failure.

RR: Is there any way of avoiding the fact that people will undoubtedly make the assumption we've been discussing—that your own myths will subvert what you say is the purpose of the movie?

BD: Don't forget—I'm not a myth to myself. Only to others. If others didn't create that myth of Bob Dylan, there would be no myth of Bob Dylan in the movie.

RR: Would there even be a movie? Or the money to finance it?

BD: I doubt it.

RR: So aren't you caught in a bind?

BD: You mean by talking out of both sides of my mouth?

RR: Well, you've made a film that you'd like people to take on its own merits, with characters you'd like them to accept; yet the main reason people will see it is that they'll want to know about Bob Dylan and Joan Baez and Sara Dylan...

BD: I would hope so, yeah.

RR: How do you get around that?

BD: What's there to get around?

RR: Your stated purpose that people shouldn't take their preconceptions to the film.

BD: Well, they shouldn't. No, I don't know how to get around that.

RR: Could it be that the movie is really intended to take on the gossip about you head on?

BD: There's truth to that. It does take it on in the sense that gossip is information. Gossip is a weapon traveling through the air. It whispers. But it does have a tremendous influence. It's one of the driving forces. How did we start talking about gossip?

RR: Well—

BD: OK, gossip. What we're doing now is gossiping.

RR: In what sense?

BD: We would have more in common if we went out fishing and said nothing. It would be a more valuable experience, anyway, than sitting around and talking about this movie, or life and death, or gossip, or anything we've been talking about. I personally believe that. That's why I don't sit around and talk too much.

RR: All right, since there aren't any fishing rods around, let's continue gossiping for a while longer.

BD: OK.

RR: One last try: If there's anything to the interpretation that this movie was made in the spirit of "All right, if all you people out there want to talk about Dylan breaking up with his wife, about his having an affair with Joan Baez, I'll just put those people into my film and rub people's noses in the gossip, because only I know the truth?"

BD: It's not entirely true, because that's not what the movie is about. I'm not sure how much of Bob Dylan and Joan Baez concern anybody. To me, it isn't important. It's old news to me, so I don't think it's of much interest to anybody. If it is, fine. But I don't think it's a relevant issue. The movie doesn't deal with anything current. This is two years ago. I'm smart enough to know I shouldn't deal with any current subject on an emotional level, because usually it won't last. You need experience to write, or to sing or to act. You don't just wake up and say you're going to do it. This movie is taking experience and turning it into something else. It's not a gossipy movie.

RR: We began this discussion of your movie by comparing film makers to painters. Were you as interested in painting as in, say, rock music when you were growing up?

BD: Yeah, I've always painted. I've always held on to that one way or another.

RR: Do you feel you use colors in the same way you use notes or chords?

BD: Oh, yeah. There's much information you could get on the meaning of colors. Every color has a certain mood and feeling. For instance, red is a very vital color. There're a lot of reds in this movie, a lot of blues. A lot of cobalt blue.

RR: Why cobalt blue?

BD: It's the color of dissension.

RR: Did you study painting?

BD: A lot of the ideas I have were influenced by an old man who had definite ideas on life and the universe and nature—all that matters.

RR: Who was he?

BD: Just an old man. His name wouldn't mean anything to you. He came to this country from Russia in the Twenties, started out as a boxer and ended up painting portraits of women.

RR: You don't want to mention his name, just to give him a plug?

BD: His first name was Norman. Every time I mention somebody's name, it's like they get a tremendous amount of distraction and irrelevancy in their lives. For instance, there's this lady in L.A. I respect a lot who reads palms. Her name's Tamara Rand. She's for real, she's not a gypsy fortuneteller. But she's accurate! She'll take a look at your hand and tell you things you feel but don't really understand about where you're heading, what the future looks like. She's a surprisingly hopeful person.

RR: Are you sure you want to know if there's bad news in your future?

BD: Well, sometimes when the world falls on your head, you know there are ways to get out, but you want to know which way. Usually, there's someone who can tell you how to crawl out, which way to take.

RR: Getting back to colors and chords, are there particular musical keys that have personalities or moods the way colors do for you?

BD: Yeah. B major and B-flat major.

RR: How would you describe them?

BD: [Pause] Each one is hard to define. Assume the characteristic that is true of both of them and you'll find you're not sure whether you're speaking to them or to their echo.

RR: What does a major key generally conjure up for you?

BD: I think any major key deals with romance.

RR: And the minor keys?

BD: The supernatural.

RR: What about other specific keys?

BD: I find C major to be the key of strength, but also the key of regret. E major is the key of confidence. A-flat major is the key of renunciation.

RR: Since we're back on the subject of music, what new songs have you planned?

BD: I have new songs now that are unlike anything I've ever written.

RR: Really?

BD: Yes.

RR: What are they like?

BD: Well, you'll see. I mean, unlike anything I've ever done. You couldn't even say that Blood on the Tracks or Desire have led up to this stuff. I mean, it's that far gone, it's that far out there. I'd rather not talk more about them until they're out.

RR: When the character Bob Dylan in your movie speaks the words "Rock 'n' roll is the answer," what does he mean?

BD: He's speaking of the sound and the rhythm. The drums and the rhythm are the answer. Get into the rhythm of it and you will lose yourself; you will forget about the brutality of it all. Then you will lose your identity. That's what he's saying.

RR: Does that happen to you, to the real Bob Dylan?

BD: Well, that's easy. When you're playing music and it's going well, you do lose your identity, you become totally subservient to the music you're doing in your very being.

RR: Do you feel possessed?

BD: It's dangerous, because its effect is that you believe that you can transcend and cope with anything. That it is the real life, that you've struck at the heart of life itself and you are on top of your dream. And there's no down. But later on, backstage, you have a different point of view.

RR: When you're onstage, do you feel the illusion that death can't get you?

BD: Death can't get you at all. Death's not here to get anybody. It's the appearance of the Devil, and the Devil is a coward, so knowledge will overcome that.

RR: What do you mean?

BD: The Devil is everything false, the Devil will go as deep as you let the Devil go. You can leave yourself open to that. If you understand what that whole scene is about, you can easily step aside. But if you want the confrontation to begin with, well, there's plenty of it. But then again, if you believe you have a purpose and a mission, and not much time to carry it out, you don't bother about those things.

RR: Do you think you have a purpose and a mission?

BD: Obviously.

RR: What is it?

BD: Henry Miller said it: The role of an artist is to inoculate the world with disillusionment.

RR: To create rock music, you used to have to be against the system, a desperado. Is settling down an enemy of rock?

BD: No. You can be a priest and be in rock 'n' roll. Being a rock-'n'-roll singer is no different from being a house painter. You climb up as high as you want to. You're asking me, is rock, is the lifestyle of rock 'n' roll at odds with the lifestyle of society in general?

RR: Yes. Do you need to be in some way outside society, or in some way an outlaw, some way a—

BD No. Rock 'n' roll forms its own society. It's a world of its own. The same way the sports world is.

RR: But didn't you feel that it was valuable to bum around and all that sort of thing?

BD: Yes. But not necessarily, because you can bum around and wind up being a lawyer, you know. There isn't anything definite. Or any blueprint to it.

RR: So future rock stars could just as easily go to law school?

BD: For some people, it might be fine. But, getting back to that again, you have to have belief. You must have a purpose. You must believe that you-can disappear through walls. Without that belief, you're not going to become a very good rock singer, or pop singer, or folk-rock singer, or you're not going to become a very good lawyer. Or a doctor. You must know why you're doing what you're doing.

RR: Why are you doing what you're doing?

BD: [Pause] Because I don't know anything else to do. I'm good at it.

RR: How would you describe "it"?

BD: I'm an artist. I try to create art.

RR: How do you feel about your songs when you perform them years later? Do you feel your art has endured?

BD: How many singers feel the same way ten years later that they felt when they wrote tile song? Wait till it gets to be 20 years, you know? Now, there's a certain amount of act that you can put on, you know, you can get through on it, but there's got to be something to it that is real—not just for the moment. And a lot of my songs don't work. I wrote a lot of them just by gut—because my gut told me to write them—and they usually don't work so good as the years go on. A lot of them do work. With those, there's some truth about every one of them. And I don't think I'd be singing if I weren't writing, you know. I would have no reason or purpose to be out there singing. I mean, I don't consider myself... the life of the party. [Laughs]

RR: You've given new life to some songs in recent performances, such as I Pity the Poor Immigrant in the Rolling Thunder tour.

BD: Oh, yes. I've given new life to a lot of them. Because I believe in them, basically. You know, I believe in them. So I do give them new life. And that can always be done. I rewrote Lay, Lady, Lay, too. No one ever mentioned that.

RR: You changed it to a much raunchier, less pretty kind of song.

BD: Exactly. A lot of words to that song have changed. I recorded it originally surrounded by a bunch of other songs on the Nashville Skyline album. That was the tone of the session. Once everything was set, that was the way it came out. And it was fine for that time, but I always had a feeling there was more to the song than that.

RR: Is it true that Lay, Lady, Lay, was originally commissioned for Midnight Cowboy?

BD: That's right. They wound up using Freddy Neil's tune.

RR: How did it feel doing Blowin' in the Wind after all those years during your last couple of tours?

BD: I think I'll always be able to do that. There are certain songs that I will always be able to do. They will always have just as much meaning, if not more, as time goes on.

RR: What about Like a Rolling Stone?

BD: That was a great tune, yeah. It's the dynamics in the rhythm that make up Like a Rolling Stone and all of the lyrics. I tend to base all my songs on the old songs, like the old folk songs, the old blues tunes; they are always good. They always make sense.

RR: Would you talk a little about how specific songs come to you?

BD: They come to me when I am most isolated in space and time. I reject a lot of inspiring lines.

RR: They're too good?

BD: I reject a lot. I kind of know myself well enough to know that the line might be good and it is the first line that gives you inspiration and then it's just like riding a bull. That is the rest of it. Either you just stick with it or you don't. And if you believe that what you are doing is important, then you will stick with it no matter what.

RR: There are lines that are like riding wild bulls?

BD: There are lines like that. A lot of lines that would be better off just staying on a printed page and finishing up as poems. I forget a lot of the lines. During the day, a lot of lines will come to me that I will just say are pretty strange and I don't have anything better to do. I try not to pay too much attention to those wild. obscure lines.

RR: You say you get a single line and then you ride it. Does the melody follow after you write out the whole song?

BD: I usually know the melody before she song.

RR: And it is there, waiting for that first line?

BD: Yeah.

RR: Do you hear it easily?

BD: The melody? Sometimes, and sometimes I have to find it.

RR: Do you work regularly? Do you get up every morning and practice?

BD: A certain part of every day I have to play.

RR: Has your playing become more complex?

BD: No. Musically not. I can hear more and my melodies now are more rhythmic than they ever have been, but, really, I am still with those same three chords. But, I mean, I'm not Segovia or Montoya. I don't practice 12 hours a day.

RR: Do you practice using your voice, too?

BD: Usually, yeah, when I'm rehearsing, especially, or when I'm writing a song, I'll be singing it.

RR: Someone said that when you gave up cigarettes, your voice changed. Now we see you're smoking again. Is your voice getting huskier again?

BD: No, you know, you can do anything with your voice if you put your mind to it. I mean, you can become a ventriloquist or you can become an imitator of other people's voices. I'm usually just stuck with my own voice. I can do a few other people's voices.

RR: Whose voices can you imitate?

BD: Richard Widmark. Sydney Greenstreet. Peter Lorre. I like those voices. They really had distinctive voices in the early talkie films. Nowadays, you go to a movie and you can't tell one voice from the other. Jane Fonda sounds like Tatum O'Neal.

RR: as your attitude toward women changed much in your songs?

BD: Yeah; in the early period, I was writing more about objection, obsession or rejection. Superimposing my own reality on that which seemed to have no reality of its own.

RR: How did those opinions change?

BD: From neglect.

RR: From neglect?

BD: As you grow, things don't reach you as much as when you're still forming opinions.

RR: You mean you get hurt less easily?

BD: You get hurt over other matters than when you were 17. The energy of hurt isn't enough to create art.

RR: So if the women in your songs have become more real, if there are fewer goddesses—

BD: The goddess isn't real. A pretty woman as a goddess is just up there on a pedestal. The flower is what we are really concerned about here. The opening and the closing, the growth, the bafflement. You don't lust after flowers.

RR: Your regard for women, then, has changed?

BD: People are people to me. I don't single out women as anything to get hung up about.

RR: But in the past?

BD: In the past, I was guilty of that shameless crime.

RR: You're claiming to be completely rehabilitated?

BD: In that area, I don't have any serious problems.

RR: There's a line in your film in which someone says to Sara, "I need you because I need your magic to protect me."

BD: Well, the real magic of women is that throughout the ages, they've had to do all the work and yet they can have a sense of humor.

RR: That's throughout the ages. What about women now?

BD: Well, here's the new woman, right? Nowadays, you have the concept of a new woman, but the new woman is nothing without a man.

RR: What would the new woman say to that?

BD: I don't know what the new woman would say The new woman is the impulsive woman...

RR: There's another line in your movie about "the ultimate woman." What is the ultimate woman?

BD: A woman without prejudice.

RR: Are there many?

BD: There are as many as you can see. As many as can touch you.

RR: So you've run into a lot of ultimate women?

BD: Me, personally? I don't run into that many people. I'm working most of the time. I really don't have time for all that kind of intrigue.

RR: Camus said that chastity is an essential condition for creativity. Do you agree?

BD: He was speaking there of the disinvolvement with pretense.

RR: Wasn't he speaking of sexual chastity?

BD: You mean he was saying you have to stay celibate to create?

RR: That's one interpretation.

BD: Well, he might have been on to something there. It could have worked for him.

RR: When you think about rock and the rhythm of the heartbeat is it tied into love in some way?

BD: The heartbeat. Have you ever lain with somebody when your hearts were beating in the same rhythm? That's true love. A man and a woman who lie down with their hearts beating together are truly lucky. Then you've truly been in love, m' boy. Yeah, that's true love. You might see that person once a month, once a year, maybe once a lifetime, but you have the guarantee your lives are going to be in rhythm. That's all you need.

RR: Considering that some of your recent songs have been about love and romance, what do you feel about the tendency some people used to have of dividing your work into periods? Did you ever feel it was fair to divide your work, for example, into a political period and a nonpolitical period?

BD: Those people disregarded the ultimate fact that I am a songwriter. I can't help what other people do with my songs, what they make of them.

RR: But you were more involved politically at one time. You were supposed to have written Chimes of Freedom in the back seat of a car while you were visiting some SNCC people in the South.

BD: That is all we did in those days. Writing in the back seats of cars and writing songs on street corners or on porch swings. Seeking out the explosive areas of life.

RR: One of which was politics?

BD: Politics was always one because there were people who were trying to change things. They were involved in the political game because that is how they had to change things. But I have always considered politics just part of the illusion. I don't get involved much in politics. I don't know what the system runs on.

For instance, there are people who have definite ideas or who studied all the systems of government. A lot of those people with college-educational backgrounds tended to come in and use up everybody for whatever purposes they had in mind. And, of course, they used music, because music was accessible and we would have done that stuff and written those songs and sung them whether there was any politics or not. I never did renounce a role in politics, because I never played one in politics. It would be comical for me to think that I played a role. Gurdjieff thinks it's best to work out your mobility daily.

RR: So you did have a lot of "on the road" experiences?

BD: I still do.

RR: Driving around?

BD: I am. interested in all aspects of life. Revelations and realizations. Lucid thought that can be translated into songs, analogies, new information. I am better at it now. Not really written yet anything to make me stop writing. Like, I haven't come to the place that Rimbaud came to when he decided to stop writing and run guns in Africa.

RR: Jimmy Carter has said that listening to your songs, he learned to see in a new way the relationship between landlord and tenant, farmer and sharecropper and things like that. He also said that you were his friend. What do you think of all that?

BD: I am his friend.

RR: A personal friend?

BD: I know him personally.

RR: Do you like him?

BD: Yeah, I think his heart's in the right place.

RR: How would you describe that place?

BD: The place of destiny. You know, I hope the magazine won't take all this stuff and edit—like, Carter's heart's in the right place of destiny, because it's going to really sound—

RR: No, it would lose the sense of conversation. The magazine's pretty good about that.

BD: Carter has his heart in the right place. He has a sense of who he is. That's what I felt, anyway, when I met him.

RR: Have you met him many times?

BD: Only once.

RR: Stayed at his house?

BD: No. But anybody who's a governor or a Senate leader or in a position of authority who finds time to invite a folkrock singer and his band out to his place has got to have... a sense of humor... and a feeling of the pulse of the people. Why does he have to do it?

Most people in those kinds of positions can't relate at all to people in the music field unless it's for some selfish purpose.

RR: Did you talk about music or politics?

BD: Music. Very little politics. The conversation was kept in pretty general areas.

RR: Does he have any favorite Dylan songs?

BD: I didn't ask him if he had any favorite Dylan songs. He didn't say that he did. I think he liked Ballad of a Thin Man, really.

RR: Did you think that Carter might have been using you by inviting you there?

BD: No, I believe that he was a decent, untainted man and he just wanted to check me out. Actually, as Presidents go, I liked Truman.

RR: Why?

BD: I just liked the way he acted and things he said and who he said them to. He had a common sense about him, which is rare for a President. Maybe in the old days it wasn't so rare, but nowadays it's rare. He had a common quality. You felt like you could talk to him.

RR: You obviously feel you can talk to President Carter.

BD: You do feel like you can talk to him, but the guy is so busy and overworked you feel more like, well, maybe you'd just leave him alone, you know. And he's dealing with such complicated matters and issues that people are a little divided and we weren't divided in Truman's time.

RR: Is there anything you're angry about? Is there anything that would make you go up to Carter and say, "Look, you fucker, do this!"?

BD: Right. [Pause] He's probably caught up in the system like everybody else.

RR: Including you?

BD: I'm a part of the system. I have to deal with the system. The minute you pay taxes, you're part of the system.

RR: Are there any heroes or saints these days?

BD: A saint is a person who gives of himself totally and freely, without strings. He is neither deaf nor blind. And yet he's both. He's the master of his own reality, the voice of simplicity. The trick is to stay away from mirror images. The only true mirrors are puddles of water.

RR: How are mirrors different from puddles?

BD: The image you see in a puddle of water is consumed by depth: An image you see when you look into a piece of glass has no depth or life-flutter movement. Of course, you might want to check your tie. And, of course, you might want to see if the make-up is on straight. That's all the way. Vanity sells a lot of things.

RR: How so?

BD: Well, products on the market. Everything from new tires to bars of soap. Need is—need is totally overlooked. Nobody seems to care about people's needs. They're all for one purpose. A shallow grave.

RR: Do you want your grave unmarked?

BD: Isn't that a line in my film?

RR: Yes.

BD: Well, there are many things they can do with your bones, you know. [Pause] They make neckpieces out of them, bury them. Burn them up.

RR: What's your latest preference?

BD: Ah—put them in a nutshell.

RR: You were talking about vanity and real needs. What needs? What are we missing?

BD: There isn't anything missing. There is just a lot of scarcity.

RR: Scarcity of what?

BD: Inspirational abundance.

RR: So it's not an energy crisis but an imagination crisis?

BD: I think it's a spiritual crisis.

RR: How so?

BD: Well, you know, people step on each other's feet too much. They get on each other's case. They rattle easily. But I don't particularly stress that. I'm not on a soapbox about it, you know. That is the way life is.

RR: We asked about heroes and saints and began talking about saints. How about heroes?

BD: A hero is anyone who walks to his own drummer.

RR: Shouldn't people look to other to be heroes?

BD: No; when people look to other for heroism, they're looking for heroism in an imaginary character.

RR: Maybe that in part explains why many seized upon you as that imaginary character.

BD: I'm not an imaginary character, though.

RR: You must realize that people get into a whole thing about you.

BD: I know they used to.

RR: Don't you think they still do?

BD: Well, I m not aware of it anymore.

RR: What about the 1974 tour? Or the Rolling Thunder tour of 1976?

BD: Well, yeah, you know, when I play, people show up. I'm aware they haven't forgotten about me.

RR: Still, people always think you have answers, don't they?

BD: No, listen: If I wasn't Bob Dylan, I'd probably think that Bob Dylan has a lot of answers myself.

RR: Would you be right?

BD: I don't think so. Maybe he'd have a lot of answers for him, but for me? Maybe not. Maybe yes, maybe no. Bob Dylan isn't a cat, he doesn't have nine lives, so he can only do what he can do. You know: not break under the strain.

If you need someone who raises someone else to a level that is unrealistic, then it's that other person's problem. He is just confronting his superficial self somewhere down the line. They'll realize it, I'm sure.

RR: But didn't you have to go through a period when people were claiming you had let them down?

BD: Yeah, but I don't pay much attention to that. What can you say? Oh, I let you down, big deal, OK. That's all. Find somebody else, OK? That's all.

RR: You talked about a spiritual crisis. Do you think Christ is an answer?

BD: What is it that attracts people to Christ? The fact that it was such a tragedy, is what. Who does Christ become when he lives inside a certain person? Many people say that Christ lives inside them: Well, what does that mean? I've talked to many people whom Christ lives inside; I haven't met one who would want to trade places with Christ. Not one of his people put himself on the line when it came down to the final hour.

What would Christ be in this day and age if he came back? What would he be? What would he be to fulfill his function and purpose? He would have to be a leader, I suppose.

RR: Did you grow up thinking about the fact that you were Jewish?

BD: No, I didn't. I've never felt Jewish. I don't really consider myself Jewish or non-Jewish. I don't have much of a Jewish background. I'm not a patriot to any creed. I believe in all of them and none of them. A devout Christian or Moslem can be just as effective as a devout Jew.

RR: You say you don't feel Jewish. But what about your sense of God?

BD: I feel a heartfelt God. I don't particularly think that God wants me thinking about Him all the time. I think that would be a tremendous burden on Him, you know. He's got enough people asking Him for favors. He's got enough people asking Him to pull strings. I'll pull my own strings, you know.

I remember seeing a Time magazine on an airplane a few years back and it had a big cover headline, "IS GOD DEAD?" I mean, that was—would you think that was a responsible thing to do? What does God think of that? I mean, if you were God, how would you like to see that written about yourself? You know, I think the country's gone downhill since that day.

RR: Really?

BD: Uh-huh.

RR: Since that particular question was asked?

BD: Yeah; I think at that point, some very irresponsible people got hold of too much power to put such an irrelevant thing like that on a magazine when they could be talking about real issues. Since that day, you've had to kind of make your own way.

RR: How are we doing, making our own way?

BD: The truth is that we're born and we die. We're concerned here in this life with the journey from point A to point Z, or from what we think is point A to point Z. But it's pretty self-deluding if you think that's all there is.

RR: What do you think is beyond Z?

BD: You mean, what do I think is in the great unknown? [Pause] Sounds, echoes of laughter.

RR: Do you feel there's some sense of karmic balance in the universe, that you suffer for acts of bad faith?

BD: Of course. I. think everybody knows that's true. After you've lived long enough, you realize that's the case. You can get away with anything for a while. But it's like Poe's The Tell-Tale Heart or Dostoyevsky's Crime and Punishment: Somewhere along the line, sooner or later, you're going to have to pay.

RR: Do you feel you've paid for what you got away with earlier?

BD: Right now, I'm about even.

RR: Isn't that what you said after your motorcycle accident—"Something had to be evened up"?

BD: Yes.

RR: And you meant...?

BD: I meant my back wheel had to be aligned. [Laughter]

RR: Let's take one last dip back into the material world. What about an artist's relationship to money?

BD: The myth of the starving artist is a myth. The big bankers and prominent young ladies who buy art started it. They just want to keep the artist under their thumb. Who says an artist can't have any money? Look at Picasso. The starving artist is usually starving for those around him to starve. You don't have to starve to be a good artist. You just have to have love, insight and a strong point of view. And you have to fight off depravity. Uncompromising, that's what makes a good artist. It doesn't matter if he has money or not. Look at Matisse; he was a banker. Anyway, there are other things that constitute wealth and poverty besides money.

RR: What we were touching on was the subject of the expensive house you live in, for example.

BD: What about it? Nothing earthshaking or final about where I live. There is no vision behind the house. It is just a bunch of trees and sheds.

RR: We read in the papers about an enormous copper dome you had built.

BD: I don't know what you read in the papers. It's just a place to live for now. The copper dome is just so I can recognize it when I come home.

RR: OK, back to less worldly concerns. You don't believe in astrology, do you?

BD: I don't think so.

RR: You were quoted recently as having said something about having a Gemini nature.

BD: Well, maybe there are certain characteristics of people who are born under certain signs. But I don't know, I'm not sure how relevant it is.

RR: Could it be there's an undiscovered twin or a double to Bob Dylan?

BD: Someplace on the planet, there's a double of me walking around. Could very possibly be.

RR: Any messages for your double?
BD: Love will conquer everything—I suppose.

December 1977
Jonathan Cott Interview, Los Angeles, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 647-661.

This interview was conducted during early December 1977 by Jonathan Cott (JC), a staff-writer for Rolling Stone. It centers on Renaldo & Clara and is one of numerous interviews given around this time to publicise the film. Cott treats his subject seriously and, accordingly, this is an in-depth interview in line with Cott's own views on interview technique:

> They say, 'The questions get too scholarly, or overly serious.' I say: Maybe they're right. I just like to treat people I admire in a serious way – but playfully, too. To talk with rock artists with the same seriousness with which I'd talk to William Butler Yeats, were he alive. The idea is to get away from the 'What's-your-favorite-color?' and 'What-kind-of-girls-do-you-like?' questions.

This is one of two interviews given to Cott by Dylan this year; the second, focused on his then latest album Street Legal.

JC: If someone asked me what Renaldo and Clara was about, I'd say: art and life, identity and God – with lots of encounters at bars, restaurants, luncheonettes, cabarets and bus stations.

BD: Do you want to see it again? Would it be helpful for you to see it again?

JC: You think I'm too confused about the film?

BD: No, I don't think so at all. It isn't just about bus stations and cabarets and stage music and identity – those are elements of it. But it is mostly about identity – about everybody's identity. More important, its about Renaldo's identity, so we superimpose our own vision on Renaldo: it's his vision and it's his dream. You know what the film is about? It begins with music – you see a guy in a mask [Bob Dylan], you can see through the mask he's wearing, and he's singing When I Paint My Masterpiece. So right away you know there's an involvement with music. Music is confronting you.

JC: So are lines like: "You can almost think that you're seein' double."

BD: Right. Also on a lyrical level. But you still don't really know... and then you're getting off that, and there seems to be a tour. You're hearing things and seeing people... its not quite like a tour, but there's some kind of energy like being on a tour. There's a struggle, there's a reporter – who later appears in the restaurant scenes.

All right, then it goes right to David Blue, who's playing pinball and who seems to be the narrator. He's Renaldo's narrator, he's Renaldo's scribe – he belongs to Renaldo.

JC: Yet David Blue talks not about Renaldo but about Bob Dylan and how he, David Blue, first met Dylan in Greenwich Village in the late fifties.

BD: They seem to be the same person after a while. It's something you can only feel but never really know. Any more than you can know whether Willie Sutton pulled all those bank jobs. Any more than you can know who killed Kennedy for sure. And right away, David Blue says: "Well, what happened was that when I first left my parent's house, I bought The Myth Of Sisyphus." Now, that wasn't really the book, but it was pretty close.

It was actually – so he tells us – Existentialism And Human Emotions. So that's it: this film is a postexistentialist movie. We're in the postexistentialist period. What is it? That's what it is.

JC: What could be more existentialist than playing pinball? It's the perfect existentialist game.

BD: It is. I've seen rows and rows of pinball players lined up like ducks. Its a great equalizer.

JC: What about the emotions in Existentialism And Human Emotions?

BD: Human emotions are the great dictator – in this movie as in all movies... I'll tell you what I think of the emotions later. But getting back to David Blue: he's left his home, and right away you're in for something like a triple dimension. Just ten minutes into the movie he says: "I got in the bus, I went down to New York, walked around for four hours, got back on the bus and went home." And that is exactly what a lot of people are going to feel when they walk into the movie theater: they got on the bus, walked around for four hours and walked home.

JC: There's another guy later in the film, who walks out into the night and says to a girl: "This has been a great mistake."

BD: Yeah. You can pick any line in a movie to sum up your feeling about it. But don't forget you don't see that guy anymore after that... He's gone. And that means Renaldo isn't being watched anymore because he was watching Renaldo.

JC: Talking about mistakes and seeing double: it's fascinating how easy it is to mistake people in the film for one another. I mistook you, for instance, for the guy driving the carriage (maybe it wasn't you); for Jack Elliott; and I even mistook you for you.

BD: The Masked Tortilla [Bob Neuwirth] is mistaken for Bob Dylan, Bob Dylan is mistaken for Renaldo. And... Bob Dylan is the one with the hat on. That's who Bob Dylan is – he's the one with the hat on.

JC: Almost every man in the film has a hat on.

BD: Right.

JC: All those disguises and masks!

BD: The first mask, as I said, is one you can see through. But they're all masks. In the film, the mask is more important than the face.

JC: All the women in the film seem to turn into one person, too, and a lot of them wear hats. It reminds me of The Ballad Of Frankie Lee And Judas Priest:

He just stood there staring
At that big house as bright as any sun,
With four and twenty windows
And a woman's face in ev'ry one.

BD: This film was made for you. [laughing] Did you see the Woman in White who becomes a different Woman in White? One's mistaken for the other. At first she's only an idea of herself – you see her in the street, later in the carriage... I think the women in the movie are beautiful. They look like they've stepped out of a painting. They're vulnerable, but they're also strong-willed.

JC: "Breaking just like a little girl."

BD: That's the child in everyone. That's the child in everyone that has to be confronted.

JC: Just Like A Woman always seemed to me to be somehow about being born: "I can't stay in here, I just can't fit". So by confronting the child in you, saying goodbye to childhood, you're being born into something bigger... In a way it's a frightening song.

BD: It always was a frightening song, but that feeling needs to be eliminated.

JC: I was thinking of what looked like a Yiddish cabaret filled with older women listening intently to Allen Ginsberg reading passages from Kaddish, his great elegy to his mother.

BD: Those women are strong in the sense that they know their own identity. It's only the layer of what we're going to reveal in the next film, because women are exploited like anyone else. They're victims just like coal miners.

JC: The poet Robert Bly has written about the image of the Great mother as a union of four force fields, consisting of the nurturing mother, like Isis (though your Isis seems more ambiguous); the Death Mother (like the woman in It's All Over Now, Baby Blue); the Ecstatic Mother (like the girl in Spanish Harlem Incident); and the Stone Mother who drives you mad (like Sweet Melinda who loves you howling at the moon in Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues). Traces of these women seem to be in this film as well.

BD: The Death Mother is represented in the film, but I don't know what I should say or can say or shouldn't say about who is who in the movie. I mean who is the old woman everyone calls Mamma – the mamma who sings, plays the guitar reads palms? She reads Allen's palm, saying: "You've been married twice." And me, later on I'm looking at the gravestone marked HUSBAND.
Ginsberg asks: "Is that going to happen to you?" And I say: "I want an unmarked grave." But of course I'm saying this as Renaldo.

JC: In Tarantula you wrote your own epitaph;

> Here lies bob dylan > killed by a discarded Oedipus > who turned around > to investigate a ghost and discovered that > the ghost too was more than one person.

BD: Yeah, way back then I was thinking of this film. I've had this picture in mind for a long time – years and years. Too many years... Renaldo is oppressed. He's oppressed because he's born. We don't really know who Renaldo is. We just know what he isn't. He isn't the Masked Tortilla. Renaldo is the one with the hat, but he's not wearing a hat. I'll tell you what this movie is: it's like life exactly, but not an imitation of it. It transcends life, and it's not like life.

JC: That paradox is toppling me over.

BD: I'll tell you what my film is about: its about naked alienation of the inner self against the outer self-alienation taken to the extreme. And it's about integrity. My next film is about obsession. The hero is an arsonist... but he's not really a hero.

JC: Renaldo and Clara seems to me to be about obsession too.

BD: That's true but only in the way it applies to integrity.

JC: The idea of integrity comes across in a lot of your songs and in lines like: "To live outside the law, you must be honest" and "She doesn't have to say she's faithful, / Yet she's true, like ice, like fire."

BD: We talked about emotions before. You can't be a slave to your emotions. If you're a slave to your emotions you're dependent on your emotions, and you're only dealing with your conscious mind. But the film is about the fact that you have to be faithful to your subconscious, unconscious superconscious – as well as to your conscious. Integrity is a facet of honesty. It has to do with knowing yourself.

JC: At the end of the film, Renaldo is with two women in a room (The Woman in White played by Joan Baez and Clara played by Sara Dylan), and he says: "Evasiveness is only in the mind – truth is on many levels... Ask me anything and I'll tell you the truth." Clara and the Woman in White both ask him: "Do you love her?" as they point to each other – not: "Do you love me?"

BD: Possessiveness. It was a self-focused kind of question. And earlier one of the women in the whorehouse talks about the ego-protection cords she wears around her neck. Do you remember that?... In the scene you mentioned, did you notice that Renaldo was looking at the newspaper which had an article on Bob Dylan and Joan Baez in it? Joan Baez and Bob Dylan at this point are an illusion. It wasn't planned that way. Joan Baez without Bob Dylan isn't too much of an illusion because she's an independent woman and her independence asserts itself. But Joan Baez with Bob Dylan is.

JC: So at the moment you open up that newspaper, art and life really come together.

BD: Exactly.

JC: And what about the moment when Joan Baez, looking at Clara, says: "Who is this woman?" and you cut to your singing Sara? Talk about art and life.

BD: It's as far as you can take it – meaning personally and generally. Who is this woman? Obviously, this woman is a figment of the material world. Who is this woman who has no name? Who is this woman, she says... who is this woman, as if she's talking about herself. Who this woman is, is told to you, earlier on, when you see her coming out of the church carrying a rope. You know she means business, you know she has a purpose. Another way of putting it is: the singer's character onstage is always becoming Renaldo. By singing Sara, the singer comes as close to Renaldo as he can get. It brings everything as close as possible without two becoming one.

JC: It was pretty amazing to see you use your personal life so nakedly in that scene with Renaldo and the two women.

BD: Right, but you're talking to me as a director now.

JC: Still, you do have that scene with Joan Baez and Sara Dylan.

BD: Well, Sara Dylan here is working as Sara Dylan. She has the same last name as Bob Dylan, but we may not be related. If she couldn't have played the role of Clara, she wouldn't have done it.

JC: Is she talking about her real problems or pretending that she's an adventurer?

BD: We can make anybody's problems our problems.

JC: Some people will obviously think that this film either broke up your marriage or is a kind of incantation to make your marriage come back together.

BD: Either one of those statements I can't relate to. It has nothing to do with the breakup of my marriage. My marriage is over. I'm divorced. This film is a film.

JC: Why did you make yourself so vulnerable?

BD: You must be vulnerable to be sensitive to reality. And to me being vulnerable is just another way of saying that one has nothing more to lose. I don't have anything but darkness to lose. I'm way beyond that. The worst thing that could happen is that the film will be accepted and that the next one will be compared unfavorably to this one.

JC: Strangely, the scene where the two women confront Renaldo reminds me of King Lear in which each of the daughters has to say how much she loves her father.

BD: You're right. Renaldo sees himself as Cordelia.

JC: I've always interpreted some of the Basement Tapes as being concerned with ideas from King Lear: "Too much of nothing / Can make a man abuse a king"; "Oh what dear daughter 'neath the sun / Would treat a father so, / To wait upon him hand and foot / and always tell him 'No'?"

BD: Exactly. In the later years it changed from "king" to "clown."

JC: King Lear had a fool around him, too, and when the fool leaves, Cordelia comes back. She takes his place and he takes hers.

BD: The roles are all interchangeable.

JC: As in Tangled Up In Blue and as in your movie.

BD: Yes it is.

JC: Were you specifically influenced by King Lear when you wrote songs like Tears Of Rage?

BD: No. Songs like that were based on the concept that one is one.

JC: "...and all alone and ever more shall be so."

BD: Exactly. What comes is gone forever every time.

JC: But one is difficult to deal with, so Christians gave us the Trinity.

BD: The Christians didn't bring in anything – it was the Greeks.

JC: Jesus is a very strong figure in Renaldo and Clara, I noticed. There's that song by you called What Will You Do When Jesus Comes? There's the woman who says to you in the restaurant: "There's nowhere to go. Just stand and place yourself like the cross and I'll receive you." And then there are the shots of the huge cement crucifix in the Catholic grotto.

BD: Right. Jesus is the most identifiable figure in Western culture, and yet he was exploited, used and exploited. We all have been.

JC: There's also that scene, near the end of the film, where Allen Ginsberg takes you around to see Jesus killed for the second time and then buried under the weight of the cross. On one level, the film is about the Stations of the Cross, isn't it?

BD: Yeah, you're right. Like the double vision having to be killed twice. Like why does Jesus really die?

JC: Spiritually or politically?

BD: Realistically... Because he's a healer. Jesus is a healer. So he goes to India, finds out how to be a healer and becomes one. But see. I believe that he overstepped his duties a little bit. He accepted and took on the bad karma of all the people he healed. And he was filled with so much bad karma that the only way out was to burn him up. In my film we're looking at masks a lot of the time. And then when the dream becomes so solidified that it has to be taken to the stage of reality, then you'll see stone you'll see a statue which is even a further extension of the mask: the statue of Mary in front of the statue of Jesus on the cross in the Crucifix Grotto.

JC: Throughout the film, I also noticed the continual reappearance of the red rose. Every woman has a rose.

BD: It has a great deal to do with what's happening in the movie. Do you remember the woman in the carriage? She's bringing a rose to Renaldo who gives it back to her.

JC: But then it appears in your hat when you're singing.

BD: By that time it's all fallen apart and shattered the dream is gone — it could be anywhere after that.

JC: Joan Baez carries one when she's with Mamma. And then the violinist Scarlet Rivera gives it to you in your dressing room.

BD: That's right. The rose is a symbol of fertility.

JC: Also of the soul. 'The Romance of the Rose' – the dreamer's vision of the soul.

BD: That's right... The most mysterious figure in the film is the conductor on the train. Do you remember him?

JC: He's the guy who tells the Masked Tortilla – who says he's going to a wedding – that he's only been on the train for four hours (there's that magical four hours again!) and not for the six days that he imagines.

BD: Yeah he tells him too, that he's going to possibly the largest city in the East.

JC: I figured it was New York.

BD: No. The largest city in the East!

JC: The Magi!

BD: That's not exactly what he's talking about – it's more like the holy crossroads.

JC: There's another scene like that in which Mick Ronson is blocking Ronnie Hawkins' way to a backstage area. He seemed like some kind of guardian.

BD: He's the Guardian of the Gates. But scenes like these work in terms of feeling. It's like with Tarot cards – you don't have to be confused as to what they mean... someone else who knows can read them for you.

JC: "Nothing is revealed," you sing at the end of The Ballad Of Frankie Lee And Judas Priest. Is anything revealed at the end of Renaldo and Clara?

BD: Yeah. I'll tell you what the film reveals: this film reveals that there's a whole lot to reveal beneath the surface of the soul, but it's unthinkable.

(Silence)

BD: That's exactly what it reveals. It reveals the depths that there are to reveal. And that's the most you can ask because things are really very invisible. You can't reveal the invisible. And this film goes as far as we can to reveal that.

JC: Under a statue of Isis in the city of Sais is the following inscription: "I am everything that was, that is, that shall be... Nor has any mortal ever been able to discover what lies under my veil."

BD: That's a fantastic quotation. That's true exactly. Once you see what's under the veil, what happens to you? You die, don't you or go blind?

JC: I wanted to tie in two things we've talked about: the idea of integrity and the idea of Jesus. In your song I Want You, you have the lines:

Now all my fathers, they've gone down,
True love they've been without it.
But all their daughters put me down
'Cause I don't think about it.

These are some of my favorite lines of yours, and to me they suggest that real desire is stronger than frustration or guilt.

BD: I know. It's incredible you find that there. I know it's true. And in Renaldo and Clara there's no guilt. But that's why people will take offense at it, if they are offended by it in any way because of the lack of guilt in the movie. None at all.

JC: This brings us back to Jesus.

BD: Jesus is... well I'm not using Jesus in the film so much as I'm using the concept of Jesus – the idea of Jesus as a man, not the virgin birth.

JC: But what about the concept of masochism associated with Jesus?

BD: That's what happened to Jesus. People relate to the masochism, to the spikes in his hand, to the blood coming out, to the fact that he was crucified. What would have happened to him if he hadn't been crucified? That's what draws people to him. There are only signals of that in this film – like a finger-nail blade at one point.

JC: What about the line in Wedding Song: "Your love cuts like a knife."

BD: Well it's bloodletting, it's what heals all disease. Neither aggression nor anger interests me. Violence only does on an interpretive level only when it's a product of reason.

People are attracted to blood. I'm personally not consumed by the desire to drink the blood. But bloodletting is meaningful in that it can cure disease. But we didn't try to make a film of that nature. This film concerns itself with that dream. There's no blood in the dream, the dream is cold. This film concerns itself only with the depth of the dream – the dream as seen in the mirror.

The next film might have some blood... I'm trying to locate Lois Smith to be in it. She would represent the idea of innocence. Do you know who she is? She was the barmaid in East of Eden. I 'm trying to line up some people for the film, and I can't find her... For some reason I've just thought of my favorite singer.

JC: Who is that?

BD: Om Kalsoum – the Egyptian woman who died a few years ago. She was my favorite.

JC: What did you like about her?

BD: It was her heart.

JC: Do you like dervish and Sufi singing, by the way?

BD: Yeah, that's where my singing really comes from... except that I sing in America. I've heard too much Leadbelly really to be too much influenced by the whirling dervishes.

JC: Now that we somehow got onto this subject, who else do you like right now? New Wave groups?

BD: No, I'm not interested in them. I think Alice Cooper is an overlooked songwriter. I like Ry Cooder. And I like Dave Mason's version of something which is on the jukebox right now.

JC: I wonder what you think of the guy who ends your movie singing this fulsome, crooning version of In The Morning with those memorable lines: "I'll be yawning into the morning of my life". Why is he there?

BD: The film had to end with him because he represents the fact that Renaldo could be dreaming! And he might be singing for Renaldo – representing him, the darkness representing the light.

JC: He's like what's happened to one sentimental part of rock & roll in the Seventies.

BD: He's not rock & roll...

JC: Rock & roll isn't rock & roll anymore.

BD: You're right, there's no more rock & roll. It's an imitation, we can forget about that. Rock & roll has turned itself inside out. I never did do rock & roll, I'm just doing the same old thing I've always done.

JC: You've never sung a rock & roll song?

BD: No, I never have, only in spirit.

JC: You can't really dance to one of your songs.

BD: I couldn't.

JC: Imagine dancing to Rainy Day Woman #12 & 35. It's kind of alienating. Everyone thought it was about being stoned, but I always thought it was about being all alone.

BD: So did I. You could write about that for years... Rock & roll ended with Phil Spector. The Beatles weren't rock & roll either. Nor the Rolling Stones. Rock & roll ended with Little Anthony and the Imperials. Pure rock & roll.

JC: With Goin' Out Of My Head?

BD: The one before that... Rock & roll ended in 1959.

JC: When did it begin for you?

BD: 1954.

JC: What is there now?

BD: Programmed music. Quadruple tracking.

JC: What do you think about the Seventies?

BD: The Seventies I see as a period of reconstruction after the Sixties, that's all. That's why people say: well, it's boring, nothing's really happening, and that's because wounds are healing. By the Eighties anyone who's going to be doing anything will have his or her cards showing. You won't be able to get back in the game in the Eighties.

JC: I came across something you wrote a while back:

> Desire... never fearful
> Finally faithful
> It will guide me well > across all bridges > inside all tunnels > never fallin'.

BD: I even remember where I wrote that. I wrote that in New Hampshire. I think I was all alone.

JC: Here's something else you wrote:

> Mine shall be a strong loneliness > dissolvin' deep
> t' the depths of my freedom
> an' that, then shall > remain my song.

You seemed to have stayed true to that feeling.

BD: I haven't had any reason to stray.

JC: In The Times They Are A-Changin' you sing: "He that gets hurt / Will be he who has stalled," What has kept you unstalled?

BD: I don't know. Mainly because I don't believe in this life.

JC: The Buddhist tradition talks about illusion, the Jewish tradition about allusion. Which do you feel closer to?

BD: I believe in both but I probably lean to allusion. I'm not a Buddhist. I believe in life but not this life.

JC: What life do you believe in?

BD: Real life.

JC: Do you ever experience real life?

BD: I experience it all the time, it's beyond this life.

JC: I wanted to read you two Hassidic texts that somehow remind me of your work. The first says that in the service of God, one can learn three things from a child and seven from a thief. "From a child you can learn (1) always to be happy; (2) never to sit idle, and (3) to cry for everything one wants. From a thief you should learn: (1) to work at night; (2) if one cannot gain what one wants in one night to try again the next night; (3) to love one's co-workers just as thieves love each other; (4) to be willing to risk one's life even for a little thing; (5) not to attach too much value to things even though one has risked one's life for them – just as a thief will resell a stolen article for a fraction of it's real value; (6) to withstand all kinds of beatings and tortures but to remain what you are; and (7) to believe that your work is worthwhile and not be willing to change it".

BD: Who wrote that?

JC: A Hassidic rabbi.

BD: Which one?

JC: Dov Baer, the Mazid of Mezeritch.

BD: That's the most mind-blazing chronicle of human behavior I think I've ever heard... How can I get a copy of that.

JC: I brought it for you actually. I photocopied it from a book called The Wisdom of the Jewish Mystics.

BD: I'll put it on my wall. There's a man I would follow. That's a real hero. A real hero.

JC: Another Hasidic rabbi once said that you can learn something from everything. Even from a train, a telephone and a telegram. From a train, he said, you can learn that in one second one can miss everything. From a telephone you can learn that what you say over here can be heard over there. And from a telegram that all words are counted and charged.

BD: It's a cosmic statement. Where do you get all of these rabbis' sayings? Those guys are really wise. I tell you, I've heard gurus and yogis and philosophers and politicians and doctors and lawyers, teachers of all kinds... and these rabbis really had something going.

JC: They're like Sufis, but they speak and teach with more emotion.

BD: As I said before, I don't believe in emotion. They use their hearts, their hearts don't use them.

JC: In one second missing everything on a train... do you think that means you can miss the train or miss seeing something from the train window?

BD: That's a statement of revelation. I think it means that in one moment you can miss everything because you're not there. You just watch it, and you know you're missing it.

JC: What about the telephone – what you say here is heard over there.

BD: That means you're never that far away from the ultimate God.

JC: And words being counted and charged.

BD: That's very truthful, too. That's every thing you say and think is all being added up.

JC: How are you coming out?

BD: You know, I'll tell you: lately I've been catching myself. I've been in some scenes, and I say: "Holy shit, I'm not here alone." I've never had that experience before the past few months. I've felt this strange, eerie feeling that I wasn't all alone, and I'd better know it.

JC: Do you watch what you say?

BD: I always try to watch what I say because I try not to say anything I don't mean.

JC: Maybe Renaldo has that problem at the end of your movie?

BD: No, Renaldo's on top of it, he's on top of circumstance. He's not going to say too much 'cause he knows he doesn't know much. Now me, obviously I'm talking and saying things, and I will talk and say things, but that's because I think I'm going to mean them... or I feel I mean them now. I'm not just talking to hear myself. But Renaldo is not saying anything just because he knows that what he says is being heard and that therefore he doesn't know what to say. No, he says some very incredible and important things when he's confronted with his allusion. You know, he does say: "Do I love you like I love her? No." "Do I love her like I love you? No". He can't say any more that... you don't have to know any more about him than that. That's all you have to know about him, that's all you have to know about Bob Dylan.

JC: At that moment in the film, you cut into a performance of your song Catfish – "Nobody can throw the ball like Catfish can." It's almost jokey after that intense preceeding scene.

BD: Its treated more in the way of music, getting back to the idea that music is truthful. And music is truthful. Everything's okay, you put on a record, someone's playing an instrument – that changes the vibe. Music attracts the angels in the universe. A group of angels sitting at a table are going to be attracted by that.

So we always get back to the music in the film. We made a point of doing it, as if we had to do it. You're not going to see music in the movies as you do in this film. We don't have any filler. You don't see any doors close or any reverse shots which are just there to take up time until you get to the next one. We didn't want to take time away from other shots.

A lot of hold shots, not enough of them. When the woman is walking down the street with that rope, that's a hold shot. David Blue is on a hold shot for six minutes the first time you see him.

I know this film is too long. It may four hours too long – I don't care. To me, it's not long enough. I'm not concerned how long something is. I want to see a set shot. I feel a set shot. I don't feel all this motion and boom-boom. We can fast cut when we want, but the power comes in the ability to have faith that it is a meaningful shot. You know who understood this? Andy Warhol. Warhol did a lot for 'American cinema. He was before his time. But Warhol and Hitchcock and Peckinpah and Tod Browning... they were important to me. I figure Godard had the accessibility to make what he made, he broke new ground. I never saw any film like Breathless, but once you saw it you said: "Yeah, man, why didn't I do that, I could have done that." Okay, he did it but he couldn't have done it in America.

JC: But what about a film like Sam Fuller's Forty Guns or Joseph Lewis' Gun Crazy?

BD: Yeah, I just heard Fuller's name the other day. I think American filmmakers are the best. But I also like Kurosawa, and my favorite director is Buñuel; it doesn't surprise me that he'd say those amazing things you quoted to me before from the New Yorker. I don't know what to tell you. In one way I don't consider myself a filmmaker at all. In another way I do. To me, Renaldo and Clara is my first real film. I don't know who will like it. I made it for a specific bunch of people and myself, and that's all. That's how I wrote Blowin' in the Wind and The Times They Are A-Changin' – they were written for a certain crowd of people and for certain artists, too. Who knew they were going to be big songs?

JC: The film, in a way, is a culmination of a lot of your ideas and obsessions

BD: That may be true, but I hope it also has meaning for other people who aren't that familiar with my songs, and that other people can see themselves in it, because I don't feel so isolated from what's going on. There are a lot of people who'll look at the film without knowing who anybody is in it. And they'll see it more purely.

JC: Eisenstein talked of montage in terms of attraction – shots attracting other shots – then in terms of shock, and finally in terms of fusion or synthesis, and of overtones. You seem to be really aware of the overtones in your film, do you know what I mean?

BD: I sure do.

JC: Eisenstein once wrote: "The Moscow art is my deadly enemy. It is the exact antithesis of all I'm trying to do. They string their emotions together to give a continuous illusion of reality. I take photographs of reality and then cut them up so as to produce emotions."

BD: What we did was to cut up reality and make it more real... Everyone from the cameramen to the water boy, from the wardrobe people to the sound people was just as important as anyone else in the making of the film. There weren't any roles that well defined. The money was coming in the front door and going out the back door: the Rolling Thunder tour sponsored the movie. And I had faith and trust in the people who helped me do the film, and they had faith and trust in me.

JC: In the movie, there's a man behind a luncheonette counter who talks a lot about truth – he's almost like the Greek chorus of the film.

BD: Yeah, we often sat around and talked about that guy. He is the chorus.

JC: That guy at one point talks about the Movement going astray and how everyone got bought off. How come you didn't sell out and just made a commercial film?

BD: I don't have any cinematic vision to sell out. It's all for me so I can't sell out. I'm not working for anybody. What was there to sell out?

JC: Well, movies like Welcome To L.A. and Looking for Mr. Godbar are moralistic exploitation films – and many people nowadays think that they're significant statements. You could have sold out to the vision of the times.

BD: Right. I have my point of view and my vision, and nothing tampers with it because it's all that I've got. I don't have anything to sell out.

JC: Renaldo and Clara has certain similarities to the recent films of Jacques Rivette. Do you know his work?

BD: I don't. But I wish they'd do it in this country. I'd feel a lot safer. I mean I wouldn't get so much resistance and hostility. I can't believe that people think that four hours is too long for a film. As if people had so much to do. You can see an hour movie that seems like ten hours. I think the vision is strong enough to cut through all of that. But we may be kicked right out of Hollywood after this film is released and have to go to Bolivia. In India, they show twelve-hour movies. Americans are spoiled, they expect art to be like wallpaper with no effort, just to be there.

JC: I should have asked you this before, but how much of the film is improvised and how much determined beforehand?

BD: About a third is improvised, about a third is determined, and about a third is blind luck.

JC: What about, for instance, the scene in which Ronnie Hawkins tries to get a farm girl to go on tour with him, trying to convince her by saying something like: "God's not just in the country, God's in the city, too... God's everywhere, so let's seize the day."

BD: In that scene, Ronnie was given five subjects to hit on. He could say anything he wanted as long as he covered five points. Obviously, God was a subject relevant to the movie. Then he talked about the Father: Now get this: in the film there's the character of the Father played by Allen Ginsberg. But in Ronnie's scene, the farmer's daughter talks about her father. That's the same father.

Another half-improvised scene is the one in which Ramone – the dead lover of Mrs. Dylan [played by Ronee Blakley] – appears as a ghost in the bathroom, and they argue in front of the mirror.

JC: How does the audience know that that's Mrs Dylan?

BD: She's so identified later on in the film. Its just like Hitchcock. Hitchcock would lay something down, and an hour later you'd figure it out – but if you want to know, you wait and find out. It's not given to you on a platter.

JC: Hitchcock puts himself into each of his films – once. You put yourself in hundreds of places and times!

BD: Right [Laughing]. I've tried to learn a lack of fear from Hitchcock.

JC: Did the John Cassavetes movies influence you at all in scenes such as the one in the bathroom?

BD: No. not at all. But I think it all comes from the same place. I'm probably interested in the same things Cassavetes is interested in.

JC: What are those?

BD: Timing, for example, and the struggle to break down complexity into simplicity.

JC: Timing of relationships?

BD: The relationships of human reason. Its all a matter of timing. The movie creates and holds the time. That's what it should do – it should hold that time, breathe in that time and stop time in doing that. It's like if you look at a painting by Cezanne, you get lost in that painting for that period of time. And you breathe – yet time is going by and you wouldn't know it, you're spell-bound.

JC: In Cezanne, things that you might take as being decoration actually turn out to be substantial.

BD: That's exactly what happens in Renaldo and Clara. Things which appear merely decorative usually, later on, become substantial. It just takes a certain amount of experience with the film to catch on to that. For example. Allen Ginsberg. You first hear his name, just his name...

JC: And then you get a glimpse of him at that weird, monomaniacal poetry reading...

BD: It's not as weird as it should be. Weirdness is exactness.

JC: One quick question about Hurricane Carter, whom you show in the film. Do you think that he was guilty?

BD: I don't personally think he is. I put that sequence in the film because he's a man who's not unlike anyone else in the film. He's a righteous man, a very philosophic man – he's not your typical bank robber or mercy slayer. He deserves better than what he got.

JC: You told me that you plan to make twelve more films, but I gather you're not giving up on songwriting and touring.

BD: I have to get back to playing music because unless I do I don't really feel alive. I don't feel I can be a filmmaker all the time. I have to play in front of the people in order just to keep going.

JC: In Wedding Song you sing: "I love you more than ever / Now that the past is gone." But in Tangled Up In Blue you sing: "But all the while I was alone / The past was close behind." Between these two couplets lies an important boundary.

BD: We allow our past to exist. Our credibility is based on our past. But deep in our soul we have no past. I don't think we have a past anymore than we have a name. You can say we have a past if we have a future. Do we have a future? No. So how can our past exist if the future doesn't exist?

JC: So what are the songs on Blood On The Tracks about?

BD: The present.

JC: Why did you say: "I love you more than ever / Now that the past is gone"?

BD: That's delusion. That's gone.

JC: And what about: "And all the while I was alone / The past was close behind"?

BD: That's more delusion. Delusion is close behind.

JC: When your "Greek Chorus" restaurant owner talks about the Movement selling itself out, you next cue to your singing Tangled Up In Blue which is, in part, about what has happened in and to the past.

BD: But we're only dealing with the past in terms of being able to be healed by it. We can communicate only because we both agree that this is a glass and this is a bowl and that's a candle and there's a window here and there are lights out in the city. Now I might not agree with that. Turn this glass around and it's something else. Now I'm hiding it in a napkin. Watch it now. Now you don't even know it's there. It's the past... I don't even deal with it. I don't think seriously about the past, the present or the future. I've spent enough time thinking about these things and have gotten nowhere.

JC: But didn't you when you wrote Blood On The Tracks? Why is it so intense?

BD: Because there's physical blood in the soul, and flesh and blood are portraying it to you. Will power. Will power is what makes it an intense album... but certainly not anything to do with the past or the future. Will power is telling you that we are agreeing on what is what.

JC: What about Idiot Wind?

BD: Will power.

JC: Why have you been able to keep so in touch with your anger throughout the years, as revealed in songs like Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window? and Positively 4th Street?

BD: Will power. With strength of will you can do anything. With will power you can determine your destiny.

JC: Can you really know where your destiny is leading you?

BD: Yeah when you're on top of your game... Anger and sentimentality go right next to each other and they're both superficial. Chagall made a lot of sentimental paintings. And Voltaire wrote a lot of angry books.

JC: What is Idiot Wind?

BD: It's a little bit of both because it uses all the textures of strict philosophy, but basically it's a shattered philosophy that doesn't have a title and it's driven across with will power. Will power is what you're responding to.

JC: In your film you show a bearded poet in Hasidic garb who speaks in an Irish brogue and carries a gun. He tells us that he doesn't care about being fast but about being accurate. Is that how you feel now?

BD: Yeah. Everyone admires the poet, no matter if he's a lumberjack or a football player or a car thief. If he's a poet he'll be admired and respected.

JC: You used to say you were a trapeze artist.

BD: Well I see the poet in every man and woman.

JC: Rimbaud's grave doesn't even mention the fact that he was a poet, but rather that he was an adventurer.

BD: Exactly But I don't try to adopt or imitate Rimbaud in my work. I'm not interested in imitation.

JC: I've always associated you with Rimbaud. Illuminations and Fireworks. Do you believe in reincarnation?

BD: I believe in this – if you want to take reincarnation as a subject: let's say a child is conceived inside of a woman's belly and was planted there by a man. Nine months before that seed is planted there's nothing. Ten, twelve, thirteen months... two years before that seed is planted, maybe there's the germination of that seed. That comes from food intake into the bloodstream. Food can be a side of beer or a carrot on a shelf. But that's what makes it happen.

In another lifetime – you're in a supermarket and there's a package of carrots right there... that possibly could be you. That kind of reincarnation... And how did that carrot get there? It got there through the ground. It grew through the ground with the help of a piece of animal shit. It has to do with the creation and destruction of time. Which means it's immense. Five million years is nothing – it's a drop in a bucket. I don't think there's enough time for reincarnation. It would take thousands or millions of years and light miles for any real kind of reincarnation. I think one can be conscious of different vibrations in the universe and these can be picked up. But reincarnation from the twelfth to the twentieth century – I say it's impossible.

JC: So you take reincarnation on a cellular level, and when I say "Rimbaud and you", you take it as an infinity.

BD: Maybe my spirit passed through the same places as his did. We're all wind and dust anyway and we could have passed through many barriers at different times.

JC: What about your line: "Sweet Goddess / Born of a blinding light and a changing wind" in the song Tough Mama?

BD: That's the mother and father, the yin and yang. That's the coming together of destiny and the fulfillment of destiny.

JC: George Harrison once said that your lines:

Look out kid.
It's something you did
God knows when

But you're doin' it again

from Subterranean Homesick Blues, seemed to be a wonderful description of karma.

BD: Karma's not reincarnation. There's no proof of reincarnation and there's no proof of karma but there's a feeling of karma. We don't even have any proof that the universe exists. We don't have any proof that we are even sitting here. We can't prove that we're really alive. How can we prove we're alive by other people saying we're alive?

JC: All I have to do is kick a rock.

BD: Yeah, you're saying you're alive but the rock isn't going to tell you. The rock don't feel it.

JC: If you take reality to be unreal, then you make unreality real. What's real to you? Art?

BD: Art is the perpetual motion of illusion. The highest purpose of art is to inspire. What else can you do? What else can you do for anyone but inspire them?

JC: What are your new songs like?

BD: My new songs are new for me and they accomplish what I wanted to accomplish when I started thinking about them. Very seldom do you finish something and then abandon it and very seldom do you abandon something with the attitude that you've gotten what you started out to get. Usually you think, well, it's too big, you get wasted along the way someplace, and then it just trails off... and what you've got is what you've got and you just do the best with it. But very seldom do you ever come out with what you put in. And I think I've done that now for the first time since I was writing two songs a day way back when. My experience with film helped me in writing the songs. I probably wouldn't have written any more songs if I hadn't made this film. I would have been bummed out, I wouldn't have been able to do what I knew could be done.

JC: I know I'm being nostalgic, but I loved hearing you sing Little Moses in Renaldo and Clara.

BD: I used to play that song when I performed at Gerde's Folk City. It's an old Carter Family song, and it goes something like:

Away by the waters so wide
The ladies were winding their way,
When Pharoah's little daughter
Stepped down in the water
To bathe in the cool of the day.
And before it got dark,
She opened the ark,
And saw the sweet infant so gay.

Then little Moses grows up, slays the Egyptian, leads the Jews – it's a great song And I thought it fit pretty well into the movie. Everybody's in this film: the Carter Family, Hank Williams, Woody Guthrie, Beethoven. Who is going to understand this film? Where are the people to understand this film – a film which needs no understanding?

JC: Who understands Sad-Eyed Lady Of The Lowlands?

BD: I do... Its strange. I finally feel in the position of someone who people want to interview enough that they'll fly you into town, put you up in a hotel, pay all your expenses and give you a tour of the city. I'm finally in that position. I once went to see the king of the Gypsies in southern France. This guy had twelve wives and 100 children. He was in the antique business and had a junkyard, but he'd had a heart attack before I'd come to see him. All his wives and children had left and the gypsy clan had left him with only one wife and a couple of kids and a dog. What happens is that after he dies they'll all come back. They smell death and they leave. That's what happens in life. And I was very affected by seeing that.

JC: Did you feel something like that in the past four years?

BD: You're talking about 1973? I don't even remember 1973. I'm talking about the spring of 1975. There was a lack of targets at that time. But I don't remember what happened last week.

JC: But you probably remember your childhood clearly.

BD: My childhood is so far away... it's like I don't even remember being a child. I think it was someone else who was a child. Did you ever think like that? I'm not sure that what happened to me yesterday was true.

JC: But you seem sure of yourself.

BD: I'm sure of my dream self. I live in my dreams, I don't really live in the actual world.

" 'I'll let you be in my dreams
If I can be in your dreams.'
I said that."

Dylan: 'My Film Is Truer Than Reality'
By JOHN ROCKWELL
Santa Monica, Calif.

Bob Dylan is the almost unchallenged leader of American popular music or at least of white American popular music. He is our pre-eminent former folkie and present-day rock-and-roller, an evocative and mystical poet, a moving composer and an electrifying performer. But he has never been content with all that. He has written a novel, published a book of his writings and drawings, appeared in two films about himself and acted a fictional role in a third, and continues to enlist his services in behalf of controversial political causes.

Now Mr. Dylan is about to descend upon us in yet another guise—that of the compleat filmmaker. His four-hour film, "Renaldo and Clara," is set to open in New York, Los Angeles and Minneapolis on Jan. 25. Mr. Dylan produced it, wrote it (insofar as it was written at all), directed and co-edited it, stars in it and is distributing it. And although he has usually maintained a guarded distance from the press, he is even talking about it.

"Renaldo and Clara" is going to confuse and annoy as many people as it fascinates. Although it includes extensive concert footage from the Rolling Thunder Revue, the hit-and-run Bicentennial tour Mr. Dylan staged in 1976 with such performers as Joan Baez, Ronee Blakley. Bob Neuwirth, Allen Ginsberg, Ramblin' Jack Elliott, Roger McGuinn, Mick Ronson and Joni Mitchell, it is by no means a typical rock-and-roll tour film. Linking the concept footage and providing it a dramatic context is a largely non-narrative series of recurrent images, semi-improvised skits and out-and-out acting. What story there is involves the mostly romantic tribulations of a clown-faced singer named Renaldo (Mr. Dylan), especially in relation to the woman in his life (Clara, played by his wife, Sara) and a woman from his past (Miss Baez). But these scenes are far outnumbered by others in which the various Rolling Thunder performers sometimes play themselves and sometimes impersonate more or less fictionalized characters of their own or Mr. Dylan's invention. And sometimes it's very clear that the center of the film is not Renaldo at all, but the "real" Bob Dylan.

The result is a grandly ambitious, sometimes muddled effort to pose a complex of philosophical questions and to dig behind the outer reality of Mr. Dylan's life and career. Whether it all works, and whether lots of people will pay to see it, remains for the film critics and individual movie-goers to decide; Mr. Dylan himself, encountered in a rehearsal studio in Santa Monica, says he's happy with the film and determined to continue expressing himself in the cinematic medium.

"Music is my first love," he began, tucked into a chair next to a room in which a man was methodically tuning a piano, plunking out sweet and sour chords one after another. "But in writing songs I've learned as much from Cézanne as I have from Woody Guthrie. I feel I have a lot in common with the visual side of it, because the songs I write are basically songs of realism. To play upon the realism and draw the abstraction out of the realism is what I do."

To judge from tales heard during the tour and from Sam Shepard's recent "Rolling. Thunder Logbook"—Mr. Shepard, the playwright, was hired to provide dialogue for "Renaldo and Clara," but Mr. Dylan amicably says now that not many of his scenes were used because of a "conflict in ideas"— the shooting of Mr. Dylan's movie sometimes approached chaos. Film crews scurried about not sure of what they were supposed to be filming, often arriving after some particularly amusing potential scene had already transpired. Mr. Dylan admits some of this, although naturally he defends the film stoutly. "We learned a lot from this film," he says, twisting restlessly in his chair. "I feel there was more control all the time, but I didn't have as much control as I would like to have had, in terms of preconceiving. This was a movie done without a script. There were ideas from the beginning, but a lot of this film developed as we were doing it. Quite a bit was improvised, but only within certain rules. No one was aware of how they would be fitting into it. I knew, because I was behind it."

Mr. Dylan disclaims any specific literary allusion for the title, which like much else in the picture came to them after they had begun shooting. He will say only that the two names are "just two people, madly in love." The fact that the two people are played by himself and his wife, will be of special interest to Dylan fans, to be sure, especially because, since the editing was completed late last spring, Mr. Dylan and his wife have been involved in particularly bitter divorce proceedings, complete with teams of detectives herding their five children back and forth. The climactic scenes of the film include Mr. and Mrs. Dylan and Miss Baez, his lover a decade ago, dressed as a mysterious lady carrying a rose (who, before she enters a building to encounter the other two, is played by Mrs. Dylan). These scenes are intercut with Mr. Dylan singing his "Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands" (which he says he wrote for his wife) and "Sara." But despite all of this, Mr. Dylan insists that a knowledge of any of his domestic details or indeed the identity of the myriad of more or less obscure Rolling Thunder musicians and poets who wander through the film is not crucial to an enjoyment or understanding of it.

"I don't think it's important whether the audience knows anyone in the film or not," he argues. "Well, it might make a little difference. But we wouldn't have made the film and spent this much time on it" and money—"Renaldo and Clara" cost a reported $1,250,000 to make, not counting the $400,000 to $600,000 to launch the initial three-city engagement if we thought it was just a personal movie for people who know people in it. If the audience is concerned with who's in it, then they're not receiving the movie the way they should be receiving it.

"You cannot be in your own work. You can't stand in the middle of the canvas or you'll die. I'm not interest in documentaries and I'm not moved by them. Bob Dylan is portrayed in this movie by Ronnie Hawkins (the veteran rockabilly singer for whom the Band once worked as backup musicians). He is Bob Dylan for all believable purposes, and if you don't believe that, just see the movie. What's in people's minds, what they bring to it, what their preconceived ideas are, that we don't want to even bother with. All the truth you need to know is given to you. The camera doesn't lie."

Still, people are going to insist upon seeing the principal character as "Bob Dylan" rather than "Renaldo," and the film derives strength from these very confusions and tensions. Mr. Dylan suggests that "Renaldo and Clara" is ultimately about the duality between illusion and reality, and about a search for our real selves under the varying masks of appearance. He himself appears in the film as a performer in plastic mask and white face, as Renaldo and Bob Dylan and Robert Zimmerman (the name with which he was born), as a self-conscious extension of a poetic tradition from the English Romantics through Jack Kerouac and Mr. Ginsberg, as the leading figure in the 1960's Greenwich Village folk scene and so forth. And the others can be seen as themselves, as reflections of Mr. Dylan's image of them and—in the case of his wife and Miss Baez—both his fantasies about them and their perceptions of him.

"I don't write songs for escape," Mr. Dylan reflected, and the same could be said of his film. "My experience dictates what the songs are about, and then I elaborate it with whatever technique I have. It isn't the experience that defines it, it's the feeling arising out of the experience.

"What this movie does is create a battle between reality and illusion. It's about man's basic nature being duality—between darkness and light, between freedom and oppression. We all have many names, and our own true name is deeply inside of us. What we project is not a name, but energy, and the energy has no name. It doesn't matter what people think they're seeing in this film; it's just how they feel."

These are interesting ideas, but the real question facing audiences when the film is released is whether Mr. Dylan has succeeded in shaping them into an artistically persuasive cinematic form, or whether inexperience and self-indulgence have blunted their impact. Mr. Dylan himself doesn't think the film's potential audience will be alienated by its complexity or its length. "We had a problem cutting it down," he admits, "but the movie was always going to be too long right from the beginning. For some people it's four hours too long. It's not a problem of time. The problem is in the area of concentration. Four hours is not a long time to concentrate."

From his conversation it becomes rapidly clear that Mr. Dylan retained creative and financial control over his film because of a deep distrust of the conventional methods of American filmmaking and because he doubted that the studio system would understand his ideas or let him do what he wanted to do.

"We make our movies a little differently than most people. I've worked on sets of movies (notably Sam Peckinpah's "Pat Garrett and Billy the Kid," in which he had a leading role), and there's no way you can make a really creative movie in a system that breeds so much discontent. You have, to have your own crew and your own people to do it."

Similarly with distribution. "Renaldo and Clara" is being distributed by the newly founded Circuit Films, headed by Mr. Dylan's 36-year-old brother, David Zimmerman, based in their home state of Minnesota and relying primarily on people with experience in the music business rather than Hollywood and New York regulars.

"He's doing it with people we have confidence in," says Mr. Dylan, "mainly because we didn't know any people in the film business. All I know is what people tell me—how everyone takes a piece of this and a piece of that. That's irrelevant, but how they understand the movie is relevant. I know there are people out there who want to see this film, and the film business might not be keyed into that."

Mr. Dylan's immediate future plans involve music—he's written a batch of songs over the summer and is currently auditioning musicians for a new band in Santa Monica. If there's time he hopes to cut a studio album—there will be no sound track album from "Renaldo and Clara," partly to underscore that it's not a tour film and partly because there already has been one Rolling Thunder Revue live album. In mid-February he begins a tour of the Far East, to be followed by America in the spring and, possibly, Europe in the late fall and following winter. In the meantime, however, he has other film projects in mind, too, and sturdily resists the notion that "Renaldo and Clara" represents an onscreen learning process in movie-making, a glorified home movie or a wallowing in details of his domestic life better left private.

"I'm not doing this to learn the craft of film; I'm doing it to make movies—to put forth a certain vision which I carry around and can't express on any other canvas. This movie's a play-act based on reality. It hopes to transcend that reality and get something out of the ashes which is better than that reality, will live longer than that reality and will be more true than that reality."

Joel Kotkin (New Times) Interview, Santa Monica, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 859-863.

During early 1978 Dylan gives a large number of interviews, primarily geared to publicising Renaldo And Clara. The Kotkin interview took place at Rundown Studios. Parts of the Interview were syndicated through the Washington Post and a separate section appeared in New Times. The following is taken from New Times February 6th 1978.

RENALDO AND WASSO

Ever since he handled the press on the Rolling Thunder Revue in 1974, Paul Wasserman has been firmly in control of marketing the Bob Dylan legend. And Wasserman now plots out a media strategy for Dylan's Renaldo and Clara, much as he has co-ordinated the hype for Diane Keaton, the Rolling Stones, Neil Diamond, Linda Ronstadt, James Taylor and Paul Simon.

"I get the best deal I can get," Wasserman (otherwise known as "Wasso") explains over lunch at the Century City Hamburger Hamlet. The deal, he admits, often includes such things as guaranteed magazine covers for his clients and, sometimes, control over the copy inside.

"Why do the magazines do it?" Wasserman snarls. "Well, it's because they want the stars to sell more copies. Whose fault is it if they agree to put them on the cover? The star? The press agent? Or, maybe the press for going along with it?"

But even for Wasso, hyping Renaldo and Clara presents problems. The movie, four hours long and nearly incomprehensible, is not a box-office natural, and Dylan knows it. "The first thing Bob told me about the movie," Wasso recalls, allowing a rare smile, "was, 'It's not Star Wars, is it Paul?'..."

Nevertheless, Wasserman told a somewhat surprised Dylan that with a few cover stories and interviews in the right places, the people out there, their interest in his mystique rekindled, would flock to the theaters.

"Bob asked me if I could do anything with this picture," Wasso says. "I said I could do something with the press if he could make himself available. After all, the real Dylan buffs would only keep us going for the first few couple of weeks."

Among the vehicles chosen to disseminate the Dylan resurrection were the New York Times, the Washington Post, Playboy, New York, Rolling Stone and New Times none of whose writers would have stood a chance of getting through Dylan's Point Dume door before the release of Renaldo and Clara.

But this doesn't mean the star's snowing us explains Dylan's pied hyper. "When Dylan won't do interviews, he's a – –: but when he needs to do them, he's selling out," Wasserman snorts. "You just can't win."

It is a drab day in Santa Monica, a slow news day in a slow news decade, and therefore a perfect day for Paul Wasserman, who is talking on a wall phone in a converted furniture store where Dylan has established his West Coast theater of operations. Dylan arrives an hour late:

"Paul, aren't I supposed to talk to someone?" he asks in a bored monotone. Wasserman points at me and Dylan passes by without another word. Fifteen minutes later, led by Wasserman, Dylan enters dressed in white shoes, a white sweat shirt and white pants. He offers a limp handshake. Finally Wasserman's imposing presence departs and Dylan is left sniffling with flu his small hooked (and now quite red) nose the only bit of color to break the monotony of his snowy dress. He fidgets crossing and recrossing his legs, as the man who once wrote "propaganda all is phony," attempts to explain his media blitz:

JK: Journalists like to play a game about "rebel of the sixties selling out." Has that sort of scrutiny affected your life?

BD: Uh-uh. Those people are not my true fans.

JK: You mean like People magazine?

BD: Yeah. I can't get into that stuff. My world is just a world where I know people as people – artists, pickpockets and thieves are all in it. Whatever is written about me. I just have to pay no attention.

JK: Have you been following the media coverage?

BD: No. Just Jon's. [Rolling Stone's Jonathan Cott]

JK: What did you think of that?

BD: Jon's piece was fine. He seemed to understand the movie.

JK: Do you think the movie will be understood by the people who see it?

BD: I don't really think about that. The people who are meant to see it will see it.

JK: Any particular group?

BD: All the people who are interested in poetry or in human reason at all. I think they'll find something in there to identify with.

JK: Anything in particular?

BD: I don't really know. That's not my business... to sell the movie.

JK: But you are doing interviews?

BD: Yeah, only so that people will know there's a movie out. That's the only reason.

JK: Do you care whether the movie makes money or not?

BD: I care, but it's not the main reason we made the movie.

JK: What would be the main reason?

BD: Just to get the movie out of my system.

JK: To exorcise a ghost in any way?

BD: No. No. It's a movie. It's an art form. I'm an artist working in art and different mediums. Who wouldn't want to make a movie if they thought they could? It's a visionary dream which I always wanted to do.

JK: A lot of readers who read newspapers are regular everyday people. If you're supposedly expressing a vision, they need a vision, too, so they can understand.

BD: I don't know who you are talking about.

JK: The average person...

BD: I don't know anybody who is an average person.

JK: Do you think that there are many people who won't be able to understand the movie?

BD: Possibly... When we were writing those songs in the early days a lot of people didn't grasp them immediately. It's the same thing with the movie. A lot of people aren't going to be able to understand it... the times don't allow them to understand it.

JK: Do you think that money is irrelevant in this business? You once said, 'Money doesn't exist because I don't recognize it.'

BD: Well, I care to a certain extent. There's no salvation in money. If you have enough money to buy a Cadillac, that's cool. That's all I can tell you about money...

JK: But the type of work you did certainly requires capital... Do you think that as you've gotten older you've gotten better at handling money?

BD: Oh, I don't know. I couldn't say.

JK: Well, part of being good at business is hiring the right people, like Paul.

BD: Paul is a publicity man.

JK: But what he does generates money.

BD: Yeah, that's correct. You know, advertising is a big thing, but we couldn't afford it so we hired Paul, see.

JK: Paul is there so you can advertise with your name?

BD: Well, yeah, well, right. I met Paul on that Bob Dylan/Band tour in 1974. We had a relationship then and...

JK: And obviously you trust him.

BD: Uh-huh.

JK: Do you feel comfortable with yourself as a movie maker?

BD: No, I don't know nothing about making movies. I don't think of myself as a film maker. If da Vinci were alive, or Van Gogh, or if Rembrandt were alive, they'd be making films.

JK: And therefore it's alright for you to be making films.

BD: Exactly. If someone feels they can do it. What's to stop somebody from giving up their job as an accountant to become a rodeo rider?

JK: This is 1978, and we still don't know what the seventies are all about...

BD: I don't know what the seventies are all about. The sixties were a shattering decade. The same thing happened in the 1860's. It seems to happen in the middle of the century. Everything happens in those middle years. The 1960's were not any different than that. Now we're in the seventies, and it's a period of reconstruction. Nothing is happening.

JK: We've grown up in a much more violent, much poorer, much more commercialised world than the one you grew up in. If this generation renounces what your generation did, what will be the continuity?

BD: Well, you know, the people of my generation didn't try to make rules for anybody. The people of my generation rebelled against what was; the people in the fifties generation didn't do that.

JK: Do you think this generation is replaying the fifties?

BD: I dunno. I don't go out to high schools to find out what high school kids are thinking. It ain't a bad idea, but I don't consider myself a spokesman for any generation. I mean, they say the sun is going to blow up in a billion years, so what are we talking about – the death of the planet. Looking at it that way, what difference does it make to talk of one generation to the next? I never gave much thought to the generation gap, you know.

JK: Yeah, and what amazes me about your generation is your lack of concern for the people coming up behind you.

BD: Because it wiped out, my whole generation... my whole generation was taught a lot of lessons.

JK: And one of the lessons is not to worry about the generation behind you?

BD: Well, no, yeah-well, of course I worry about the next generation. I think about it.

JK: I have to worry about it – it's my generation.

BD: Yeah, you're right, I do, too, I have children. I'm not saying I don't have any concern, but you have to deal with your own first. You can't go out and try to save the world. You just say what is available to you to say.

JK: And that's where your effort is going now?

BD: Well, it's no effort. I don't create art out of effort. I have a hard enough time just dealing with my life on a day-to day basis. I can't think of all these cultural or cultural art or political... these things don't mean anything to me. It's like that song Ramona: "Everything passes, everything changes, just do what you think you should do. Some day maybe, who knows, baby, I'll come crying to you." That's the way it is.

JK: Publications are being told that if you want to interview Bob Dylan you're going to have to put him on the cover.

BD: I wouldn't know about that.

JK: Do you care at all?

BD: No. I don't care. We have a purpose behind doing these interviews. We're not just going out and doing interviews for no reason. There is a purpose to these interviews. If magazines want an interview, now is the time. I think they might be interested to hear about Renaldo And Clara. You haven't even asked me too much about the movie. Only a little bit.

JK: Well, Cott's interview went into that in tremendous detail. I frankly did not understand it completely.

BD: Well, maybe if you saw it again you could get closer to it. Maybe it was just like a new experience for you. Maybe you hadn't had those experiences in life yet. That could be it too.

JK: It's not possible that the movie is at all disjointed?

BD: No. No possibility of that. No way.

JK: Why do you say that?

BD: Did you sit through the whole movie?

JK: I sat through about three hours.

BD: Do you smoke a lot of dope?

JK: I have in my day.

BD: That's the reason.

JK: I'm sure there were people in the movie theater who had smoked a lot more dope than I had.

BD: How old were you when you first started smoking dope?

JK: Thirteen.

BD: Well, O.K. There's your reason right there.

JK: Because I'm a hopeless dope addict?

BD: Your mind has been... You smoked dope before you knew how to smoke dope.

JK: Well, I sat through the two Ivans, I'm a voracious reader. And I have no trouble with Faulkner... Do you feel at all uncomfortable with all these interviews? Paul has you booked with all these obnoxious people. Maybe you're bored.

BD: I'm not bored. Maybe you're bored.

JK: I'm not bored.

BD: I'm not bored. Don't mistake my restlessness for boredom.

JK: Are you always this restless?

BD: Yeah. I'm a restless person.

The Photoplay Interview, Los Angeles, California

Another in the large series of promotional interviews for Renaldo And Clara conducted whilst Dylan was rehearsing at Rundown Studios. This one for Photoplay magazine is by an unknown journalist. Heylin (Stolen Moments) places this as happening between January 26th and 31st 1978.

DYLAN DEFENDS HIS FOUR-HOUR MOVIE

Bob Dylan has not been having much success with his marathon movie, Renaldo and Clara. Dylan, that most enigmatic of pop music superstars, explained that it was filmed during his 1975-76 tour of New England and Canada but it is not a documentary.

"I'm not attuned to documentaries," said Dylan, who was the subject of two cinéma vérité films, 'Dont Look Back' and 'Eat The Document', in the late sixties and more recently he made a guest appearance in 'The Last Waltz' which stars The Band in their last concert. "Renaldo and Clara could be called a documentary-type movie because it was shot with 16 millimeter hand-held cameras. The concert tour provided background for the film even though I considered editing out the 47 songs in order to allow the story line to stand on its own."

"I didn't because people wouldn't like the idea of Bob Dylan in a movie that was not a singing movie. They think I'm Gene Autrey or Roy Rogers."

Nobody viewing the 3 hour and 52 minute film which Dylan wrote, directed and co-edited, could possibly confuse it with the simple tale of a singing troubadour. Dylan calls the film "a dream, but not even my dream. It has a theme which I think is pretty self-explanatory. Renaldo and Clara has a purpose and it's all connected, It might seem vague but it isn't."

'Vague' was one word, along with 'tedious' and 'boring', that most American critics used to describe Dylan's picture. The critical consensus is that Dylan should simply have stuck to the concert scenes and dumped the story, described mostly as an ego trip for the star in a highly extensive 'home-movie'. The difficult-to-describe plot has Dylan playing himself and a Dylan-like Renaldo, which his ex-wife Sara calls him in the latter part of the film. Sara is Clara and 'Nashville' star Ronee Blakely is cast as Mrs. Dylan opposite country musician Ronnie Hawkins as Mr. Dylan. To further blur the connections between illusion and reality, folk singer Joan Baez, an ex-girlfriend of Dylan's, wanders through the movie as a mysterious 'Woman in White' who seems to be vying with Clara for the affections of Renaldo.

Renaldo And Clara has scenes where Dylan and Sara discuss whether they should continue their romantic involvement. Were they meant to indicate marital troubles between the real-life couple? Their marriage break-up last year resulted in a bitter court fight for custody of the five children and for possession of the two million dollar mansion in Malibu.

"No," Dylan answers. "The movie was conceived in 1975 before any of this came about. The divorce was just one of those inevitable things."

Asked what film-makers he admires, Dylan cited John Ford, Elia Kazan and Sam Peckinpah, who directed Bob's straight acting debut in Pat Garrett and Billy The Kid in 1973. Dylan admits he tried for 'touches' of those directors in his movie. "Also, I was influenced by Andy Warhol," he said.

"Renaldo And Clara was originally intended as a more structured film. I hired playwright Sam Shepard to provide dialogue but we didn't use much of his stuff because of a conflict in ideas. Sam ended up playing a part in the picture. There was a lot of chaos while we were making the film. A lot of good scenes didn't happen because we had already finished improvising them by the time the cameras were ready to film. You can't recapture stuff like that."

"There was a lot of conflict during filming. We had people who didn't understand what we were doing because we didn't have a script. Some who didn't understand were willing to go along with us anyway. Others weren't and that hurt us, and hurt the film. No one was really aware how they would fit into the total picture. I knew because I was behind it."

There were certain surprises in the editing room when Bob and Howard Alk were viewing the 100 hours of film which were shot. "There was a marvelous scene where David Blue is talking about the folk-singers in New York during the 1960s," said Dylan. "I'd completely forgotten about it but we had to put that scene in the picture."

Does Dylan think that he has overstuffed the film with too many people and does he think its too long? "I had a problem cutting it to the present length," he said. "But it was always going to be a long movie, right from the beginning. For some people it's four hours too long. It isn't a problem of time, it's a problem of concentration. Four hours is not a long time to concentrate."

Dylan, who financed Renaldo And Clara with his own money, decided to release it through Circuit Films, a new company headed by Bob's 36-year old brother, David Zimmerman. Circuit is based in Minnesota, Bob's home state, far from the big-studio system of Hollywood.

"We took the movie to one of the major studios," said Bob. "They treated us like dogs. As far as I can remember they didn't want to see more than 15 minutes of the film before they bought the picture. We felt it only proper they should see it all. Besides a major studio would never release this as a four-hour movie. They thought it should run for 1½ hours and that it had to be all music. Everybody had something to say."

Obviously Dylan has a deep distrust for the conventional methods of American filmmaking. But he definitely has more movie plans in the future. "We'll make more movies but make them differently from most people," he said. "I learned by working in Pat Garrett that there is no way you can make a really creative movie in Hollywood. It's a system that breeds so much discontent. You have to have your own crew and your own people to make a movie your own way."

"There will be no album from Renaldo And Clara. I don't want people to have the impression it's a musical."

Film-Maker Dylan: A Peek Behind the Mask
BY GREGG KILDAY

Bob Dylan has decided to become his own advance man: The 36-year-old singer-songwriter is trying to save himself a few million dollars in publicity costs by volunteering to be interviewed about his latest project, a sprawling four-hour film titled "Renaldo and Clara," which opens Wednesday at the Regent Theater in Westwood and the Lido Theater in Newport Beach.

Throughout most of his 16-year career, Dylan has regarded reporters warily and steadfastly kept his distance from the camera's eye. When he has been forced to stand still long enough to allow himself to be photographed, he has calculatingly filtered his personality through a series of archetypal poses: From the wandering urban troubadour of "The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan" through the haunted poet-imagist of "Blonde on Blonde," the playful country boy of "Nashville Skyline" and the wizened medicine man of "Desire," Dylan has fashioned an identity out of an ever-changing succession of masks.

Not surprisingly, then, masks also provide the key to "Renaldo and Clara," in which Dylan makes his entrance wearing a translucent plastic mask that both reveals and distorts his countenance as if to erase—or maybe to suggest—his many previous incarnations. According to the movie's credits, Dylan is actually playing a character called Renaldo, a quasi-mythical creation of vague definition. But the song that the masked Renaldo is singing is Dylan's own "When I Paint My Masterpiece" and the setting is Dylan's Rolling Thunder Revue as it tours the New England countryside during the fall of 1976.

The movie is full of just such teasing logic: Some of Dylan's fellow musicians play themselves and some play each other. For some scenes, they impersonate pilgrims and cowboys, gypsies and hookers; for others, they flirt recklessly with their own images in the gossip columns. Dylan's ex-wife Sara is seen in the co-starring role of Clara. Singer-actress Ronee Blakley is cast as "Mrs. Dylan" opposite country musician Ronnie Hawkins in the guise of "Bob Dylan." And throughout the movie's alternating layers of concert footage and improvised dramatic vignettes, Joan Baez wends her way as a mysterious figure by the name of the Woman in White who appears to he headed for a confrontation with Clara over the affections of Renaldo. Dylan is not about to sort out the movie's various illusions. But because "Renaldo and Clara" is venturing onto the marketplace without benefit of a major distributor, Dylan at least was willing to talk about the making of the film.

Dressed in rumpled white pants, white sweatshirt and black leather jacket, Dylan took a seat on an abandoned sofa in an empty room in a Santa Monica rehearsal hall where he has been trying out a new band for an upcoming tour of the Far East.

"I was ready to do something different, something new, and this is what it turned out to be," Dylan said matter-of-factly, explaining that the idea of the film had developed simultaneously with his plans for the Rolling Thunder Revue and that he spent the summer preceding the '75 tour in New York City "doing research in the streets—that summer I gathered the crew, the elements in it, I was researching the possibilities of making this film and so I just left myself open."

Dylan has had brushes with film in the past: Filmmaker D.A. Pennebaker followed him to England in 1966 for the documentary, "Don't Look Back." And Dylan himself recorded one world tour for a documentary that never quite surfaced on ABC. But he has since soured on the whole notion of such road films and insists that "Renaldo and Clara" be viewed as a fictional movie rather than another documentary about a concert tour.

"Documentary films, I haven't learned much from them. I'm not too attuned to documentaries," Dylan stated. "This film could be called a documentary-type film because it was shot with 16mm hand-held cameras. But if I had my way, we would have shot it with big 35mm Panavision cameras."

Asked what film-makers he admires, Dylan cited John Ford, Elia Kazan "up through 'Splendor in the Grass'," and Sam Peckinpah, for whom he made his acting debut in "Pat Garret and Billy the Kid." "And I like Warhol a lot," Dylan added. "I think his 'Empire State Building' is more exciting than Bergman."

It is easy enough to spot Warhol's influence in the long takes, the elaborate play-acting and the almost casual sense of personal drama that runs throughout "Renaldo and Clara." But connections—however fragile—can also be made with Ford, Kazan and Peckinpah, with whom Dylan shares a preoccupation with rethinking and reshaping American myths.

The now-standard cowboy-outlaw-poet-rock-musician paradigm provides one constantly shifting focus of attention for the film. It is balanced by an equally fluid view of women that moves between images of fortune-tellers and lovers, mothers and whores. However, the one myth that dominates "Renaldo and Clara" is, of course, Dylan's own. The movie deals, he admitted, "with the image which I assume everyone is concerned with. It deals with those images, but it goes beyond those images. The image is broken apart and you see what's behind the images. You see the truth behind the idle truth, a kind of resurrection of the common man as opposed to gratification of the image or the ego."

Although the movie's confusions between illusion and reality sound complex, Dylan contends that their origins are actually quite simple: "We started out with a simple love triangle story," he said. "But the more deeply involved I got I realized most of it happens all in the mind. Things that happen in the outerday world are just manifestations of the inner mind. And what I was trying to capture was what the inner mind was going through.

"The idea of the mask was to reveal the inner self-all these words I'm throwing at you have been used so many times before, but I mean just that—the mask is more a replica of the inner self than the face. We knew we had to do the movie with masks in order for it to be successful."

Filmed at a reported $1.25 million, "Renaldo and Clara" was a structured exercise that quickly turned into an improvisational experiment. Playwright Sam Shepard was brought aboard to rough out scenes, but due to what Dylan describes as "a miscommunication," Shepard's role was soon reduced to that of a minor player. Actors Harry Dean Stanton and Helena Kallianiotes (who delivers a speech in "Renaldo and Clara" not that far removed from the tough hitchhiker's lament that she unleashed in "Five Easy Pieces") were invited to come along because, as Dylan puts it, "we needed people who could stand in front of the camera and set an example for the rest of us," but at a certain point they dropped off the tour. To read Shepard's subsequent account in his book, "Rolling Thunder Logbook," and to hear Dylan tell it, a certain amount of chaos reigned.

"The film could have been much better if people could have had a little more belief, been a little freer," Dylan commented. "There was a lot of conflict on this film. We had people who didn't understand what we were doing, but who were willing to go along with it. And we had people working on the tour who didn't understand and weren't willing to go along with us. It hurt us. It was good for the show, but it hurt the film. There were scenes that were planned out that would have added another element, but for one reason or another, they never panned out."

For example, a number of violent special effects that Dylan learned of while working on the Peckinpah film had to be jettisoned. "We were going to blow up a car that had the Masked Tortilla (a character played by musician Bob Neuwirth) in it. That didn't happen. So it kind of leaves the Masked Tortilla hanging," Dylan laughed. "It would have finished him off in a more conclusive way. Yeah, a lot of scenes didn't happen."

In the process of editing the 40 hours of film, though, Dylan discovered compensatory moments, such as David Blue's spoken memoirs of the New York City folk scene of the early '60s, that he hadn't even realized had been shot. Dylan claims he considered editing out many of the movie's 47 songs, in order to allow the story line to stand on its own. "But people would not like the idea of Bob Dylan in a movie that was not a singing movie," Dylan complained. "They think I'm Gene Autry or Roy Rogers." So, in the end, Dylan opted for the movie's complex counterpoint of song and drama, a cumulative effect that he likens to a dream or, perhaps, a Cubist painting by Picasso.

There are points at which the dream becomes troubled. Dylan included in the finished film an interview with convicted murderer Rubin Carter, even though Carter's conviction was upheld in a second trial that took place after the film was shot. "My feelings on that haven't changed at all," Dylan said of his belief that Carter has been unfairly treated by the legal system.

Dylan also has persisted in using footage of his ex-wife, Sara, from whom he was divorced last June, even though he knows it will only titillate the curiosity of some members of the audience. "I can't avoid publicity," Dylan said. "I don't know what people know about me, though. I don't see why that should affect what I do. The film is actually very little about me. It's a dream. To put it more correctly, it isn't even my dream."

"Renaldo and Clara" is, however, quite definitely Bob Dylan's movie. To ensure his control of its advertising and distribution, he rejected overtures from a number of major companies. The movie is now being distributed independently through Circuit Films, a Minnesota-based firm established by Dylan's younger brother, David Zimmerman.

Nevertheless, Dylan couldn't resist a final contradiction. He already is thinking about shooting another movie next fall or winter, a movie "without masks, more of a straight-line movie." Concluded Dylan, "If we could make a deal with a studio, I think the next movie we could do cheaper. We could do the job easier, quicker, smoother on a soundstage. We're still talking about a small budget, so it may be to our advantage next time to work in a Hollywood studio."

Press Conference, Santa Monica, California

ROBERT HILBURN
Bob Dylan—Meeting the Press

Bob Dylan opened his press conference this week with a question of his own.

Spotting a reporter whose story about the songwriter's much-publicized Malibu home once upset him, Dylan asked the writer icily: "Do you want to talk about my house or my movie?"

The remark reflected the media testiness associated with Dylan ever since his sarcastic encounter with a Time magazine correspondent in "Don't Look Back," the decade-old film documentary.

But it proved a false alarm. Except for verbal jousting with an Australian-based writer who wondered if Dylan felt guilty for having changed his name from Bob Zimmerman, things went smoothly. Surprisingly so.

Sitting in the "playback" room on the first floor of a two-story Santa Monica rehearsal hall, Dylan waded patiently through nearly 90 minutes of questions from mostly foreign journalists.

The usually private Dylan has made himself available to the press in recent weeks to draw attention to his new "Renaldo & Clara" film. This week's conferences had been planned as a single session but so many writers showed up from Japan that a separate meeting was set up for them.

"I've never been opposed to talking to the press," Dylan said, when asked about his general media hesitancy. "It's just that I usually don't have anything to talk to them about."

Though most of the questions centered on the film and an upcoming Japan-Australia tour, some touched on such classic fan magazine fodder as "What's your favorite food," and whether Dylan a really pals around with Mick Jagger and Bruce Springsteen. Springsteen was hailed by some critics as the "new" Dylan.

The irony is that one of the themes of "Renaldo & Clara" is that attempts to peek into an artist's private life only tend to cloud the understanding of his art.

Rather than the sarcasm one might have expected in response to those questions, Dylan reacted with wry amusement. "Whisky," he quipped, when queried about his favorite dish. Then, he changed it to ice cream. After assuring the writers he doesn't hang out with Jagger and Springsteen, he added, "But Bruce does write some pretty good songs..."

"I think the movie is pretty self-explanatory." Dylan told the first group of writers. "It might seem vague, but it isn't. It's all got a purpose and it's all connected. It might be a little different from what you're used to seeing, but I think in time it'll prove true...

"If it's still around in 10 or 12 years, then it'll have done well. What happens on opening night isn't too important because everybody's not going to see it on opening night."

Speaking far more concretely than in the recent, almost amorphous Rolling Stone interview, Dylan discussed the reported financing of the $1.25 million film and his future movie plans. "I tried to get financing for a film I tried to do before this and it was impossible..." the financiers wanted to know exactly what they were going to be getting for their money. "We financed... ('Renaldo')... with the Rolling Thunder tour. The money that was coming into the box office was going out all for the movie."

Dylan also explained why he distributed the film himself rather than turn to a major Hollywood studio. "They wouldn't let this movie run long enough... If they released it and it didn't do well in three or four weeks, they'd take it off the market. It's not that kind of picture.

"Also, some of them wanted all music... some said it has to be an hour and a half. Others would say it has to be more of 'you' and less of everybody else. Everybody had something like that to say."

Dylan said he'd like to begin another film this year, but said he'd probably shy away from the multiple roles of actor, writer and director that he undertook this time: "I don't want to write it all. I wouldn't even want to direct it. I just want to help push it along. I'll be in it and I want to see a certain story... but I might get some help..."

Moving to other aspects of his career, Dylan was asked why he stayed away from concerts so long in the late '60s and early '70s. He also was asked if he was surprised such a large, intense following was waiting for him when he did return to live shows in '74.

"I (stayed away because I) had been touring so much: 10, 11 months a year. It finally got to me... And the sound wasn't right, anyway. The sophisticated sound equipment has just come into being the past few years.

"I was surprised (at the response)... I remember when we opened in Chicago... all those people there. But if they weren't there, I'd just have gone back to the clubs. I'm just up there being a servant to the songs."

Dylan also said he was worried in '74 whether the old songs would be meaningful—to him and to audiences. "Maybe I wouldn't feel like singing them anymore," he noted. "But they still felt right I felt that feeling from the rest of the people, too. The songs held up. The arrangements always change. That's gotta be expected. We've got some new arrangements (for this tour) that you wouldn't even think were the same songs."

After the Japan and Australia tours, Dylan expects to record an album in L.A. Presumably, it'll be released in time for a late spring or early summer U.S. tour. The U.S. schedule will be a mixture of large and small halls, and may include some cities that he didn't reach on the Band or Rolling Thunder tours.

For the overseas dates, Dylan will be backed by a 13-piece band, including female backup singers. The rhythm section includes Rolling Thunder holdovers Rob Stoner on bass, David Mansfield on steel guitar/violin and Steven Soles on guitar.

Early February 1978
Philip Fleishman Interview

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1031-1036.

An interview held some time early on in February 1978 and published in the March 20th edition of Maclean's. Philip Fleishman is a contributing editor of the magazine. It is believed that the interview took place in the Los Angeles area.

Bob Dylan, folk-poet laureate to a generation, has turned moviemaker. And if you had trouble understanding his songs, wait until you see his movie. His first major effort, much of it filmed during his sensational transcontinental musical tour, Rolling Thunder Revue, more than two years ago, defies easy description. Titled Renaldo And Clara, it runs for more than four hours and throws a series of contradictions at the audience. Dylan appears as the character Renaldo, while the singer Ronnie Hawkins plays Bob Dylan. Dylan's then-wife Sara (they divorced last year after 11 years of marriage) is Clara, while country singer Ronee Blakley plays Mrs. Bob Dylan. And Joan Baez, for years the main woman in Dylan's life, is billed as The Woman In White. The film is ad-libbed and the fact that the cast is composed of musicians, not actors, is often painfully apparent.

The movie has not been a success. Because of its extraordinary length it had opened by early March in only two theatres, in New York and Los Angeles. Besides, having chosen not to "sell out" to the major distributors, Dylan was having the film handled by a company set up by his brother. Suddenly the reclusive singer/guitarist was granting selected interviews (critics said to avoid the costs of advertising Renaldo and Clara).

Many of Dylan's responses in this conversation with Maclean's contributing editor Philip Fleishman seem contradictory. But there emerges an image of a man who, despite the immense fame and fortune that have come his way in his 36 years, is trying to live his life with a sense of truth and integrity.

PF: I sat through Renaldo And Clara last night and I didn't like it. Images kept returning to me in a way I didn't expect, but overall it held little meaning for me.

BD: Well, you know what the movie's about because it came back to you. It's going to be around for years and years and you'll go see it again sometime and then you'll say "Aha, that's what it was about". Then you'll know and I won't have to tell you. (laughs).

PF: Why do you play a character called Renaldo and not Bob Dylan?

BD: Well, in any song I write or any movie I'm in, I always become the character in it. I play the character Renaldo in the movie. When I sing It Ain't Me, Babe I'm another character. It's all a play. My songs are closer to theatre than to ordinary rock and roll.

PF: What are the two main women in your life, your ex-wife Sara and Joan Baez doing in the film if there isn't some underlying theme you were trying to get across?

BD: Well, it's the changing of roles. That isn't that far removed from daily life. A man gets up in the morning, puts on his mechanic's suit and he's a mechanic. But on the weekend he's wearing another hat. There's no way I should or could explain the movie. It's all connected, it all makes sense, and if that wasn't the case then I'd have to explain it. But I can't explain (his song) Desolation Row* either. It's connected on a level, almost a subliminal level, from scene to scene.

PF: But this movie goes on for over four hours. You don't mean to tell me that someone's supposed to be able to connect the whole thing subliminally?

BD: Well. I haven't really seen the movie in a while. So much has happened since I have seen it that I would really have to see it again to explain it to you. If I did see it, I could explain it. I haven't seen it in a while.

PF: But what about Sara and Joan Baez? Surely you must remember why they were there.

BD: Yeah, but they were the same woman, as demonstrated in the film. We know that they're different women 'cause we're watching the screen, but in that room (a scene in which they confront the real Bob Dylan about which one he really loves) they're the same woman.

PF: I didn't think they were the same woman.

BD: You didn't think that they were the same woman, but if you see the movie again, you'll see they were the same woman. The Woman In White (Baez) was played earlier by the woman we now call Clara (Sara Dylan) who was in that room, and the Woman In White who was in that room then was a manifestation of the past which did or didn't exist. They aren't two different people playing (laughs)... I know it's hard to grasp, but it's true nevertheless. They're the same persona.

PF: Look, I watched that movie and I saw two different women...

BD: But in reality they're not.

PF: In reality they certainly are; one is Joan Baez and one is Sara. And I think to others who watch that film that's how it appears, because there were no symbols or indications given to suggest anything else.

BD: Maybe so, but in reality they're not. They are really the same woman. It's like the ghost stepping outside itself.

PF: The ghost? What ghost?

BD: The ghost in the room... of the woman. (laughs) There really aren't any women there. (laughs)

PF: I know. I know... and Bob Dylan wasn't really there. I spent four hours watching this movie, but God knows why.

BD: That's right.

PF: Are you trying to be evasive or are you seriously trying to help me understand?

BD: Ah, evasiveness is all in the mind. It's about what is beneath the mask. The mask in this movie isn't used to hide the inner self, it's used to show the inner self. The mask is more real than the face. The mask isn't hiding anything.

PF: Just what was it that you were trying to get out?

BD: Well. On different days you want to get different things out; your feelings, how they change from day to day. It's just a never-ending well.

PF: You've become a person of almost mythological stature to at least one generation. What, from your perspective, do you see Bob Dylan as having become?

BD: I don't know, I don't deal with that. I only deal on a musical level. You see, I know so much more than the people that listen to me. They might listen to me and hear what I'm doing, but where I come from is a place they might not know and that's what forms my music.

PF: Tell me about those places.

BD: First of all, I only listen to a certain type of music, but that which I do listen to, some of it has profoundly changed my life. If I'd never heard Woody Guthrie or some other people I'd have never been doing what I'm doing – singing and playing my music. Yet how many people who have heard me have heard of them? So when I go through changes and people are looking at me wondering what's he going to do next, they don't have any knowledge of my background. People have a knowledge of the superficial things, see, but they shouldn't be conscious of these things, they shouldn't be bothered by them. Who they think I am or what they think I'm like, or what I'm wearing or what my parents' names were. It's not important. If it were, that's where I'd be.

PF: I've had an image of you as a person who has been very much alone in life.

BD: Well, my influences come from a time when things were simpler. Today things are so complicated. I think at least up in Canada you have more space to breathe but here things are pretty rushed and people are losing track of what happened before. People think of the Sixties as a special, revolutionary time, but if you look at the Sixties you see that they're no different than a lot of other times in the past. In 2060 we'll most probably be having another revolution.

PF: Do you find any contradiction between your Jewish roots and the fundamentalist existential philosophy on which you seem to base yourself?

BD: I don't have a strong Jewish tradition. If anything I'm a pagan Jew. Existentialist Jew, Buddhist Jew... I mean, I don't know what these things mean. Pure Jew? I don't know, I doubt it.

PF: To what extent do you engage in self-mockery? Both as a person and as a film maker.

BD: To no extent, because I am personally playing Renaldo, and Renaldo is responsible. In most of the film he ain't saying anything. Why? Because he ain't got anything to say? No!

PF: To what extent did he say nothing simply because he couldn't think of anything to say at the moment? A lot of your film was ad-libbed, wasn't it?

BD: If I'd have never told anybody that it was improvised, if I'd have shown people the script for this movie, they would have been excited to see the scenes and the dialogue. When we make a movie like this, and this is the only type of movie I'm interested in making, we use all our own people, so everyone knows everyone and has a hand in it. When you have people like this they all know what the other person is going to say and you don't need to write everything down. There was an outline for this movie. I mean, we didn't just all get together and say, "Go do whatever you want." There was an outline for this movie and there was a list of points that we wanted to cover in each scene.

PF: What directors have you admired?

BD: John Houston. Warhol was more than just a director, he busted through to new territory. But Bergman is so cold and lately with his recent films, for some reason, boredom sets in. Now Sam Peckinpah has influenced me; he's got a point of view. I mean, it's a distorted view of romance, a child's view of romance.

PF: How has your breakup with Sara affected your view of romance?

BD: Well, we were married a long time, and nobody in my family, I think, has ever been divorced, so it was a bit of a shock at first. I mean, I don't think that it really has anything to do with feelings. I still love her and I suspect that she still loves me. We just aren't married anymore.

PF: But why did you get married in the first place?

BD: That's a really interesting question. You have economic advantages if you're married, and if you're having children, you should be married.

PF: Why?

BD: I don't know. I'm just old-fashioned that way. Ah, who am I to say? Nobody's the same. No, I take that back. You don't have to be married to have children. That's really stupid. I think my uncle must have told me that. I suppose it didn't matter one way or the other, getting married or not getting married. California is hard on married people. It's tough to be married here because life is pretty loose. Young couples together have to have something in common, something they're working at, something in their relationship other than just looking at each other's eyes. Because it's not going to last that long.

PF: Do you still have the faith to keep searching for that one perfect person?

BD: Oh, I keep looking for that person.

PF: What must she have?

BD: She's got to have me inside her. I've got to look into her and see me.

PF: Isn't that a little narcissistic?

BD: Yeah! (laughs) But you asked me, so I told you. Or else she's got to be the opposite of me. But I believe we can find that person if we know ourselves real well. Ah, I don't know, I'd settle for someone who could just sew my pants right now.

PF: I imagine many women would like to become involved with you. Is that a problem?

BD: You mean loves? Well, I'm not too successful in that area so I pretty much just keep the friends I've got. I tend not to mess around too much.

PF: How do you see yourself as having changed from those times when you burst onto the scene with The Times They Are A-Changin'?

BD: Well, we change but stay the same. We always go 'round but come back to the same place. We don't change as much as we are bombarded by feelings along the way and those feelings make us become what we are.

PF: And what are you now?

BD: Me? What am I? I'm just a musician... a writer of songs that I sing. That's all I can really do. I do that, just that, real good. That's all I do and all I really want to do, and I'll make a movie now and then. I'm not politically inclined. My talent isn't in that area; it's just to play music. As it is, it falls into areas where people are politically motivated, but who cares? Like Blowin' In The Wind was just a feeling I felt because I felt that way.

PF: Is that why you seemed so reticent to get involved with the people in the American anti-war movement?

BD: No, no. I knew a lot of those people but I also know a lot of lesbians. They're not going to ask me to join a lot of campaigns just because I wrote Just Like A Woman.

PF: One of your songs that most affected me went, "My friends in the prison, they ask unto me...

BD: ...how good, how good does it feel to be free...

PF: (together with Bob)

BD: ...and I answer them most mysteriously, like a bird free from the skyway*." The whole world is a prison. Life is a prison, we're all inside the body. Freedom only comes from knowledge and knowledge is power. So just because you're out there in the desert, facing an endless sky and an unknown nothingness, doesn't necessarily mean you're free. You're trapped on the desert. Only knowledge of either yourself or the ultimate power can get you out of it. I don't know that much.

PF: Who do you read to find out?

BD: People I read? Dostoevsky, Tolstoy, Chekhov, Henry Miller, Joseph Conrad and Melville.

PF: In your film, you were walking through a graveyard with Allen Ginsberg, talking about different artists' gravestones. You saw a gravestone that said only the word "Husband" and you said, "I want an unmarked grave". Why did you say that?

BD: Well, these are things that Renaldo knows...

PF: You are being evasive.

BD: (laughs) Why an unmarked grave? What is a gravestone anyway except the supreme ego trip, isn't it really? Husband is a role that we play in this life and the movie has to do with roles that people play. So in that scene we had the father (Ginsberg) talking in some subliminal dream to a man who really is and isn't there, whose voice you hear although you're not sure if it is Renaldo or isn't Renaldo. So, you see, it's like a cubist painting, like you see all of it. I can see you but I can't see your back. What if I wanted to see your back and your front, all that together? That's what I was trying to do. So in order to perceive it all, you have to perceive first of all, "What's in his mind?" You just saw the movie once and thought that it was just a lot of masquerade, but it isn't! Whether it's a failure or not, I don't know. It could be. Maybe the movie just isn't for everybody. Maybe there are only two or three people in the universe who are going to understand what it's about.

PF: But you didn't make it for two or three people in the universe. After all, it's been reported that you spent over $1. 5 million making it.

BD: No, we didn't spend that much. I don't even know where they got that figure from.

PF: But suffice it to say that you've made one hell of an investment in both time and money...

BD: Yeah, and I think it was worthwhile. I'm not thinking about the money. If the film medium is a true canvas then the film has been worthwhile. If films break down and don't mean anything and don't last well, then...

PF: What is a work of art to you?

BD: Okay, you can stand in front of one of Cezannne's paintings for hours and see things, right? A work of art isn't anything but proof that a man lives to do it, and that while he did time, the universe stopped for him.

PF: I only have those conventions that I'm used to from my past to draw on in understanding your film. I'm not sure where to begin to understand the conventions of your film.

BD: Fortunately you don't have to. Unlike trying to understand Ezra Pound or T.S. Eliot we don't assume that we know something that you don't know. We're not trying to be aloof in the way that I think Pound is. You don't have to know much about the Sixties, you don't have to know that much about Bob Dylan and Joan Baez. These are all things of mythic value and because that's what they are, they only seem to be facts. But to understand this movie you just have to see it.

PF: But when you break with film convention, don't you run the risk that it won't be understood by the majority of the audience?

BD: Look, you're talking about someone who is a master of contriving drama on the screen. You're talking about someone who has studied the art of making a film as someone might study sculpture and know that this is what you do to get this effect. We get our effects in other ways which never were taught to me, which I just discovered. And I would rather do that than go to film school and learn how you make somebody cry, how you make somebody laugh. There are ways to do that.

PF: But you've done that in your songs for years.

BD: That's because I'm closer to music, and because I do laugh and cry. Films, I don't know... I'm not sure of that medium really.

PF: What do you feel you're working toward in your life now?

BD: We die and are reborn in our own lives many times and yet it is always heading out toward the end which is perhaps the beginning. What do we know about life and death? Nothing! Most people are working toward being one with God, trying to find him. They want to be one with the supreme power, they want to go Home, you know. From the minute they're born they want to know what they're doing here. I don't think there's anybody who doesn't feel that way. So we do what we can do while we're here and do the best we can... and that's all we can do. Renaldo And Clara is a movie. Once it's done, it's done. It's like my songs; I can't dwell on any one for too long. Once they're done, they're done. This movie, it's done. There will be other movies.

Rodney Gilchrist Interview, Los Angeles, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1037-1038.

One of the many interviews in Los Angeles crowded into early 1978, ostensibly to gain publicity for Renaldo And Clara. The resultant article by Roderick Gilchrist appeared in England's Daily Mail on 27/2/1978.

THE SIXTIES MAN WHO CAN'T UNDERSTAND THE SEVENTIES

In a cavernous converted furniture store in downtown Los Angeles Bob Dylan slumps deep into a brown settee and picks idly at the familiar curly hair. He has the flu. His nose is the colour of a cherry against the snowy face. He sniffles.

"The experiences I've had have been basically the experiences I've felt with the people of my own generation, ya know. I don't really know what younger people think or feel." A helpless shrug of the boney shoulders. He is warming to the memory of the big waves he used to ride.

"I don't know what the seventies are all about, man;" he says finally and after a long period of introspective analysis and nose blowing. "The only generation I'm in tune with is my own. The '60s were a shattering decade. The same thing happened in the 1860s. It seems to happen in the middle of the century. Now we're in the '70s and it's a period of reconstruction. Nothing new happening, nothing..."

David Zimmerman, the kid from Minnesota, who became a troubadour spokesman for yesterday's generation with "Times They Are A-Changin'" and other heated 45 r.p.m. reflections which so accurately articulated the mood of dissent and independence of adolescents a decade ago. Today, for him there are no more peace marches, no more easy-rider motor-bikes, no more stands against conservative values and the Establishment.

The man who was hailed as some kind of pathfinder to a new society, is 36. A lonely celebrity in fashionable Malibu, rich, confused, depressed over his recent divorce and separation from his four children, and currently pursuing an unusual policy for such a recluse of courting the press to promote his new four-hour film 'Renaldo and Clara' "to save on the advertising." For a man who once wrote 'Propaganda all is phoney,' there are many who are saying it is the ultimate commercial sell-out. The explosives are being placed under an icon. The fuses all but lit.

He shrugs. The shrug says "Who cares?" Someone asks Dylan what he thinks of rock and roll today. He says: "There's no rock and roll. It's an imitation. I never did do rock and roll. The Beatles and the Stones weren't rock and roll. It ended with Little Anthony and the Imperials."

Oh, yes, Dylan is in fine cynical form. The conversation turns to his new film, a curious Felliniesque confection of his 1975 tour through the U.S.A. 'Rolling Thunder' and a fantasy scenario in which the musicians impersonate pilgrims and cowboys, gypsies and hookers.

But that is not the unfathomable scene. Throughout the movie Joan Baez, Dylan's celebrated former mistress, wends her way as a mysterious figure by the name of 'Woman in White, ' who appears to be headed for a confrontation with Clara – played by his ex-wife Sara over the affections of Renaldo, who is played by Dylan. Whether the film was an attempt to win back his wife or some strange confirmation of his new single state he won't say. For a man with a rare talent to create truth and color with his music he seems almost illiterate when denied his guitar through which to make his statements. The cleverly projected image of cowboy-outlaw-poet seems long redundant.

17 February 1978
Press conference, International Airport Haneda, Tokyo, Japan

Source: Circulating tape

All questions are voiced in Japanese, and a Japanese female interpreter puts them in English for Dylan. I have two tapes for the conference, one [5m21s] contains the first 12 Dylan responses and seems to be a clean recording of the beginning of the conference; while the other one [1m18s] is heavily edited and cuts out most of English interpretation of the questions to Dylan. There are, however, two extra comments from Dylan which undoubtedly answer questions asked right after the 12 initial ones.

Ladies and gentlemen, we proudly introduce you to the world famous superstar, Mr Bob Dylan!

Q: I'm sure you are very tired, but we are very welcome to you, very welcome to have you in Japan.
BD: Good.
Q: We haven't had any concerts in the recent two years and what is your motive for holding these concerts in Japan?
BD: What is my motive?
Q: What motivated you to come to Japan?
BD: No motive, just… that's a place we always wanted to come to play.
Q: For the Japanese tour you have rehearsed for about two months—is that right?—do you always do that?
BD: Well… we are always rehearsing. We're rehearsing to record an album. We're always rehearsing. We never stop rehearsing.
Q: Are you going to introduce any new songs in these concerts?
BD: Maybe.
Q: What is the title to the songs?
BD: Oh, various titles, some don't have any titles yet.
Q: At the press interview in Los Angeles you said you were on your new album already…
BD: Uh-huh.
Q: …and that the theme for it is "love". What is your concept for love?
BD: There are different reasons(??)
Q: ??? (dismayed) Is there any difference between your love and the love that Beatles sing, or you're going to sing about love?
BD: Huh?
Q: Is there any difference between their idea of love and your idea?
BD: They might be… of a different point of view.
Q: What are the differences?
BD: My point of view is less abstract than their point of view.
Q: I see… Up till now you used to sing the protesting songs, right? How do they come about for making the theme love this time?
BD: Well, protest songs are really love songs, too. They were my most brilliant love songs.
Q: [Japanese only]
BD: Well, I'm not a god of folk songs.
Q: Then what are you?
BD: I'm just a person.

February 1978
Randy Anderson interview for The Minnesota Daily, Santa Monica, California

An interview with DYLAN by Randy Anderson

After spending half my life living closely with his words and music, I am now face to face with the most important artist of my generation. Bob Dylan shakes my hand weakly, puts down his coffee cup next to mine and bums a Marlboro.

RA: Greetings from the Midwest—it's ten below there. Which coffee cup's mine?

BD: This one's mine, that must be yours.

RA: Mine's starting to curdle... I'm running out of cigarettes.

BD: I just got over the flu. Actually I think I still got the flu.

RA: I heard that... Are you tired of doing this?

BD: Interviews?

RA: Yeah.

BD: (In an encouraging tone of voice) No, not at all. (Strains of "Lay Lady Lay" in the background.)

RA: ...Would you be interested in talking about your days at the University of Minnesota?

BD: Yeah, sure.

RA: When I talk about those days—and I don't even remember how long they were—what kind of feelings does that conjure up? Good times? Bad times?

BD: Well, I remember people more than events you know. Ah, David Wicker, Hugh Brown, Ernie Washington—you know any of those people?

RA: No, I'm younger than you are—about six years.

BD: Ah, John Koerner—Dave Ray was just getting out of high school.

RA: ...So how long were you in school at the U?

BD: (taking a long drag on cigarette) I was registered there for about six months (1960). I never did get an academic rating. I registered there for six months and I was there beyond that time. I don't re-member much about it—Scott Hall, Ford Hall.

RA: What classes did you take?

BD: I took ah,... English. I remember an anthropology course I took, which took place in a big auditorium most of the time. Umm, I think those are the only classes I actually even attended. (smiles)

RA: Was there anything valuable about your academic experience? What turned you off or on?

BD: No, ah nothing... I would hang around mostly at the cafe. What's the name of that place?

RA: The Scholar?

BD: No, no on campus there—

RA: Is it still there?

BD: Yeah, they turned it into an auditorium. I saw because I played there when I got back from New York the first time. You know the Little Sandy Review was published in Minneapolis?

RA: Yeah.

BD: And that was just starting up when I was there. So there was that type of general atmosphere and that was the atmosphere that I was only interested in. I didn't much get interested in any other activity school-wise. I figured after high school my schoolin' days were over.

RA: How was your high school experience?

BD: Ah well, I was playin' music in high school too and I was workin' in high school so (five second pause)—

RA: That must seem like light years away.

BD: (quickly) It does, it does now. (with an air of admission) My mind was always outside the classroom.

RA: Really?

BD: Yeah, I don't think I was compelled in any way in the classroom.

RA: Never any teachers or professors that meant anything to you?

BD: There were some good ones, some good teachers at Hibbing High. But I had teachers that my mother had so—

RA: They're probably still there! How important is Minnesota, Hibbing and Minneapolis to you?

BD: I feel very comfortable there. And I do get back every so often. I was up in Hibbing a few years ago (six second pause)—

RA: How was that?

BD: (quickly) Well it hasn't changed. I was glad to see that. (ten second pause) You know, like a lot of people go back to their hometown and they find their hometown's been replaced by a supermarket or something.

RA: When was the last time you saw the West Bank?

BD: Well the West Bank has changed since when I was there. The University has changed a lot, Minneapolis has changed a lot, but Hibbing hasn't.

RA: How has Minneapolis changed?

BD: All the recent development. I think that when I was goin' to school there, there was about 20,000 students, maybe 25,000. I don't know how many there are now but I think it's much more.

RA: Maybe 50,000.

BD: 50,000? So, there wasn't any development on the West bank. There was that Seven Corners area where it was undeveloped. It was like London or New York or the Soho district. But I see they've taken all that and developed it and made it into dormitories or ah—

RA: Highrise apartments.

BD: Yes. There wasn't any of that there when I was there. It had a different look to it and a whole different feel. They didn't have any of that stuff when I was there, it was just old, old houses.

RA: When you were there, were you already making plans to go to New York?

BD: Yeah, I had made plans to go to New York. Most of the people were leaving anyway. And I had done about as much as I could there in Minneapolis. I went to Chicago first and stayed there. Then I went up to Wisconsin, which was more or less the same general scene as it was at the school in Minnesota. And from there I went to New York. That was quite a trip... another guitar player and myself got a ride with a young couple from the campus whose parents were from Brooklyn. They were goin' there and wanted some more drivers, so we just drove.

RA: So what does it feel like when you go back to Minnesota and—

BD: Well, it feels the same. I relax more there than I do out here or anywhere else.

RA: Do you like LA—Malibu?

BD: I don't think in terms of liking it, I think of it in terms of a place I have to be. Now I have to be here because it is centrally located to what I'm doing.

We are sitting in a stark room in a reconverted furniture factory that Dylan has rented as a rehearsal hall. He's working hard at whipping a new band into shape for his upcoming tour of Japan and Australia. Throughout the interview the band can be heard jamming upstairs.

It's a rainy day in Santa Monica, California. Earlier, I had rendezvoused with Paul Wasserman, Dylan's press agent, at his Beverly Hills offices. Together we drove down to the rehearsal hall, chatting amiably about—among other things—Dylan, the interview, the movie Renaldo and Clara. (It's been reported that after Dylan screened his long, cryptic movie for Wasserman—the man he had picked to launch the publicity campaign—Dylan said, "It's not Star Wars, is it Paul?").

During our engaging conversations, Wasserman tells me that Dylan felt he was burning himself out with these interviews, that he was having trouble coming up with new answers and that he was repeating himself.

"I told him not to worry about it, that it would add to the mystique," Wasserman says. "He didn't find that too humorous."

After the interview, as we walked toward his car in a torrential downpour. Wasserman asks me, "Was he mystical?" I replied in the negative.

But that mystical stuff can get to you when you're sitting in this room alone for an hour and a half waiting for the man to appear. Wasserman, a very kind and considerate man (contrary to reports), keeps bringing me coffee and at one point apologizes for Dylan's lateness (it seems he's stopped off at the doctor's on the way in from his much-publicized, copper-domed Xanadu in Malibu). Band members, sound men and security guys come in and out, by and large a friendly bunch. One of them leans over to me and says, "This waiting—I think it's part of the technique."

The waiting does give me chance to drink in the environment, to get relaxed. I make a list of everything in the room: two non-descript beige couches: a big color TV; a grade school-level mural painting of a rainbow (red, yellow and green), some clouds and some birds; two huge speakers; two closed circuit TVs; a huge sound board behind me; and on top of a coffee table, a TV Guide, a white painter's hat, and a list of something. I lean over to check out the list—it's a list of songs: "Tambourine Man," "Like a Rolling Stone," "Positively 4th Street," "Ballad of a Thin Man" and on and on—I couldn't look anymore. It was the one thing in the room that seemed to be a grim reminder of the enormity of Dylan's contribution. I manage to avoid looking at it for the remainder of my wait, turning around to stare at the mixing board behind me and at a crazy drawing in orange, purple and green chalk on a blackboard behind that. I decide to kill time by sketching it:

X

I look closely at the smudged caption and it looks something like, "Another Self-Portrait." I chuckle to myself and hope that, yes indeed, there is some levity among these people.

I continue staring at the gray concrete floor and suddenly there's a noise, somebody walks in and plops down on the other couch. I look up and it's Dylan, unshaven and looking scruffy as usual (still "the unwashed phenomenon, the original vagabond," that strayed into Joan Baez' heart) with a Big Apple hat pulled over his riotous black locks. He's wearing a black leather jacket, an off-white collarless shirt, blue jeans and a pair of white, California penny loafers. We exchange nervous pleasantries and begin to talk about Minnesota.

As we talk, I notice that Dylan has many different rhythms to his speech—depending on how interested he is in the topic or how sure he is of what he's saying. Sometimes, he talks in a New York, street-jive style, sometimes in our bland Midwestern style and at other times, in a curious Southern drawl. He has a habit of taking long pauses when he's conversing with someone, something I'd luckily picked up beforehand in reading what others had said. Also, I knew he had once written: "experience teaches that silence terrifies people the most," I decide to gut those silences out, and soon I find he doesn't do it to offend anyone or to appear spacy, but to think, consider his words, or to show that he has nothing to say at the moment. He leans forward and talks faster when he's interested or has got something prefabricated to relate. And, he's obviously in shape to talk about Renaldo and Clara.

RA: How important is spontaneity to your art?

BD: Well, the movie wasn't spontaneous. It might seem that way cuz it was so natural. But it wasn't a spontaneous movie at all. People like to think it was because some of it's improvised. But not really, it wasn't a spontaneous movie in the sense that people go out and do anything they want to do and that will find its way into the movie. It was outlined by fact.

RA: You put things down on paper.

BD: Hmmm—well, it seems so natural that people think that—well, it must be spontaneous.

RA: That's really hard to do though.

BD: Yeah it is hard to do.

RA: What were some of your techniques?

BD: You just have to get that drama out of people. You have to have control and you have to know what it is you're doing, want to do and what the end result will be and you can make it happen like that. Personally, I would rather see it happen like that. Your best actors are people who, when you're lookin' at 'em, you do think that they're acting spontaneously. (begins to slip into his street jive manner, sounding very sure and slightly defiant) You see Jack Nicholson in a movie—I mean you never think he's acting. You think he's thinkin' of them lines right at the time he's sayin' 'em.

RA: There were a lot of people who were not known as actors before who were able to pull that off.

BD: There were. Well, it's in everyone, everyone wants to act you know.

RA: How do you mean?

BD: Well, given the opportunity, people do want to act out a role other than themselves.

RA: Do you share that interest? Or, are you more interested in the directing end of it?

BD: To a certain degree, but I'm more related to the music.

RA: Do you find it's difficult to put words to a piece of art like the film? Would you rather have the music and visual images speak for themselves?

BD: Oh yeah, yeah, that's my preference. My preference isn't to talk about the film because it isn't explainable. Either it works for you or it doesn't work for you. And if it doesn't work for you, me explaining it isn't going to make it work for you.

RA: Exactly. Reading between the lines of some of the articles written about Renaldo and Clara, one gets the idea that the movie's inaccessible. But it's not—though it is inexplicable. Saying that it is can turn people off.

BD: It isn't an inaccessible movie, it isn't at all. It's a very simple movie to follow. It's inaccessible to people who are burdened down with their own logic, who have preconceived ideas. Those people aren't going to let themselves be affected by what they're seeing.

RA: Who do you think the audience is for the movie?

BD: Anybody who's been through any of those things at all is going to be a receptive audience for that movie. Anybody who's been through that struggle.

RA: What struggle?

BD: That alter-ego struggle against the subconscious which is always going through there. But we don't like to call it that or say that because it's an awful big undertaking. But that's exactly what is happening in that movie. It's the subconscious mind against the alter-ego in that movie. Something is wishing to become something else. Whether it's possible or whether it succeeds, we don't know that. The movie doesn't provide any answers. But nothing provides any answers—War and Peace doesn't provide any answers.

RA: But that's what people want, especially American moviegoers. They want simplicity, they want everything explained, they want that storyline.

BD: It doesn't have any of that.

RA: Europeans are more used to films as opposed to movies. Most Americans go to movies, to be entertained. Renaldo and Clara is a film and you don't necessarily go to it to be entertained.

BD: Well, my songs aren't explainable either. And there shouldn't be any reason why this movie or this film, should be any different than a song I feel close to.

RA: Have you ever met Keith Jarrett?

BD: Yeah, I think so.

RA: I talked to him awhile back about popular music and he claimed that virtually all popular music is a waste of time, because if the words are good enough people aren't going to pay attention to the music, and if the music's good enough it doesn't need any words.

BD: I don't find that true.

RA: We went on about this, and he finally brought up your name, saying that you were the only person who is able to pull that off—mixing words and music. And of course, he has done some of your tunes on his early records.

BD: That's probably because subconsciously I'm aware of both as being equal. I'm always aware of that fact. I can't write something where the music is heavier or more loaded than the lyric or the lyric is more loaded than the music. It would just be something I couldn't do. That's why some of the tunes that have an emotional quality, an intense emotional quality, will have a very simple melody—a folk melody.

RA: Most of what happened to me as a moviegoer during Renaldo and Clara was in the realm of feeling. Sometimes I was depressed, sometimes I was exhilarated, at times my mind wandered—the times my mind wandered made the intense scenes that much more powerful by contrast—but comparing emotional notes with the person I saw the movie with, well, both of us felt very sad after the movie. Do you think that's a strange reaction?

BD: No, no, not at all. There's a lot of sadness that develops in that movie. A lot of dead ends. But the overall picture shouldn't be one of sadness, it should be one of—what's the word?—it should be one of resolve. It is resolved. But you're—there is a great deal of sadness in it, but it doesn't leave you sad—

RA: I don't follow you.

BD: —but it could though. Well, it leaves you at the end with an out—because it is the morning of this man's life.

RA: Yeah.

BD: No matter what he's gone through, no matter who he knows, no matter what's been done to him, it still is the morning.

RA: Hope?

BD: Hope, yeah. So, although there is a great deal of sadness that develops, it is conceivable that the sadness will be broken after the movie ends.

RA: If I said there was a lack of humor and lightness in Renaldo and Clara would that strike you as wrong?

BD: No, no. Ummm...

RA: Every once in a while I wished for something to break the tension cuz I was concentrating so hard. Sometimes the music did that.

BD: Uh-huh. That's just the nature of the film to be that way. It is intense. There is no out.

RA: I think that's where the depression comes in, at least my feelings of it. I was very moved by parts of the film, but I'm wondering whether the mass audience will...

BD: Well, we don't know if the mass audiences will, but it's not really for a mass audience. The mass audience doesn't go for my music either. So there's no real reason why it should have to appeal to a mass audience to be successful.

RA: But you still have to sell a lot of tickets.

BD: You do have to sell tickets—

RA: And that's probably why we're doing the interview in the first place—to help out the film.

BD: I'm hopin' we would help out the film, so people know that there's a film to see. But we can't explain the film. There's no way we can do that.

RA: But do you see what I mean? There's a problem here. It's the old money and art problem I guess—a cliché but it's very real.

BD: It is yeah. Well, we just do the best we can and that's all we can do you know—we can try.

RA: Do you read any of the articles written about the film? You're old enough now, maybe that stuff doesn't affect you anymore.

BD: Personally, I don't believe that critical acclaim or denunciation is going to affect the movie one way or another. I think it's the people who see the movie which will decide for themselves whether they want their friends to see it.

RA: So the jury is still out as far as you're concerned?

BD: Well, there really isn't a jury——

RA: Well, there's a critical consensus from the masses or the people.

BD: (six second pause) Well, I think in 20 years we'll see. If that movie's still playin' in 20 years, well then I guess it'll have something to say that's speaking to the people. If it isn't, well then it just didn't reach enough people.

RA: I'm glad you brought that up, because another feeling I had was that the film had an aura of timelessness to it.... Do you think in 20, 50 or 100 years, people will say Renaldo and Clara was "the '60s" or "the '70s"—like Saturday Night Fever is in the '70s—or will they say that it's a real timeless movie, that you just can't place it.

BD: Yeah, it's a timeless movie. There's nothing that locks that movie into any age.

RA: Except maybe the '60s a little bit.

BD: Well, there's a sign on a theater up in Harlem, showin' Earthquake—

RA: You mean the Apollo Theater-scope.

BD: Yeah, so that'll date it if you want to get that specific.

RA: Speaking of the Apollo Theater, you once wrote: "the fact that the white house is filled with leaders that've never been to the apollo theater amazes me." (from the jacket notes to Bringing It All Back Home) Which made me think that this film has been simmering on your backburners for a few years and that you picked out scenes like the Apollo Theater that mean something to you.

BD: Yeah, this film—this is the right time for this film. I couldn't have made it before, but I've been thinkin' about it.

RA: For a long period of time?

BD: Off and on, yeah.

RA: ...You've been up to the Apollo Theater in Harlem haven't you?

BD: Yeah, I used to go there on Monday nights a lot.

RA: You can't do that anymore can you?

BD: Oh, well, I've never had any trouble walking around in neighborhoods.

RA: Think black people would be interested in the film?

BD: In this film?

RA: Yeah.

BD: (sincerely) I really don't know. It's a truthful film. And we're not lookin' at people as either black or white. It's an experience beneath the mind, it's—I don't think you have to be any certain color to relate to the film.

RA: But one of the things that you pick up in your film or your art is a great sensitivity and love for minorities and the disadvantaged.

BD: Well, it's not that so much as a love for truth. Ah, I don't love black or green or white or blue or whatever happens to be the color of different people. But in a search for truth you find different elements that happen to be involved with how certain people treat other people—economically, socially or personally.

RA: The quest for truth brings to mind Moby Dick—ever read it?

BD: Yeah.

RA: ...Melville's book wasn't appreciated until long after he was dead—people never really read it until the 1920s.

BD: Right.

RA: Did you ever think Renaldo and Clara might be something like that?

BD: Probably. It probably is.

RA: You might not even be around to see it appreciated.

BD: I could believe that. Sure. Joseph Conrad wasn't appreciated either in his time. Look at Van Gogh, I mean he couldn't even sell a painting to eat.

RA: Does that bother you?

BD: Well, yeah, in a work like this it does. Because you know, you can't expect people to go out there and accept it the way they would the Mona Lisa. People lookin' at the Mona Lisa—they might just say, "Well, it's a picture of a woman with a smile." You know, that's all they might see. And in this movie too, they might go to it and say, "Well, it's a movie about Bob Dylan and Joan Baez." And that's all they might see. I understand that that's where people are comin' from. But still I've got a belief that you have to do whatever it is that you're doing. You can't compromise with the fact that you must do what you must do.

RA: Compromise is an anathema to being an artist?

BD: Uh-huh. Yeah, the artists that are really successful, that make platinum records and that are makin' movies and all that—I mean they're compromisin' a whole lot. I mean they're just calculatin' what the audience will want.

RA: Is there any value at all in any of that stuff?

BD: I don't look at those people as true artists.

RA: Just production people—

BD: No, they're just intelligent people who can get it together to superficially satisfy a lot of people.

RA: That seems to be what a lot of Americans are after—fast food, MacDonald's hamburgers—

BD: Yeah, yeah.

RA: —and a record is just like a hamburger, just consume it and it's over.

BD: Yeah.

RA: Do you find yourself alienated from the average, common person, leading the life that you do?

BD: Maybe so, maybe so. I don't know. I never eat in restaurants. I won't eat in one. Once in a while I will, but as a rule I won't eat in a restaurant. I don't go places most people go to ah—

RA: But as an artist don't we have to keep in touch with the people, the country, the earth—

BD: Sure, sure we do.

RA: So how do you do that? One has to, otherwise we become solipsistic—

BD: Otherwise we go into a monastery. No, I'm not livin' in a monastery. I'm out and about in the world, and I just come in contact with where people are and what their feelings are and from that I create the artistic experience—plus my own feelings and instinct that I have myself, I use that and sometimes it seems like there isn't enough time to go and be where you wanna be.

RA: See. in other ages artists could live among the people, and be of the people.

BD: Well, look at Baudelaire or Lord Byron. They could write a monumental work sittin' in a café, you know.

RA: Doesn't that bother you as a limitation—

BD: Yeah, but that's the environment in this country. You can't really do that. You're reality is broken up by plastic and it affects you. And if you don't want that plastic in your work you'll have to go elsewhere. So it's a continual search to find what's real. What's real and what's more organic in a way.

RA: One of my favorite poets is Walt Whitman and of course he was able to walk among the streets of Brooklyn and embrace the people.

BD: Allen Ginsberg does that to a certain degree.

RA: He can get away with that.

BD: Yeah, he can get away with that. Me, I'm not that type of poet, because I play music. And I have to play that on the stage. So when you're playin' on the stage it's a—you're of the people but you're not of the people.

RA: (making a gesture) There's a—

BD: No, there really isn't a wall there. It's all the same room. But, you really sometimes have to hole up to gain that inspiration.

Only time will tell if Renaldo and Clara is Dylan's Moby Dick or a self-important, artistic white elephant. On a peaceful California evening, I saw the film at the Regent Theatre in Westwood near the UCLA campus. For four dollars you get four hours plus of film, one hour of which is devoted to concert footage from the Rolling Thunder tour of 1976. (Dylan edited down 100 hours of film to four hours—and I'm sure the A. J. Webermans of the world would kill to see the 96 hours that ended up on the cutting room floor.)

The musical interludes are arguably the best scenes in the film. Dylan's rendering of "Isis" is riveting (it drew a smattering of applause in Westwood)—as is "One More Cup of Coffee" and "Sara." The whole group of gypsies do righteous versions of Curtis Mayfield's "People Get Ready" (as Dylan's entourage tours an Indian gathering) and Dylan's "Knockin' on Heaven's Door." As much as I dislike her, Joan Baez did raise goosebumps with "Diamonds and Rust," her transparent ode to Bob. But then she embarrasses herself with a non-seductive, flailing dance onstage while Roger McGuinn leads the band through "Eight Miles High." McGuinn follows that with a fine vocal on "Chestnut Mare." There are a lot of close-ups in the concert footage and all the performers come off as dedicated and intense throughout.

The three hours given over to improvised vignettes, broken and recurrent storylines and semi-documentary inserts would definitely make the movie tedious and cumbersome to a non-fan. Following Warhol's lead, Dylan lets the cameras roll on, waiting for special moments. The obligatory, Felliniesque bordello scenes which keep cropping up are questionable in their relevancy. So are the snippets of Ginsberg reading "Kaddish" to a confused bunch of Jewish matrons at some naugahyde nightclub. However, Sara Dylan is an interesting onscreen figure—still beautiful despite being in her upper thirties and having born five children and despite the fact she takes to wearing a hideous wig halfway through the movie.

Ronnie Hawkins, the big old rockabilly singer the Band backed up in their early days and who ostensibly plays "Bob Dylan" in the movie, does a good job in an improvised scene in which he tries to lure a farmer's daughter into joining him on the road—memorable quote: "Rock and roll's the answer—live fast, love hard and die young." The freeze-frame, street interviews with blacks on the Hurricane Carter issue are also affecting.

The film was shot down the line of the Rolling Thunder tour on the East Coast: New York, Cape Cod, Maine, with a sidetrip up to Quebec City. The film has an annoying randomness to it, with one attempt made at making it cohere: a sort of ad hoc, rambling narrative by David Blue who functions as Boswell to Dylan's Johnson, remembering things past as he plays a losing game of pinball poolside in some Cape Cod motel. Some of it's very funny.

Many of the characters (who seem to interchange roles as the movie rolls along) wear makeup. Dylan himself starts out the movie by singing "When I Paint My Masterpiece" onstage with a plastic, transparent mask on. Indeed, in watching the movie, it's confusing as to which was more important—the mask or what was behind the mask. Renaldo and Clara is also vaguely and hesitatingly autobiographical—the final scene of the Woman in White (Joan Baez) interrupting the love-making of Dylan and Sara is undeniably a contorted attempt to come to terms with the frighteningly fuzzy line between myth and reality that obtains in the movie. Still, it's a fascinating albeit somewhat false contretemps.

By the time I talked to Dylan, the critics had pretty much lambasted Renaldo and Clara. For most, figuratively and literally, it was a pain in the ass (with only a 100 millimeter cigarette intermission to ease the ache). It's not like eating at MacDonald's. It's as if Dylan had made a huge, four-sided album that, condensed down, would have made a great double album. Still, for four dollars—if you can dismiss what critics have said about Dylan's self-indulgence and supposed Messianic complex—it's worth it. Just allow yourself to be dragged into the dreamy momentum of a long, late-night flight.

Sensing the non-commercial nature of Renaldo and Clara, Dylan had Wasserman (the publicity man in entertainment, he also has handled the likes of the Rolling Stones, Linda Ronstadt, Paul Simon and James Taylor) to set up interviews to plug the movie, in hopes of salvaging some of the 1,25 million dollars he sunk into it.

RA: ...an interviewer sometimes feels like a thief when he interviews someone—

BD: Heh! Heh!

RA: It's like the old African tribesmen who feel like you're stealing part of their soul when you take a picture of them. Like I get people to talk and then I get it on tape and take it home and show it to the public. That make any sense to you?

BD: Oh yeah. I agree with that picture-taking thing. You gotta have a protective layer around ya to have your picture taken. And, I feel the same exact way as those old tribesmen, about havin' your picture taken. I don't believe it's really proper, to do that to somebody else.

RA: I really don't either and that's why sometimes I feel morally against interviews as verbal pictures—although it's my job. How do you approach an interview given that you feel like that?

BD: How do I do an interview?

RA: Yeah, you're obviously aware that that's my job.

BD: Yeah, I've just become accustomed to that. I used to do interviews in the old days so I know what they are. I haven't done 'em in a long time cuz I really had nuthin' to do an interview about. I didn't figger what I was doin' was that interesting. So now we're doin' interviews and why? I couldn't really say for sure. But it seemed like a good idea cuz of this movie, so whatever you wanna know I'm gonna try to tell ya.

RA: ...I once saw the movie Don't Look Back. As an interviewer there's no way I can purge that from my mind when I come to talk with you and when I'm waiting here for you to come in. How you are now is totally different from the bullshit that's been passed down to us over the years.

BD: Yeah, a lot has changed though since those days. People in those days—that was the establishment press we were talking to. They didn't understand what was goin' on in the musical arena. But nowadays, I've found from doin' these interviews that there's a lot of people who do understand what I've been doin', so it isn't that difficult because people relate to me on that level where before people were relating to me—"What's this phenomenon that's being created?"; "What does that song mean?"—they would just coldly ask me these things. How was I to explain to them what the song meant? They should have asked the crowd. They should have asked the audience what the songs meant. And they never do. They never talk to my audience. They always wanna hear it from me or else they make up their own mind and they tend to disregard all the people that do find something worthwhile in my work.

RA: Have most of these interviews been enjoyable?

BD: I've found them to be interesting because I get a sense of what people are thinkin' of the movie when they see it. Some people say, "Gee, I saw it and I didn't understand it." Or some other people say, "I saw it and I understood a lot of it and didn't understand some of it." And some people say, "I thought it was—you know, brilliant." People react in different ways, and they usually say that right off.

RA: What's been the breakdown pro and con?

BD: Very mixed. Very, very mixed. If you really wanna know what the people are thinkin' you should just go to the movie theater and ask the people when they're comin' out. That's the way you're gonna find out what people are thinkin' of this movie cuz I can't tell you what anybody's thinkin' of this movie. And you can't tell me, you know.

RA: As a 36-year-old artist do you still suffer from insecurity in regard to your work? A lot of people think, "He's gone through it all, he probably doesn't care what we say about him anyway." Or, do you find that insecurity is a permanent part of existence no matter who you are.

BD: Yeah, insecurity in the area of being able to write and perform. (ten second pause) I had that for a while... Yeah, around like '72, '73. I wasn't sure what I was gonna do and didn't really feel much like singin' and playin' or writing. But nowadays... if you have belief then you won't be insecure.

RA: Faith—in yourself and in your work?

BD: Yeah.

RA: Yet faith in yourself is something that goes up and down isn't it?

BD: That's right... you want some more cigarettes?

RA: Yeah, I'd love some.

BD: Lemme go get some.

RA: How much more time we got Bob?

BD: Well, let's just talk and see.

Tape off. Dylan returns; upstairs, the band plays on—sounds vaguely like the Allman's "Mountain Jam."

RA: Say, did you have any misgivings about granting us an interview? I mean... we're not exactly Rolling Stone or Playboy.

BD: No I really didn't. Not at all.

Dylan had talked to several people by the time A&E got an interview. In reading some of the interviews, I got the impression that he would be arrogant and unfriendly. (For Playboy, he didn't take his sunglasses off for days.) At the very least, I expected an encounter with the Jack of Hearts—that archetypal rascal, master of ambiguity. Yet already, one unforgettable thing about the interview is how friendly, how human he seems. Perhaps it's part of the demythologizing process. He isn't necessarily helpful to an interviewer (in fact he's a bit lazy in answering questions, and definitely considers interviews work) but he does, in subtle ways, make you feel relaxed. Invariably, a good stretch of music from his band upstairs distracts him a little, causing him to tap his feet. Essentially though, he's a very restless person—like an energetic youth in a boring math class.

Nonetheless, he's undeniably charismatic. His eyes are most memorable—steel blue to some, "bluer than robins' eggs" to Joan Baez ("Diamonds and Rust"). They dart, dance and fix, attesting to an inner intensity when his voice falls silent. More than anything, they remind you that you're not talking to any "regular guy"—the man was not destined for anonymity.

RA: Did you ever read The Great Gatsby? (Young man leaves Minnesota, changes name and. answering the "drum of destiny," becomes a mysterious, famous figure in New York)

BD: Yeah, I read it in high school, but I couldn't tell you anything about it though.

RA: Did you have a dream you wanted to live out like Gatsby?

BD: No, not exactly that, because I always played the guitar. It was always directed toward the music I was playing.

RA: ...Do you feel you have a public persona that functions as a mask for you that you can fall back on?

BD: No, I don't feel I have that persona to fall back on. I don't consider myself in the public eye. I'm in the public eye superficially but I don't consider myself being a public personality.

RA: I guess what I'm talking about is the Dylan myth, the one that you're making us confront somewhat in Renaldo and Clara.

BD: There's no myth for me to fall back on. It's ah... whoever said there was a myth? Time magazine or Newsweek magazine might have said there was a myth.

RA: Exactly. But that's something that you have to live with, that becomes part of your life that I don't have to live with...

BD: But I don't feel I'm in any danger because I've never believed it.

RA: But that's a struggle that you have that most people don't have. It's a struggle against what people are doing with your life.

BD: Yeah—

RA: What's that like?

BD: Well, sometimes, at different times you confront people who can't see you. I've met a lot of them. They can't see you. They're only seeing the myth, or whatever they're choosing to see.

RA: What do you do with a person like that?—give 'em the myth or say to hell with 'em and don't deal with 'em?

BD: Those incidents don't usually last a great deal of time—they don't usually last too long. But I know what you mean because I've experienced it.

RA: What I'm basically getting at is that those occurrences aren't everyday occurrences for everyday people. I would imagine the myth's a burden—maybe it isn't.

BD: Well, a myth is a story, a myth isn't a person necessarily. A myth is a happening. We think of things in mythological terms: the myth of the younger sister, the myth of the false bride, the myth of the two brothers, the myth of the king and queen. We think of those stories and involvements as myths. Singular people we can't really consider as being myths, although we can. We have the myth of Robin Hood—

RA: That's more like a legend.

BD: A legend yeah. Legendary is for singular people. But mythological isn't. I think people have just got the wrong terminology when they think of me in terms of myth.

RA: But just because of the way the country is set up, it has a way of making living people seem larger than life. And maybe some people have an inner need to have heroes.

BD: Maybe so but ah... (ten second pause) legendary is something that happens after we die or after we're gone. So like if we experience a lot of different changes in this life you can become legendary, meaning that something you did yesterday you're not doing anymore.

RA: When the history of the 20th century is written, how would you like to be remembered?... The reason I bring it up is because of that scene in the movie when you and Ginsberg are standing by Kerouac's grave—or don't those things concern you?

BD: No, it doesn't really concern me —how I'm going to be remembered.

RA: But to get involved with art on such a grandiose scale there has to be an ego involved.

BD: You're concerned with being remembered by your children... and your neighbors. (ten second pause) In those terms, I'd like to be remembered as doing the best I could—for them and for myself.

RA: How important are your children in your life?—or is that an unfair question? (Dylan is recently divorced and for the past year has been playing a painful game of tug-'o-war with his wife over the children)

BD: No, it's not an unfair question (12 second pause).

RA: In other words, what fulfillment do they give you that art can't give you? Is it an extra dimension?

BD: (ten second pause, and then he speaks softly and poignantly) Yeah, it's maybe the only dimension that really counts. We're all playin' games with this art business you know.

But in reality it's a—we have to be able to, we have to be willing to be a fulfilled human being.

RA: Did you figure that out of an early age or was there a time when you thought of yourself as a permanent single person, traveling light and fast... or did you always want children?

BD: Well, that's just a belief in life. At a certain point, you must decide whether you want to sacrifice your ideas for something which may have more value. Sacrifice your ideas for something which has more value in terms of flesh and blood. You just are either orientated that way or you're not.

RA: You don't think all people are oriented that way?

BD: I don't think of all people as being fulfilled the same way.

RA: ...I find I constantly change my attitude about something I've done. Do you have that problem with the film? The film is forever, a song you can redo onstage every time you sing it.

BD: No, the film's gotta stand because it's too involved, it's more involved than a song, it's gotta stand. Sure we coulda made it better, embellished it a bit. But I don't have any regrets about what it is.

RA: A favorite song of mine is Edith Piaf's "I Have No Regrets." Do you believe in regrets?

BD: No, regrets just keep you chained to the past. You gotta make peace with the past. There's no reason to regret it. You've done it, just make peace with it.

RA: Are you at peace with your past?

BD: I am, yeah. I try to be, yeah. I always try to keep my past and my present and my future all on the same level.

RA: What's next? You're obviously going on tour, you're rehearsing a new band—

BD: Yeah, that's basically, that's mainly what I do, write songs and tour and record. Making movies is somethin' which I'll be interested in doing and when we do it, if we can do it within the boundaries of the music...

RA: What do you do in your spare time?

BD: I don't have any spare time.

RA: What about in '72 and '73 when you said you weren't doin' anything?

BD: Yeah, when I have—in my spare time I probably like to go back to Minnesota... and just let everything else drift away.

RA: What do you do when you go back there?

BD: Ah...

RA: You gotta piece of land back home don't ya?

BD: Yeah, ah... (the music from upstairs is infectious)

RA: Do you just hang out, see friends and commune?

BD: Yeah, yeah. I just get to go for, you know, short periods of time.

RA: You can't tell me specifically what you do in that spare time?

BD: Well...

RA: Other interests besides writing or reading or playing music?

BD: Oh! ah... you just mean what do I like to do?

RA: Yeah.

BD: I like to blast sculpture out of metal.

RA: Really?

BD: Yeah, and I also like to go roller skating or ice skating or go fishing or...

RA: You go fishing in Minnesota?

BD: Yeah sometimes.

RA: I get the feeling you're ready to play.

BD: I think I am.

RA: I think you are.

BD: Yeah. Heh! heh!

RA: I really enjoyed it.

BD: Okay. I hope you got somethin' you can use.

We shake hands and say goodbye. Waiting in the lobby for Wasserman, I spy a soaked wet figure hunched over in the rain outside. He looks very European in dress and has a guitar case, a tape recorder and some books. He keeps scribbling out notes, then tapping on the locked, glass door and giving the scraps of paper to Dylan's security man. It seems he wants to play with Dylan and has made a long pilgrimage in hopes of auditioning for his hero. The security guy tells me it happens a lot. I ask if that sort of thing depresses everybody and he says, "Yes, it does... if they only knew how it really is." The hard rain keep falling as Wasserman and I depart. For several hours I kept thinking of that forlorn musician. It just didn't seem fair.

CREEM—July 1979
by Machine Rock

OSAKA, JAPAN The Guinness Book Of World Records has officially given credit for the world's shortest (no pun intended) Bob Dylan interview to CREEM regular Jeffrey Morgan for the following exchange between Dylan (on stage during a recent concert) and Morgan (who was sitting in the front row at the time):

BD: This next number is a song I once did with the Band. You remember the Band, don't you? It was on an album called Planet Waves. It sold twelve copies.
JM: WHY?
BD: Get this guy outta here.

Even though he missed the rest of the concert, Morgan later called the exchange "a great rock n' roll moment. Almost as good as the time I asked Lou Reed if he was scared of death."

Dylan was unavailable for comment.

Barbara Kerr Interview with Bob Dylan

as reprinted in "On The Tracks" Vol 8, No 1 (OTT 18) Display until April 30, 2000, pp. 8-12.

Boston Herald's 1978 interview with Bob Dylan
by Barbara Kerr

The Boston Herald's March 1978 headlines read:

"'Recluse' [Bob Dylan] talks freely of his music, family and home: One of America's most private superstars has finally 'gone public' Bob Dylan, who for years carefully nurtured his status as a recluse, talked with Barbara Kerr of the Chicago Daily News, on the occasion of the release of his new movie Renaldo and Clara, now playing locally at the Galeria in Cambridge."

At 36, Bob Dylan has been a central figure in contemporary music for almost 15 years.

Erupting out of the Greenwich Village folk/protest tradition of Woody Guthrie and Pete Seeger in the early '60s, he went on to electrify both his guitar and a generation which knew, as he said in the title of one of his songs, "that the times are a changin'."

He rejuvenated the folk tradition with songs like "Blowin' In The Wind," fused it with the angriest of rock and roll in "Maggie's Farm" and, for good measure, overlaid it with the wry warning that even "A Rolling Stone" eventually had to come to rest.

Later, when the tempest of the '60s subsided, there was a mellower, more reflective Dylan, home with family and friends, "Watching The River Flow."

And after life got too laid-back, there was Dylan with his band of gypsies, from Joan Baez and Ronee Blakley to Allen Ginsberg, barnstorming in the Rolling Thunder Revue.

Early one afternoon, after a screening of Bob Dylan's just-released movie, the four-hour-long Renaldo and Clara, I drove him back to his lovely ranch estate a few miles north of Malibu, California.

On this day, Dylan's curly brown hair was as unruly as ever, and he was dressed in nondescript boots and jeans, a black beret and a short black leather jacket. He wasn't unkempt, just careless.

Much of his rather eclectic wardrobe is composed of items found by friends in second-hand stores, and recently, when his lawyer instructed him to wear a conservative suit to a court appearance concerning the custody of his children, he had borrowed one from an MGM wardrobe mistress.

Over the next three weeks, he would talk to me about the many sides of Bob Dylan: his music, his home, and family, his hatred of the Dylan myth and his battle to reconcile artistry with celebrity.

Bob Dylan was born May 24, 1941 in Duluth, Minn. Six years later, his family moved upstate to Hibbing, a small mining town near the Canadian border, where his father owned a hardware store.

"When I was young, my life was built around the family. We got together all the time. There weren't many Jews around, and we never thought much about it one way or the other. Our family was close, but not narrow: One uncle married a Catholic, another married an Egyptian."

"No one else in the family made music, but they didn't make it hard for me. I played music for as long as I can remember, first the piano, then harmonica and guitar."

"I didn't go out for sports like everyone else, so other than my family I didn't have many friends."

When he was 13, Dylan turned from poetry to songwriting. Within the year, he'd organized some local kids into a group called the Golden Chords, which occasionally played at local talent shows and school dances. But Minneapolis was where he could find the rhythm and blues music he could only hear on the radio in Hibbing.

"As soon as I got out of high school, I went to Minneapolis. I knew I had to live as an artist, but I didn't know where to go to do it, so I headed for there."

"When I started out there wasn't any money in folk music, and I didn't expect there would ever be. Being an artist was the thing."

Dylan enrolled at the University of Minnesota, living in the Sigma Alpha Mu fraternity house as Bob Zimmerman while playing folk music at a local coffeehouse as Bob Dylan.

"I went to school for a year and a half, but spent almost all my time in Denver."

During this period, Dylan also read Woody Guthrie's Bound for Glory and soon adopted him as his musical idol. "Then for awhile I was into tracking down musicians. I'd hitchhike to where they were supposed to be, but then they wouldn't be there. I once traveled hundreds of miles to find Sleepy John Estes, but he wasn't home and nobody knew where to find him."

"Finally, after a year and a half, I went to Chicago. I stayed with some guy who had given me his address once when he heard me play."

"I stayed in Chicago about six months, teaching people the songs I knew and having them teach me the ones they knew. I stayed in Chicago longer than the other places because there was more music."

In 1975, Bob Dylan anticipated the Bicentennial by hitting the road with the Rolling Thunder Revue, a band of troubadours whose ranks included, among others, Joan Baez, Roger McGuinn, Allen Ginsberg and Ronee Blakley—and a film crew.

The result of that unique six-week tour, the just-released, four-hour long Renaldo and Clara, is as unexpected a film as were the songs he wrote 15 years ago. It is an astonishing account of the adventures of the musician, Renaldo (Bob Dylan), and his mate, Clara (Sara Dylan).

Still it may even be more interesting to watch Dylan watch Renaldo and Clara. During the times that I did, he stared raptly at the screen, sprawled comfortably in his seat with his head resting on his seat back, chain-smoking Camels. He said little, occasionally answering a question from someone sitting nearby, now and then sharing a thought with Howard Alk, his co-editor.

The narrator of the film is guitarist-songwriter David Blue, a long time Dylan colleague and friend. In several scenes, Blue gives a revealing, first-hand account of life with Dylan in Greenwich Village during the early '60s:

"I remember the day Bob wrote 'Blowin' in the Wind.' " He came over to Gerde's Folk City and played for (folk singer) Gil Turner, who was scheduled to play that night. Turner thought it was incredible. Bob wrote the words and music down on a sheet of paper, and when Turner went on stage he taped the paper up on the microphone and played the song. Everyone was stunned. As far as I know that was the first time that song was ever played to an audience."

During the second half of the film, Blue reaffirms Dylan's earlier statement that when he first arrived in New York City in January, 1961, and spent the succeeding months finding his way around the Greenwich Village folk scene. He also visited the dying Woody Guthrie, four or five times a week. Under the management of Albert Grossman and (Grossman's then-partner) John Court, he signed with Colombia Records. Bob Dylan his first album, appeared in March, 1962, and by 1963 he was being hailed as a "spokesman for his generation."

In 1964 Dylan told a friend: "I'm hungry, and restless, and pretty darned wretched. I used to think I was smart. But I don't any more. Don't even know if I'm normal."

Now, in the screening room, it seemed appropriate to ask Dylan if these thoughts accurately reflected his feeling about his first years of "stardom."

"No, not really," he replied. "Actually, those were good years. I was writing, sometimes all day and night, and the songs were good. The people were good. There was a lot happening in music then, and I enjoyed it."

In 1965, Dylan went on a concert tour of England. He was accompanied by Joan Baez, who had been his lover for the past year, and who plays "The Woman In White" (among other characters) in Renaldo and Clara.

Later in 1965, Dylan and Baez were in California for a concert when the final blow-up between the "peace queen" and the "king of rock and roll" occurred. The year before Dylan had met Sara Lowndes, an intelligent, beautiful student of Eastern religion who lived at New York's arty Chelsea Hotel. It is not clear whether Dylan broke up with Baez because he had fallen in love with Sara, or if he grew close to her during the months after the split with Baez.

Whatever, he and Sara were married on November 22, 1965, a union that would last until last year. Dylan and Baez would not appear on stage together until the Rolling Thunder Revue, (their) reconciliation apparently so complete that it led to her starring in his movie along with Sara Dylan.

Dylan says he "lived out his thing with Joan Baez years ago," and that this divorce from Sara is "one of those things that happens in life. It didn't have anything to do with the movie."

In July, 1966, while driving his motorcycle near his home in Woodstock, Dylan had an accident which nearly killed him. He broke his neck, had a concussion and serious internal injuries, and spent a week in the hospital and a year recuperating at his home in a brace. Although only a few friends saw him during that following year, and rumors of paralysis, disfigurement, insanity and drug addiction were rampant, he spent his time profitably; playing music and working on the film which he would call Eat The Document.

During the year of seclusion, Dylan and the Band recorded the epic Basement Tapes. But that album was not to be released until 1975, and the album that became associated with Dylan's re-emergence was the deceptively "folksy" John Wesley Harding, released in 1968.

After Dylan and Sara were married in 1965, he adopted her daughter Marie. (sic) Shortly after they moved permanently to Woodstock, N. Y. in 1966, their other four children began to arrive: Jesse Byron in 1966; Anna in 1967; Seth Abraham Isaac in 1968; and Samuel in 1969. (sic)

In light of the past year's acrimonious divorce proceedings and custody battles, I asked Dylan if he had always assumed he would marry, and if his ideas of marriage had been traditional?

"Yes. No one in my family gets divorced. It's just unheard of, nobody does that. And so when I did get married I never conceived of getting divorced. I figured it would last forever. But it didn't."

"I believe in marriage. I know I don't believe in open marriage. Sexual freedom just leads to other kinds of freedom."

"Women are sentimental," he said. "They get into that romantic thing more easily. But I see that as a prelude. Women use romance and passion to sweeten you up. A man is no more than a victim of that passion."

"You give me a woman who can cook and sew," he said, "and I'll take that over passion any day."

"I'd like to find a mate. But I can't spend any time with a woman if we're not friends. If we're not friends I don't want to get involved on a personal level."

Late one evening, Bob Dylan sat at the kitchen table in his Malibu, California home. In a few weeks, he and a band anchored by Rolling Thunder Revue guitarist Rob Stoner would be leaving for a February tour of Japan and Australia. Now under the management of high-powered Jerry Weintraub (who also manages John Denver and Frank Sinatra), he planned to release an album of new songs in the spring, and tour in the U. S. later this year.

Through most of the night, Dylan talked to me about the pressures of celebrity.

In 1964, Dylan had told Village Voice columnist Nat Hentoff that he didn't want to write for an audience any longer. "I don't want to be a spokesman," he'd said. "From now on I want to write from inside myself."

Would the attention provoked by the release of his new movie, Renaldo and Clara, reactivate the demand that he again assume the long-despised role of "spokesman."

"I doubt that very much," Dylan replied, "I'm not the spokesman for anybody's generation. Far from it. In fact, I want to emphatically deny being the spokesman for our generation. Fame is just having your name known by a lot of strangers. People who are kind or good are the ones who ought to be famous."

Despite the popular conception of Dylan as being reclusive and inactive during the late '60s and early '70s, he actually had been productive.

Among other things he had released the New Morning, Nashville Skyline and Self-Portrait albums; in 1969, he'd appeared at the Isle of Wight Festival in England; and in 1971 he'd joined George Harrison at Madison Square Garden for the benefit Concert For Bangladesh.

In 1974, he'd joined the Band in a cross-country tour to support his Planet Waves album and gather material for the Before The Flood collaboration with the Band.

But when asked if the response shown by audiences during that tour had pleased him, the vehemence of his answer was surprising.

"I hated every moment of that 1974 tour. It wasn't playing with the Band. They were great. We didn't 'break up,' you know. They just got tied up with matters of their own. I had no control over what was going on."

"I don't like to feel controlled by others. I choose people. They don't choose me. All of my deep relationships are concerned with my work. My work is my life. I choose people who can help me in my work, but it's a two-way street."

"That's part of why I stopped performing in 1967. The audience no longer came to see me. They didn't even see me and I was standing right in front of them."

"They came to see the myth of Bob Dylan, and that's all they saw. That myth could either please them or disappoint them. But whatever happened didn't have anything to do with me. Just with the myth."

"Look," he continued. "Everybody has some work to do. You know that. I know what I have to do. And what I love to do. I've known it all my life."

That discipline exists in his music.

"Usually I play for several hours. I'll play alone for an hour, then play with other musicians. When I'm writing songs, however, I play alone more than with others."

"I go to bed at a reasonable hour, generally, and wake up feeling good. I don't go out much. I get bored when I do. I have my friends, but Los Angeles doesn't have the same tradition of hanging out as does Mew York or Chicago. People are less accessible here."

Throughout 1967, while the world gloomily speculated about Dylan's hermitage in Woodstock, New York, he was actually having an interesting and productive time. He spent his days writing songs, working on his autobiography Tarantula and making music with Robbie Robertson and the other members of the Band. At night he holed up in the editing room he and co-editor Howard Alk had equipped in the basement of his home, at work on a television film for which ABC-TV had advanced him $100,000.

That Dylan film, an hour-long documentary montage of tour footage, so appalled the executives at ABC that they had no trouble believing the title, Eat The Document, was Dylan's way of describing his feelings about the contract between them. Having granted Dylan complete artistic control, a frustrated ABC announced they would write off their investment and store the film away in a dark closet.

Dylan ultimately resolved the impasse by buying the film from them with his own money, but the experience left him long on enthusiasm for film-making and short on confidence in the business. Therefore, at the beginning of 1968, as he disassembled the editing crew and equipment, he had little to say about any future movie plans except to tell Alk that he would "be in touch when the time is right."

Eventually, in the fall of 1975, Alk was awakened one night by a call at his home in Montreal, Canada. Without any of the usual social niceties, he heard a voice say simply: "Bob wants to know if you're ready."

Alk was ready, and immediately joined Dylan at a secluded resort near New York City, where he once again became cameraman, confidante and mysterious player, assisting Dylan as he simultaneously directed rehearsals for the upcoming Rolling Thunder Revue.

He also organized the writers and technicians working on Renaldo and Clara and worked with the cast of the film.

"I'm just glad it was done, and we put it out, (said Dylan). We didn't really make it to impress a lot of people. We just wanted to make some sense out of the past, present and future. To make some sense of reality, to use it and try and make a better reality for ourselves."

"I hope enough people see it so that we get our money back, but if not then we'll know it just wasn't meant to be. Obviously we weren't making a commercial film. A commercial film is 90 minutes long so that you can show it several times a day. This film is four hours long, Americans are spoiled, they expect art to be like wallpaper, with no effort, just to be there."

"This wasn't the kind of movie where one person is the boss. I directed the actors, but they directed me, too."

"We could talk for ages and so could everyone else and still miss the real point," said Dylan of his movie. "And the point is simply this: That no matter what catastrophes come down, no matter what turmoil, no matter what horrors befall the world, someone will still get up and sing to the moon and dance around the campfire." •

Craig McGregor Interview, Brisbane, Australia

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 197-214.

This interview was conducted at the Brisbane Festival Hall on March 12th 1978, the day of Dylan's first concert in Australia for 12 years. It was published in New Musical Express on April 22nd. The introduction to McGregor's article provides a good backdrop to the interview itself.

TANGLED UP IN BLUE

When Bob Dylan arrived in Sydney for his first Australian tour in over a decade, he found himself confronted at the airport by a formidable and slightly unruly phalanx of pressmen and sundry media people, all anticipating a press conference.

Dylan uttered one word – "hopeless"- and walked straight through, declining to talk to any of them. The following day, though, in Brisbane, he did agree to talk to Craig McGregor. An Australian writer, McGregor is the author of Bob Dylan: A Retrospective (Picador), a collection first published in 1972 of just about all the best writing about and interviews with Dylan up to that time.

McGregor first met Dylan during the 1966 Australian tour. Dylan seemed to like him, even according him the honor of playing him the acetates of Blonde On Blonde (which left McGregor bewildered and speechless). Since then they have been in touch from time to time; Dylan probably felt relatively at ease for the interview.

McGregor says he found Dylan "gentle and straightforward", and wondering how his tour would go. It was a very different situation to that in '66 when, as Dylan says in the interview, he had been wondering if every gig would be his last.

Reading between the lines of the interview, Dylan still seems affected by his recent divorce -he was quite emotional in talking about Sara and his family life, and had possibly been more upset by the whole episode than he would care to admit. Similarly, he was reluctant to talk about his new film, Renaldo And Clara, and was probably disappointed by the reaction to it; his quote "fading from my mind" perhaps covers a lot of real resentment.

The interview/conversation lasted for almost two hours. The transcript that follows is word-for-word Dylan, and is virtually complete. McGregor says the only editing he has done is to delete most of his own contributions to the conversation.

THE BOB DYLAN INTERVIEW

CM: What would you like to talk about?

BD: I've got nothing on my mind right now. I've no axes to grind with anybody or anything. I'm back workin' again and I'm relatively happy doing that. I was off for two years; I can't go that long without touring.

CM: You mean before the Rolling Thunder tour?

BD: We did the Rolling Thunder in 1975, 1976, and then did another one after that to help support this movie we were doing. You didn't see the movie yet?

CM: Renaldo And Clara? No.

BD: I think you'll like it. It isn't for everybody, but I think you'll like it. It got a lot of criticism, but that's because people have expectations, y'know, they shouldn't really but they do.

CM: I like the idea that it's four hours long.

BD: It isn't too long.

CM: Have you been disappointed in the reaction to it?

BD: Ah... The people who go and see it, I can feel resistance to it, by people who I don't know who are very critical of it. But they miss it. They're not looking at it in the way it should be seen, I know. At this point it's fading away, just like the last album is fading away.

CM: You mean in your head?

BD: Yeah. After you've done it, you've done it, so I'm not in any position to defend it against people who are critical of it. I don't feel I have to defend it anyway. There's enough people who like it who, if they felt like it, would defend it. Do you know Daryl Poncison?

CM: No.

BD: He's a writer; he writes books, but they turned a couple of them into movies; Cinderella Liberty and The Last Detail. They are both movies about sailors, they were playing in the States for a while. He just wrote another one called The Ring, it's about a circus. Possibly he'll be working with me on the next movie, which we want to have a script for.

CM: Tell me why you're getting back on the road again; do you really like it?

BD: It's not that I like it or dislike it; it's what I'm destined to do. Muddy Waters is still doing it, and he's 65. In the States there's a lotta old guys that are doing it, and I kinda feel that when I'm that old, as long as I can do it, I guess I will do it, because it's all I did ever do or want to do.

CM: Do you find it still gives you a charge – do you get energy from it or does it take it out of you?

BD: Well, it takes it and gives it. It's a kick to sing these songs that were written in 1961, 1962, and to feel that they're still alive right now, I mean that's an incredible rush, just for that.

CM: What about these new arrangements?

BD: They're not new in the sense that the melodies have changed. I'm still playing three chords, but the lines are there whereas the lines were never there before. It would be all melody based upon old folk songs. The lines became clearer to me as time went on, the structure of all those songs, so what's happened is that I've gotten down to play the line on the guitar or piano, the basic structural line of the song which holds it up. That's all it amounts to when they say new arrangements, because they aren't really new arrangements, they're just stronger lines.

CM: When you say line, you don't mean just the melody or the tune...

BD: Well, it's the line of the melody which can be broken down and simplified. Some of the lyrics have changed.

CM: You're doing them faster, rockier than before?

BD: No. I don't listen to that much kind of music, you know, I only listen to the old music: the old blues singers and the old country singers. No, they're about the same. I get energy just knowing they're still alive, and that the lines are so strong even after all these years.

CM: But changing them makes it possible for you to keep singing them, and resinging them?

BD: Every time I sing 'em they are real to me, I've been through so much that some are even more real to me now than when I wrote them – then I could feel what they were about, but now I can understand what they're about.

CM: But do you ever feel that in changing some of your old songs, you're untrue to the person you were when you wrote them?

BD: No, I feel pretty true to that person. There was a period of time when I couldn't relate to that person, but now I can. I relate more to the person that wrote those songs than I do to the person I am that's walking around, in most cases.

CM: I don't know whether to believe you when you say that.

BD: Yeah, it's true. I have new songs too. We aren't going to be playing any of them – maybe we'll play one, we did one in Japan, we didn't do it in New Zealand, it's a real simple song which we worked up. We got a couple of them. See, I'm also workin' with this band, trying to hold a permanent band together, which I've never done before.

CM: What are some of the new songs Bob?

BD: I don't usually have a title until after I've written them. There's one called Changing Of The Guard, another one called Her Version Of Jealousy...

CM: Her Version Of Jealousy?

BD: Yeah (laughing) Another one called – I've forgotten it.

CM: Can you tell me a bit more about them?

BD: Man, I really can't, they just have to be sung. They must reflect on this energy field that is happening now, in the same way that the old ones reflected on that. I mean, I get criticized for not writing songs like I used to write...

CM: Do people still do that?

BD: All the time! It seems all I see is criticism for not writing songs like those old ones, but why should I when I'm still singing them? I couldn't write any song like that old song that would be better than it.

CM: When did you write these new ones?

BD: I wrote a bunch of them in the fall, and before this tour I had about seven or eight of them. I think I'll be writing a few more on this trip. I'll record them when I get back to the States in April, and that album will be out by spring.

CM: Have you got a title for that yet?

BD: No.

CM: So these are all songs you've written in the last few months since you broke up with Sara?

BD: Yeah, since that divorce thing happened.

CM: Are they related to that?

BD: Not really; we were breaking up for a long time. So it doesn't reflect too much of that.

CM: How come you seem so at ease at the moment? I mean, I'd like to know the secret...

BD: I'm not really, I just appear that way! This is a pretty easy place to be, this town, it's a pretty easygoing place.

CM: I didn't think you liked Australia too much last time you were here.

BD: Well, we had a rough time last time. I think we came before any of the big groups came, before the sound was sophisticated; they put us in boxing arenas and wrestling arenas – in one place we followed, I think, Gorgeous George into an arena where the stage moved...

CM: That was Sydney! The stage turned a quarter of a revolution every now and then. If I remember.

BD: Do they still have that building?

CM: No, they've torn it down. It was old Sydney stadium, where Jack Johnson took the world heavy-weight championship from Tommy Burns in the early part of this century and became the first black heavyweight champ... there used to be a lovely old photograph in the aisle leading into the stadium, Johnson and Burns in the ring together, with this great sea of thousands of felt hats watching the black champ beat the white man for the first time.

BD: I saw a photograph of that.

CM: You probably saw it there. Things have changed a bit; but have you been here long enough to notice anything?

BD: I think we played here before. I don't see much change in Australia, just in the streets I've walked around, since the last time I was here. Perhaps just a little bit (laughing)...

Progress doesn't seem to have touched down in the streets over here. People are still the same, in the pubs.

CM: What's your next project going to be?

BD: Just more records, and hopefully another movie.

CM: Any priority there? Which are you most interested in?

BD: Just making more songs.

CM: You don't feel yourself changing over to movies?

BD: I want to make more movies. On this last one we did the best with what we had. We have a small crew...

CM: What's the next one going to be about?

BD: It's about evil. Good and evil.

CM: Oh yeah – anything else?

BD: That's mainly it. It's a kinda complicated story to spring on you, or give it away. We're gonna try and have most of it scripted and outlined before we even start. It can't cost nearly as much money as this one did, and it can't take nearly as much time to do.

CM: Is that partly because you're disillusioned with the idea of improvised scripts?

BD: No, not really. The people who got on this movie are intellectual people, not just the people who want to get out of their house and see a movie. Those people seem to find something in it worthwhile. It's that establishment intelligentsia that got down on it so hard, and I don't know whose fault that was; it was probably our fault in showing it to them. But when people see what they've written, and haven't seen the movie themselves, they decide, what the hell, if they say this about it I guess it can't be any good, and they don't give it a chance. We hurt ourselves in showing it to all those critics, but we were open about it and thought it was good. But it doesn't really affect me, because when I started out singing I just had a small group of people following me and most people didn't know what I was doing anyway. The same press that was putting my work down back then is the same press that's doing it now, nothing's really changed that much...

CM: Have you ever thought of trying to do a really extended musical work?

BD: No, I don't have any of the ideals: but other people do, and they're doing it with songs I've written. There's a group in New York that's doing a play using a lot of songs, and they're a group of clowns – ex circus clowns who all quit the circus for one reason or another and came to New York and choreographed a whole play using songs I've written. Things like that. I don't have the time to do that.

CM: Have you thought of not using your old songs, but writing a complete opera, musical, the sort of thing Gershwin did?

BD: I feel too young yet to do that. I still haven't written all the songs I really want to write. It would be a good idea if you were stationary in the one place for a while.

CM: Or is it that you feel that you don't have to prove yourself in some substantial form like that?

BD: Not to me, I don't. The idea attracts me. But my mind can't hold something for that long period of time, with songs which are all in a certain vein, like Porgy And Bess, or something like that. I would love to be able to do that, but I can't sit down and map it out. I lose track of my thoughts and I get too involved in other things to keep coming back to such a big thing as that. I don't think I could concentrate on that right now. I don't think those things like Tommy, or what have you, are what you're talking about.

CM: What about other directions?

BD: That's it, I don't have any direction but one.

CM: Which is that again?

BD: That's this one, straight ahead.

CM: What about writing apart from song writing?

BD: No. I do once in a while, but you really have to get laid back for that. You got to be finished up with one aspect of things and go lay back and you'll get it, you know. I'd like to do that too. But it isn't the time for me to do that; maybe when I'm 80 or 90.

CM: What about poetry?

BD: No, I'm not writing too much of anything but songs.

CM: Sounds as though you've refined yourself down.

BD: I was pretty spread out a few years ago, trying to do this and do that, and it didn't make much sense to me, I didn't get anything much out of it, I was too wired up so I'm back just doin' that one single thing now.

CM: How much of a success do you think you've made of your personal life in the past few years?

BD: My personal life? my personal life is pretty hard to keep track of. I've kind of narrowed it down to what I care about, who I care about, what I care about, and when I care about. I've narrowed it down as fine as I can to that. Being in this kind of situation you meet a lot of people that are attracted to you, and also you become attracted to quite a few people, and you can't really be sure many times whether that's true or not, so you just have to let the situation run it's course. But in the recent past I don't even give it a chance to run it's course. I just kind of stay with my old friends, and my old loves and old mates, you know, and at least that allows me to work. The rest of it don't allow me to work. If I get hung up I could disappear into the jungle for three or four months, I've done that.

CM: Does that mean you feel you're faced with a choice between your music and your private life?

BD: My personal life suffers because of that. I think ultimately man is better off if he can stay in one place and see the world revolve around him rather than have to be out there revolving. I try to stay put as much as I can, but I can't all the time, and I guess my personal life has suffered because of that. The privacy thing I don't think about too much anymore. I never went after fame or fortune, but I didn't turn it down. That was one of them things I had to learn how to adjust to.

CM: And now you've got it you don't want to let it go.

BD: Now I have it, it's not that I don't want to let it go, because I don't believe that I'm attached to it, but I can't let it go, there's no way I could let it go, because people know me. But a lot of people know me, and then a lot of people know the image; you get a lot of resistance from people who just know the image, who can't see through it.

CM: I still think it fucks you around.

BD: No doubt about it.

CM: What you do about it, I'm not too sure.

BD: It fucks you around in a lot of ways, but you have to be open to... it's not a burden that's just been placed on someone to drive them down.

CM: Can you channel all this into your songs?

BD: No, I don't write from that, I don't use that; I don't figure anybody cares about that, I personally don't care about it, I don't even care if somebody else is into it; I think it's a superficial thing, fame and fortune.

CM: I meant more, you write songs about Sara – I wonder whether you can channel your private emotions into your music, that's one of the reasons you're able to write songs. You suffer, and that comes out into your songs.

BD: (Pause) That particular song, well... some songs you figure you're better off not to have written. There's a few of them layin' around.

CM: There's some parts of your life you'd rather not have lived, also.

BD: Yeah.

CM: Have you got into any religion since I saw you last?

BD: No, no dedicated religion, I have not gotten into that. No dogma. I don't usually do that, I usually play my guitar. I don't know why, I've never gone on any of them guru trips, I've never felt that lost.

CM: I thought for a while you were moving back to your Jewish background.

BD: No, I don't have much of that background to go back to, so if I was going to a Jewish religion, or Islam, or Muslim, Catholic, or whatever that religion might be, I would have to go to it; I don't have it, that religion to fall back on. What I have to fall back on is just my own isolated existence. I don't really think too much about those things.

CM: But in the interview you did with Jonathan Cott (in Rolling Stone) there were a lot of references there...

BD: Oh, Jonathan, yeah, he had all these sayings with him; we were just sitting around getting loaded, y'know, and he would bring out these quotations, which sounded really good.

CM: But you responded to them.

BD: Yeah, I'm excited by those kind of principals on life, and moral codes, that are part of any religion. They get to me. But as far as organised religion goes, I don't see myself as partaking too much of that.

CM: But whether you realize it or not, that Jewish thing must have given you a very heavy imprinting; I've assumed that's stayed with you, and that in a way you still draw on it.

BD: Possibly. It's possible. But I don't know how Jewish I am. See, with these blue eyes, which are Russian. Y'know, back in 1700's, 1800's, I know I have different blood in me.

CM: What sort of blood?

BD: Cossack blood. I don't know how any one could escape it, anyone of my family that lived back then.

CM: Did you say somewhere that you had some gypsy blood in you, is that right?

BD: I'm not sure. From the questions I asked of my old family, and the answers that I've been given, I know there's Russian blood in me.

CM: Where does that come from?

BD: It comes from Odessa.

CM: That's where you get your blue eyes from?

BD: Probably, because in Odessa mostly everyone has the color of my eyes.

CM: Have you been there?

BD: I've never been there, I don't know if I'd like to go there either (laughing).

CM: Sounds to me as though you're constructing a very exotic past for yourself.

BD: No, I don't do that! I just...

CM: You, Django Reinhart...

BD: No, no, I don't know about the gypsy thing, I might have said that; to somebody once, I'm not sure about that because that's from Rumania.

CM: Do you feel very Jewish, Bob?

BD: I don't know what Jewish people feel like.

CM: That's a nice answer! For Christ's sake, you know what I mean... as a New York...

BD: As a New York Jew?

CM: Yeah.

BD: (Laughing) I'm not from New York.

CM: Isn't that part of you?

BD: I feel a part of all people really.

CM: You don't feel proud of that background?

BD: I feel proud of what I am. How proud can you be? I mean, there's so many people walking the earth, like, if everyone among us is gonna feel proud of who they are, mankind would be in a hell of a mess.

CM: Maybe mankind is in a hell of a mess.

BD: I feel proud of my accomplishments.

CM: Sure. But often people try to link themselves to a tradition.

BD: If you check back on my work, it doesn't link itself to a tradition.. Not any one that I've ever heard of.

CM: But your music does.

BD: Well, my music, yeah; but that's all Stateside music.

CM: That's still a tradition. You mention blues singers, and so on; they're traditions you've hooked into.

BD: Musically.

CM: But not personally?

BD: I don't know. I feel life is going by at a tremendous speed. What I feel one moment I usually don't feel the next moment. I don't hold on to any period of time for too long. Even all the things I've ever written, or said, or done, I sometimes think it's all a joke, really, in certain periods of time.

CM: Do you ever look at it and think it could have been said or done by someone else?

BD: No, I think I was meant to write that.

CM: So you see yourself there still?

BD: Yeah.

CM: I think the reasons a lot of people link themselves to tradition is they feel they have no importance otherwise.

BD: Well tradition is great if you've got a community, and a society; then tradition will hold you up as long as you're living. But if you're society is crumbling, what right do you have to be part of that tradition?

CM: But what makes you a sort of freewheeling atom, like the Lone Ranger?

BD: Well, most people in the States right now are pretty freewheeling.

CM: Do you like that, though? Do you think it's good?

BD: No, I don't think that's any good at all.

CM: But that's what you're doing.

BD: I don't have any choice. I would prefer a steady family life.

CM: But that didn't work.

BD: That didn't work. That really didn't work. You know, I could be happy pounding metal all day, going home to a big fat wife, and eating a meal and, y'know, going to bed. That would be my ideal of happiness (laughing).

CM: You mean that's your romantic idea of happiness for someone else, but not you.

BD: No, it's my idea for me! (laughing) I'm still open to that.

CM: You ought to hang that on your motel door.

BD: Otherwise, if I didn't believe in that, I'd be burned out by now; some of the things I've done.

CM: It puts you in a hard position; you've nothing much to prop you up.

BD: But I never did. When I was last here, 12, 13 years ago, it was the same thing.

CM: You were propped up pretty much with drugs then.

BD: Yeah, we were taking a lot of chemicals back then, which doctors prescribe for entertainers and athletes... But those were different days, things were a lot simpler then, we were all on the way up.

CM: You mean it's harder at the top!

BD: Ah, at the top it's pretty difficult, you could fall at any time. No, it doesn't really worry me. Because morning always comes so quick that I don't have a chance to think about it.

CM: Is that the only reason you don't worry about it?

BD: You don't have much of a chance to think, really, on this level. The only time you get a chance to think is when you're thinking about your work. It's not a healthy thing, it can't be for everybody. But to make it you really have to cross a lot of things off.

CM: I wouldn't have thought that you, of all people, would have to worry for one instant any longer about proving yourself. You don't still feel any need for that, do you?

BD: Yeah, I'm always trying to... it's not proof of yourself, like in the old days. What it is... I feel like I've had it, you know; and I'm doing it; I know it; and if the audience is still there, well I'm still here. If not I'll be in the corner bar playing. I don't have that youthful desire to prove I can go out and conquer the masses. A tour like this is just a tour. There is no great meaning to it. I'll be touring a lot. it's just what I do. I'm not sure about the event, and what it means to the people. To us we're just going on playing.

CM: Do you think you can extend yourself much more?

BD: I don't know. I don't really think so. I think I've pushed it as far as I can, and I'll just have to maintain it on this level.

CM: I'm surprised to hear you say that.

BD: Well, I can write new songs, and I can sing 'em, but they're always going to be sung in the same way. I mean, my style is pretty well defined. Everything about what I do is pretty well defined by this time. Sure, you could ask Paul McCartney this same question, and he might say, oh yeah, there's more to do, there's more limits to reach... But not really.

CM: Does he say that sort of thing?

BD: I don't know if he does. He could, but it would only be a superficial thing. I don't have the urge to learn any more technique than what I already know. If I was to go on and push further I'd have to learn more technique, and I've done that. I don't figure I can do any more with that technique.

CM: But you're willing to take on films, which means learning a whole new technique.

BD: Yeah, but the film is an image. I'm not sure how great a love, or great a need, I have for that. I know I do now, because I figure... I'm looking at the film as a painting, and if you can get character into that painting, and make it come alive, that's what my intentions are. I don't know if that's the right way people are making films nowadays; some are, but most I don't think are. I'm trying to get more out of that film. But in reality it isn't as great as standing on stage and singing. For me it's not that much of a kick to get your vision across.

CM: It's a nice thing to do anyhow; make a film.

BD: It is, if you believe in it.

CM: Do you do much painting these days, like you used to?

BD: I haven't done so much painting for a long time. I miss it. I'd like to get to a place eventually like Churchill, you know, just sit around and paint! And write your memoirs.

CM: It sounds as though you're mature, that's what it sounds like.

BD: I don't think so. Maybe I have matured, or whatever them words are, but it isn't like that inside. What I've learned to do, which I didn't learn in the old days, is just hold it, in order to put it out when the right time is. So when people say he's mellowed, or matured, that's true, and I've gone through a lot of changes so it is true, but I just hold back most of the time to let it out. And if I didn't have that way to let it out I'd probably be just as crazy as everybody else, if not more so.

CM: Whereas as it is you're absolutely sane!

BD: Yeah, right (laughing).

CM: To reach a stage where you're pretty confident, and can hold back and let it out when you want to, I'd have thought that must feel pretty good.

BD: I've always been confident though. I went to New York confident, I didn't know what I was going to have, what I was going to do, but I was confident I was going to come through. I wasn't going to roll under any wheels. I feel pretty confident now, in what we're doing. I don't know how much pleasure it gives me, but I know I'm doing what I'm supposed to do.

CM: When I said "mature", I suppose I was thinking of artists like Michelangelo and da Vinci, who reached a stage where they all had the technique, and at that stage they did their greatest work. Do you feel that could happen to you?

BD: No, I don't feel I could be a Michelangelo or da Vinci. These guys had too much isolation back then. They were given the nod; it's hard to find anybody that society will do that for these days, so you're pretty much on your own. Michelangelo and da Vinci weren't really on their own, they were pretty much supported. And encouraged. Their work was respected in it's time.

CM: But so are you, and so is your work.

BD: Well, I don't know if it is or it isn't. I never think about it, because I don't want to believe it – in case tables turn, or white goes to black, I don't want to be prepared, I don't want to be unprepared.

CM: Can you give me any idea as to where your work might move?

BD: No. It's in the same old place it's always been, it's not movin' anywhere, it's staying right where it is. It won't get any more complicated or simple than it is. New thoughts come and, y'know, new ideas, new feelings; and I can't say what they're going to be.

CM: I was thinking that, sometimes, you get some idea of what sort of shape your life is going to take for a while.

BD: Oh yeah, I've had them ideas.

CM: Did they ever turn out right?

BD: No, they never do. Things change so fast, so quickly. Just turn around, everything's gone.

CM: One of the reasons I bothered to do that book about you was at that stage I thought I could half understand what you were doing, in relation to myself: you were acting it in one way, I was acting it out in another. But I don't know that I can now.

BD: I bet you can. I'm just doing the same thing. You get the point where you're just doing it. That's the point I'm at now, I'm just doing it. I don't think about it anymore.

CM: Faced with something like the choice that you were faced with, in your life... if I understood it all... the family thing...

BD: Well, you've got to have that. I expect to have that. I just didn't make it one time. But I mean, I still got my kids. I got five kids. I see them quite a bit of the time. But... er, I expect to have that too. Again.

CM: Sounds like a failure, Bob. By you there, somewhere.

BD: What, in my marriage?

CM: Yeah.

BD: Right at the start... It wasn't a failure... it was a... Maybe it was a failure. Marriage was a failure. Husbandry... husband and wife was a failure. But...

CM: Not husbandry.

BD: Father and mother wasn't a failure.

CM: How were you at husbandry?

BD: Husbandry, I wasn't a very good husband. I don't know whether I was or wasn't, I don't know what a good husband is. I was good in some ways, as a husband, and not so good in other ways... But, I feel my true family relationship is up ahead of me somewhere.

CM: You mean, you'd try it again? You'd get married again?

BD: Oh yeah.

CM: You like that?

BD: Yeah, I like comin' home to the same woman. (Pause). It was a failure. You got to take the bad with the good. It didn't disillusion me at all.

CM: Did it knock you around to have a real failure like that, because I don't think you had a failure up till then?

BD: Oh yeah! (laughing).

CM: What were your other failures?

BD: I failed at school.

CM: That was a long time ago.

BD: Not so long. My life seems to have flashed by in a minute. When you think about it, er... but then again, "there's no success like failure."

CM: That's a nice line.

BD: I believe it, too. It wasn't a failure... If you fail at one job, and you pick up another job, which you like more, then you really can't consider what happened a failure. There aren't really any mistakes in life. They might seem to knock you out of proportion at the time; but if you have the courage and the ability and the confidence to go on, well then that failure, you can't look at it as a failure, you just have to look at it as a blessing in a way.

CM: When you say that, you're not saying you believe everything is predestined, do you?

BD: No, I don't believe everything is predestined, but it is in a way. We're sitting here right now in the present, but we could talk about yesterday, and if we want to look at yesterday we could see that it was all predestined, because it was, if we're looking back everything is predestined. And tomorrow we'll be looking back on today, and today will have been predestined: we just don't know it now. So in a way I do believe in predestination; but only when you get to the place you can look back on does it become proof of itself.

CM: Or make sense.

BD: Right. But you can't project into the future, which probably gets conflicted with predestination. Things upset you, which you don't have any understanding or knowledge of at the time.

CM: Does that knock you around?

BD: Yeah, it knocks me around. Usually when you're caught up in the turmoil of some personal event, and you can't seem to work it out and you're impatient with time doing it, you become impatient, and then you decide to get angry. But if you've been through it enough times to know it does work itself out, well then it just doesn't mean as much. That's what's happened to me, anyway, I still get booted around in my personal life, here and there, but er... I just try to understand that... tomorrow is another day.

CM: How do you handle it?

BD: Well, fortunately I handle it just by working. I just forget it and go back to work, rehearse, make records, or play, and then when I turn around whatever it was was bothering me ain't there anymore. Sometimes that's true, sometimes it's not true, sometimes it's still there...

CM: Do you think you become a bit desensitized as time goes on, through that process?

BD: Probably do, yeah.

CM: Does that worry you?

BD: Yeah, it bothers me sometimes. Sometimes I can't even be sensitive to my own needs.

CM: You got a litmus paper test, you can hold up and say, how's my sensitivity rating?

BD: I wish there was some kind of test like that. I don't deny it makes you insensitive to the flow and activity around you. But then again, it makes you more sensitive, because you get more inward.

CM: Maybe you become wiser.

BD: As you go on, you begin to realize, if nothing else at least you're alive. If you've been around enough times you realize what it is not to be alive, and to go down, and have that feeling of going down, and if you've had enough of them times they build up – especially in my life, when I got to a point... where I just... I don't want... at least I'm alive.

CM: Jesus, I hope we get wiser, Bob, that's what I'm holding out for.

BD: I don't want to get wiser (laughing).

CM: Did you have a motorbike accident at all?

BD: You mean back in 1966? After I left here? Yeah...

CM: It wasn't just a cover-up?

BD: No, I was put out of the picture. That was it, for me.

CM: And you nearly did wipe yourself right out?

BD: Well, it wasn't that the crash was so bad. I couldn't handle the fall. I was just too spaced out. So it took me a while to get my senses back. And once I got them back I couldn't remember too much. It was almost as if I had amnesia. I just couldn't connect for a long, long time. And what was happening around me I didn't want to connect with anyway. And what had happened in that period of time was that music had become very big. There were people doin' my songs. When I was working, I was nothin'. Talk about criticism now – there was more criticism back in those days than there is now. We'd get no good reviews; every time I put out an album the only good reviews would come from the musical papers; no one else knew what I was doing, or could care less... After I was knocked off, knocked out, I guess people thought I was gone, y'know, wasn't about to come back, so they started elevating me to a level of which no one could come back from. I wasn't out there working; and then acid became very big; and when I got back, I couldn't relate to that world, because what I was doing before that accident wasn't what was happening when I got back on my feet. We didn't have that adulation, that intense worship, I was just another singer really, but I had a loyal and intense following. And when I went back on the road I was more famous than I was when I'd gotten off the road. I was incredibly more famous. And I had a lot of people who were coming who weren't my true fans, I was just another famous name. These people didn't understand what I had done to get there, they just thought I was a famous name and I'd written songs Jimi Hendrix was singing, that's all they knew. And so I picked up a lot of new fans, and I made some records, and went on, y'know. I was half there and half wasn't. And when I finally did get back up to a place where I could express myself again, it surprised a lot of people. Because they didn't know that that's what it was all the time. When you see me on stage now. I mean, you don't get that feeling that I might die after the show. Whereas that's what happened the last time here.

CM: What was the place that you got back to, where you felt you could express yourself? Was that a particular album?

BD: No album. I haven't made one album yet that I figured I really... I haven't made an album since Blonde On Blonde that I felt I was all there for. I have written songs that were worthy of it; I haven't been able to perform them properly, but the ideas were there. I haven't been able to get them down right. I could relate to the idea in an abstract way but I wasn't able to get it down right, the way I felt I needed and wanted to bring it home.

CM: Which songs were those?

BD: From the John Wesley Harding album to the Desire album I've written a lot of songs which I feel real close to; I don't feel I performed them that well on record, or performed them with the proper meaning; but it still doesn't reflect on the songs at all, it reflects more on me. And I didn't get back into doing what it was, with everything blocked out of the way, until like, maybe, the end of the first Rolling Thunder tour. Or the second Rolling Thunder tour – at least I was doing the best I could in the environment I was in... And now I'm also doing the best I can within this environment; and I expect to go on and even do more acoustical things.

CM: Are you doing any acoustical things on this tour?

BD: I'm not doing any acoustical things, but we do some stuff which you'd think it was acoustical, but there's another level to it, it's just with guitar, organ, saxophone, but it brings it out in a way where you think it would be just me playing the guitar.

CM: Why aren't you doing any acoustical things?

BD: I'll tell you one reason, but you wouldn't probably believe me, is because I haven't found a magic guitar. I think I might have found one now, but I haven't found one where I could feel completely at one with. In my kind of thing you have to have the proper instrument. I played acoustical songs on that band tour in '74, but I pushed too hard. I played acoustical guitar on the Rolling Thunder tours, but I had to push too hard. And for my type of style I can't really afford to push too hard, because I lose the reason behind the song. If you heard me sittin' in a room singing I wouldn't be pushing too hard.

CM: It pressurizes you, doesn't it?

BD: Yeah, I never used to push in the old days, and I was playin', y'know, an hour by myself and an hour with the band, and yet I was never pushing myself.

CM: What's the guitar you found.

BD: A guitar passed my way, I think it might be it's just telling me to use it.

CM: Which of the songs you've done in the past few years are the ones you feel are close to what you've just been talking about?

BD: There's a bunch of them in Blood On The Tracks. And there's half a dozen of them off Desire. Knocking On Heaven's Door is a good song. There's a bunch of good ones on John Wesley Harding, and Nashville Skyline there's good songs on.

CM: Which are the ones on Blood On The Tracks?

BD: Idiot Wind, Big Girl Now, Tangled Up In Blue...

CM: I've always thought Tangled Up In Blue was a great song. I really like it.

BD: Yeah. I like that one too.

CM: Without knowing anything about it, I half assumed that Blue might be Joan Baez.

BD: Joni Mitchell had an album out called Blue. And it affected me, I couldn't get it out of my head. And it just stayed in my head and when I wrote that song I wondered, what's that mean? And then I figured that it was just there, and I guess that's what happened, y'know.

CM: It's not the same Blue as in It's All Over Now, Baby Blue?

BD: No, no. That's a different Blue. That's a character right off the haywagon. That Baby Blue is from right upstairs at the barbers shop, y'know, off the street... a different Baby Blue, I haven't run into her in a long time, long time.

CM: You're being serious?

BD: Yeah, I've never looked at Joan Baez as being Baby Blue.

CM: Do you see much of her these days?

BD: (Pause). She was on two tours with me. I haven't seen her since then. She went to Europe.

CM: You involved in her?

BD: No, no...

CM: Listening to Tangled Up In Blue, I got the feeling it's like an autobiography; a sort of funny, wry, compressed novel...

BD: Yeah, that's the first I ever wrote that I felt free enough to change all the... what is it, the tenses around, is that what it is?

CM: The person...

BD: The he and the she and the I and the you, and the we and the us – I figured it was all the same anyway – I could throw them all in where they floated right -and it works on that level.

CM: It's got those nice lines at the end, about "There was music in the cafés at night / And revolution in the air" and "Some are mathematicians, some are carpenters wives / I don't know how it all got started, I don't know / what they do with their lives."

BD: I like that song. Yeah, that poet from the 13th century.

CM: Who was that?

BD: Plutarch. Is that his name?

CM: Yeah. Are there a lot of Dylanologists around still in the States?

BD: I don't pay much attention to that.

CM: Is Weberman still around, who was going through your garbage? I've lost touch with all that.

BD: I've lost touch with it, too.

CM: Well, you've changed cities for a start.

BD: Yeah. Got my own garbage dump. (laughing)

CM: But are you still hassled by people projecting on to you and your work, at that level?

BD: I get over-enthusiastic fans. But I never did pay much mind to that.

CM: And you've got some good, close friends that you can just spend time with?

BD: Yeah, I still have the same old people I've always known.

CM: Why have you built this great place on the West Coast?

BD: That's been built into a big thing out of nothin'. What had happened was that, somehow, we found ourselves in California in '73 or '74, and we were living on the beach, and I didn't like it, it was too noisy; traffic was on one side of the beach, ocean was on the other side, Couldn't eat in your sleep. So I found an area out there that was a little bit more remote, but very close by, and wasn't so glamorous and attractive to most of the Hollywood set. It was an older area, up on a cliff. I bought a house and I figured it was too small, I was going to remodel it. But we soon found it was pretty impossible to remodel it in any old way, because they have these laws, y'know, you can't build this on such and such; it was discouraging.

Anyway, I found a man one day who was pretty much like me in a lot of ways, but he was a contractor, and he didn't have hardly anything going, he was doing one house in the Canyon or some place, and he said, well you can do anything! You just draw it up and we can do it. Well, what happened was, we already had plans filed for one part of the house, but then we drew up another room one night, and filed that, and then drew up another room, and we just got carried away with this house!

One thing led to another, and it got to be a whole scene – it got to be a big scene up there, we had 30 people livin' in the back buildin' the house, and seein' as we could build it, I figured to go ahead and build it. So we built it and... it's standin' there now (laughing).

CM: Are you going back to it? Sounds like a symbol...

BD: I don't know. Don't know if I'll go back to it, don't know if I'll sell it.

CM: You don't want to become a prisoner of it, like Randolph Hearst.

BD: Can't afford to become a prisoner of it. The day I start to become a prisoner to it is the day I blow it up, or somethin'.

CM: I know what you mean about being too close to the sea. I lived for a while at Byron Bay, lived and wrote there with my family, right on the beach; it was beautiful, and spectacular, and idyllic, and after a while it really got me down, because I've come to think of the sea as embodying some active principle. It becomes oppressive, a challenge. So now I'm living here in the bush, which is like the passive principle here in Australia.

BD: Do you have electricity?

CM: Yeah. That's about all we've got. No hot water, no nothing... an old wood stove. But it's really lovely, because there everything is waiting for you to put your own energy into it, you're not having to be challenged all the time. I really feel I'm going to do some good work there...

BD: (Pause) I'm looking for a place like that.

12 March 1978
Helen Thomas Interview, Brisbane, Australia

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 663-668.

This interview took place in Dylan's Brisbane hotel on the afternoon of March 12th 1978. It was first published in The Age just a few days later, was referred to in Glen Baker's article in Juke (25th March 1978) and was to reappear later in a more complete form in the May 26th 1979 edition of Juke from which this interview is taken.

The opening paragraphs of Helen Thomas' (HT) article set the scene.

The number of times Bob Dylan has consented to an interview in recent years could be counted on one hand.

He's reclusive, elusive and enigmatic. While gossip columnists recount the daily lives of lesser known celebrities, Dylan has always managed to keep out of the public limelight, except in terms of his music.

On his Australian tour last year, Dylan had sent advance warning that there'd be no interviews. Journalist Helen Thomas, a confessed Dylan fan, ignored the warnings and finally cornered the man at his Brisbane hotel.

This is the complete, previously unpublished interview, exclusive to Juke.

Let's bring back the scene. It's early in the afternoon of March 12, 1978 – and Bob Dylan is an idol at ease. He is lounging around a top floor hotel suite in Brisbane, in jeans, no shirt, an open vest. The main table in the living room is piled with books, packets of cigarettes and a glass of orange juice that's half full.

Next door, this man's small, compact bodyguard is still hovering close at hand. But as Dylan sits back in the chair and finds his acoustic guitar, things seem to settle, as much as any encounter with the dozen [presumably 'doyen' – JAB] of rock poets can settle. And we talk – and his amazing blue eyes shine.

HT: I'd like to talk about your relationship with the Press. After your arrival in Sydney, I got the impression they have a fairly distorted view of you because a lot of the reports put you back as a force from the '60s, a spent force. Do you find that in the Press everywhere, or is that just here?

BD: Well, I don't know that; most of the Press I relate to is really just the music press. I don't know what the other Press thinks of me.

HT: You don't come into contact with daily newspapers very often then?

BD: No, no, no. In fact, not at all.

HT: Is that because you find them defensive, antagonistic or anything?

BD: Ah, no. I'm just not one of the public figures that has something to tell them every day. I don't know why they would want to talk to me really.

HT: What is your reaction to the description of you as a protest singer from the '60s? Does that bother you?

BD: Well, that's a Time Magazine quote. I think. I don't know; protest – I haven't thought much about it. I don't consider myself only a protest singer.

HT: That's one of the things that came out, clearly, on Tony Scaduto's book – that you never claimed to be a leader.

BD: Yeah. Tony's book came out in '71 and no, I don't relate too well to that. If I were only a protest singer. I wouldn't be here now.

HT: Still on the topic of media, there was a report in a national weekly paper here that the interviews you did (last year) with Rolling Stone, Newsweek and Time, you asked for copy approval on the Stones. Is that true?

BD: Ah. I think we might have asked for the cover. I don't think we asked for copy approval.

HT: Yeah. I just wondered because people still tend to say you like manipulating the Press as well as other people.

BD: Well, you know, you can't win really. If you don't talk to the Press, they call you a hermit and if you do talk to them, they say you're exploiting them. So (laughing) there's no way out, really.

HT: That's much the same with the songs you write. If you do write protest songs, you're leading the Movement – if you don't you've sold the Movement out.

BD: Right, but they don't say where this Movement is or what this Movement is about. To them, it's just copy, you know. It's selling papers. They don't know what you're talking about.

HT: Still on the media, could you expand on that comment you made before – about not just being a spent force from the '60s?

BD: Well, I got my start in the '60s, that's when I began to make records, so here we are in the '70s – there was a lot of us that came out of the '60s that are still around in the '70s, not too many but some... They say we're from the '60s the way they say Sinatra is from the '40s, or Elvis Presley's from the '50s. It's just a period of time people associate you with – there's very little you can do about it.

HT: You don't consider yourself a spent force, lost in time... (laughing)... in that age?

BD: ...Oh no. Not really.

HT: What sort of people are attracted to you now? How old are they – is there a particular age group?

BD: Well, you'll see tonight. I don't know what to expect here. Most of the audiences I play for are the same age as I am. And maybe we grow older and a little younger... when I look out, I usually see people of my time.

HT: What about younger people – are you reaching the kids now?

BD: Possibly, I don't know for sure. There are enough people my age to reach.

HT: What prompted you to do this tour of Japan and Australia?

BD: Ah, I don't know (laughing). I keep asking myself that.

HT: I mean, do you like touring, are you happy on the road?

BD: Yeah, yeah. I'm touring most of the time and I like what I'm doing, which is why I do it... Japan was hard, you know, the sound was good but at a certain point in the show, it does cross your mind and you wonder how many people understand the words. It crosses your mind but it passes.

HT: Are you doing any writing on the road, while you're here? Or do you do that off the road?

BD: Ah, I'm usually writing most of the time, just fragments of songs... I try to finish it up some place along the way.

HT: Moving away from that, in the (first) Jonathan Cott interview (in Rolling Stone last year), you said you'd like to do several more films I think 12.

BD: Yeah. Well, when I say 12 films, I think it would be nice to do 12 films. But I don't know whether that's a possibility. But we are making another film though.

HT: OK, how has the reaction to Renaldo and Clara affected you? The reviews we've seen here have been very bad.

BD: Yeah. The critics have found all sorts of things to be critical of in the movie but they're taking it too seriously and what they're playing up is just what is superficially in the movie. It's a shame, really, because they have written too much stuff- we shouldn't have shown it to them. They're all like intellectual people who sit around at parties and coffee tables and couldn't get much out of the movie except that it was Bob Dylan and Joan Baez.

But that's really not what the movie's about. It has to be seen by someone who doesn't know any people in the movie. You're better off if you go to that movie and you don't know who's who. If you know who's who, you're just going to get irritated.

HT: That happens to a lot of your work, a lot of intellectuals sit around coffee houses and university lounges... ?

BD: Well, yeah – but not so much with this film. I'm pulling it off, we're going to pull this film off the market and just show it to people who aren't going to worry so. We're just going to show it in rural places because it's a rural film – it isn't for city people who are real sophisticated, unless they still desire to see that sort of thing. But it's more a free-flowing film for people who just want to be carried along, you know? It isn't for someone whose mind is going to stop on this scene, or that scene because they're not going to catch the movie. They're not going to hear it, they're not going to see it. But these are the same people who didn't like what I was singing about in the '60s either.

They don't realise they're the same ones. They were never there when I started out playing and singing anyway. They're just establishment people, even though they might be working for so-called magazines which seem to be involved in a certain lifestyle. They're still pretty comfortable critics, who can't really see beyond their own nose. The movie isn't that bad. But it has brought out intense hatred in some people, the same way as my songs did in the early '60s.

HT: Why does that happen?

BD: I just strike that chord in some people. You know, they have that inside them and my work hits them in a place where they can't fit it into their own logic. These are people with logical minds – they have to have everything explained to them and I don't have time for that and neither does the crowd I play to.

But at this point, it begins to fade away from my experience. I've done it already and I can't defend it – I AM defending it because I think it's a good movie... it's just that the critics don't want to hear of it, they don't want to know that it's art. They want to kill it – they don't want people to see it. But it isn't all what they say it is. I can't tell you what it is, but it isn't what they say it is.

We wouldn't have gone ahead and made this movie (if it was that bad). They just don't understand it – their minds are just too locked into their own problems.

HT: Does that sort of response ever become detrimental to your own output, whether you are making a film or writing a song?

BD: Making a film, it could I mean, if I was a dedicated film-maker and it was all I had going, I would be very affected by what the critics say because the critics keep the people away, you know. If they say it's great, people will go to see it.

But it's got a lot against it to start with – and now, with the critics against it also, that doesn't help it any. It's four hours long and most people don't have that kind of time to sit for a movie during the week, anyway. They've got to get up and go to work the next day and they don't have four hours to get out of a theatre at one o'clock in the morning, So, there's a lot against it. But it's not going to stop me from making another film if I want to.

I'm convinced this movie is going to be around a lot longer than those critics.

HT: Well, that's what happened with your music, isn't it? A lot of critics have gone but the music remains.

BD: Right. A lot of the critics have all gone but the music is still around. So, (laughs)...

HT: Just getting back to way, way people look not just at your films but at your work overall, how do you cope with the Academic sitting around talking about you, dissecting you? Does that bother you?

BD: No, no. That really doesn't have too much to do with me; I don't take part in it. I just don't have the time. Although I can't help but feel sort of... interested.

HT: Is it flattering?

BD: Well... (pause) It's not for me to say.

HT: On that point of people talking about your work, I was wondering how close you feel you are to your audience?

BD: Well, in a certain sense I am (close)... I don't really play games with them. I don't play that game. I lay it down for anyone in the vicinity to pick it up and that's all I've ever done and that's still what I do. But I relate to their feelings.

HT: Is there any song, or one album, that you're particularly proud of, that you're happiest with?

BD: Ah, many.

HT: You look at it, then, as a whole progressive thing.

BD: Sure...

HT: OK, well out of the studio again – do you ever get worried about going back to face the crowd, after being off the road for a couple of years?

BD: No, not really. It's like yesterday all the time, you know? It doesn't matter how much time passes.

A lot of time has passed between the last tour and this one because I was finishing the movie. I just didn't have the energy to crank it up and go back on the road. But it doesn't take long to get back there...

HT: You've written several "protest" songs that were very important to a lot of people back in the'60s...

BD: Well, I'm still singing them.

HT: Right – but do you think they're still as important today as they were back then?

BD: Sure.

HT: Can you see any change having come from those songs?

BD: Yeah, I can – in a very abstract way. People have told me that they've heard a song of mine and it's changed their lives. Now I can only believe that or disbelieve it – but I know what it is to feel that because I've felt that way myself about some other peoples work.

HT: What work has touched you like that, come so close that it has changed your life?

BD: Well, I'm still awed by Woody Guthrie.

HT: He's the major one, is he, even now?

BD: Well, even now, sure.

HT: Right. Now, again, this might sound a vague kind of thing, a hard thing to pull down. But can you see any social change as a whole coming from your work, rather than just people saying it's changed their individual lives?

BD: Well, maybe it's moved things along a bit. But I don't consider myself one who's going to affect great change in the society of a country. I think it takes more than one singer with a guitar to do that, although every little bit helps, you know? But I'm not interested in changing society. I was never interested in doing that.

I always accepted society for what it was – and just dealt with my own feelings on that.

HT: What do you see long-term? I think in the Cott interview you said the 70s were a transition period from the '60s and into the 70s?

BD: Right, well that was just another link in the chain that we were talking about. In every period of time, there is a great period of revolt. That's what happened in the '60s; maybe some of the changes that were meant to happen in the '70s happened in the '60s, I don't know...

Ah, you can't depend on anything, really – everything is temporary. And so the '80s will be here and the '70s will have been temporary, just the way the '60s were temporary.

HT: Do you have an idea of what you will be doing in the '80s?

BD: I'll be doing the same thing.

HT: Singing and playing?

BD: Yeah – I've done it since I was a kid: I don't see any reason to stop.

HT: Is there anything you haven't done since you started that you wish you had?

BD: Oh, many things that I haven't done... (laughing)... Oh Lord, yeah – there are many things I haven't done.

But I have no goals like to be the first man to do this or the first man to do that: the first man to go to the moon, the first man to win the boxing heavyweight title three times. I don't have any of those kind of goals, you know.

HT: Referring to that Cott interview again, you said there really hadn't been any true rock n' roll since Little Richard...

BD: Yeah.

HT: How would you describe your music?

BD: Ah, it's a kind of mixture of rural sophistication.

HT: Country sophistication?

BD: Well (with a grin) I've been to the city, you know, and I can't avoid that. So it does enter into my music – but the backbone of it comes from the country.

HT: And you can't see yourself moving into any new area?

BD: No, I'm on a steady rolling path.

HT: Is it a path you are happy with?

BD: It's the only path I know – so it's the most familiar path to me. I'm neither happy nor disillusioned with it.

HT: OK, one last thing. You had a Press Conference recently in Los Angeles, to launch Renaldo And Clara and again, it seems as if the media were being very defensive towards you – or you were being very defensive towards them. Then, maybe one works towards the other – but what happened there? From this distance it seemed negative?

BD: Well – what can I say? We did the interviews so people would know there was a movie out, and the whole idea was to let people know that. We didn't think the Press was going to be so antagonistic towards it. But that's alright, you know.

The movie, like I say, is going to be around a lot longer than they are. It's just a shame they can't see that.

Karen Hughes Interview, Sydney, Australia

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 669-679.

This interview between Karen Hughes and Bob Dylan took place at the Boulevard Hotel in Sydney immediately before the 1978 tour concert at the Sydney Showground (this was the last show of the Far East leg). It was originally published in Australia, in Rock Express, issue No. 4. as an edited version of the actual interview. A taped version exists and the printed article is a pretty accurate reflection of the interview proper, with the exception that the questions asked were in a very different order to the way they appear in print. Some questions asked were not published (they appear at the end of this section) and, it would appear, a few points printed in Rock Express never arose during the interview in the context suggested (these are noted also). It would have been better, perhaps, to transcribe the tape and then note differences from the Rock Express article, but the tape in my possession is not of the complete interview – it would seem that Hughes did not switch on her recorder until the interview was under way and the tape is certainly truncated at the end. Certain parts of the printed interview do not appear on the tape and these are probably from the end section of the session which is not available to me. I am unable to find a more complete version.

Karen Hughes was a young Australian journalist, with little track-record who happened to bump into Dylan in Adelaide and found herself being promised an interview for later in the tour.

KH: Sometimes, when you speak, it's as though words are energy and too many words are wasted energy, which could be better put into your songs. Is that how you feel?

BD: Absolutely, yeah. I seldom talk. I seldom like to talk to anybody also because it's false, because when you talk and you speak that's all you're doing. And it has to be direct. I can't do in any other way unless it's direct. And most people don't want to be direct... you find yourself drifting.

KH: Into social conventions of communication?

BD: Yeah, into opinions and ideas. I don't care about those things (pause). I do and I don't.

KH: Or do you care about them if they have feelings to back them up?

BD: Well, feelings yeah, and experience. If they have experience to back them up, alright. It's like somebody telling you about Australia is one thing, and seeing it for yourself is another. I don't like to be told things.

KH: Do you think that you've got to be selfish and shut everything off in order to write?

BD: I think so, don't you?

KH: Yeah, but don't you find that paradoxical?

BD: To what?

KH: Communication.

BD: Well, you need something to communicate to so... no, I don't think so at all.

KH: What kind of outlet does touring provide for you?

BD: It's hard to explain to someone who doesn't do it at all. Since I was just a kid, just a little kid, I used to watch touring bands come through my home town. It always seemed like that was where to go. And the only escape out of it was to get on a bus and go.

KH: What about now, then?

BD: It's the same thing.

KH: Ray Davies once said about touring "when I tour I realise that I have to communicate with the outside. If I don't have an audience and I just write, my mind meanders round and round the subject, but when I know I have to communicate it to the people, it goes straight to the subject. So I like to tour". Would you agree with that?

BD: I would agree to that. I like to sing to the people. I just don't like to sing into microphones in a studio.

KH: Many people who come to your concerts here regard it as a kind of pilgrimage. Most would like to meet you. What do you feel you have to offer your fans on this kind of individual level?

BD: In India they have men that live in the Himalayas and people make long journeys to sit at their feet. And what happens when they sit at their feet? Nothing. Nothing happens; they're usually given a big dose of silence.

KH: That's an answer of a kind, throwing it back on the questioner.

BD: I don't know whether that's an answer. Sometimes it's better to be quiet than to make a lot of noise; because when you're quiet you're usually more in tune with the birds and the bees and the phantoms of life.

KH: Do you meditate?

BD: Oh, I know a little about all these things, but I don't follow any daily rituals.

KH: You can't see any parallel between your fans seeking a private audience with you and the time long ago when you went to visit Woody Guthrie in a New Jersey hospital?

BD: No. When I went to see him there wasn't many people seeing him. He was sick. No one had heard of him in those days, except just a few people who played folk music. So I went to see him, and it wasn't like seeing the king, you know.

KH: What kind of feeling have you been getting back from the audiences in Australia?

BD: (Pause) That they understand without having to be told what it's all about, what the music's all about. Why I'm different from all the rest of the groups of people playing around. I mean, I've been at this now a long time. What usually happens is that you are at it until someone else comes along, and I'm still at it. And I'm still going to be at it until someone else comes along.

KH: But surely no-one else ever comes along that's the same?

BD: Well, that's true, but usually the way things go is that someone else comes out, out of the crowd, of considerable ability who can cover what you're doing and take it another step (pause). When the fire's burnt out, I'll just be doing this until the fire's burnt out. Muddy Waters is still playing, he's 65-66. If those people can do it, I don't see why I can't. It takes more out of you when you're young because you don't know yourself that well. If you're dealing in the whole and not just fragments, I don't see why you can't last as long as you want to last. It's not uncommon to be 65 to 70. Muddy Waters, I keep coming back to Muddy Waters because... Lightning Hopkins was very old. I don't know how old he is 'cause he doesn't really say, but he's gotta be beyond 50. Bill Monroe is still going on and he's in his fifties.

KH: How does the audience reaction here in Australia compare with Japan, New Zealand and the United States?

BD: The States I can't tell you. I haven't been in the States with this show; I've been in the States many times. In Japan they were very reserved, as if something was destroyed. I don't know what. Well, you know what, I know what, everybody knows what it was.

(Steve Soles interrupts to talk with Bob about the purchase of acoustic guitars made from local woods)

BD: Yeah, they were very reserved but maybe there was a language barrier. There probably was; I don't see how there couldn't be really. But they were great. They got better and better with every show. New Zealand was an outdoor show. We played one outdoor show in New Zealand and the audience was very supportive.

KH: How did you find New Zealand as a country.

BD: Well, I was only in Auckland, but the sky was deep.

KH: They have mountains and sea together.

BD: Yeah, the flowers are strange and the birds were interesting. I have never seen those kind before.

KH: Do you find that touring gives you a more direct communication and therefore speeds up the creative process?

BD: One feeds the other.

KH: You were saying touring was a way of getting out of where you lived in Minnesota.

BD: Well, it was an escape, it was like sitting all day... like, when the train rolled through town you always looked at those faces that were peering out of the windows.

KH: Yeah, like when you sit in airports and see all those people going.

BD: Yeah, it was like that; that was it.

KH: How do you feel about Minnesota now; do you feel some kind of attraction?

BD: Yeah, I still go back every now and then.

KH: Because you've got some land there haven't you?

BD: Yeah, I still know some people there so I go back every now and then.

KH: Do you still go to class reunions?

BD: No, I don't do that.

KH: You did once.

BD: I went to one in... er, did I go to one, I went to the 10th one.

KH: When was that, in '63?

BD: '69, I just poked in, poked my face in.

KH: Do you draw much these days?

BD: No.

KH: Why not?

BD: Time.

KH: Would you like to?

BD: Yeah.

KH: What kind of satisfaction do you get out of it?

BD: One time I was doing it all day for a couple of months in New York. This was a couple of years back, it was 74-75. I did it every day from eight till four with a break or something, and it locked me into the present time more than anything else I ever did. More than any experience I've ever had, any enlightenment I've ever had. Because I was constantly being intermingled with myself, and all the different selves that were in there, until this one left, then that one left, and I finally got down to the one that I was familiar with.

KH: Who are your friends these days?

BD: I just have the same old friends that I've always had. People who are akin to me. None of my friends look at me in awe, there's no one hanging around me that thinks I'm the leader. It's hard to explain who they are, they're just people; people like you or me.

KH: You're working very hard at the moment, What are you working on?

BD: Trying to get another album organised.

KH: Can you tell me something about the songs and ideas involved?

BD: They're hard to define. Some ballads, some narrative ballads, and some which aren't. I don't really write about anything, I don't know where these songs come from. Sometimes I'm thinking in some other age that I lived through. I must have had the experiences of all these songs because sometimes I don't know what I'm writing about until years later it becomes clearer to me.

KH: Do you find that, as a composer, you're more like a medium, tuning into something greater happening?

BD: I think every composer does that. No one in his right mind would think that it was coming from him, that he has invented it. It's just coming through him.

KH: What kind of force compels you to write?

BD: Well, any departure, like from my traditional self, will kick it off.

KH: How do you go about composing these songs, working them out?

BD: Well, I usually get a melody. A melody just happens to appear as I'm playing and after that the words come in and out. Sometimes the words come first.

KH: Does it come quickly or do you have to work on it?

BD: Well, it sometimes doesn't come quickly and other times it does come very quickly. I've written songs in five minutes complete, other songs I've had laying around for months.

KH: Does it relate to anything going on outside of you?

BD: No, just when I have the time to finish it or the inspiration or whatever it needs to finish it.

KH: Previously, when you recorded, you just used to go into the studio and do it once, put down each track completely with no overdubbing.

BD: I still do that.

(Dylan at this point noticed Karen Hughes copy of Brian Vesey-Fitzgerald's book Gypsys Of Britain)

BD: Yeah, in the gypsy way of life, death is a very happy thing.

KH: It's nice. Lots of nomadic cultures are like that.

BD: Yeah, I can see that point of view.

KH: Didn't you once visit a Gypsy king in the south of France?

BD: Yeah, he was an old man at this time and the person I went to see him with knew him when he was young, not young but ten years earlier, when he was still vital and active. And at that time he had maybe sixteen to twenty wives and over one hundred children. At the time we saw him he'd had a heart attack so the smell of death was all around and most of his family abandoned him. Fifteen or sixteen of his wives had left him and gone, and he only had about two or three children there, so he was pretty much alone. But he still had his scene going; he was into dealing in antiques and junk-metal junk.

KH: Getting back to the album, is there anything else you can tell me about it?

BD: Is this your book? You didn't bring this for me, did you?

KH: No, but you can have it. Would you like it?

BD: Sure, I'd appreciate it.

KH: What kind of arrangements will you be using?

BD: Well, they're all new songs, very simple arrangements.

KH: Similar to what you've done in the past?

BD: Yeah, the arrangements are...

KH: You're not going to change drastically like Joan Baez has on her last album, more towards funk?

BD: I didn't think it was all that funky. Oh, maybe it was for her (pause). Funk is not something that you capture on record, funk is a way of life. It's a way you feel; you can't just make a funky sounding record. But I know what you mean. Funk has to do with throwing coins into the coffin, that kind of thing.

KH: Throwing coins into the coffin?

BD: Yeah, funk has to do with different beliefs.

KH: Do you think there's still a lot to say about people that hasn't yet been said?

BD: Individual people yeah, but not people in general. Yeah, you can go on and on about individual people because of the really different characteristics and different attitudes of many people. And then of course, once you get two people together, there's some different types of relationship between different types of people. There are many different levels of how people can relate to one another. Some are casual, some are business, some are romantic, some are...

KH: Do you think that films are an ideal medium to explore that?

BD: I do, yeah.

KH: What's the significance of the title Renaldo and Clara?

BD: Well, people keep asking me that. There isn't any more significance to that than what's the significance to Queen Jane, why she had that name. Tolstoy wrote a book called Anna Karenina and what was the significance of that name? Renaldo is a fox and Clara is supposedly the clear understanding of the future which doesn't exist.

KH: What kind of relationship do you have with women?

BD: What kind of relationships?

KH: How do you view women? What do you get out of relationships with women? Do you think that they're equal or...

BD: Well, I do think that everybody's equal, but, I get past the attraction kinda rather quickly. I don't have time for that anymore.

KH: And then what?

BD: How many relationships can you really have in your life and what kind are they?

KH: Why I brought that up was because the other night you were saying how difficult you found it to have girlfriends because they always had to fit into your life. And I was wondering if, given your belief in equality, you should expect that?

BD: No, but anyone who is in my life at all respects that. That I don't come home every night.

KH: You seem in your songs to have a capacity to love many women. Would you like to have many wives, like the Gypsy king?

BD: Well, yeah, I'd like to have a wife for every degree.

KH: Do you have a home?

BD: A home? I don't have all my possessions in any one place. My clothes are all over the place, but I thrive in different places. I'd love to have a home somewhere ideally.

KH: It can be a person or a feeling or a...

BD: You know that old corny saying "a home is where the heart is"?

KH: It's true.

BD: (Nods)

KH: You once said after visiting Rubin Carter in prison that you left knowing that "this man's philosophy and my philosophy were running on the same road, and you don't meet too many people like that". Well, how do you feel about your fans who buy your records? Surely there's some kind of empathy there?

BD: I'm not sure if they think like me. They might feel as I do, but thinking like me? I don't think we can talk about thought, we just have to talk about feeling. I'm only dealing in the feeling aspect. I'm only dealing with feelings that seem to be unbreakable and the people that follow me and feel that way, feel that. And that is what I think combines everything.

KH: Do you think that in any way the public and the press have made you into something that you're not?

BD: Uh, no, I don't think the public are that gullible. If I wasn't doing what it is that they think I'm doing, I'm sure that no amount of press would be skilful enough to say that I was. What do you think of this shirt?

KH: I like the penguins. Where did you get it?

BD: Off the street.

KH: Here?

BD: Yeah.

KH: Are you going to wear it on stage tonight?

BD: This shirt with the penguins? No, I don't wear my street clothes on the stage anymore. Somebody made up all these clothes. I just got too depressed having to go on in my street clothes all the time.

KH: What's the name of your designer?

BD: A guy in L.A. named Billy. He designed all these clothes.

KH: In the songs that you've been writing, have you written anything about your experiences in Australia?

BD: No, not as a traveler. I haven't had that much time to experience too much.

KH: Have you managed to hear any live bands or artists while you've been here?

BD: No, just on television. But a couple of the guys went to see this guy, Dave Warner, and somebody managed to get a taped cassette and it sounded pretty good.

KH: Have you heard Richard Clapton at all?

BD: Yeah, I heard Richard Clapton in Auckland. I liked him very much. In fact, I tried to get him on the bill for Australia, because you know what the law says that you have to have an Australian support act.

KH: He always cites you as an influence.

BD: I thought he was real good, no pretence.

KH: What do you think characterises the Australians that you know?

BD: Well, in Brisbane, I noticed that everybody has a great ability to laugh.

KH: What about elsewhere?

BD: Elsewhere I find it... I don't think it's a land for explorers.

KH: You mean you don't consider it a land for explorers because there isn't much to discover?

BD: No, I find you have to have permission for everything.

KH: Creatively?

BD: No, just a general feeling in the air. I can't explain it. It's like a feeling when all the windows are closed and you can't open them. And I can't explain it but it seems to be very large too. I've seen a lot more and I've got a lot better feelings for it this time than the last time when I was here and I probably will come back again.

KH: When do you think you'll come back?

BD: Well, the next go around.

KH: You have no idea when that will be?

BD: No, whenever resembles the right time. I like Australia, I like all the towns that we've played in and all the people that we've played to.

KH: Do you think that feeling of having to ask permission for something is linked with the inferiority complex that Australians are reputed to have? Like "no you can't do that because this is Australia" going back to the convict days.

BD: Yeah, because we have some friends. I have a good friend who wanted to come to a concert, who wanted to see this show and he couldn't get a visa – he was coming from Singapore. He couldn't get a visa and it was outrageous of them and he said, well they didn't understand why he just wanted to come for a few days.

KH: If you could think of one image to sum up how you see yourself, what would it be?

BD: During the last one hundred years or the next hundred years?

KH: Both.

BD: I don't know. Basically I just have common qualities. I feel primitive in a lot of ways and in a lot of ways I feel advanced and neither one of these feelings really matter to me. I can imagine every situation in life as if I've done it, no matter what it might be: whether it be self-punishment or marrying my half-sister, I mean, I can imagine, I can feel all these things for some reason. I don't know why.

KH: You once wrote in Idiot Wind "what's good is bad, what's bad is good, you'll find out when you've reached the top, you're on the bottom". Does that sum up how you feel about the cyclic way of things?

BD: Yeah, everything that goes out comes around. I feel that way, don't you? I mean, I don't feel that I have to be quarantined for thinking that, that's just a very common way to think. And it isn't all that irregular either, it happens to be true. The simple things which are true usually astound people. "What's good is bad and what's bad is good". It sounds very simple really.

KH: Yeah, it struck me as being very true, that's why I noted it.

BD: Right, it's a piece of raw meat.

KH: Frank Zappa once said he thought the universe was based on a Mobius vortex.

BD: Oh yeah. Well, I can see that. I also find it very uncertain. I had a great flash into what the universe was all about when I saw a man burning a fiddle on a roof, but I can't explain to you what it was that I felt. (See notes at end of this section)

KH: What other artists do you find at the moment musically exciting?

BD: You mean contemporary?

KH: Yeah, doing things now.

BD: Well, everybody can be exciting on a certain night.

KH: But for you?

BD: For me? Usually the old people every time are the only people exciting musically. Of my crowd, Eric Clapton's pretty exciting, but I usually listen to the older records.

KH: You mentioned liking Joan Armatrading.

BD: I like her, yeah. I only have heard her records. I haven't seen her in person. I liked her.

KH: What about Roy Harper?

BD: Isn't he an English... er... Yeah, years ago I heard his records and I liked them.

KH: Ray Davies?

BD: I think he's a genius. Nobody ever asks me about him. I've always been a fan of Ray Davies ever since way hack when. I've always liked him and his brother and that group. (For underlined text refer to notes at end of this section)

KH: What do you admire about the Kinks?

BD: Well, whenever you come up with something, it's like being a chemist. Whenever you come up with something new, you've created something new so I have to admire anyone that can do that. And that song – like I say I don't know what he's doing these days, but he did those songs You Really Got Me and the one after that, that was new, that was different. It was new and it had never been done before. So I admire that when I hear that and I appreciate that (pause). Yeah. I was going to try and contact him next time I go over there, to see what he was doing.

KH: Do you find other people working in other areas interesting, scientists for example?

BD: Well, I don't recognise too many of those people so... yeah, people who are working on cancer research, I'm not gonna put that down.

KH: How self-sufficient are you?

BD: In what way?

KH: Mentally, I suppose.

BD: Well, I'm not under any narcotics.

KH: That's not really what I meant.

BD: How do you mean it then?

KH: How much can you exist in isolation without needing other people?

BD: Without drinking any hemlock? I don't know, I really don't know. I mean, I have to get out and see people, but I still need to pull the night shades down too.

KH: With each successive step do you feel that you're coming closer to working out your own destiny?

BD: Yeah, 99% of the time I do.

KH: Do you believe in reincarnation?

BD: In a casual but not astonishing way.

KH: Can you recall other lives?

BD: No, personally I can't.

KH: Not even flashes?

BD: Um, the flash without the desire to... once in a while... no, I can't say as I do. I don't pretend that I have been living in some other time although I admit that it's possible.

KH: Do you find that most things come from within?

BD: Most things come from taking chances.

KH: And you're always taking a lot?

BD: Yeah.

Additional significant sections of the interview found on tape but not in the published version.

As the tape starts up:

KH: I think it sums up how you feel at the moment. Free like a bird, just singing and playing.
BD: Well, it depends on what kind of bird you talk about, you know. There's erm, robins and wrens, owls... some of them can be good and some of them can be not so good. You know, for one, happiness and ensuring the long future and many children and then when you hear a, you know, another kind of bird, it means a different thing.
KH: Well, which one are you?
BD: Me? Well, I can be either one. It depends on what I feel like at the moment.
KH: I was wondering if you exercised a lot 'cause your body's in very good shape.
BD: Um, er... I'm running around so much, you know, that, that... er, I guess it... I don't know. I can't remember how much I eat and what would be my weight.
KH: Yeah.

KH: You said, with the other album, that you were writing about different levels of reality. You said that the other night.
BD: I don't really write about anything. I don't really write about different levels of reality, er...

KH: In the songs that you've been writing, have you written anything about your experiences in Australia?
BD: No. Not as a traveler.
KH: But as a thinker?
BD: No. I haven't had much... I haven't had time to experience too much of what, er... The writer now... in fact, I'm waiting for this guy to call me back. Is he going to call me back?
KH: Yeah. He is.
BD: Do you know his work.
KH: No. I don't. I've never heard of him.
BD: You'd like to hear him.
KH: Do you like his work?
BD: He sent me a song the last time. That was very good.
KH: Yeah. You know, I don't mind if he comes up here while I'm doing this. So you haven't written anything about Australia?
BD: No.

KH: Do you have what I call "mind groupies" – groupies that hang around you trying to live off your mind?
BD: No. There's no-one hanging around me who thinks I'm their leader, you know. It's not that type...
KH: But, they really want to get into your mind.
BD: No. Maybe they do. I'm not aware of it if they are.
KH: You were saying that strange things have been happening to you here like getting lost in Brisbane and just really weird things.
BD: No, it wasn't so strange. One day, I just, er, found myself with nothing to do except walk around and I walked past the bridge on the wrong side of the road and, er... found myself out... pretty far from town. And, er, it was just one of them days, you know, it wasn't... I don't even remember it all that much as, er, nothing very eventful really happened, but... I was just convinced it was due to nothing. I didn't get lost; I wouldn't say that I was lost.
KH: You just ended up somewhere different.

BD: Yeah.

KH: I thought you got somewhere like eight miles in ten minutes.

BD: No, I was eight miles out of town, which was strange. I mean, I kept looking at that bridge, following that bridge because I knew where it was. I knew where the beginning of the bridge was but I... I was looking at the other side of the bridge. So I kept walking around in circles until I got to the other side of the bridge. The other side of the bridge was not far from the (?)... miles. A long bridge. Very permanent.

KH: Have you seen many people in Australia – met many people?

BD: Yeah! We've met a lot of people here in Sydney. Well, you know, some people in or out of the shows.

KH: Have you got close to many?

BD: Erm... Not really. But I do have some people that I know last time I was here, that I met, that are here and sort of... they, they, you know. I can't... I haven't gotten close to anybody where I can read their mind and they can read mine.

KH: That made kinda lasting friendships?

Regarding the Mobius vortex question, this concept had to be explained to Dylan before he understood (or seemed to understand).

Bob Dylan Opens Up on Bob Dylan
BY ROBERT HILBURN

Bob Dylan the legend seemed unusually relaxed and approachable as he strolled down a Santa Monica street this week. There were few signs of the brooding, reclusive image that has often surrounded him.

It was 11 a.m. and he wanted some coffee. The restaurant closest to his two-story rehearsal hall wasn't open yet, so he headed for a nearby sidewalk café.

On the way, several people recognized Dylan, who opens his first L.A. concert engagement in four years Thursday night at the Universal Amphitheater.

A teen-ager wearing a faded Jackson Browne T-shirt waved as he zipped past Dylan on a skateboard. A man in a white MG convertible slowed for a closer look. At the café, a woman at the next table stared for a half hour and then asked in a French accent, "Aren't you Bob DillON?"

It was inconceivable a few years ago to find Dylan on such public view. An interview was even more unlikely. After a near-fatal 1966 motorcycle accident, Dylan retired to upstate New York to recuperate and—some say—hide from the pressures of rock superstardom.

But here he was—just two days before his 37th birthday—speaking openly and intensely about his music, image, financial troubles and the critics who panned his "Renaldo & Clara" film.

"Reading the reviews of the movie, I sensed a feeling of them wanting to crush things. Those reviews weren't about the movie. They were just an excuse to get at me for one reason or another.

"I think I know what happened. In the '60s, Time, Newsweek—all those magazines—started calling me the 'father of the revolution,' 'the folk-rock king' and all that stuff. That's what created this 'mythical Bob Dylan' thing.

"So, now, the magazines must figure they made a mistake back then and they've gotta take it down some. I don't know if they'll be successful, but what they say has nothing to do with me. It didn't in the '60s and it doesn't now."

Dylan's retreat in 1966 followed years that overflowed with the pressures of touring, recording and living up to the enormous expectations created by such gripping, anthem-like songs as "Blowin' in the Wind," "Like a Rolling Stone" and "Times They Are A-Changin'."

However much he denied the role, he was looked to as the spokesman for a generation actively involved in the civil rights movement and other areas of sweeping social change.

"I was on the road 150-200 nights a year in those days," he said. "Everything was happening so fast. It was a real danger. I couldn't see how fast. I was moving. I was looking at a wall and I didn't know it But I was racing after something in my music and I hadn't gotten there yet..."

By 1968, Dylan was making records again, but they lacked the intensity and social comment of the early days. Some complained about the changes in his music Some attacked him as having originally used "protest" music just to gain an audience.

Through it all. Dylan kept to himself. He didn't tour again until 1974. But he was bigger than ever. More than six million ticket orders were received for his 40 concerts that year. He followed that highly acclaimed series of shows with the Band in 1975 with the more informal Rolling Thunder Revue tour. But he'll be on the road more this year than at any time since the '60s.

The sold-out seven-night Amphitheater engagement is part of a worldwide tour that has already included Japan and Australia, and next heads to Europe. Dylan also will return to the United States for an extensive tour this fall.

Part of the reason for the concert activity, he admits, is financial. "I've got quite a few debts to pay off," he said, smiling slightly. "I had a couple of bad years. I put a lot of money into the movie ("Renaldo & Clara"), built a big house... and there's the divorce. It costs a lot to get divorced in California."

But Dylan also said he realizes he needs to do more live shows.

"Movies fascinate me, but they'll never take the place of performing. If you are a musician, you need that feedback. Elvis did 30 movies or whatever, but they never were enough for him. He eventually had to go back on stage. Once you pick up the guitar, you can't put it down.

"It's like I have to laugh at Robbie (the Band's Robbie Robertson) in 'The Last Waltz' when he talks about giving up the road. It ain't gonna happen. Once you're on it, you're on it..."

"Renaldo & Clara"—Dylan's recent four-hour mix of concert and other footage—was both a critical and box-office disaster. The film closed in most theaters after just a few weeks. Critics not only attacked the film, but seemed in many cases to take after Dylan himself. Indulgent was one of the gentler phrases used.

Dylan now hopes to put out a more workable, two-hour version of "Renaldo & Clara" soon—but he stands by the original film.

"I can't say the critical reaction surprised me. Look, you get 10 people and seven of them aren't going to like it. That's the percentage I've been accustomed to with my music. Of the three who are left, one might love it, one might hate it, one might just blank out or something.

"But I was disappointed that the critics couldn't get beyond the superficial elements. They thought the movie was all about Bob Dylan, Joan Baez and Sara Dylan... and wasn't.

"It had nothing to do with those people. But that's what kept coming back in review after review. It's like the old days. The times haven't changed. They're the same people who didn't like what I was singing about in the '60s."

Still, Dylan acknowledges he learned something from "Renaldo & Clara" about film-making. "I know the importance of a good script. We thought we had a script with 'Renaldo & Clara' but it may have been too abstract.

"I'm trying to get some people together, but I don't know how far we're gonna get. I realize I can't do the whole thing. I can only do one thing at a time. A movie is too big. I'll never try to combine a tour and a movie again."

Back in the rehearsal hall, Dylan slipped a tape of his upcoming album into the cassette machine. Titled "Street Legal," the LP will be released next month. Dylan tapped his foot and commented about some of the songs and the arrangements. He seemed especially pleased.

"On this album, I took a few steps backward, but I also took a bunch of steps forward because I had a lot of time to concentrate on it. I also had the band sounding like I want it to sound. It's got that organ sound from 'Blonde on Blonde' again. That's something that has been missing."

Because of the much-publicized break-up of his 12-year marriage, several of the songs on "Street Legal" are likely to be interpreted as reflections on that period. But he denied the link.

"I went beyond that" he said. "I cut that whole experience right off. I had some songs last year which I didn't record. They dealt with that period as I was going through it. For relief, I wrote the tunes. I thought they were great. Some people around town heard them. I played them for some friends. But I had no interest in recording them. I wanted to start off new on the album."

Listening to the music, Dylan spoke of his direction and objectives as a songwriter.

"My music comes from two places: white hillbilly music—Roscoe Holcomb, stuff like that—and black blues—people like Son House, Charley Patton, Robert Johnson. These are the two elements I've always related to best, even now.

"Then, all of a sudden in the '60s, I heard Woody Guthrie, which just blew my mind—what he did with a lyric. So, I stopped everything and learned his songs.

"That's what kept me going. I wanted to see how far I could take those elements, how well I could blend them together. Sometimes my music has gone a little to one side, then it drifts back to the other, but I'm always headed in the same direction. That's what I hear on this album, too.

"The people who have been into my music realize that. They didn't need the magazines to tell them something was happening. They discovered it for themselves. That's why I have a real strong following. That's why I'm not really surprised when the shows sell out. It's no mystery to me. My audience and I go back a long way."

Dylan acknowledged, however, the difficulty of keeping perspective amidst the acclaim and adoration.

"I know I've played some shows that were awful and people acted like they were great," he said, tugging occasionally at his dark curly hair. "It saddens you when that happens. You get depressed about it. But then I've played some shows that I thought were everything they should be and people would still find something to complain about.

"So, you have to learn to trust your own judgment You have to remember what your purpose is and walk that thin line. You've got to guard against the road getting too wide, and things put on the road to make you stumble or turn back. You have to keep moving. I feel like I'm moving real well now. There's a lot going on."

Despite some exquisite love songs that would have made him an acclaimed songwriter even if he had never written about social conditions in America, Dylan—to many—continues to be looked upon chiefly as a spokesman and commentator.

So, it was only natural to ask him—the most American pop music voice of the 1960s (and beyond)—about the 1970s. He took advantage of the question to again define his artistic position.

"The peculiar thing about the '70s is they're almost over and no one has gotten around to figuring them out," he said.

"The '70s aren't as explosive as the '60s where people were laying themselves on the line every day, but people have to understand everything changes.

"Look at the so-called leaders from the '60s. What ever happened to them? There was Abbie Hoffman, who you never hear from any more. He could be sitting at the next table for all we know. There was Tom Hayden, who's running a children's camp. And: Jerry Rubin, who is a sociologist or whatever.

"What did those 'leaders' really do? Maybe they did something then, but what are they doing now? That's the same thing a lot of people say about me: 'He did it then, but what is he doing now...'

"Well, I'm doing what I always did: I'm still playing my guitar and singing my songs."

Garth Pearce Interview

As yet, I have no idea where, or exactly when, this interview by Garth Pierce was conducted. It was published in the Daily Express of 26th May 1978 under the heading –

THE SINGER: "I DON'T WORRY ANYMORE"

The times are changin' for Bob Dylan who celebrated his 37th birthday this week.

The weary folk hero of the sixties arrives to do six concerts in London's massive Earls Court next month with a plague problem weighing heavily on his narrow shoulders.

A reputed £1 million has been lost on a film called Renaldo and Clara. More millions will go on a divorce settlement to his wife Sara. And his recent sell-out tour of Japan and Australia – forced on him – some say by money problems – has not been a critical success.

Dylan's unwillingness to take to the road regularly has added to the brooding, somewhat mystical qualities which still help him to cash in hugely at the box office. Even though his talent has been judged by many to be in sharp decline. All 96,000 tickets for his British concerts have been snapped up. But what sort of Bob Dylan will his ageing fans see?

"I don't feel old," he says. "I don't really think in terms of growing up."

If the pressures of being feted as a musical genius have ever taken their toll, he makes light of it: "It doesn't really worry me," he says. "Morning always comes so quickly that I don't have a chance to think about it. I don't have that youthful desire to go out and prove that I can conquer the masses. A tour like this is just a tour. There is no great meaning to it. I am not sure about the event and what it means to people but to us (Dylan and the backing group) we are just going on playing."

For a man who produced the classics of the sixties, like 'Positively Fourth Street,' 'Desolation Row,' 'Like A Rolling Stone' and 'Just Like A Woman,' there has been an alarming dearth of good material in recent years. He shrugs off suggestions of being a man out of step with 1978.

"You must have belief and a purpose," he says. "You must believe that you can disappear through walls. Without that belief you're not going to become a very good rock singer. I try to create art and I wrote a lot of those songs by gut feeling. I don't think in terms of economics or status or what people think of me one way or another." As long, his critics might add, as they keep passing the pound notes through the turnstiles.

Philippe Adler Interview, Royal Garden Hotel, London, England

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 445-449.

Dylan was interviewed by Philippe Adler of the French magazine L'Expresse on June 16th, the day of the second Earl's Court concert. The interview took place in Dylan's suite at the Royal Garden Hotel. The article was published as a major cover-story in issue 1408, 3 – 9th July, timed to appear the week of the Paris shows (first show at Paris Pavillion was July 3rd).
I've used the excellent translation of Sue Allen as my starting point but have made a number of corrections to this following comparison with the genuine Express article.

BOB DYLAN PARLE

<< L'amnésie est terminée... >> Dans un entretien exclusif avec Philippe Adler, Bob Dylan a rompu un silence de douze ans. Une confession à chaud, entre deux concerts à Londres.

PA: When you came on stage last night in London you received a fantastic ovation. Intoxicating, wasn't it?

BD: No, because I didn't think it was for me. It was an ovation for someone or something else.

PA: In the English press this morning they're talking about you as a myth, a living legend, an electric poet...

BD: I don't care. It even annoys me a little. As soon as people start sticking a label on me that puts up a barrier between the public and me.

PA: Now you seem to be returning to the stage. Does that mean that the journey through the wilderness has ended?

BD: Yes, I believe so. I'm back on the tracks.

PA: Is it for the money?

BD: No. Of course I need the money and I know how to spend it, but basically it's because I wanted to do the only thing I've ever known how to do; sing and play. I'm a musician that's all.

PA: We won't need to wait another 12 years to see you again?

BD: No, no. The amnesia is finished (laughs).

PA: In your new band there's a lot of percussion...

BD: That's essential for me. My songs need a lot of rhythm. Next time I'll come with three drummers.

PA: It's been said that in taking on three pretty singers you're paving the way to Las Vegas.

BD: Pfff!

PA: Are you going to present the same program in Paris as in the States and in London?

BD: I still don't know. I might put in a few more songs from the new album, now that it's out. But that means I'll have to take out other ones, and I never know which ones to take out. There are so very many.

PA: Legend has it that your very first song was dedicated to Brigitte Bardot.

BD: That's right.

PA: Could you sing it again for me?

BD: I can't remember it anymore. I only know that it was very short (laughs).

PA: How old were you when you bought your first guitar?

BD: I was 12. It was an electric guitar. I was mad about Presley, Chuck Berry, Buddy Holly and I played rock. And then, one day, I heard a record by Odetta, and everything changed.

PA: I thought that you had been influenced at first by Woody Guthrie?

BD: No, it was the rock and rollers, then Odetta, The Kingston Trio, Harry Belafonte, The Carter Family. Guthrie only came along afterwards but what a shock! I learned off by heart more than 200 of his songs.

PA: When you gave up the folk guitar for the electric, your early fans didn't appreciate it.

BD: Oh, no! They threw me off the stage in Newport in '65 (laughs). After that I got used to the whistles. I was entitled to them in Paris as well as London in '66. Deep down I think that people enjoy whistling. Like at a ball game.

PA: Why have you changed your name from Zimmerman to Dylan?

BD: Why do people change their towns, nationalities, lives? I don't possess this name. It just fell off my tongue one day, it rained on me, I kept it.

PA: Is there any link with Dylan Thomas?

BD: No, none at all! If I were a fan of Dylan Thomas I would have sung his poems or I would be called Bob Thomas.

PA: You've always remained very mysterious about your childhood. At one time you even pretended to be an orphan. Your biographies say that your father was a chemist or a miner or an electrician...

BD: No, none of these. My father was a very active man, but he was stricken very early by an attack of polio. The illness put an end to all his dreams I believe. He could barely walk. When we moved from the North of the country two of his brothers who were electrical fitters, opened a shop and they took him with them so he could mind the shop.

PA: Before that, had he been a student?

BD: No. You know my grand father had come over from Russia in the 1920s. He was a peddler and made shoes. He had 7 sons and one daughter, well, my father never had the time to go to college. He used to do odd jobs to bring home some money to his mother. He died in '68.

PA: Your motorcycle accident in '66 happened like a sign of destiny, at a time when you were burning the candle at both ends.

BD: I couldn't have kept going for long at that pace...

PA: Well, there was this long period when you seemed to disappear into thin air.

BD: Yes. That was the amnesia (laughs).

PA: After Paris are you going to take a rest?

BD: No, not at all! I'm going to Sweden, then I return to England for a gigantic festival in the open air on a disused airfield. They are expecting more than 100,000 people. After that I'm on tour in America until the end of the year. Then I'll cut a new album.

PA: Where and when do you write?

BD: Anywhere and anytime.

PA: Do you often have ideas for songs?

BD: All the time. I put all my ideas down on paper.

PA: Do you have a note book?

BD: No, loose leaves. Like you and the same pen as you (laughs).

PA: Do you think that your recent songs touch on current events like those ones when you were starting out?

BD: Yes, I think so. This will be even more obvious with the ones on my next album. I think these really ought to reflect the way people think about things today. At least the people I see.

PA: Who are they?

BD: Musicians, painters. People who travel. I go everywhere where there are people. I listen to them talking. I listen to them chatting and I pick up on their feelings.

PA: A song like Times They Are A-Changin' is 15 years old now. You're still singing it. Doesn't that bother you?

BD: Each time I sing it, I feel like I wrote it the day before.

PA: What do you think of punks?

BD: To be honest, I don't know much about this movement. I've heard some records and I've seen some groups. I think that above all they're releasing a lot of energy and that's important. But, to be frank, I mostly listen to good music. Rhythm & Blues, Hillbilly, Blues.

PA: And those dark glasses you wear all the time, should they be seen as a sign of aggression?

BD: No, of insecurity, above all else (laughs). I really think that I wear them because I like wearing them.

PA: You once said that you were a "guy under 30" and that you were counting on staying that way as long as possible. How do you feel now that you're 37?

BD: Well, now I'm a guy under 15 years old!

PA: During your "amnesia" some of your fans formed a "Dylan Liberation Front" to force you to come out from your retreat, to take up your engagements. At one point they made a lot of noise about you having bought shares in an arms factory that was making napalm bombs.

BD: I've never done that (shrugging his shoulders). I've got my own armory at home (laughs). I've got revolvers, pistols like all Americans. But there's no napalm, no, no.

PA: Are you still living in your amazing house at Point Zuma?

BD: Yes, but I'm not often there. It's just a place to sleep. Why is that difficult to believe.

PA: It appears to be topped by a rather mysterious copper dome. People have said that it's an eagles nest, an observatory, a peeled onion. Which is right?

BD: A landmark, so that I can recognize it (laughs).

PA: At the time of your divorce from Sara, didn't your wife want to keep it?

BD: No. She'd gone elsewhere. Anyway, she hadn't lived there much.

PA: Do you see your children often?

BD: Everytime I get the chance to.

PA: What would you do if you learnt that one of them was taking drugs?

BD: Really... (He looked like he was going to give a couple of claps, almost tenderly, then a burst of laughter). It depends on what kind of drug he was taking. You know. You can only talk, explain, people want to go through their own experiences themselves. In any case I've also acted in this way myself (pause). They need to have enough experience, a sense of their identity to have confidence in themselves. As for me, that was different, people were taking drugs and saying that they are creating these experiences. But I never got hooked on drugs. Yet I took every sort (grimace). In any case you can't lay down the law to make people live according to your own rules, (a silence). For my children I don't know what I would do. Perhaps they have already taken them, I don't know (laughs). My oldest daughter has undoubtedly already taken them but I haven't been on the spot.

PA: Knowing the influence that you exercise over millions of young people, don't you think it's dangerous to go on singing Everybody Must Be Stoned? (sic)

BD: But that song has lot of other meanings.

PA: Maybe, but it does have a precise one.

BD: Marijuana isn't a drug like the others (a pause). Today there are drugs that are a lot more dangerous than in my time. There's one called "Angel Dust". It's a tranquilizer that they give to elephants. People take it to get high (a pause). I think you can do what you want up until the moment when you realize you have to be responsible for yourself, or otherwise you've had it.

PA: Did your film Renaldo & Clara get a rather cool reception in the States?

BD: At first I was disappointed about it, now I don't care. They didn't want to be impressed, but I didn't make this film to impress anybody. And then, they took exception to it, they only wanted to see the affair of Bob, Sara and Joan Baez — as though the film had nothing to see but that. I know that's a beautiful film. People need to get used to it that's all.

PA: Is it still being shown over there?

BD: Yes, you can see it in some places. Let's say that it's not in the process of engulfing the planet, but if one looks around one can see it (laughs).

PA: Rumor has it that you're preparing a shorter version?

BD: It's done. Now there's a choice between a Renaldo & Clara of 4 hours and one of 2 hours (laughs).

PA: As compensation, it was rather well received at the last Cannes festival.

BD: Oh yes, what do you want... Nobody's a prophet in his home country (laughs).

PA: Are you going to make another?

BD: Yes. Painting has always been my passion. For me a film is a painting that comes alive from a wall. If Michelangelo and Cezanne were alive today they would be film directors.

PA: You often list Henry Miller amongst your influences.

BD: Yes. I think that he's the greatest American writer.

PA: I believe you've met him. What did you talk about?

BD: We played table tennis (laughs).

PA: You're still keeping to your definition of the role of the artist to instill disillusion into the world?

BD: Yes

PA: And President Carter, you've even met him.

BD: Yes, he's a friend. I once said his heart's in the right place. That's important.

PA: Have you seen him again recently?

BD: No. He hasn't phoned me (laughs).

PA: If President Giscard D'Estang offered you an invitation during your stay in Paris, what would be your reaction?

BD: Oh, but I don't think he would ever have heard of me.

PA: You're surely mistaken. Once he invited Leonard Cohen.

BD: Oh, good! Well, he'll have to see about that with my agent (laughs).

PA: Have you met many people since you've been on tour?

BD: No, I'm working. I haven't got the time.

PA: Do you take your meals in the hotel or go out?

BD: I don't like restaurants or hotels. I enjoy eating when I know the person who's prepared the meal.

PA: Have you friends in France?

BD: Yes, some in Paris, Marseilles, St Maries-des-la-Mer, but I repeat that unfortunately I'm here to work (a pause). There's only one person I'm sure I want to meet in France, that's Mr President. Now there's a really good guy.

PA: When are you going to see him?

BD: Where and when he wants. I am entirely at his disposal. Definitely and without discussion (laughs).

PA: Did you say that failure was preferable to success?

BD: Yes, because failure engenders success, whereas success is the end of the line. I've never had the feeling of having succeeded and I'm very happy about that. If I had had that feeling, I would no longer be around. Already long gone.

PA: Do you believe in God?

BD: Let's say, as he shows himself.

PA: Do you often think about death?

BD: Yes, often.

PA: Do you feel you're ready to face it?

BD: Me? Oh, no not at all. I've still got some time, eh? (laughs).

20 June 1978
Ray Coleman Interview, London, England

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1041-1045.

Ray Coleman of Melody Maker and Max Jones met Dylan backstage after his final show at Earls Court. The brief interview, wrapped up in a review of the Earls Court concerts, appeared in Melody Maker's July 1[st] issue.

WHY DYLAN STAYS FOREVER YOUNG
Why Coleman wraps up six nights of Dylan in London – with comments from the man himself...

"I'm glad these songs mean as much to you as they mean to me." Bob Dylan said that. He said it to his adoring audience on the final night of his six-concert stretch at Earls Court, London – just after he had sung It 's All Right Ma, (I'm Only Bleeding). He got an heroic reception, and he thanked us. Warmly.

The Dylan of old used to treat his songs and his audience with virtual disdain. Ten years ago, to have imagined him admitting any real care for them would have been unthinkable. That comment spoke volumes for the man's maturity.

The same new quality was evident later. An hour or so after that final show, Dylan was talking backstage to my colleague Max Jones and me and one of his remarks ran roughly like this –

"Doing these concerts here has made me realise about British audiences. They're really something different – they actually come for the words and for the songs. That's what's missing back home. There, they tend to come for..."

The event?

"Yeah, not so much the music, more the side-show."

For committed Dylan die-hards like me, it was all a little hard to swallow; on all his concerts he had been diplomatically thanking the audiences. Tonight, he had confessed that the songs meant a lot to him. Now, he was getting close to talking about wonderful British audiences.

My mind flashed back to an MM interview with David Bowie recently in which David had said he had been disillusioned by Bob's quote to him: "Wait till you hear my new album." Bowie said, in effect, that he could scarcely take that kind of Las Vegas cliché from Dylan, of all people.

All this was a far cry from the monosyllabic Dylan of yore. Ten or more years ago, a "yes" or, more likely, "no" from the man would have been regarded as a major political speech. Now, he was looser, talking to the MM about anything from his current musical inclinations, reminding us and himself about his roots and registering unmistakably sincere delight at what had happened to him in Britain...

Max Jones, a cohort of Bob's since long before the musician exploded on to the world stage, commented on the extent of the band's involvement in Dylan's stage act today, and Bob responded immediately with great enthusiasm.

He had taken ages he said, to find the right musicians, but now was elated at what they'd done for him and for the old material. "They're all the same songs," he said, in what seemed to me a direct quote from his Albert Hall speech in 1966.

Famous half-smile
"The songs will go on for ever. People like them done over and over, and me, too. But finding these players gave me the chance to develop all the old stuff. I enjoy them this way and people seem to as well."

"If we wanted them sung as on the record," he added, "go and listen to the albums." He managed that famous half-smile.

We talked of The soul-and-blues inflections in certain passages of his act, notably in Going Going Gone, which closed the first half, and in I Shall Be Released, which carried a definite gospel flavour, and even theatrical hand gestures by Bob.

"What I like about the band is that I can get everything I want from them – the blues, soul, country, cajun, American mountain music – everything. This is NOT just a rock band. Soul has always been in me, and I've been listening to Red Prysock, the greatest horn player I've ever heard."

"And then years ago I used to go to the Apollo (in Harlem) and listen to the Bobby Blue Band – I went there night after night."

"Lonnie Johnson and Muddy – these people are the guys I've come up with, so the soul element is a natural."

Mention of the girl back-up trio of Helena Springs, Jo Ann Harris and Carolyn Dennis - introduced jokingly on stage by Dylan as, variously, "my cousin, my fiancée, my ex-girlfriend" – seemed to elicit a very slight glint in Dylan's eye, as he stood talking to us just outside his backstage caravan.

We commented on their visual appeal, as well as vocal quality, and Dylan said he was getting round to thinking that that aspect of the show was "a bit Las Vegas."

"But there's nothing wrong with a bit of sex in the show, is there?" asked the painfully, honest Max Jones.

"I turned round in Japan and saw a pair of breasts on stage... I thought then that something's gotta be done about this." replied Bob enigmatically.

Getting back to the music, he said that on some nights – but not on this final one – he had included To Ramona, and this was another example of how thrilled he was with the soulful violin playing of David Mansfield.

"I think he's the best guy around on that instrument, but they're all special to me."

He said it had taken him a year to put the band together and many of the arrangements had been conceived and executed by Steven Soles, the tasteful guitarist/vocalist who also fronts the critically-acclaimed Alpha Band.

Throughout the week of concerts. Dylanologists had been collecting anecdotes and comparing shows.

On this final night he had been more communicative than ever. His "thank you's" had been voluminous. At the end of Mansfield's mind-blowing solo which ended All Along The Watchtower, Dylan crept up to the mike amid fantastic applause and said dryly: "I taught him that solo."

Before that performance. Dylan said: "This song is dedicated to the late Jimi Hendrix."

Introducing the heavily orchestrated version of Ballad Of A Thin Man – which, incidentally, gave him the cue for more animated gestures than ever, acting out the role of interviewer and musician as in the story-line – Dylan said: "I wrote this song 15 years before the ballad of 'Short People'." (An aside alluding to Randy Newman's recent hit.) We were left to make what we wished of the remark.

Sparklers, candles stuck into drink cans and cigarette lighters had combined to set Earls Court alight long before the end of the show was in sight on Tuesday, and Dylan was moved to say: "Careful with those lights – the place will burn down."

Musically, this final night was special for reasons different from those which made every concert remarkable.

Different lines of his songs came over with fresh force. Tangled Up In Blue, read so majestically under a solo spotlight on nights one and four, was not so dramatic or meaningful on the final show, partly because Bob's innovative ideas with bending the notes weren't so hot (but it's worth registering here that Dylan below his best is still incomparably superior to his nearest competitor).

Songs that clinched the final night were Just Like A Woman, handled with every ounce of persuasiveness and delivered with surprising gusto by Bob and the band.

Rarely, if ever, has the song been so brilliantly blown apart and knitted together again to make a beautiful, meaningful tapestry of words: "She makes love just like a woman... and she breaks just like a little girl" never sounded more potent than in the hands of their author.

Mighty roar

There are those who prefer his original, simpler version. But, like Dylan says, a good song should be able to stand re-defining, or else it's dead.

And his harmonica solo was a riveting joy, bringing the ecstatic crowd to its feet with a mighty roar.

It's All Right Ma, (I'm Only Bleeding) was another stand-out. Again, he shook the old version, from the Bringing It All Back Home album, to its foundation and spat out the song in one hell of a hurry.

It gained urgency from this treatment, and the band rocked away handsomely behind the garrulous story-line, but there was no mistaking his own enjoyment of this recycle, and there was no mistaking the crowd's response at the line that became peculiarly finger-pointing towards himself: "I got nothing, Ma, to live up to..." Untrue, of course, but he was doing it with aplomb.

Shelter From The Storm was excellent, too – but on this my third Dylan attendance at Earls Court, I was struck by the power of one particular song from his new album, Street Legal.

This was Señor (Tales Of Yankee Power). Brooding and sinister, the lyrics are, on close inspection, as desperately evocative of a mood as anything he's written.

"Can you tell me where we're heading... is it Lincoln County Road or Armageddon?" he asks – and we are left to surmise the target at which he points his finger, yet again. At a directionless America, presumably.

It's a haunting, bluesy song, the saxophone touching the right spots to wailing effect, and Dylan's voice reminding us of much of his early work: 'This place don't make sense to me no more... can you tell me what we're waiting for Señor?'

Splendidly meaty stuff, as is his assumed song of his recently broken marriage, Baby Stop Crying.

Musically, then, there were highlights aplenty, and each observer will carry his or her own highlights of Dylan's concerts in the memory for a good few months.

Offstage, and backstage, it seemed a fairly orderly week, with Dylan's much-touted interest in British reggae arousing excitement among the national press. The singer did no formal interviews, hardly surprising in view of the fact that when he emerged early in the week from the Royal Garden Hotel, Kensington, a national foot-in-the-mouth type yelled: "You're doing it for the money, aren't you, Bob?"

That incredible piece of insensitivity reduced everyone's interview chances from nil to nil-plus... and anyway, oddly enough, most artists do perform for money. Dylan, unlike some, actually earned his.

So Dylan came and conquered and enjoyed Merger at Dingwalls, propped up by bodyguards, and talked informally to Max Jones and me and had a conversation with Michael Gray, whose review appeared in the MM last week, and who had written Song And Dance Man, a book on Bob's songs.

Articulate mood

Dylan went for dinner with Robert Shelton, the American writer who first noted his appearance at Gerde's Folk City, in New York, in 1961, and then gave Dylan his first ever review – in the New York Times. (Shelton is still at work on the definitive biography, and plans to complete it after Blackbushe.)

Dylan also phoned Shusha, the discerning Persian folk singer who has recorded some of his songs, and who closes her act with Forever Young just like Dylan. He told her how much he liked her work and that she ought to perform in America.

Shusha, who saw his final concert and was naturally impressed, found Dylan in articulate mood and seemed to have struck up an intelligent friendship with an artist she has studied a long time.

The only moment in which Dylan made a mistake with an audience was when he said: "Goodnight – see you tomorrow," not realising that most of the people at Earls Court would not in fact be returning the next night.

But if, as I suspect, that was his only error of communication during six stupendous performances, then the world's most important rock artist clinched it impeccably.

Here were no ordinary occasions. A seer of the Sixties, his reputation slightly blurred for some by the mere passing of time, had come to test our patience. And he emerged not just unscathed, but with a greater reputation. Because he'd risked everything by recycling the songs. And he'd proved they still stand up.

When Dylan said, then, after his final show, to the MM that he was genuinely energised by the British reaction, it was patently sincere, and no Hollywood jive.

In America, remember, his records are rarely played on the radio and he does not have the same legendary status as here; it appears that we take musical poets more seriously.

A mind-blowing week it had been. See you at Blackbushe indeed, Bob Dylan!

Robert Shelton interview, Knightsbridge Restaurant, London, UK

Robert Shelton interviewed Dylan at a Knightsbridge restaurant after his final Earls Court show. The interview was published in Melody Maker on July 29th 1978.

HOW DOES IT FEEL TO BE ON YOUR OWN?
BOB DYLAN TALKS TO ROBERT SHELTON

"How does it feel?" I teased Bob Dylan with his own famous question. He'd just finished his sixth triumphant concert at Earls Court. Dylan insisted the ovations and the rave reviews were for his work:

"It's not me. It's the songs. I'm just the postman. I deliver the songs. That's all I have in this world are those songs! That's what all the legend, all the myth, is about – my songs."

We were huddled at a corner table in a Knightsbridge restaurant. Dylan was filled with nervous energy, but his dark glasses gave him some refuge. Although I've known and studied him for 17 years, it is always exciting to be around him. The air still crackles a bit when he walks into a room.

"Are you getting this?" he asked me, so I pulled out my notebook. I'd had a couple of informal backstage interludes with him, but now he wanted this conversation mostly "for the record." He knew I wouldn't ask him about God, how he enjoyed his divorce, or if he dedicated his first song to Brigitte Bardot. It was a conversation, not an inquisition. Dylan speaks with the same sort of rhythm that he brings to his singing. Sometimes his lines are gentle. Sometimes they bite:

"I started writing those songs... before, you know... before I could walk! George Harrison told me last night that I'd be singing 'It's Alright, Ma' when I'm 90! Nobody else gives my songs life. It's up to me to do it... But those songs have a life of their own, too. Jimi Hendrix sang them... Stevie Wonder, Van Morrison and Elvis Presley have sung them," Dylan continued.

How did he react to the death of Elvis Presley?

Dylan: It was so sad. I had a breakdown! I broke down... one of the very few times. I went over my whole life. I went over my whole childhood. I didn't talk to anyone for a week after Elvis died. If it wasn't for Elvis and Hank Williams, I couldn't be doing what I do today.

Presley died young, last summer. The great country singer, Hank Williams, died even younger – at 29 in 1953. Dylan's adolescence was death-haunted as one after the other of his idols – James Dean and Buddy Holly – died long before their time. Dylan sang about death at 19, outlined his own epitaphs at 23. We all feared he'd die young, too, but he cheated the undertaker and hitch-hiked back from the cemetery.

In his great new song, Where Are You Tonight? (Journey Through Dark Heat), the narrator expresses disbelief that he's still alive. Yet we've just heard Dylan bring new rampant life back to his classic old songs. When he sang Forever Young it was for his audiences, but also for his children, and, probably, for himself, as well.

There are differences between Dylan's mystique in America today and his grip on the audiences of Britain, Japan, Australia, New Zealand, the Netherlands, Germany, Sweden and France. He paid his highest tribute to the warmth of the English audiences at his final Earls Court concert, saying:

"I'm glad these songs mean as much to you as they do to me... Actually, I'm thinking of moving up to Liverpool!"

After that remarkable turnout at Blackbushe, he told 250,000 picnickers: "I hope to get to see you real soon. I wanna come back."

I asked him about the differences between audiences. Dylan told me: "Some American audiences and critics don't find the depth in my work, in my songs, like they do elsewhere..."

He had praised the sophistication of British audiences to me earlier: "Why, there were blues singers who were working as janitors in America until they came here to England."

Would he ever really consider living any place but America? "Yes I would," Dylan replied thoughtfully. "Creatively, I couldn't live anywhere but America, because I understand the tone behind the language. I'd love to live somewhere else, but only for a while. I lived in Mexico for three months..." he said, referring to 1973, when he was writing music for, and playing the role of Alias in the film Pat Garrett And Billy The Kid. He added: "I wrote my fourth album ("Another Side of Bob Dylan") in Greece, but that was still an American album."

Dylan spoke with animation about the great feelings he'd gotten "in spring... two birthdays ago" at a gypsy festival at Sainte-Marie-de-la-Mer, France, where flamenco music filled the air. He'd also spent time on a flower-scented Mediterranean isle, which I'll leave unnamed in case he wants to find seclusion there again. "It was wild!" Dylan said, wrapping up the gypsy fires and the island's unspoiled beauty in a word. But he always brings the "raging beauty" back home. "I feel at home in America," he continued, "because, as primitive as it is, I still can create from America. All my feelings come out of America. When you leave America, you get peace. America is a very violent place, so when you leave, you get that peace – to create. My language is still American, though. I don't know the language, the rules or the structure of other countries. I was never a kid in any other country... In America everybody's got a gun... I've got a few of them." Remembering his old-style cutting slashes at interviews and his knife-throwing in Billy The Kid, my assistant, Gabrielle Goodchild, said: "You're pretty good with knives, Bob." Like a badman, Dylan shot back: "I'm better with a gun!" (Dylan's West Coast rehearsal studio used to be a rifle factory).

It's no secret, of course, that Dylan missed the box-office and critical bullseye with his ambitious film, Renaldo And Clara. There are still unconfirmed reports that it may soon circulate Europe in either its original four-hour form, or an abridged two-hour version. Dylan may yet recoup his losses. His divorce a year ago was financially, and emotionally, draining. Yet some of the press has focused on money as the only reason behind this world tour.

Dylan still believes firmly that "the myth of the starving artist" is about that – "a myth." He told me, with obvious annoyance at the stress that has been put on his box-office appeal: "I earn everything I make! I'm not getting nothing for nothing. Reggie Jackson of the New York Yankees gets three million dollars a year for striking out! For every dollar I make, there's a pool of sweat on the floor. I feel we're all underpaid — my band, my singers." After one performance, he said: "I put in an eight-hour day in two hours on stage."

Part of the excitement that Dylan's been causing in his world tour has been his new backing group. Dylan made it clear to me that he was in no way running down his years with The Band or the various musicians on the Rolling Thunder Revue. But he is delighted at the range of styles and effects possible with this dynamic eight-piece and three backing-singer group, "I got myself a real band!" Dylan exploded with boyish delight. When did he put them all together? "I started recruiting this band last January. It was difficult It was hard. A lot of blood has gone into this band. This band understands my songs. It doesn't matter if they understand me or not. They understand my songs!"

Was there some magic mystery arranger at work behind the scenes, I wondered. With pride, Dylan said: "There's nothing that band does that can't be worked out on my guitar!" As much energy as Dylan pours into his performances, as perfectionist as he is, he seems to get a remarkable input of energy from appreciative audiences.

Looking back over the years since he arrived in New York at the age of 19 with a headful of dreams and the drive to conquer and survive, Dylan thought about those who had made it through the pop jungle. "Who is around?" Dylan asked. "The Rolling Stones? Who else has come through? Mick Jagger and Keith Richard have come through the same fire that I've come through. Who else? Gerry Goffin? Leiber and Stoller?" He seemed to be searching his mind for those veterans of rock who hadn't died, quit or been burned-out. "When it comes down to it," he went on, "it's a question of how much of it you can stand. How much can you stick it out?" One reason Dylan's ability to "stick it out" is all the more amazing is that he's several people at once, a polymath as well as a Protean chameleon. In the past, he's shrugged off labels wanting to keep himself free of "confinement and definition," wanting to change roles or to pursue several at once. He used to wince at the name "poet," exploding at me once "That's such a huge, goddamn word for someone to call themselves – A Poet!... When people started calling me a poet... it didn't make me any happier..." I asked him now if he had become any more comfortable at being called "a poet" these days. "Very much so," Dylan replied. "I consider myself a poet first and a musician second. I live like a poet and I'll die like a poet I've always liked my stuff. All you really have to please is yourself, in any arena of life... it doesn't really matter."

Yet, as rock superstar, he had a mass audience to contend with, a problem faced in the flesh by few living or dead poets. Could he see his audiences from up there on the stage? "I sure can," Dylan replied quickly. Could he feel when he was breaking through to them? Dylan: "It doesn't matter, really. You can't depend on an audience to tell you that you're good. You have to know it If you know it, they'll know it." Dylan seemed determined this time to lead a much saner life on the road than that on many of his previous tours. Having travelled with him during wild, sleepless tours when the pace was more than anyone could stand, I was pleased to see him conserving his energies. "I'm not in the pressure-cooker," said the man who'd just cooked up half-a-dozen steaming concerts.

"Do you get a chance to relax when you're on the road?" With a slight tone of annoyance, Dylan said: "I am relaxed!" He lit another cigarette and took another shot of Courvoisier. Dylan has never set himself a more furious pace. By 11.30 p.m. July 15 he'd already sung this year to more than 800,000 people in 50 concerts in nine countries. It was hard to believe him when he told me that he'd be doing 115 shows in 1978. Later, an associate confirmed that 65 concerts in America would begin on September 13 in Maine. Even the band members don't have the full itinerary yet.

In London, Dylan managed to relax nearly every day by swimming. He churned up several laps at a North London public pool, where few of the other swimmers recognized him. He spent his first night in London (June 12) at the German-made film, The American Friend. His American friends – Dennis Hopper and David Blue, were in the picture, a study in the attractions and repulsions of violence. At one point Hopper mouths a phrase from Dylan's I Pity The Poor Immigrant.

The next two nights Dylan made the rounds of London music clubs with Brooklyn-born Elly Smith, CBS Records press manager. Elly had to cope with more than 50 requests from all the media for interviews with Bob. She also sorted out hundreds of pleas for backstage passes from people who wanted to meet their "old buddy" or distant idol. Among those who did see Dylan backstage were the actors Jack Nicholson and Shelley Duvall, who are filming The Shining here for Stanley Kubrick. George Harrison and Ringo Starr were on hand, and Bianca Jagger and her daughter, Jade, were around. Also backstage at Earls Court were photographer David Bailey and TV comedian Eric Idle.

One night I witnessed a touching reunion with an old folk-singer friend from Woodstock, Happy Traum, and his family. Happy was appearing nearby at the Troubadour, the first place Dylan had ever sung in London, in 1963. At one late-night Chelsea party, Dylan greeted American pop-artist Andy Warhol, Bryan Ferry and a few other scene-makers. The only London journalists Dylan talked to, as far as I know, were Melody Maker's Ray Coleman and Max Jones and Michael Gray, author of Song And Dance Man: The Art Of Bob Dylan. Dylan spoke to Philippe Adler of L'Express, Paris, and also met Rolling Stone's Jonathan Cott on the coach from Rotterdam to Amsterdam.

Sitting in the Royal Box at one concert was Mrs Shirley Williams the Education Secretary, a longtime fan. She was interested when I told her that Dylan was a college drop-out who'd gotten an honorary doctorate of music from Princeton University.

Speaking of education, as soon as Dylan arrived in London, he took a crash course in the current British music scene, with a few seminars in new wave and reggae. He listened to recordings by the Sex Pistols, Wire, John Cooper Clarke, Elvis Costello and others. Dylan and Elly went to hear Merger, the reggae band, at the 100 Club. Impressed with their work. Dylan asked that they be added to the Blackbushe bill. At Dingwalls, Dylan also heard a set by the gutsy blues band George Thorogood and the Destroyers.

On Wednesday June 14, after enduring a small CBS executive party in his honour at the Next Door Club in Covent Garden, Bob and Elly started cruising the music haunts again From Clouds in Brixton (closed), to the Four Aces in Dalston (open, but not swinging) they proceeded to the Music Machine in Camden Town. There, Dylan heard Robert Gordon and Link Wray.

Although some press-people and fans besieged Dylan's hotel in Kensington, it wasn't the crowd mania of the Sixties. One day, he signed autographs outside the hotel. Another day, a carload of photographers gave Dylan's Mercedes a chase through red lights, until his chauffeur-cum-bodyguard, Joe, finally eluded the pursuers.

After Dylan performed for 50,000 people at the open-air Rotterdam Folk Festival on June 23, he explored Amsterdam, and went to the home of Rembrandt. He also visited the house where the Jewish girl, Anne Frank had written her diary, hiding from the Nazis before she was taken to her death at Belsen, and while there questioned Elly searchingly about National Front activities in England. He had planned to visit a concentration camp site in Germany, but that was cancelled through lack of time.

Though life on the road this time was kept to a fairly quiet pace, Dylan did jam through one night with Eric Clapton in Germany, and there was frequent hotel jamming with his band members. But, David Mansfield told me at Blackbushe, this leg of the world tour was much more relaxing, with time for sight-seeing and shopping. In the restaurant where I was talking with Dylan, nearly every eye was on him. I wondered if he could ever find those secret little cafes, like he used to in Greenwich Village, where he could scribble down lyrics and ideas for songs. Dylan told me: "Yes, there are thousands of places in this world where I can write... cafes where I can..." I offered him his old line: "be invisible". "Yes," he went on, "I'm invisible now. I don't have that kind of fame. People know what my job is. They leave me alone. In reality, I'm not that famous. I might be anyone... Fame is awe. People take me as I am. On stage, I'm just taking them out of what they were."

I couldn't draw Dylan out much on Renaldo And Clara. "I talked too much about that film already," he said. Clearly, he was hurt by the way the American press had ravaged the film, yet encouraged by the warm reaction it had received at the Cannes Film Festival. "It's not obvious," Dylan said about the film, adding: "You gotta see it, Bob."

Although bristling with drive Dylan left me with the general impression that he is far from happy these days. Naturally, the great reviews and ovations he's gotten pleased him. But it's difficult to recall protracted periods when Dylan has been happy. Perhaps it's all what is called "the divine discontent of the artist". We can all carry on a dialogue with Dylan, at his performances, or through his recordings: his work always commands a response from us. How incredible that as he changes, his music of the past unfolds new connotations. When he sings Like A Rolling Stone these days, the powerful lyrics take on a new relevance for and about Dylan, as well as for his listeners.

In Australia, Dylan said: "I'm on a steady rolling path. It's the only path I know, so it's the most familiar path to me. I'm neither happy, nor disillusioned with it." Like a rolling path.

A close listening to many of the lyrics of Street-Legal reveals a set of narrators who are oppressed lonely, wandering and alienated – in a foreign country. Where Are You Tonight? may very well be his most direct confessional of pain and loss. Yet at Blackbushe, he'd changed the new song, brightened its tempo, muted the oppressive tone.

The pained lyrics hid behind the music of dark glasses, yet they were still there. That time, the song seemed less to express anguish than to convey that anguish had been exercised. Recently, Dylan's been showing rare candour in stepping out from behind another persona by introducing Shelter From The Storm as "the story of my life". The song tells of the flight of a man, who is living in a foreign country, from toil, blood and doom. In his moment of greatest need, the narrator finds that safe, warm shelter with a woman. Then, he loses her. I find the desperation of that search still strong in Street-Legal.

I pressed Dylan to tell me more about one of his most intriguing formulations: "No man can fight another like the man who fights himself. Who could be a stronger enemy? "It's true that a man is his own worst enemy, just as he is his own best friend. If you deal with the enemy within, then no enemy without can stand a chance," Dylan says.

I probed dangerous territory. What is "the enemy without"? Dylan replied tersely: "Suspicion". Could he put his finger on "the enemy within"? He laughed at my question. "I'll draw you a picture for the cover of your book," he said, "with a big finger pointing to the enemy within!" He poked his index-finger toward his heart. "Come on, man," I pleaded. Cautiously, Bob said: "It's all in those two verses of that last song," directing me to Where Are You Tonight?

The lines begin: "I fought with my twin, that enemy within / 'til both of us fell by the way..." (Copyright, 1978, Big Ben Music, Ltd.) The clue haunts me. Is "the enemy within" Dylan's Gemini twins locked in mortal combat? Is it the id battling the ego? Is it the death-trip threatening the life-force? In an earlier song, there was an encounter with a different kind of "twin". In Simple Twist of Fate Dylan sang: "People tell me it's a sin / To know and feel too much within". (Copyright, 1974, Big Ben Music, Ltd.)

That's how we can all have our dialogue with Dylan, and he with us. During most interviews, he has used wit and cunning to conceal his personal emotions. Then he'll turn around and tell the whole world about his feelings in his lyrics, if you can penetrate the ambiguities and the codes and the shifting personas.

Dylan fights like a demon to protect his privacy, then stands naked in his songs. That's where the best dialogues with Dylan may always be, for he asks us better questions than anyone can ever ask him. The question itself is often the answer.

Dylan and the press have long carried on a duel of wits. He puts it this way: "If I don't talk to the press, I'm a hermit... If I do talk to the press, then I'm trying to manipulate reporters... In my position, I can't win." I don't agree. Without a single formal interview in the English press, Dylan won completely at Earls Court and at Blackbushe.

Dylan has long held a democratic view about the creativity that resides in everyone. He once told me: "To be a poet does not necessarily mean that you have to write words on paper... One of those truck-drivers... is a poet. He talks like a poet..."

Dylan maintains that "the purpose of art is to inspire" others with the belief that they, too, can be creative. I reminded him about something he'd told his old Minneapolis gang back in 1962 after he'd gained some initial recognition in New York. Then he'd said: "There are a million me's, all over the country..." Did he still really believe that today. "Yes," he answered, "only now there are a million more million me's."

The cheers and the excitement have subsided. Dylan's back on the road again, maybe toward "ecstasy" maybe toward the highway blues. With the American audience, he is facing perhaps his greatest challenges. For all the rapport he has with millions around the world, I still sense a foreboding loneliness about him. That may be the curse of knowing and feeling too much within. That may be the enemy within and without.

"A lonely man with money is still lonely..." he wrote in 1964. Two years later, he said: "It's always lonely where I am." We can only hope that his rapport with his new band will help.

To show my appreciation for his survival as a great artist who is always busy being reborn, I wanted to give him some token. He's shown fascination with Tarot cards in recent years, and Desire and Street-Legal are rampant with Tarot imagery. I handed him a Judgement card from my deck. It shows a winged angel blowing a trumpet, raising the dead from their graves, and they are reborn again as little children. The Judgement card is like "Forever Young", telling us that music can revitalize and renew us. Dylan thanked me warmly for the token gift. "But you shouldn't break up your pack of cards," he said. I told him I'd already sent off The Magician card – which amazingly resembles Dylan, visually, and in its symbolic meanings – to my publisher in New York. Dylan accepted the card. What else can you give a man who has given us all so much?

Mette Fugl Interview, Gothenburg, Sweden

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, p. 865.

On his arrival at Gothenburg's Landvetter Airport, Dylan is interviewed twice in rapid succession. The first interview (this) by Danish TV reporter Mette Fugl lasts only five minutes and is followed by an even briefer interview with the Swedish TV reporter Nils Chioler (see next entry). That night sees the first of his two shows at the Gothenburg Scandinavium Stadium.

This interview was partially broadcast by Danish television on July 12 and 16 (TV-Aktuellt)

MF: Okay, once you wrote songs about your dreams. You wrote "Bob Dylan's Dream," "115th Dream" what are you doing these days?

BD: Same thing.

MF: What would be your 1978 version of a visionary song?

BD: All of them.

MF: Anyone. Okay. Whatever you do almost it has been categorised as pure genius. Is there space in your great success for self criticism for artistic development?

BD: Mmmm, surely.

MF: When everybody says it's genius, it's pure genius?

BD: I don't think everybody says that.

MF: You have said in interviews that your songs have no political content and no social significance. But still you attract one of the largest crowds in the history of pop music. Doesn't that indicate that your songs have a certain social significance?

BD: What do you mean?

MF: Is it only your admirers, your audience, that find an interest in the content of your songs or are you just caught up of the contents?

BD: Possibly.

MF: Is it that you just don't want to discuss it?

BD: Well, no. You never know what's happening in the minds of men.

MF: No and you don't want. But you have written songs about Hurricane Carter and Joey Gallo and you've dedicated your last album to Emmett Grogan. They have one thing in common those three men. They are sort of outlaws. Do you have an outlaw syndrome?

BD: No, not really.

MF: Not really. How come you dedicate your songs to the sad eyed drifters, the rough riders?

BD: Well, who... they just happen to be in the forefront of my imagination.

NC: Bob Dylan, the symbol of the sixties.
BD: To who?
NC: To the youth of the sixties.
BD: Who said that? I never said that.
NC: Wasn't it you? Do you think there is a difference between you of the sixties and the Bob Dylan of today?
BD: I couldn't tell you. Is there a difference between you in the sixties and today?
NC: Oh, I think so, yes. Don't you think your music has developed, from the sixties.
BD: Possibly.
NC: When you are around touring, as you are now, do you think it's another audience than the one you met in the sixties.
BD: No. It's the same, basically same.
NC: Are you failing to reach the new, youth generation.
BD: I don't know.
NC: You don't think there's a difference between you and the songs you write?
BD: I don't think so

Matt Damsker Interview, Senator Hotel, Augusta, Maine

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 459-467.

Matt Damsker was the entertainment writer for the Philadelphia Evening & Sunday Bulletin. His interview with Dylan took place right before the start of Bob's tour opening in Augusta, in the Senator Hotel. This was the day of the concert at the Augusta Civic Centre, the start of a massive American tour and the first concert since Blackbushe. The interview was broadcast the following October on American radio and partially published in the USA in Circus Weekly on December 19th of that year.
The broadcast proper is preceded by a discussion between Damsker (MD) and a radio announcer (RA).
Taken from the circulating tape and not from the printed article.

RA: Matt Damsker is a writer, contemporary music critic, entertainment writer for the Philadelphia Evening and Sunday Bulletin. Matt Damsker is the gentleman who interviewed Bob Dylan up in Maine just a few weeks ago. Matt, I think a few people out there would like to know some details of the interview. When exactly was it, where was it, were you alone with Dylan, how'd you feel about the whole thing? In what frame of mind did you find Dylan?

MD: Yeah. Well, it took place September 15th, the afternoon of the first show of the tour. He would open his tour that evening in Augusta, Maine Civic Center on the Campus at the University and I interviewed him at a hotel, in a motel room actually; I guess it was his motel suite, about a mile and a half from the concert hall, the Senator Motel and It was one o'clock in the afternoon. It was Dylan and myself, in his suite. He had some instruments there, a rented piano I believe, that he was pounding out what sounded like an upbeat blues song. I heard him as I was approaching the open door.

RA: Were you alone?

MD: Yeah. I was accompanied at first by his press agent, Paul Wasserman who arranged the whole thing.

RA: Who introduced you to him... You've been a Dylan fan, or certainly a listener of his music...

MD: I was greatly influenced, I have to say, by Dylan's music in the 1960's...

RA: Was it a bit overwhelming meeting him for the first time, and having to sit and, you know, have a conversation and ask questions?

MD: Yeah, it was. Actually, it was an interview I always thought would be the prize interview for someone who was covering the rock music of the sixties and seventies, and I never really expected, I thought, to get it; I felt that interviews with Dylan would remain, you know, a pretty rare commodity, and I guess when it happened it was unreal because... ah!

RA: I imagine because it's such a rare opportunity, every question has sort of double value. Did you pre-plan any questions?

MD: I did. I pre-planned a lot of questions, but I missed the one question I would have wanted to ask him I think, because when he started to open up he seemed to be pretty honest about himself in a way. That was the question about Rubin Hurricane Carter, and his support of him, in light of the fact that the case has sort of had a turn about.

RA: That's the question that you forgot to ask him?

MD: The question I didn't ask.

RA: Well, you got a lot of good questions, and we're ready for the interview. This is, again, September 15th in Augusta, Maine, right before the start of Dylan's tour opening show. Matt Damsker of the Bulletin.

MD: This is a long tour, and it follows a long period of touring. Is it the longest period you've gone through?

BD: No, in the old days we used to do it more. When I was living at the Chelsea Hotel, we were touring eight or nine months out of the year. Nine months, that's an awful long time. Then, of course, we moved to Woodstock. Those days were... It was harder to tour back then.

MD: Well, what's the motivation for all this touring these days?

BD: Well, I just can't think of nothing else I wanna do right now, really.

MD: There's gossipy reports that you need to make some money.

BD: Well, that's true to a certain extent, but money's not everything.

MD: No. Was it the divorce and things like this... heavy gossip items... I guess I'm exploiting you by asking you that question?

BD: No. That's quite alright. I've lost a lot of money, but I don't think of it that way.

MD: People analyze your stuff very seriously, and I know in reading some of the quotes you've given that you feel sometimes it's taken too seriously. For instance the way the critics reacted to Renaldo and Clara.

BD: That I thought was shameful, yeah. First of all people should find out and decide for themselves whether they like it or not But these critics, they do bring a certain amount of responsibility that they have, not only to the artist, but to the public. And unless they've had the experiences that the artist has had, or can relate to those experiences, then they shouldn't be involved with that artists work. That's what I feel, unless they, you know, they're educated in that type of music, or have lived where that artist has lived, felt what that artist has felt, then they have really no right to criticize in a negative way anything which they themselves don't quite understand. There's enough people out there who don't understand it anyway. Of course, I'm just talking about negative criticism... there are plenty of positive critics around too. And I imagine lots of critics take sides, same way as in theatre I think, critics just take sides. I mean, people are criticizers of life, you know. If you go over somebody, if you're sitting around in somebody's house, you're all just talking, sometimes, you know, everybody is a critic; on some level on some thing. Critic, seems just by the sound of the word, it seems to be a negative thing.

MD: To put down, yeah..

BD: To be critical, yeah. So what is the opposite of a critic? A supporter. So, I have plenty of supporters too, so critics don't bother me.

MD: A supporter doesn't seem like a legitimate... I mean, if somebody can be completely objective, you would think that would be the best stance, but it doesn't seem critics can be completely objective.

BD: Well, they get paid not to be objective.

MD: Under the pretence of objectivity, shall we say?

BD: Right Everybody's gotta make a living, you know.

MD: I'm a critic too Bob, I've had to criticise your stuff, I mean...

BD: Well that's fine. A lot of the things I've done need to be criticised. I'll agree to that.

MD: Do you find that you have gotten insights from criticism?

BD: No. I don't think so, but I respect it when it's right you know. If he can't identify with something, and it's not done in his way of thinking, well, he can criticise it, you know. I've done a lot of things which I criticise myself.

MD: I understand you're cutting down Renaldo and Clara to two hours.

BD: That's already a fact.

MD: I can ask, was it in response to the commercial...?

BD: No, it was in response to the theatre owners themselves. It wasn't in response to the people, because the people, as I understand, did get something out of it and will continue to. But it was a direct action that was done for the theatre, for the theatre owners. I mean, they just say they couldn't show the movie, they couldn't give it a fair showing at four hours, 'cause they couldn't get people in and out. It costs them to open their doors... too much money. So it's more practical now.

MD: You know, Bob, in viewing the film, there was one scene that really struck me. The scene where you jump out of the tour bus, in New York City and you sort of wander down. You seem to get away pretty anonymously, you hand a beggar a bill, and you sort of hold your hand out as if you were a beggar, and I got the impression that that scene, it sort of represented that you were sort of looking for something that was lost to you, and I began to think that maybe the whole film has something to do with that; it was a question of identity had been lost through public image, and that perhaps the real person inside had become lost to his public person that everyone has created.

BD: I am not what you call a commercial star, you know, so, you have to remember me in that light all the time. I don't sell records you know, like Fleetwood Mac sells, and I don't sell platinum records, you know. I just don't. I sell enough, y'know, but I'm not a commercial star in that sense of the word. Yes, I would sell more records than would Kiss, you can name a lot of groups that would. And also I'm not the type of star that is, assuming there's no place I can't go or can't be, nothing I can't do, just because people might know who I am. I don't live under that barrier.

MD: You don't feel you're living the drama that people have created of your life?

BD: Well, I feel that I must have created a drama; I don't think other people have.

MD: Do you still see yourself, did you ever see yourself as a strong moral voice?

BD: Yes, I have. I've tried to be very moral in all my dealings. In an ultimate sense, I've tried to remain very moral, and even in my sinful ways I see some morality coming out of the ashes. I always reason it out in my head in some kind of way. You just can't be perfect.

MD: Do you feel it carries over into the seventies? I mean, there was such... an anger, and seems like such a righteous resentment, in that consciousness in the sixties, all that was going on, all that you articulated, very ambiguously, I suppose. Do you feel that it's similar in the seventies, or do you feel that everything has changed and it's more of an entertainment concept? Because back then it did seem to be strongly tied to a message that people hadn't been.. at least that pop music and the rock n' roll hadn't been speaking to, in the fifties, till the folk people came around in the early sixties.

BD: No, it was the Beatles that did that The Beatles did that I mean, we always knew, you know, Bo Diddley, Chuck Berry, John Lee Hooker, Buddy Holly, you know, we were always in that tradition all the time. I personally went into the folk music thing because it was new to me, and I realised that I didn't have that information; and it still stuck, I mean, it still sticks with me. So I was using the ballad form, alongside another storytelling form which... that's how I was able to write those songs, because I learned it in the folk circle, that form. You can also tell the same story in a blues form, which... one step beyond that blues would be rock n' roll form, but once you get into production, you aren't going to tell too much of the story at all, you know. Records nowadays are all production.

MD: You've avoided that in your records?

BD: I haven't I'm not sure if it's good or bad, you know. It's just as bad as good, it's good because it allows me... I've been making records long enough so I'm confident to go into the studio and just do it, without a producer. 'Cause I started recording for John Hammond in 1960, and that's the way he made records, we'd go in and make a record, live.

MD: It's a living thing, recording the songs, like you said in that Playboy interview.

BD: Right, that's the way I learned how to record, and that's the way other people were doing it Now, you don't do it that way, because the machinery is... they got... you know, it's like, er... you go in a recording studio now and what I do is obsolete. So, I don't, half the time, use a decent studio. I mean, we made the last record, we made Street Legal in a rehearsal hall, you know, only because we couldn't use the studio we booked in town, you know. So, yeah, I could use a good producer, you know, I could make some well-produced records, 'cause my songs are good enough, I mean, you don't need but a fairly decent song, you know, to have a well-produced record.

MD: Well, it seems that there were... well, I think of one album New Morning, as the closest thing to, like, a Dylan pop produced album, that seemed to me... it seemed to have a sort of pastel, if that's the word, texture to it. In many ways it's probably an album that people don't take seriously.

BD: I don't think they do, but if you listen to that album, you realise we had the girls on there too. Lot of people complain about the girls, you know, but I hear this sound that these particular girls make, background singers, you'll see the show tonight, you'll see they're not the Ikettes, they're not Barry Manilow's girls, they sing in the way these songs should be sung.

MD: I guess you feel it just wouldn't be Bob Dylan, it wouldn't be the Bob Dylan style if you went in and did a produced album, you know, with all the overdubs?

BD: Oh no, no. Just, that I never had the time to do it, or patience you know, 'cause we've been on the road now for so long. I had two weeks to make an album this year. That's all I had was two weeks, and fortunately we managed to do it If I hadn't done it in two weeks, I wouldn't have a record out and you know how it is, after a certain amount of time, you won't do those songs anymore, so you lose them.

MD: I would think with someone like you, that if you started to labor over those songs with overdubs that it would probably kill the purity that you might feel.

BD: Well, I feel that you can do it both. I haven't done it that way, but I feel that you can go in... see my records first of all, they take a week or two to make. Other people... the Eagles go and make a record, they'll take a year. You know, every time they're off the road, they'll go work on it and that's what they'll be doing. They'll be making that record and it'll be important to them. Me, I don't do that, cause I don't have a producer. Er, how can I tell you?

MD: I mean you could get any producer you want. I get the impression what you're saying is, you don't feel there's a producer you know that could be that sympathetic?

BD: I'm searching for one right now as a matter of fact. As a matter of fact, I'm searching for a qualified record producer. I mean, you listen to one of those songs by the Bee-Gees, you know. This is one of those songs, if you hear the song underneath the song, that's the real song. But what you listen to in a room, on a record player, or a disco, is that live beat and that's swell, you know, that what is it kind of thing, you know. It just sounds good, 'cause it's very angelic and it's got the beat to it too.

MD: Now that's an interesting point right there. The concept of disco that has begun to dominate – like one whole half of what people are thinking of pop and rock music in the seventies. To me, I reflect it as a kind of mechanical machine music that's there to sustain a mood and a rhythm. But it seems in opposition to the whole mainstream of sixties music, the stuff you were into and the Beatles stuff.

BD: It is, but it's purpose, it's main purpose is to make people dance and forget their troubles. Now you and me, maybe we go down to a bar and listen to a bar band. If you feel like dancing you can dance, if you feel like drinking you can drink. But these people, they get dressed up, and they wanna go out and boogie, in a sophisticated kind of a way, and that music allows them to do it. It's too late to go back, 'cause it's all done with machinery. It's perfectly legitimate, people want to dance, and it creates an environment for them to do it in.

MD: Yeah, but it seems so amoral. There's decadence and amorality to the disco...

BD: They always say that the Devil is always, you know, involved in dancing. You know, one side says that, but I personally don't believe it at all. Some of the great religions of the world don't believe it either.

MD: That idea of amorality equated with evil crops up in a book you might have read. I don't know if you have, The World According To Garp. It's just out now by John Irving.

BD: I heard of it.

MD: It equates evil, the evil in the world, not as such a mysterious force, it equates it with an absence of morality. You know, keeping faith between people in a marriage, let's say, is the hardest thing to do. In other words, the evil is a force that is sinful because it exists; good is more a human creation. I was trying to equate that perhaps to your music, in which notions of evil and good sort of trade back, and the images of good and evil, bad and good, constructive and destructive, sort of trade back and forth with often equal power and the only thing that overcomes one or supports the other is the personal faith of the singer or the people involved.

BD: Well, that's always true. I mean, even the old ballad singers that used to sing, they used to lay it out, you know, in the same way, and in the singer was the voice, which could decide for you the listener, you know, which side was right and which was wrong. There just can't be such a thing. I personally don't think good and evil has got anything to do with marriage at all. Marriage, when you get into it, sometimes you find it's just a job; being faithful to oneself is more worthy than being faithful to an idea, or something which is transient, you know what I mean, which changes all the time. It's illusory. You're always grasping it, you know you're wondering what you grasp, but even when you get hold of it you don't have anything.

MD: The anger that I feel in so much of your stuff in the sixties, resurfacing. I don't feel it so much on the, say an album like Street Legal, except maybe on a couple of the songs, The Changing Of The Guard and No Time To Think...

BD: Well, we'll put aside the anger for the time being, 'cause the anger doesn't drive. The sixties was a driven time, anger was driving everybody. So that's what was pushing me, anger. But, nowadays you can't be pushed by that no more, you have to just deal with anger. It's out in front of you except... instead of behind you. That's the way I see it anyway.

MD: Are you bored by rock and roll? Do you feel that it just would cloud you by making you competitive?

BD: No, I don't know what you mean by rock n' roll. I've...

MD: You mentioned it yourself, the Fleetwood Mac stuff.

BD: Well, I don't know if I'd call that rock n' roll; I think maybe that'd be pop. Rock n' roll is just that twelve-bar beat, you know, and it's the backbeat. That's all that rock n' roll is. That's all you need to play rock n' roll and that kind of rock n' roll is whatever the subject matter is about that's got the backbeat. You can move to it, it makes you feel alive, but for me, I mean I've never... I used to play rock n' roll, if that's what it was called, when I was growing up, but I saw these people that have died, you know. I've seen Buddy Holly play, I've seen Eddie Cochran play, I've seen Sam Cooke, I've seen all these people that are dead. Not a day goes by when I don't think about all these people.

MD: The death of Elvis?

BD: There's another case.

MD: How did you react?

BD: I was stunned. Something I never had thought about I mean, I thought anybody else was gonna live forever. I saw no reason for his death.

MD: When you survived that motorcycle accident in '66, I guess that was a real brush that sort of...?

BD: That was a brush. I survived that, but what I survived after that was even harder to survive than the motor cycle crash. That was just a physical crash, but sometimes there are things in life that you cannot see, are harder to survive than something which you can pin down.

MD: Could you pin that down a little more for me. I mean, can you say what you survived after that?

BD: Well, that crash was, I think, in 1967 or '66 and at that time I deserved to crash, 'cause I certainly couldn't have gone on... it was just, you know... the Great Spirit telling me, you know, you need a rest. But that had nothing to do with me, that crash. After that, what I survived after that was man-made.

MD: Of your own making. I guess it humbled you when you crashed?

BD: Well, I don't recall what I was thinking about. I looked at the ceiling for a while...

MD: I mean, John Wesley Harding, maybe I'm wrong in saying, resulted from that.

BD: Well, at that time, I had not recorded for a while, I don't think... I might have had a new contract coming up, which I think I did. I didn't know how to record the way other people were recording, and I didn't want to. The Beatles had just released Sergeant Pepper, which I didn't like at all, because I didn't like... I could see that... Talk about indulgence. I thought that was a very indulgent album, though the songs on it were real good. I just didn't think all that production was necessary, 'cause the Beatles had never done that before. The Stones did it too, with something they were doing. Mick had that song out, 10,000 Year Old Man or something like that.

MD: That sort of came after Sergeant Pepper, sort of copying it.

BD: Yeah, OK. And at that time, Janis Joplin was starting to make it big, Jimi Hendrix was starting to make it big, the Grateful Dead were making it big. There was a lotta stuff happening that... er... I just didn't quite understand at that period of time, none of us did. We didn't figure it had anything to do with anything. Although Janis was great, Janis was great, but the psychedelic music scene, that's what I'm trying to say. Jimi Hendrix, what he was doing with his guitar was fine, but then all the producers started to get into everything. Anyway, we were caught – we were caught We were up there in Woodstock, so we were laying down songs, and at that period of time, we were laying down all these songs on tape. We were just writing 'em and singing 'em onto a tape, and I was going to have to go in and make a record, and I figured it was just the kind of stuff I wanted to do on my record. I'd sing the songs and I'd say "it didn't feel right". I mean, I didn't want to... I don't figure it was saying anything different, you know what I mean, except in my particular type of way it was. But then I went back and just wrote just real simple songs. It was the first time I ever did an album, ever wrote a song, as a matter of fact, there's only two songs on the album which came at the same time as the music The rest of the songs was written out on paper, and I found the tunes for them later. I didn't do it before, and I haven't done it since. That might account for the specialness of that album. It came out at a time when... it was live in the studio. I knew it wasn't gonna stay there very long, though, but it was special, and I still sing them songs.

MD: They're powerful songs, and it took so long, I mean, because... as I say, I was picking up that album expecting you to have like rolled along, but you sorta went back to the pastoral, rustic... it wasn't folk, it was more, you know, a swing into country which would solidify with Nashville Skyline, and er...

BD: Right I hear you. But the thing, you see, I've never broke tradition. I've never broke tradition – I've never gone and done something that had no tradition behind it When I finally broke with it at John Wesley Harding, I started out again, and I knew it wasn't where I was gonna stay very long, but I had to explore that territory, and never until I got to Blood On The Tracks did I finally get a hold of what I needed to get a hold of and once I got hold of that, Blood On The Tracks wasn't it either, and neither was Desire. But Street Legal comes the closest to where my music is going, you know, for the rest of the time. It has to do with an illusion of time, I mean, what the songs are necessarily about is the illusions of time. Now, in the old days, they used to do it automatically, but it's like I had amnesia, all of a sudden in 1966. I couldn't remember how to do it. I tried to force-learn it, and I couldn't learn what I had been able to do naturally like Highway 61 Revisited. I mean, you can't sit down and write that consciously, I mean, because it has to do with the break-up of time, MD: Fragmentation, fragmentation's such an important part I guess in your art. I feel that.

BD: You know, it's got, I mean, it's just... in four lines, in the first four lines, it covers all you need to cover. It covers the past, present and future. I had to unlearn how to do that consciously because I learned in '75 that I was going to have to do it from now on... consciously; and those are the kinds of songs I wanted to write. The ones that do have the break-up of time, where there is no time, trying to make the focus as strong as a magnifying glass under the sun, you know. To do it consciously is a trick, you know and I did it on that... er... I did it on Blood On The Tracks for the first time, and I didn't know... I knew how to do it because it was a technique I learned, I actually had a teacher for it, and er...

MD: Who was that?

BD: It was an old man in New York who is... who knew about that, and so I picked up what I could.

MD: Do you feel that Blood On The Tracks and Desire were sort of sentimental albums?

BD: Well, Blood On The Tracks did consciously what I used to do unconsciously. I didn't perform it well, I didn't have the power to perform it well, but I did write the songs; they can be changed but the idea was right They... it might be sentimental in a way, because maybe I was sentimental... if it was in a way sentimental, I mean, I was fighting sentimentality all the way down the line. Desire was a little different, but of course I had a co-writer in on that and we both brought our own ideas to it MD: It seemed like Blood On The Tracks was a confession, it was real personal, it was a real chronicle. I could see that in your fragmented way, like on Tangled Up In Blue, you were sort of telling a story, and I tied it on to your relationship with Sara.

BD: Well, here's the thing. There might be some little part of me which is confessing something which I've experienced and I know, but it is not definitely the total me confessing anything. I mean, when Mick Jagger sings Beast Of Burden, you know what I mean, there's something in there that's in him confessing, but you just do that MD: Another song on the Rolling Stones album which seems like it's for you, that Some Girls song where he sings it in your voice just about, he sings... "gimme a lethal dose"...

BD: Well, Mick is always kinda singing... I hear myself in Mick a lot, you know. The one you mean, has it got Zuma Beach on it?

MD: Yeah.

BD: I don't live on Zuma Beach. I think he's talking about Neil Young, if you wanna know the truth, 'cause he lives on Zuma Beach, I've never lived there.

MD: That house you built, on the coast. I don't know the story with it; was that sort of a Xanadu for you?

BD: No, not really. It's a long story. I don't think you'd even be interested. The house just happened, you know... it was... it happened accidentally. I mean, I wasn't paying too much attention to what was happening, but I had a man who knew how to... who did know, but I wasn't really paying too much attention and, er, you know, it just got a little larger than usual and a little spread out But it isn't...

MD: It's sort of like an elusive chapter, you know, a man builds a massive house with a dome...

BD: No, no, I don't think so... my home is where my heart is, you know, and I just didn't think of domes and wood as home.

MD: Do you feel more at home now? This might be obvious, but, I guess... do you feel more at home doing this, traveling around?

BD: Well, I've been doing it for such a long time, it's all I'm doing now.

MD: I mean, it's your life, yeah. Well, I know you said things like you could be happy with a real settled down life, coming home to a wife and, I guess, you want that again.

BD: Oh definitely. I wouldn't mind it I'd be real happy. I could be perfectly happy and content being a bus driver, y'know. I mean, if all this faded away, it wouldn't bother me. I mean, I could do that, you know. I'd... it would be quite an experience doing it, but I still could go back to, y'know, making pizzas or something, I don't know.

MD: Do you really think... maybe you know, it seems everybody else is dealing with the problem of trying to make their mark, and then maybe for the man who has made his mark it's... easy to say "hey, you know, I don't care if I were in another job or I wasn't making my mark".

BD: Well, you need love. You have to have people who love you, you have to have people you can identify with, who are companions, and there's have to be love in your corner. Y'know, if you don't have that, well then nothing you do is gonna be satisfying to you.

MD: Do you feel that's missing?

BD: In my life? No, I don't feel that's missing. I mean, I don't have... I've got much less than I've ever had, but I've got love, y'know, so that makes me feel that I've got more. But in physical terms, I really don't.

MD: Has your vision of women, of woman, changed significantly since, er... I mean a song like Just Like A Woman, it's a definitive song.

BD: Well, that's true, that's true, I believe that. I believe that that feeling in that song is true and that I can grasp it, you know, when I'm singing it. But if you're looking for true companion in a woman, I mean... I can't stand to... to run with women anymore, I just can't, it bothers me. I'd rather stand in front of a rolling train, y'know. But if you find a woman that is more than a companion, that is also your sister, and your lover and your mother, y'know, if you find all them ideas in one woman, well, then you got a companion for life. You don't ever have to think about.

MD: Is there a woman like that though really? It's like that woman, you're saying "is she the mother and the sister" and she's also looking at you saying "is he the father and brother".

BD: Yeah, right. Your father is a son, when he was a baby... that's the way life really is, though. Well, I've got five kids y'know.

MD: I know you do.

BD: And, you know, it's heartbreaking going away and leaving your kids, but you just have to adjust to it.

MD: How many boys and how many girls?

BD: I can't remember.

MD: You've done a real good job at keeping them out of getting swallowed up by the newshounds.

BD: Oh, well, nobody's really interested. I mean, you know, I mean, If they are, that's one thing people don't generally do. There are some things in my life which is off-limits, and I think any man on earth would agree to that. Me, they can do what they want with me. They can write about, they can photograph me, you know, they can say anything they want about, and y'know, do what they want generally. But with things... there is a certain line which nobody deserves to cross, you know. I think that's just a natural line, I mean, anybody would agree to that.

MD: Have your children expressed a desire to go into the music business?

BD: I hope not. I mean, they're all good musicians; they all can play. But I don't want anybody to tell my kids to go into it, into what I'm doing; it's not a good life. I mean, it's not a natural thing, you know, it puts you too much up in the air, it's too much of a commitment to, er, the road y'know. I think we're pulling out now.

MD: OK Bob.

17 September 1978
Jonathan Cott Interview, Portland, New Haven

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 681-692.

This is Jonathan Cott's (JC) second interview with Dylan in less than a year. It took place on September 17th 1978 on bus and plane, on the way to the concert that night in New Haven. The discussions continued in the dressing room before the show. This interview was published in Rolling Stone on November 16th 1978.

Soon after the 1978 tour Dylan converted to "born-again" Christianity – "I had no idea" said Cott.

In his book "Dylan" (published by Rolling Stone Press, 1985) Cott describes his meeting thus:

> "True to his reputation and to my image of him, Dylan was totally magnetic and mysterious, vulnerable and wary, sincere and caustic, witty and righteous, charming and sly. Indeed, he seemed to combine the characteristics of both the Joker and the Thief- the two characters he sang about in "All Along The Watchtower" – both of whose symbolic functions are to shake up one's pre-conception, received opinions, illusions and sense of security."

On the evening of September 15th, the Boston Red Sox were in New York City trying to get back into first place. In New Orleans, just before Muhammad Ali made his comeback, TV commentator Howard Cosell introduced the fighter by quoting from the song Forever Young: "May your hands always be busy/May your feet always be swift/May you have a strong foundation/When the winds of changes shift." And in Augusta, Maine, the composer of that song was inaugurating a three month tour of the United States and Canada that will include sixty-five concerts in sixty-two cities.

According to an Associated Press review of the opening night, Bob Dylan "drove a packed-house audience of 7200 into shrieks of ecstasy. The thirty-seven-year-old folk-rock singer mixed old songs and new. His audience in the Augusta Civic Center was a mixture of people who first knew Dylan as an angry young poet in the early Sixties and high-school students more accustomed to punk rock. Dylan satisfied both, although his veteran fans seemed the happiest."

After a highly successful series of concerts in Japan, Australia, New Zealand and Western Europe earlier this year, it might seem peculiar to think of Dylan's latest American tour as a kind of comeback. But, at least in this country, Dylan recently has been the recipient of some especially negative reviews, both for his film, Renaldo and Clara (which, incidentally, was warmly greeted at this year's Cannes Film Festival), and his latest album, Street-Legal. This billingsgate, moreover, has come from a number of Dylan's "veteran fans." In the Village Voice, seven reviewers – a kind of firing squad – administered justice to the film with a fusillade of abuse. And ROLLING STONE, in its two August issues, featured a column and review that pilloried the album. Yet Street Legal seems to me one of Dylan's most passionate, questing and questioning records.

I ran into Dylan in the hallway of his Portland motel at noon on September 17th – an hour before the entourage was to take off for New Haven. He was heading to breakfast and wasn't looking forward to it. "I ran into a girl last night," he told me as we walked to the dining room,

"whom I knew in the Village in 1964. She figured the food wouldn't be too good up here, so she said she'd bring some with her this morning. But I haven't seen her."

"Maybe her love's in vain," I joked.

"Maybe," Dylan laughed.

But just after we had sat down and were told that breakfast wasn't being served any longer, a lovely woman appeared next to us with the promised feast in a basket. We ate, saved the muffins to give to the band later on and went out to catch the Scenicruiser bus that was to drive us to the local airport for the flight – on a chartered BAC 111 jet – to New Haven, where the group was to perform that night at the Veterans' Memorial Coliseum.

Dylan and I sat at the back of the bus. The musicians and tour organizers – the most organized and sweet-tempered people I've met in years – listened to a cassette recording of Ray Charles and the Raylettes. As the bus started, I foolhardily tried to interest Dylan in a theory I had about Changing Of The Guards – namely, that the song could be seen to have a coded subtext revealed by the characters of various Tarot cards – the Moon, the Sun, the High Priestess, the Tower and, obviously, the King and Queen of Swords – the two cards Dylan specifically mentions. My idea was that the attributes associated with these images make up the "plot" of the song.

"I'm not really too acquainted with that, you know," he warded me off. (What was that Tarot card doing on the back of the jacket of Desire? I wondered.) Undaunted, I mentioned that it had been said that Tarot diviners discover the future by intuition, "with prophetic images drawn from the vaults of the subconscious." Didn't Dylan think that a song like Changing Of The Guards wakens in us the images of our subconscious? Certainly, I continued, such songs as that and No Time to Think suggested the idea of spirits manifesting their destiny as the dramatis personae of our dreams.

Dylan wasn't too happy with the drift of the discussion and fell silent. "I guess," I said, "there's no point in asking a magician how he does his tricks."

"Exactly!" Dylan responded cheerfully.

"Okay," I said, "we have to start someplace. What about the first line of Changing Of The Guards? Does sixteen years' have anything to do with the number of years you've been on the road?"

"No," Dylan replied, "sixteen is two short of eighteen years. Eighteen years is a magical number of years to put in time. I've found that threes and sevens... well, things come up in sevens... What am I saying? I mean, what am I saying?"

I started rambling on about the possible mystical significance of numbers (sixteen equals one plus six, which equals seven, love minus zero, etc.), but by this time I realized that only the bus was going anywhere. It was time to get the interview rolling. And now the interview proper:

The Bus

JC: When I tell Rolling Stone what we've been talking about, they won't believe it.

BD: They had the nerve to run the reviews they did on Street Legal – why should I give them an interview, anyway?

JC: Are you going to kick me off the bus?

BD: No, it's your interview. It's okay. But if you were doing It for another magazine, it'd be okay, too.

JC: Think I should go somewhere else with it?

BD: Yeah – Business Week.

JC: (The tape of Ray Charles and the Raylettes that has been counterpointing our banter has now given way to Joe Cocker's Mad Dogs and Englishmen) It's strange, but I noticed in your last two performances that your phrasing and the timbre of your voice at certain points resemble those of Little Anthony, Smokey Robinson and Gene Chandler. Are you aware of this?

BD: No. When your environment changes, you change. You've got to go on, and you find new friends. Turn around one day and you're on a different stage, with a new set of characters.

JC: In your new song, No Time To Think, you list a series of qualities and concepts like loneliness, humility, nobility, patriotism, etc.

BD: Is pregnancy in there?

JC: It wasn't in there the last time I heard it. But I was thinking that it's these kinds of concepts that both free and imprison a person. What do you think?

BD: I never have any time to think.

JC: I should have known you'd say something like that. Maybe someone else should be up here doing this interview – a different character.

BD: Someone who's not so knowledgeable. You're too knowledgeable.

JC: I had the idea of just asking you the questions from A Hard Rain's A Gonna Fall: Where have you been? What did you see? What did you hear? Whom did you meet? What'll you do now?

BD: (Laughing) I'd be here the rest of my life talking to you... Just look outside the window at the picket fences and the pine trees. New England falls are so beautiful, aren't they. Look at those two kids playing by the train tracks. They remind me of myself. Both of them.

JC: Did you ever lie down on the tracks?

BD: Not personally. I once knew someone who did.

JC: What happened?

BD: I lost track of him... You should describe in your interview this village we're passing through, Jonathan. It's real special. Go ahead, describe it.

JC: There's a little pond at the edge of the road...

BD: ...and here's the Stroudwater Baptist Church. We just turned the corner and are heading on down... I'll tell you in a minute. What do you call this kind of architecture?... Look at the ducks over there...

JC: ...and that little waterfall.

BD: This is Garrison Street we've just passed Garrison Street – probably never will again.

JC: You're never coming back?

BD: Oh, I bet we come back.

JC: Clothes on the line behind that house.

BD: Yeah, clothes on the line. Someone's frying chicken – didn't Kris Kristofferson say something like that? You don't see this in New York City... well, maybe at McDonald's. (The bus pulls into the airport.) This may be our last chance to talk, Jonathan. I hope we've got it down right this time.

The Plane

BD: Let's find something to talk about.

JC: Maybe I should ask a question that Jann Wenner, the editor of Rolling Stone, wanted to ask you.

BD: Ask me one of his.

JC: Okay, why are you doing this tour?

BD: Well, why did I do the last one? I'm doing this one for the same reason I did the last one.

JC: And what reason was that?

BD: It was for the same reason that I did the one before that. I'm doing this tour for one reason or another, I can't remember what the reason is anymore.

JC: Articles about the tour always mention that you're doing it for the money.

BD: They always say that. There are more important things in the world than money. It means that to the people who write these articles, the most important thing in the world is money. They could be saying I'm doing the tour to meet girls or to see the world. Actually, it's all I know how to do. Ask Muhammad Ali why he fights one more fight. Go ask Marlon Brando why he makes one more movie. Ask Mick Jagger why he goes on the road. See what kind of answers you come up with. Is it so surprising I'm on the road? What else would I be doing in this life – meditating on the mountain? Whatever someone finds fulfilling, whatever his or her purpose is -that's all it is.

JC: You recently said that you do new versions of your older songs because you believe in them – as if to believe in something is to make it real.

BD: They are real, and that's why I keep doing them. As I said before, the reason for the new versions is that I've changed. You meet new people in your life, you're involved on different levels with people. Love is a force, so when a force comes in your life -and there's love surrounding you – you can do anything.

JC: Is that what's happening, to you now?

BD: Something similar to that, yeah.

JC: When you introduce the singers onstage as your childhood sweethearts, your present girlfriend, your former girlfriend – is that literal?

BD: Oh, of course.

JC: May I list the themes I found on Street-Legal?

BD: Yeah.

JC: Survival, homelessness, trust, betrayal, sacrifice, exile, tyranny and victimization.

BD: All right, those things go through all of my songs because I feel those things. And those feelings touch me, so naturally they're going to appear in the songs. I've got twenty-two or twenty-three albums out on Columbia alone and about seventy-five bootleg records floating around, so it gets to a point where it doesn't matter anymore. You want each new record to be your best, but you know you're going to write more songs and make another album anyway. People who get hit with the new album for the first time... it surprises them, it's coming at them from someplace and maybe they haven't thought about things that way. But that's not for me to say. That's my life, and if they can find identity in that, okay – and if they can't, that's okay, too.

JC: A song like No Time To Think sounds like it comes from a very deep dream.

BD: Maybe, because we're all dreaming, and these songs come close to getting inside that dream. It's all a dream anyway.

JC: As in a dream lines from one song seem to connect with lines from another. For example: "I couldn't tell her what my private thoughts were / But she had some way of finding them out" in Where Are You Tonight? and "The captain waits above the celebration / Sending his thoughts to a beloved maid" in Changing of the Guards.

BD: I'm the first person who'll put it to you and the last person who'll explain it to you. Those questions can be answered dozens of different ways, and I'm sure they're all legitimate. Everybody sees in the mirror what he sees – no two people see the same thing.

JC: Usually you don't specify things or people in your songs. We don't know who Marcel and St. John are in Where Are You Tonight? or who the "partner in crime" is in that same song...

BD: Who isn't your partner in crime?

JC: But in a song like Sara you seem fairly literal.

BD: I've heard it said that Dylan was never as truthful as when he wrote Blood On The Tracks, but that wasn't necessarily truth it was just perceptive. Or when people say Sara was written for "his wife Sara" – it doesn't necessarily have to be about her just because my wife's name happened to be Sara. Anyway, was it the real Sara or the Sara in the dream? I still don't know.

JC: Is Is Your Love in Vain? to be taken literally? You've been accused of being chauvinistic in that song, especially in the line "Can you cook and sew make flowers grow?"

BD: That criticism comes from people who think that women should be karate instructors or airplane pilots. I'm not knocking that – everyone should achieve what she wants to achieve – but when a man's looking for a woman, he ain't looking for a woman who's an airplane pilot. He's looking for a woman to help him out and support him, to hold up one end while he holds up another.

JC: Is that the kind of woman you're looking for?

BD: What makes you think I'm looking for any woman?

JC: You could say that the song isn't necessarily about you, yet some people think that you're singing about yourself and your needs.

BD: Yeah, well, I'm everybody anyway.

JC: There's a lot of talk about magic in Street-Legal. "I wish I was a magician / I would wave a wand and tie back the bond / That we've both gone beyond" in We Better Talk This Over, "But the magician is much quicker and his game / Is much thicker than blood" in No Time to Think.

BD: These are things I'm really interested in, and it's taken me a while to get back to it. Right through the time of Blonde on Blonde I was doing it unconsciously. Then one day I was half-stepping, and the lights went out. And since that point, I more or less had amnesia. Now, you can take that statement as literally or metaphysically as you need to, but that's what happened to me. It took me a long time to get to do consciously what I used to be able to do unconsciously.

It happens to everybody. Think about the periods when people don't do anything, or they lose it and have to regain it, or lose it and gain something else. So it's taken me all this time, and the records I made along the way were like openers – trying to figure out whether it was this way or that way, just what is it, what's the simplest way I can tell the story and make this feeling real.

So now I'm connected back, and I don't know how long I'll be there because I don't know how long I'm going to live. But what comes now is for real and from a place that's — I don't know, I don't care who else cares about it. John Wesley Harding was a fearful album – just dealing with fear (laughing), but dealing with the devil in a fearful way, almost. All I wanted to do was to get the words right. It was courageous to do it because I could have not done it, too. Anyway, on Nashville Skyline you had to read between the lines. I was trying to grasp something that would lead me on to where I thought I should be, and it didn't go nowhere – it just went down, down, down. I couldn't be anybody but myself, and at that point I didn't know it or want to know it.

I was convinced I wasn't going to do anything else, and I had the good fortune to meet a man in New York City who taught me how to see. He put my mind and my hand and my eye together in a way that allowed me to do consciously what I unconsciously felt. And I didn't know how to pull it off. I wasn't sure it could be done in songs because I'd never written a song like that. But when I started doing it, the first album I made was Blood on the Tracks. Everybody agrees that that was pretty different, and what's different about it is that there's a code in the lyrics and also there's no sense of time. There's no respect for it: you've got yesterday, today and tomorrow all in the same room, and there's very little that you can't imagine not happening.

JC: In Tarantula you write about a woman named Justine who tells you that "only God can be everywhere at the same Time and Space."

BD: That's right, but that was unconscious. And that drilled me down – doing it unconsciously as doing it like a primitive, and it took everything out of me. Everything was gone; I was drained. I found out later that it was much wiser to do it consciously, and it could let things be much stronger, too. Actually, you might even live longer, but I'm not sure about that.

From that point I went on to Desire, which I wrote with Jacques Levy. And I don't remember who wrote that. And then I disappeared for a while. Went on the Rolling Thunder tour, made Renaldo and Clara – in which I also used that quality of no-time. And I believe that that concept of creation is more real and true than that which does have time.

When you feel in your gut what you are and then dynamically pursue it – don't back down and don't give up – then you're going to mystify a lot of folks. Some people say, "I don't like him anymore." But other people do, and my crowd gets bigger and bigger. But who cares, really (laughing)? If you fall down and you're hurting, you care about that immediate situation – if you have the energy to care. Who really cares? It's like that line – how does it go?-"Propaganda, who really cares?..."

JC: I wanted to ask you about love.

BD: Go ahead, but I'm not too qualified on that subject. Love comes from the Lord – it keeps all of us going. If you want it, you got it.

JC: You've described and communicated the idea of two aspects of love – the love that longs for commitment and the love that longs to be free. Which is the most real to you?

BD: All of it. It's all love that needs to be love.

JC: You often sing about having a twin, a sister/wife, a dreamlover for one's life.

BD: Everyone feels these feelings. People don't like to admit that that's the way things are because it's too confusing.

JC: A famous short poem by William Blake goes. "He who binds to himself a joy / Doth the winged life destroy / But he who kisses the joy as it flies / Lives in Eternity's sun rise."

BD: Allen Ginsberg quoted that to me all the time. Blake's been a big influence on Kristofferson, too.

JC: What about soul mates?

BD: What about them?

JC: Do they exist?

BD: Sure, they do, but sometimes you never meet them. A soul mate... what do they mean by soul mate? There's a male and a female in everyone, don't they say that? So I guess the soul mate would be the physical mate of the soul. But that would mean we're supposed to be with just one other person. Is a soul mate a romantic notion or is there real truth in that, señor?

JC: That's what I was asking you.

BD: How would I know?

JC: Well a lot of your songs are concerned with that... Someone once said that one's real feelings come out when one's separated from somebody one loves.

BD: Who said that?

JC: Nietzsche.

BD: Well, I guess he's right. Your real feelings do come out when you're free to be alone. Most people draw a line that they don't want you to cross – that's what happens in most petty relationships.

JC: In a song such as Like a Rolling Stone and now Where Are You Tonight? and No Time To Think, you seem to tear away and remove the layers of social identity – burn away the "rinds of received reality" and bring us back to the zero state.

BD: That's right. "Stripped of all virtue as you crawl through the dirt/You can give but you cannot receive." Well, I said it.

(At this point the pilot announces that we'll be landing in five minutes.)

JC: Just a few quick questions before we land. Coming back to Changing Of The Guards...

BD: It means something different every time I sing it.

JC: The lines, "She's smelling sweet like the meadows where she was born/On Midsummer's eve, near the tower," are so quiet and pure.

BD: Oh, yeah?

JC: Those lines seem to go back a thousand years into the past.

BD: They do. Changing Of The Guards is a thousand years old. Woody Guthrie said he just picked songs out of the air. That means that they were already there and that he was tuned into them. Changing Of The Guards might be a song that might have been there for thousands of years, sailing around in the mist, and one day I just tuned into it. Just like Tupelo Honey was floating around and Van Morrison came by.

JC: It's been said that the Stones' song, – Some Girls, hints at being about you a bit.

BD: I've never lived at Zuma Beach.

JC: Jagger imitates your phrasing, though.

BD: He always does... He imitates Otis Redding, too, and Riley Puckett and Slim Harpo.

JC: In One More Cup of Coffee you sing about a sister who sees the future, and in Changing Of The Guards you sing about "treacherous young witches."

BD: I meet witchy women. Somehow I attract them. I wish they'd leave me alone.

JC: Well, there are some good witches, too, though that voodoo girl in New Pony was giving you some trouble.

BD: That's right. By the way, the Miss X in that song is Miss X, not ex...

JC: In We Better Talk This Over, is the line, "I'm exiled, you can't convert me," is some way about being Jewish?

BD: Listen, I don't know how Jewish I am because I've got blue eyes. My grandparents were from Russia, and going back that far, which one of those women didn't get raped by the Cossacks? So there's plenty of Russian in me, I'm sure. Otherwise, I wouldn't be the way I am.

JC: Do you agree with Octavia Paz' idea that "all of us are alone, because all of us are two"?

BD: I can't disagree, but I've got to think there's more than two. didn't Leonard Cohen sing something like "I'm the one who goes from nothing to two"? I don't remember.

JC: We're back to numbers.

BD: Leonard Cohen was really interested in numbers "I'm the one who goes from nothing to one."

JC: You're a Gemini, and the Gemini twins have been seen by one writer, Marius Schneider, as symbols of the "harmonious ambiguity of paradise and inferno, love and hate, peace and war, birth and death, praise and insult, clarity and obscurity, scorching rocks and swamps surrounding the fountains and waters of salvation." That sounds like a good description of some of your new songs.

BD: Right, but you can't choose the month of the year you're born in.

JC: "Sacrifice is the code of the road" is what you sing in Where Are You Tonight? To die before dying, shedding your skin, making new songs out of old ones.

BD: That's my mission in life... "He not busy being born is busy dying." Did you bring your parachute?

JC: The interview was that bad, huh?

BD: (Talking to a friend) Bring a parachute for Jonathan.

JC: I'd prefer the pathway that leads up to the stars.

The Dressing Room

I ran into Dylan backstage half an hour before a sound check at the Veterans' Memorial Coliseum in New Haven. He invited me into his room, where we concluded our talk.

JC: When I was waiting to pick up my ticket for your Portland concert last night, I happened to ask the woman behind the desk where all these kids were coming from. And she said: "For Bobby Dylan, from heaven – for Black Sabbath, who knows?"

BD: Well, I believe it, don't you? Where else could my particular audience come from?

JC: I've already met two angelic types – one in your dressing room here in New Haven, the other the girl whom you knew fifteen years ago who brought you a breakfast in Portland.

BD: They're all angels... But I wanted to ask you about something Paul Wasserman [who's in charge of Dylan's publicity] said that you said to him, and that is: "A genius can't be a genius on instinct alone."

JC: I said that? Maybe, but really late at night.

BD: Well, I disagree. I believe that instinct is what makes a genius a genius.

JC: What do you think of all the criticisms of Street Legal?

BD: I read some of them. In fact, I didn't understand them. I don't think these people have had the experiences I've had to write those songs. The reviews didn't strike me as being particularly interesting one way or another, or as compelling to my particular scene. I don't know who these people are. They don't travel in the same crowd, anyway. So it would be like me criticizing Pancho Villa.

JC: The reviews in this country of Renaldo and Clara weren't good, either. The writers went out of their way to call you presumptuous, pretentious and egocentric.

BD: These people probably don't like to eat what I like to eat, they probably don't like the same things I like, or the same people. Look, just one time I'd like to see any one of those assholes try and do what I do. Just once let one of them write a song to show how they feel and sing it in front of 10, let alone 10,000 or 100,000 people. I'd like to see them just try that one time.

JC: Some of theses critics have suggested that you need more sophisticated record production.

BD: I probably do. The truth of it is that I can hear the same sounds that other people like to hear, too. But I don't like to spend the time trying to get those sounds in the studio.

JC: So you're really not a producer type?

BD: I'm not. Some musicians like to spend a lot of time in the studio. But a lot of people try to make something out of nothing. If you don't have a good song, you can go into the studio and make it appear to be good, but that stuff don't last.

JC: You've had producers – Tom Wilson, Bob Johnston, Don DeVito...

BD: But that wasn't all that sophisticated I mean, John Hammond produced my first record, and it was a matter of singing into a microphone. He'd say, "It sounded good to me," and you'd go on to the next song. That's still the way I do it. Nowadays, you start out with anything but the song – the drum track, for instance -and you take a week getting the instruments all sounding the way they should. They put down the rhythm track or whatever sound they want to hear in the ghost tracks. If you have a good song, it doesn't matter how well or badly it's produced. Okay, my records aren't produced that well, I admit it.

JC: Personally, I love the "primitive" sound of Buddy Holly demo tapes or the original Chuck Berry discs.

BD: But in those days they recorded on different equipment, and the records were thicker. If you buy one of my early records – and you can't today – they weren't like Saran Wrap, as they are now. There was quality to them... and the machinery was different and the boards were different. The Beach Boys did stuff on two-track in the garage.

JC: But you do need a producer now?

BD: I think so. You see, in the recent past my method, when I had the songs, was to go in, record them and put them out. Now I'm writing songs on the run again – they're dear to me, the songs I'm doing now – and I can't perfect them. So if I can just block time out, here and there, I can work on an album the way the Eagles do. I've got so many records out there it doesn't matter when I put out a new one. I could release one a year from now – start working on it in January and have it produced right.

JC: What's the longest it's taken you to record a song?

BD: About six or seven hours. It took us a week to make Street Legal – we mixed it the following week and put it out the week after. If we hadn't done it that fast we wouldn't have made an album at all, because we were ready to go back on the road.

JC: You've got a bigger sound now – on record and onstage – than you've ever had before.

BD: I do – and I might hire two more girls and an elephant – but it doesn't matter how big the sound gets as long as it's behind me emphasizing the song. It's still pretty simple. There's nothing like it in Vegas – no matter what you've heard – and it's anything but disco. It's not rock & roll – my roots go back to the Thirties, not the Fifties.

JC: On this tour, you've again been changing some of the radically new versions of songs that I heard you perform in Europe this past summer.

BD: Yeah, we've changed them around some – it's a different tour and a different show. The band has to relearn the songs, but they're fast and the best at that.

JC: Do you write songs now with them in mind?

BD: I've had this sound ever since I was a kid – what grabs my heart I had to play alone for a long time, and that was good because by playing alone I had to write songs. That's what I didn't do when I first started out, just playing available songs with a three-piece honky-tonk band in my hometown. But when I was first living in New York City – do you remember the old Madison Square Garden? Well, they used to have gospel shows there every Sunday, and you could see everyone from the Five Blind Boys, the Soul Stirrers and the Swan Silvertones to Clara Ward and the Mighty Clouds of Joy. I went up there every Sunday. I'd listen to that and Big Bill Broonzy. Then I heard the Clancy Brothers and hung out with them – all of their drinking songs, their revolutionary and damsel-in-distress songs. And I listened to Jean Ritchie, Woody Guthrie, Leadbelly.

JC: What about the doo-wop groups?

BD: They played at shows, and those artists didn't have to be onstage for more than twenty minutes. They just got on and got off, and that was never what I wanted to do. I used to go to the Brooklyn Fox a lot, but the band I liked the best at that time was Bobby Blue Bland's, and I heard them at the Apollo. But the people whose floors I was sleeping on were all into the Country Gentlemen, Uncle Dave Macon, the Stanley Brothers, Bill Monroe. So I heard all that, too.

JC: You seem to like music that's real and uncorrupted, no matter what it's tradition. But some of your folk-music followers didn't care much for your own musical changes.

BD: But don't forget that when I played Maggie's Farm electric at Newport, that was something I would have done years before. They thought I didn't know what I was doing and that I'd slipped over the edge, but the truth is... Kooper and Michael Bloomfield remember that scene very well. And what the newspapers say happened didn't actually happen that way. There wasn't a whole lot of resistance in the crowd. Don't forget they weren't equipped for what we were doing with the sound. But I had a legitimate right to do that.

JC: The Beatles and the Rolling Stones were already popular in this country at that time, though.

BD: I remember hanging out with Brian Jones in 1964. Brian could play the blues. He was an excellent guitar player – he seemed afraid to sing for some reason – but he could play note for note what Robert Johnson or Son House played.

JC: In songs like Buckets Of Rain or New Pony, you seem just to go in and out of musical traditions, pick up what you want and need, and transform them as you please.

BD: That's basically what I do, but so do the Stones. Mick and Keith knew all that music. America's filled with all kinds of different music.

JC: When you sang Baby Stop Crying the other night in Portland, I remember thinking that your voice sounded as if it combined the following qualities: tenderness, sarcasm, outraged violence, indignation, insouciant malice and wariness.

BD: The man in that song has his hand out and is not afraid of getting it bit.

JC: He sounds stronger than the woman he's singing to and about.

BD: Not necessarily. The roles could be reversed at any time – don't you remember To Ramona? "And someday maybe, who knows baby, I'll come and be cryin' to you."

JC: In the song Baby Stop Crying it sounds as if the singer is getting rejected – that the woman's in love with someone else.

BD: She probably is.

JC: There's also a "bad man" in the song. It's almost as if three or four different movies were taking place in one song all held together by the chorus. And the same thing seems to be happening in Changing Of The Guards and some of your other new songs. What's that all about?

BD: Lord knows.

JC: How come you write in that way?

BD: I wouldn't be doing it unless some power higher than myself were guiding me on. I wouldn't be here this long. Let me put it another way... What was the question?

JC: There are all these different levels in many of your present songs.

BD: That's right, and that's because my mind and my heart work on all those levels. Shit, I don't want to be chained down to the same old level all the time.

JC: I've seen you tell people who don't know you that some other person standing nearby is you.

BD: Well sure, if some old fluff ball comes wandering in looking for the real Bob Dylan, I'll direct him down the line, but I can't be held accountable for that.

JC: A poet and critic named Elizabeth Sewell once wrote "Discovery, in science and poetry, is a mythological situation in which the mind unites with a figure of its own devising as a means toward understanding the world." And it seems as if you have created a figure named Bob Dylan.

BD: I didn't create Bob Dylan. Bob Dylan has always been here... always was. When I was a child, there was Bob Dylan. And before I was born, there was Bob Dylan.

JC: Why did you have to play that role?

BD: I'm not sure. Maybe I was best equipped to do it.

JC: The composer Arnold Schonberg once said the same thing: Someone had to be Arnold Schonberg.

BD: Sometimes your parents don't even know who you are. No one knows but you. Lord, if your own parents don't know who you are, who else in the world is there who would know except you?

JC: Then why do children keep on wanting things from their parents they can't give them?

BD: Misunderstanding.

JC: In contradistinction to the idea of being true to oneself, there's an idea of the personality – suggested by Yeats – which states that "man is nothing until he's united to an image." You seem to have your foot in both camps.

BD: I don't know about that. Sometimes I think I'm a ghost. Don't you have to have some poetic sense to be involved in what we're talking about? It's like what you were saying about people putting my record down. I couldn't care less if they're doing that, but, I mean, who are these people, what qualifications do they have? Are they poets, are they musicians? You find me some musician or poet, and then maybe we'll talk. Maybe that person will know something I don't know, and I'll see it that way.

That could happen. I'm not almighty. But my feelings come from the gut, and I'm not too concerned with someone whose feelings come from his head. That don't bother me none.

This criticism has been going on for a long time. It's like a lover: you like somebody, and then you don't want to like them anymore because you're afraid to admit to yourself that you like them so much... I don't know, you've just got to try, try to do some good for somebody. The world is full of nonsupporters and backbiters – people who chew on wet rags. But It's also filled with people who love you

JC: There are lines in your new songs about the one you love being so hard to recognize, or about feeling displaced and in exile. It seems as if the tyranny of love makes people unhappy.

BD: That's the tyranny of man-woman love. That ain't too much love.

JC: What's your idea of love?

BD: (Pause) Love like a driving wheel. That's my idea of love.

JC: What about Cupid with his bows and arrows aimed towards your heart?

BD: Naw, Cupid comes in a beard and a mustache, you know. Cupid has dark hair.

Marc Rowland Interview, Rochester

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 693-703.

Marc Rowland (MR) interviews Dylan in Rochester prior to his concert at the Rochester Auditorium. The interview was broadcast on US radio (I don't know what program). The transcript is from the circulating tape.

MR: I guess we only have a few minutes, so I guess the best thing to start with would be to ask you about the music that you're playing now.

BD: Did you... did you get the review of Renaldo and Clara with you. Did you bring one?

MR: I didn't, Bob, because Paul... I, you know, because Paul (Wasserman) didn't mention it or anything.

BD: Oh I really wanted to see it.

MR: Well I'd be glad to send it to you.

BD: Oh, okay.

MR: You know, I don't know if he told you anything about it, but I liked the movie a lot and I wrote at length about it.

BD: Yeah.

MR: Which er... unfortunately, I guess, makes it kinda unusual, in that respect, as far as the people that wrote about it.

BD: Yes.

MR: I understand that you just, um, that there's a cut version now, that you re-edited, that you edited it all again.

BD: Yes.

MR: Why did you do that?

BD: Oh well, for commercial reasons, you know. The theatre owners couldn't show a four hour movie.

MR: Uh huh, yeah. Did you think... I mean, when you were making it did you think that it was going to...

BD: Well, no, no. It's two different films, the way I heard it. I haven't seen the two hour version.

MR: Uh huh.

BD: But ah, didn't think we'd have to do that, no, we'd be... what, after making the four hour version it was very simple cutting it down to two hours.

MR: Because... what did you do? Did you just basically leave the music and...

BD: No, we just took it and er... hacked it up... took things out which were in big, er... David Blue must have been in it for twenty minutes so we just started right there and took him out completely, took him out entirely.

MR: Yeah.

BD: And that led to other changes which were pretty simp... it only took us a day or two, you know.

MR: Uh huh. Do you, I mean, how do you feel about having...?

BD: Well, for me, the long version is the movie, you know. The shorter version – if people like that, that's fine.

MR: Uh huh.

BD: But the long version is really what they should see. You know, and if they wanna book the long version, they can.

MR: It's still possible?

BD: Yeah, oh yeah.

MR: They showed it at the Cannes Festival.

BD: They did, yeah. Those prints weren't destroyed. They still exist, but, er... there's also a two hour version.

Non interview section when colleague of Dylan enters with new pair of shoes for him (size 8 and one half for interest – presumably 8½ US not UK).

MR: I assume... I do know that basically... that it didn't hold, the version that... I mean, the version that... I mean... it's your movie basically. (Conversation considerably disrupted by sound of shoes being wrapped up in place in boxes).

BD: Well I can't say I'm not disappointed, but it's a film you know, and it might take people a long time to get around to it. We made one film in the '60s people still haven't gotten around to yet.

MR: Is that, erm... Eat The Document?

BD: Yeah.

MR: Is that the one?

BD: Yeah.

MR: I had an opportunity to talk to Allen Ginsberg a while ago and he was talking about that. What is it exactly that's kept that from...

BD: Just commercial reasons, er.. you know, commercially it's just not saleable, I guess, and, erm... I don't know why it wouldn't be, but it just, you know, isn't. People just want to see...

MR: I mean, do you see that at all as symptomatic, I... ?

BD: No. It doesn't matter to me. It doesn't matter to me 'cause I've got this to do. This is my first love really.

MR: Yeah, but I meant more in terms of, erm... just that it does seem to me anyway that there's less of, even often years ago, there's less of a willingness for people to be challenged by art forms.

BD: Not so in Europe.

MR: Oh, no, not in Europe. I mean that's true also of music in Europe.

BD: Yeah, you have to take a... you have to consider er... you know, the whole world when you've something to create. And it has been received well over there, the whole four hour version of Renaldo and Clara. But that's all in the past now.

MR: Yeah.

BD: You know, I'm gonna go ahead and make another movie. I don't know whether that's gonna get accepted either, you know, but it's not really too much of my concern.

MR: Yeah, but it's something, you know... it's here that the problem is. I mean, we're like products of the culture and... a little bit weird or disorientated, the way that say jazz musicians feel... that their music doesn't, you know. But in this case it's not your music, it's your movies... 'cause it's an American movie really.

BD: It is. It is, but so is the Reader's Digest you know and Reader's Digest...

MR: Right.

BD: The way I see it is that people thought I should have made a commercial or something, and a movie is not a commercial. There's no product that it's selling, there's no certain person that it's, er... it isn't a commercial. But, er, as far as being vague and obscure like many critics said it was. It wasn't really you know, it wasn't anything like there that was so obscure. If anything it was... it tripped very lightly, you know.

MR: Right, and I thought there was like a logical connection, or a reasonable connection between each vignette and the music, the song that was on each side of it. I mean...

BD: That's right, yeah.

MR: ...you know, that's just A to B. I don't know how much more people would want than that, just spelled out.

BD: Well, then if it left a feeling with you then it achieved it's purpose.

MR: For me.

BD: Yeah.

MR: I'd like to talk a little bit more about the music you're playing now. It seems radically different from, obviously, the Rolling Thunder tour.

BD: Well, yeah. Well, I don't know how radically different it is from any of the things I've done in the past, considering the elements I have in this band I've always used before. I made an album called New Morning and we used singers on just about every track, so I've done that. As far as, er, using the horn sound, I used the horn sound in Nashville on Rainy Day Women, you know, and as far as guitar and drums, I haven't made too many albums without guitar... lead guitar, bass guitar and drums. Organ, same thing... I'll use it every once in a while, but I have used it before. We had an organ sound on Like A Rolling Stone. So, you know, there isn't really anything new, just a bunch of pieces put together.

MR: Well, but it is a different sound. I mean, the combination's different.

BD: It is, it's different, because I've heard all those kinds of musics and er... it's easy to put together a new sound. It's not really the sound that I'm looking for, it's the emphasis of being in the right place.

MR: All right... er... of course, the album is one thing, but when I saw your show a couple of nights ago it was something else again because there were so many songs of yours that are so famous and classic from the sixties and that those are quite different from the versions, you know, that were recorded then.

BD: Well, you can check all those out. You can check Bob Dylan and The Band now from Newport playing Like A Rolling Stone, or Bob Dylan and The Band tour, there are tapes of that, playing Like A Rolling Stone. I did Like A Rolling Stone on the 1974 tour; there's a record of that out.

MR: Sure.

BD: And you can... well, there is no record of these performances out, except in Japan and I don't know how true to where we are now, that record is. But this just... it really isn't that different. If I was to step up there with a thirty piece orchestra, you know, and a light show, then that might be a considerable difference, then I might be trying to emphasise something other than the music in some kinda way. But I'm still back, back where, you know... still back in a simple way.

MR: Right. No, I mean, I felt, I mean it's certainly very successful, it's wonderful and I did feel the lyrics, I mean... your poetry is not at all obfuscated by the new arrangements, which is important – extremely.

BD: Yeah, well... I care more about the poetry of it, you know, getting it across, and I'm aware of that, just as well as any critic is.

MR: Yeah, well, I mean, I have to ask you, I mean, it must really bug you to have that kind of appellations that are tossed out, like Vegas, and disco and obvious connotations that go along with that?

BD: Um... that's just ignorance. Those people who would say something like that, first of all, is given a handle, er, you know, they gotta do that, so they can't really categorise me, or they couldn't before, so now maybe they wanna say, well, Vegas or disco. Well, what does that mean, you know. I mean, I don't know what that means. I've been to Vegas before and I've never heard any bands like this in Vegas. So I don't know what that means. B. B. King plays in Vegas, Merle Haggard plays in Vegas. So, I mean... what is that... what are they saying, you know? Is that a negative thing, Vegas ? I don't know.

MR: I don't know either.

BD: I'm not trying to defend or offend Vegas, but to a lotta people it's important to go there and see who they wanna see. I don't understand what that means as far as disco goes... we're not a disco band. I used to hear disco bands in New York, you know, the likes of Johnny Pacheco, you know, and I always considered that disco music. Erm, you know, in ballrooms, that's what it was, it was real disco. What's happening now is just that people getting together in clubs and pumping it over big systems and they're dancing to it. And the bass is stronger, and the drums are a little stronger, but mainly it's the bass. So we are not a disco band either, like I say, it's just a... I don't know; I don't take offence at any of these handles, but they're certainly not right. I mean, this music I'm playing just supports the lyrics that I write.

MR: Right, right. Well, I agree. I guess, you know, that it meant some sort of slickness that was imposing some artificiality...

BD: See, if... you can't win. I mean, you go and do something like Rolling Thunder, which we did in small halls, smaller halls – we did play some big halls – but we also played many many smaller halls... er, er... and what did they say, they say it's too ragged, you know, they say it's just a bunch of Gypsies up there, you know, traveling on the road playing with... making no attempt to do a show. That's what they say. So, what happens? You put on... you get out of your street clothes and you put on something else and they say it's slick. You know... so, I mean, it's... if they're out to say something, they're going to say something and there's very little you can say against it unless you want to defend yourself against the wind, you know.

MR: Do you ever read, I mean do you read that stuff much. Does it really...

BD: I don't, no. How were the reviews in Boston?

MR: Well, our paper wrote really glowing reviews about the album, and the show – I'll be writing it next week and I'll be very positive. And all the other ones – The Globe had a review that was kind of wishy-washy, that, you know, said that, you know, that it seemed like it didn't really understand what was going on.

BD: Well, they probably don't. They didn't understand it in the sixties either. They didn't under... one thing that they really understood was the Bob Dylan / Band tour. They seemed to understand that although... and that was because there was little resistance at the time – anyone who knew anything at all or felt anything at all knew something was wrong but didn't exactly know what. Er, erm... but they didn't understand because there's like, in my mind – I'm not really that commercial an artist... I've got a great deal of fame in legendary proportions, you know, so people are going to show up. But as far as being commercial, I'm not commercial in the, you know, in the, you know, in the Sigwayne Nillson sense or Kiss sense, you know. I'm not out there trying to reach people with myself, it's the songs I care about and the lyrics I'm trying to reach them with. And, er, you know, that's the most I can do. I can't be really too concerned with all this feedback or else. I... you know... I can't.

MR: There's... was one of the reasons for the band you have now is it like, you know, to make it a different step from the Rollin' Thunder tour? Like you had done that and...

BD: No, Rolling Thunder tour take... that was never meant to be long lived.

MR: Uh huh, that's true. It was just gonna be a little one really.

BD: Right. And I went out on that tour to find some money to support that film which we had shot and it was a different tour the second time too, er... but it was never meant to be something which should exist for ever and ever, it was just a, you know, just a one-time thing and people saw it... they would only see it for that one short time and then they'd be gone and that's exactly what happened. So, er, you know, I don't know what kind of... how it exists in people minds. Er, this has developed over a long period of time, er... I mean it just took me a while to get back to getting the band together, more than on the road... going this away and that away for a lot of years, you know, wondering what to do and if I were to say, you know, I can't think this anymore, I just gotta get back to what I do, what I really do.

MR: This is still a name. Obviously it's still...

BD: Yeah, and it doesn't bother me, er what, you know, what happens in the papers although I know it's important to some degree, but when you get crowds like we get that's really all that matters. Every night I'm looking out to see who comes and see those people react in an honest way. It's more important than all, you know, all those people that write. Good or bad, it's nice to have somebody to catch on, to know what you're doing and appreciate it but, then again, no-one can take that away from you, you know. What happens, I mean you saw what happened at Boston, I mean, that's the Boston that I know and those are the people – when I think of Boston that's what I think of, those people who've come to the show, and...

MR: Well, no. I don't want to interrupt but, but what I was going to say – what, er how do you feel or what would you do if, if you were doing the exact same thing that you were doing now and no-one was reacting. If...

BD: If no-one was reacting? Well, um... I don't know what I would do. I would still do it. I would probably have to tone it down some and get, get... find some place where people were reacting, that's what I'd have to do. In one sense if people weren't going to react to me they wouldn't be there to begin with.

MR: Right.

BD: Er, and in, you know, in another sense, er... I've had all kinds of crowds, all kinds of audiences and I've been through a whole lot, with the crowd, with the audience. Sometimes, they've, you know, supported me in there, sometimes they didn't. But, er, with bucklers(?) on, you know, and, er... why, they do understand because I believe now they understand no matter what anybody says.

MR: Yeah. Oh, I do too. But, I guess I meant that in any way that what goes on in your mind - your conceptions – does that balance, do you use...

BD: No, no. I've heard music more, probably more, I've probably heard more music than you've experienced, more music than anybody, you know, that I'm playing to. You know what I mean. So I know what I'm doing and I'm taking 'em to a place, you know, that I figure is OK, you know. It isn't, er... I might not er, be able to understand it myself sometimes, but I do know that it's alright and, er, a lot of thought has gone into it. It isn't what they are accustomed to hearing because I don't know anyone else who does what I do. There's a lot of singer-song writers around but I don't know anybody else around who writes the kind of songs I write or who sings 'em the way I sing them or who would think of using the back-up that I would think of using.

MR: Yeah.

BD: So it is different.

MR: Right

BD: Er, I don't know who came in the Garden up there the night before us, or who came in after us. But I know that we have a legitimate right to be there as well as anyone else.

MR: Sure. I was going to ask – in terms of the actual songs that you are writing out, one difference certainly from before is that whatever political, er, connections there are in the song or not, it's overt as they were in... You know, do you think that that's, you know...

BD: Well when you write... for me, for a song writer, a writer, any kind of a er... Any type of a great person who's expressing himself that way... if you're not into your own hip, and you have something to say which is super-important to you, that means you have to be in somebody else's hip. That means the person, whoever's hip you try to get into, has gotta get into. So who's going to open up to you in a world like it is today? Er, people that usually you meet in the current campaign (?) or in the corner bar of the laundromat, er, in the places where people congregate; if you want to you find people open up to you. You might not know any of these people, you know... Sometimes your best friends won't open up to you, so it has to be impersonal so, erm... But I find lot of times that I don't work with people often enough to meet with because I can tell it's jaded, you know, they're doing it because of some ulterior motive or something like that. So where I get my source of material is mostly now from characters in my life who are there and from just the back roads that I do, that I'm on, and I talk to... most of the people that I talk to in different places in areas of life don't really know who Bob Dylan is. So I seek those places out. I'm more comfortable in a place with a person who wouldn't know who I was.

MR: It's just that... it could have, erm... I mean, you know, that kind of, more direct... can't work...

BD: Political?

MR: Yeah.

BD: Well, political... my songs never were political in the sense of dogma. I never, er... I never... political...

MR: I didn't mean like, you'd listen to your song and that means you'd vote for a Democrat.

BD: Yeah, yeah, alright. I'm interested in that word because I don't really understand what politics are. I mean, if politics are giving everybody jobs – that's as far as I can understand politics. A man who's got an idea or a man or a woman who's got an idea to put people to work, to take their minds off themselves, er... and keep things rolling in a creative way. Well, that's politics, well then that's politics; as far as somebody getting beat up and going to jail for a crime they didn't do – that's injustice, that's not politics. I'm concerned with injustice, you know, wherever it may be. But I'm not so much interested in politics because I don't know what I would do to give people jobs. I don't know what I'd do to cut back on the taxes. I mean, these are problems, you know, and I don't know who is aware and, and the political system in this country is different from the political system in any other country in the world. They only have two parties and if you're outside of those two parties, you know, you don't really stand a chance. Whereas if you're in Europe or, you know, you could be one of fifty parties and still be equal.

MR: Right.

BD: So, we're talking about politics. I'm not attuned to politics in that way, I'm just attuned to people.

MR: But I guess, I bet, in terms of, well, if you mention injustice and, you know, the other songs like Hurricane or Hattie Carroll, you know and that obviously is the appendage of a political system that exists.

BD: Right, it exists, but probably some... there is injustice that does exist in probably every country in the world. There's gotta be. What we're talking about is injustice -that's been here as long as man's been here. I'll fight against it like anybody else would, but it's something I don't think one political party can solve.

MR: Yeah, is it... do you see more that songs like what you sing er, can expand someone's consciousness in a way.

BD: Yeah. I believe I've written songs that (next few words unclear) in people's minds that might see things in different ways. Er, I might just have done that, the truth is I just don't know. I've tried.

MR: Uh huh, I mean that is one of your goals when you write, I would say.

BD: Yeah, it is, but to be... Phil Ochs used to do that. He used to write... er, um... topical songs with the point of view that, erm... which was his own point of view and, er, I guess a lot of other peoples point of view, but I came up with Phil so I remember him when he came to New York. But somehow somebody who wasn't really interested wasn't gonna believe him anyway, you know what I mean. He was doing... the people who heard it then agreed with him to begin with – OK, right, and it, you know, boosted them up which was good.

MR: Right, it did have that morale factor to it.

BD: Yeah, he was a spokesman for that side. But, as far as going out there along the lines, you know, er, I don't know of how many of those people even heard his songs.

MR: Right, right. I mean it...

BD: I don't know how many records he sold or anything, you know, who know who he reached or whose minds he changed. He's a topical song writer – Woody Guthrie, he's the same way Woody was a, a...

MR: There was something more universal, I think, there.

BD: Yeah, yeah. There was the man beneath the song, his lifestyle. While Phil's songs, I mean, you knew what his lifestyle was, er, you know... Woody Guthrie was a different sort of, you know, and I think he started it, I think Woody started that unless Joe Hill, if you wanna get back to that part – now those were good songs that Joe Hill wrote, he wrote some real good songs, but that was... in those days martyrs were easy to find and, er... things were pretty simple like it was, you know, like which side are you on? It was down to, you know, this or that. Now, you can't have that point of view anymore because any, you know, person in their right mind just can't, you know, just can't more than choose the right any sides, you know.

MR: Yeah. Right. Again it's like if you get enough sides together, it makes just a circle... you can't differentiate. Also, I mean, I think, that yours – especially the songs that have been written lately are more really attuned to emotions which tend to something that anybody can identify with more than, you know, than a song like Ochs, you know, We're Not Marching Anymore. That's, you know, that speaks specifically...

BD: That was a good song. Er, maybe he did change some peoples minds on that. I don't know. He could have. You know, someone could be sitting on a fence and hear a song like that and might just get a little courage to go out and get off that fence one way or another. So... it's possible.

MR: How do you like living in Los Angeles?

BD: This year I've been on the road about, getting on a little, about six months... seven months – I can't see it, this part of my life that I'm not really living anywhere. I don't feel that I've found a, you know, place to live, yet. I've lived in a lot of different places and I just sort of move around. But, um, you know, L.A. is not as high energy as, as... it is, actually, it is. It's not as er... California's different, San Francisco's a different type of city than L.A. But, er, there's a lot of restless energy in L. A. which is... which is... which can't be put to use.

MR: Like static electricity?

BD: Yeah. Yeah. And you can't put it to use because you've got nothing to hit it, you know, nothing to hit against. And, er, I mean there's too much space, you know, or something... I don't know what it is.

MR: Yeah. That's why I asked. It seemed kind of incongruous actually, knowing you from your music, you know.

BD: Well, it's easy, you know, it's, it's sunny all the time, you know what I mean? I know, it's... it's, erm... you know, it's... it's not too crowded... but as far as night-life and... er... being rooted in something out there, I'm not.

MR: Uh, huh. What, doesn't seem like there's roots?

BD: No. I don't feel that out there. It's okay place to be for the time you're there. Like I said, been on the road a lot this year and it's, er, it's all right to start from there.

MR: Uh, huh. Yeah. What were you saying? Do you have, I mean is there a place that you can call home or do you still feel that you're basically on the road?

BD: I do feel that I'm on the road. Sometimes I feel more at home on the road than I do anywhere I've been which scares me. You know, after a period of time, after you've done it long enough, you just get it down, you know, and, er...

MR: That's strange. In a way that's strange that, I mean, you come from a, er, from a tradition that's really, I mean, from the beginning it really does have strong roots, I mean, the whole folk tradition is based on that and I don't really, you know, want to bring in a personal thing but you are a father, you know, you have five kids...

BD: That's right. I don't know how to reason that one out. My kids understand me; they know what I have to do and, er, they know that this is what I must be doing.

MR: That's the most important thing, I guess. Where do you see yourself going from here?

BD: Ah, I really can't say. I'll be on the road next year too, probably just as much as this year. It's just what I do, you know, always done my whole life and that's what I know how to do best.

Assistant enters and says "fifteen, Bob".

BD: What time is it?
MR: Holly, you got the exact time?

Five or ten after, probably ten after.

BD: OK. I don't know what kind of a show it's gonna be tonight. I'm just getting a little bit better myself and one of the girls is really sick.
MR: I gather...
BD: Oh, she can't even talk.
MR: That's too bad.
BD: Yeah. A lot of things have happened, you know, that you can't have a lot of control over. Yes, she's in... we're playing light tonight.
MR: You're playing light.
BD: Yeah. She sings the hard part too, that's a very important part and it won't be there tonight and no-one can compensate for it. But we're working around it, somehow.
MR: Do you find your... are you interested in... it seems like one thing that's really standing out in the last couple of years is that you seem very interested in growing as a musician... is there a whole technical side of it?
BD: Being a musician isn't really that difficult. You just have to... it takes practice and watching the right people. I play just well enough for myself... um... and to write my songs, that's as well as I play. I can play with Billy, erm... intricate things but I'm not all that too much interested in showing off, that side of things... er... I'm not going to come up with any new run that's never been done before. I might, I mean, I might, 'cause I do sit around and play a lot and I come up with different runs and different rhythms and, you know, I could do that, but I, like I say, it's just all practice. I mean, the time you see here is just two and a half or whatever it is, two and a half hours; you don't see the other part that also, you know, conditions those interviewers.

MR: Well, it's obviously a very polished thing... you have to assume it...
BD: It's polished because we've worked hard and we've worked since last January. So, I mean, it's gotta be, by this time, you know, it's gotta be, there's no way it could be there's not gonna be, you know, another kind of a band. If it isn't polished now it ain't ever gonna be polished. It's not polished because it's slick it's polished because really everybody knows what they're doing.
MR: Did a lot of the songs evolve... do you have... I mean the way the song sounds tonight is that something that you heard right from the start, or based contribution...
BD: Well some of the older songs that we're still doing I did hear that way and we've done that way and some of them I feel I hear 'em a different way now. But, er... yeah. I've heard all these songs this way. This is the way I've heard them done. Maggie's Farm I always wanted to do this way. I was doing it on the Rolling Thunder tour a similar way but not quite as definite. It had a rhythm in it but it didn't have a rhythm run in it that this one's got.
MR: I don't remember that. I don't know what you even call it. It's like a descending and then ascending...
BD: Da dum da da dum (on musical scale to demonstrate).
MR: Right, yeah, and you also... you seem to be having a lot more fun out there than I ever remember from seeing you before.
BD: Well, it's a lot of fun up there. I haven't had, I haven't had the confidence in the backing group before. That usually has kind of kept me back. Er, er... when there's work to do... when you're hearing things which you don't want to hear and, and other instruments sometimes might be fighting you or your vocals or, that's from my point of view anyway, then it's not gonna be fun. Or when you're working and your sick, it's not gonna be fun. If I'm sick it's never fun and I've never cancelled a show. Some of them, like, I don't know how I got through like we did a show at Montreal and I was as sick as a dog. I couldn't even, I couldn't move. And I wanted to cancel the show but somehow never got around to it and the people were all there, they were all lined up and I just figured, I didn't want to let 'em down, you know. And, er...

MR: And you tell me you've never cancelled a show.

BD: I don't think so. Not because of er... maybe because I couldn't get there, because it was snowed in or something like that, maybe, you know, a reason like that. I've tried to be there for every show but we played in Montreal and I couldn't... I just couldn't be there. I mean we were giving... the show they saw, I guess they thought was good because they re-acted real positive, but it's one town I definitely want to go back to and play a good show, you know, what I think is good. I didn't think it was good and that bothers me more than anything ever would.

MR: You still have very strong feelings about... about, you know, giving people a really strong, intense, emotional show.

BD: That's because the songs are intense. There's a wide range of emotions there. To me it's like a Shakespeare play, you know, even after all these years, you know, you can still go and see a group doing Shakespeare. It might not be the way it was, you know, when, you know, it was happening but it's a pretty fair account of it, and this is the same way, the songs all run together in a way that if you was going to sit down and break 'em all down you'd have some kind of story there. You really would. It's that... it's more... it's a play. And I'm singing all the songs. Maybe all the elements are out there. You know, a lot of these songs I could see better, you know, with more, I could see them definitely being more romantic and using different elements of theatre but I can't do everything, you know.

MR: Yeah, just a second, I think this has just run out (the tape machine). No, it didn't. Erm, can you do that, can you summon, I mean can... when you sing Blowin' In The Wind for what must be thousands and thousands of times.

BD: Blowin' In The Wind...

MR: Yeah.

BD: Blowin' In The Wind has always been a spiritual. I took it off a song, I don't know whether you ever heard a song called No More Auction Block?

MR: No, I don't...

BD: That's a spiritual. Blowin' in The Wind it sort of follows the same feeling, erm... it's an old song... it's like, er...

MR: Well, it has the same kind of progression of feeling just like Will The Circle Be Unbroken?

BD: Right, right. It's like This Land Is Your Land is really an old Carter Family song. I don't know, I mean, there's not really too original, many original melodies around, you know. Er, anyway Blowin' In The Wind has always been a spiritual. Always. As a matter of fact the Staples Singers used to sing it and it hasn't been done as a spiritual and I've always seen it and heard it that way. But it's just taken me... I just did it with my principal guitar when I recorded it, Peter Paul and Mary didn't really make it sound spiritual but the feeling we had it had, you know, that's where it was coming from, so I'm not doing it full out to look like a spiritual; you'd hear it in a church but...

MR: But the Gospel (unintelligible)... Well then, take another, I mean, take another song then, I mean because that obviously that has like a timeless quality to it but now, but Like A Rolling Stone or any of your other songs that you have played so often, do, I mean, you manage to invest the emotion that you can really feel that as soon as the song begins.

BD: Yeah. Yeah. I have never lost any of that. That's all still inside me. As soon as the, you know, as soon as it happens I start, er...

MR: This may be an off the wall question but do you feel any special responsibility because of what you've done, as for, you know, whatever reasons and, you know, I certainly think that lot of them are qualitative, you know, reach these kind of legendary proportions.

BD: Well, the only responsibility I have is to keep on keeping on. That's my responsibility. As far as responsibility over anything I've done in the past, I let that loose, you know. I can't stay there too long. Legendary proportions, I can't help that. I'm not... if I didn't have them songs I wouldn't be up to legendary proportions. It's those songs that make me what I am and it's me writing those songs which is going to keep me being what I am.

MR: Right, well then the other side of it would be... er... you're not getting tired are you?

BD: No, I've gotta get ready though.

MR: OK. I'll just wrap it up, um... you know, it's a sense... really it's a song, it's not something that you've chose, it's, you know, there's that sense of having a privacy threatened constantly...

BD: Well, that don't bother me really. I understand what people, you know, who... er... no, I don't feel any sense of privacy being threatened – (someone enters room) I've gotta go – I don't hurt from anybody anyway.

MR: Can somebody really... can you really stay forever young?

BD: I'm not sure. I don't know. I wrote that and I felt it in er... when I was sitting there for somebody else anyway when she said what do I hope and wish, you know, and...

MR: And you said as a sort of last...

BD: I used it towards the end of the program, yeah. But I... at this point. And there's a lot of stuff we're not doing anymore, you haven't heard us do Times They Are A-Changin'?

MR: Right. No!

BD: So, I don't know. I think so. It's all in the heart, whatever keeps you that way. Keeps you forever young. Forever young doesn't necessarily mean that you don't grow old, but you just have some contact with what put you where you are. You know, keep some type of contact. Anyway...

MR: Listen, thanks a lot. It's been...

BD: OK.

MR: ...special for me.

Pam Coyle Interview, Baltimore, Maryland

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1047-1050.

Sitting in his hotel room in Baltimore, Dylan was interviewed over the telephone by Pam Coyle, Editor-in-Chief of the Hibbing High Times, the newspaper of Bob's old school. According to On The Tracks #8 –

> In the midst of what was, at the time, his most ambitious tour ever, Dylan announced he would grant only one interview in Minnesota and neighboring states prior to his October 31 concert at the Civic Center in St. Paul. The arrangements for the lone interview were left in the hands of Dylan's brother, David Zimmerman, who was acting as Bob's manager at the time. It was David who, according to the wire service report, came up with the idea of contacting George Peterson, faculty adviser of the Hibbing High Times to offer Bob's alma mater first dibs on the exclusive interview.

The article appeared in the Hibbing High Times of October 18th 1978.

HIGH TIMES Exclusive: An Interview With Bob Dylan

Back in 1956, Bob Dylan decided that he wanted to be a singer. At that time, he was in his early years at Hibbing High School.

Dylan feels that he did not actually try to pursue a career in professional music. "It was a natural thing. There was nothing else that I wanted to do," he said.

Nearly twenty years ago, Dylan began his musical career on the stage of the Hibbing High School auditorium. He said that the audiences reacted favorably when he sang for several of the school's Home-coming and Jacket Jamboree auditorium programs. He also performed at several other functions, including talent shows.

Dylan's audiences are obviously continuing to react "favorably". He will be appearing in St. Paul, at the Civic Center on Tuesday, October 31st as part of a 53-city world-wide tour which began last January.

Looking forward to the St. Paul concert, Dylan said "It is always a thrill to come back to some place familiar."

Prior to this current concert tour, he appeared with the Rolling Thunders Tours in 1976 and the Spring of 1977.

Comparing his recent audiences to those of his earlier tours, Dylan said that they are generally reacting the same. He noted, however, that his audiences are younger than they were in previous years. "The younger ones are coming up to the front now," he said.

Although concert touring may be difficult at times, Dylan said that he enjoys touring and that his future plans will include more concert touring. "Moving from town to town gets in your blood after a while."

Dylan was born in Duluth and raised in Hibbing, but the nearest concert to his home town is St. Paul, nearly 200 miles away. "I just play the tours; I don't book them." he explained. He also said that someday he would like to present a concert in Duluth or Hibbing.

Dylan said that his concert program consists mainly of his older material, although he is writing new songs.

In addition to his original material, he does perform songs by other artists, including Woody Guthrie's Passion Of Plenty and Ballad Of Tom Jones.

According to Dylan his current songs are much simpler than his earlier ones, but the style is basically the same.

Among his own songs, Dylan said that he has no favorites. "I like them all for different reasons. Each song is different." He said that he receives inspiration for his lyrics from "living my life".

Being a native of Northern Minnesota has had an effect on his songs and career, according to Dylan. "You could say that it gave me a sense of simplicity," he said.

Dylan has been a part of the music business for nearly twenty years, but he feels that not too many changes have taken place during his career. "Everything changes but stays the same," he said.

Regarding the popular music of today, Dylan said, "Some of it is all right." He cited England's John Clark as his favorite modern songwriter.

What about American artists? Dylan said that Jimi Hendrix was his last favorite contemporary musician from the United States.

Along with concert tours and more records, Dylan said that his future plans include the possibilities of making more movies, writing another movie script, and being involved with television productions.

Although he has progressed well beyond singing for a Hibbing High School Home-coming program, Bob Dylan has not forgotten his home town. "I am proud to be from Hibbing," he concluded.

As an addendum to the above interview, Pamela Coyle was the subject of the following article which appeared in the Duluth News-Tribune in October 1998 at the time of Dylan's concert in the town of his birth. It provides some background to the actual interview which took place 20 years earlier.

FOR AN UNSUSPECTING 17-YEAR-OLD FROM HIBBING,
BOB DYLAN BECAME THE INTERVIEW OF A LIFETIME

Pamela Coyle has interviewed a wide range of famous personalities, from Brooke Shields to Judge Wagner.

But none has brought her as much notoriety – or a greater appreciation of privacy – as an interview with Bob Dylan 20 years ago.

"I was wholly unprepared for the cult of Bob Dylan fans who began to call me after the interview," said Coyle, now a courts reporter for the New Orleans Times-Picayune. In 1978 she was a 17-year-old Hibbing High School senior when she interviewed the reclusive Dylan for the school newspaper.

"People who spent their lives hanging on every word of Bob Dylan starting calling me and asking me what it was like to talk to Bob Dylan," she recalled.

At the time, Coyle knew little about Dylan even though they both grew up in the same Iron Range town. Coyle's favorite musicians were Ted Nugent, Foreigner, Styx and Blue Oyster Cult.

When Dylan's press agent offered an interview to the school newspaper. Coyle figured that, as its editor she had first dibs. She got the only interview in Minnesota before his Oct. 31, 1978 concert in St. Paul.

"We probably spent 20 minutes talking," said Coyle, who went on to earn a journalism degree at the University of Minnesota. "I did not know much about his music and as a journalist today I'm embarrassed that I didn't prepare for the interview. I interviewed him like a 17-year-old. I asked incredibly basic questions. He was very nice, very pleasant. He gave very nice short answers to my questions. It was very much of a novice approach on my part. It wasn't the most free-flowing thing in my career."

But the brief interview with the musician who rarely grants interviews turned Coyle's life upside down.

News media from across the country picked up the story and began to call Coyle. The Associated Press paid her $85 for the story. Newspaper headlines read: Non-fan interviews Dylan.

And Dylan fans began to call her. They called her at school when she was in class. They called at home. They called her parents, David and Margaret Coyle. And they even called her on Saturdays at her job in downtown Hibbing.

"It took on a life of its own," Coyle said of the interview. "They asked me what it was like to talk to him and what he sounded like. The fallout was so overwhelming it supplanted the interview. It was so overwhelming I felt like not being a journalist anymore because I was being hounded so much. It actually ended up giving me a greater appreciation and sensitivity to people on the other end of the telephone and for what they go through."

After the interview, Coyle received two complimentary tickets to Dylan's concert at the St. Paul Civic Center. She and a friend, Sue Hagberg, coincidentally ended up at the same hotel as Dylan. After several unsuccessful attempts to pass a thank-you note to Dylan, Coyle finally got it into the hands of one of Dylan's bodyguards.

She never heard from Dylan again, but she's still hearing from his fans. Like the reclusive musician she interviewed 20 years ago, she'd rather avoid the calls.

"I really don't remember that much about the interview," said Coyle, now 37. "What I recall is what happened after the interview more than anything else. It was really a strange experience to go through for a 17-year-old."

"The experience was pretty simple, but it was a total trip."

DYLAN ON THE DEFENSE: 'THE '60s ARE OVER'
BY ROBERT HILBURN

KANSAS CITY—For the first time in the 1970s, Bob Dylan isn't being heralded by critics as rock's messiah on his new U.S. tour. He has been rapped in city after city for tampering with the old arrangements and for having too slick a stage manner.

Time magazine called the "mocking show-biz turns" in Dylan's show "tiresome." The Chicago Sun-Times termed the concert a "sometimes depressing, sometimes exhilarating, sometimes funny cross between 'Name That Tune' and 'That's Entertainment!'"

New Times felt Dylan exhibited the "same kind of breezy conversational style he'd use in glad-handing the high rollers at Tahoe." Perhaps, the writer continued, it was time Dylan considered a graceful retirement or at least a well-deserved rest.

After a decade of unprecedented acclaim, this was an unusual situation for Dylan. The obvious question I posed as we sat in a coffee shop before his show here was: How does it feel?

"They're crazy," he said, of the reviews, between sips of coffee at the counter. "You'll see the show tonight. You'll see the crowd and how they react. Then, read the paper in the morning and you'll see that whoever reviewed it most likely wasn't there or didn't see the same show—maybe he heard it on the telephone.

"The writers complain the show's disco or Las Vegas. I don't know how they came up with those theories. We never heard them when we played Australia or Japan or Europe. It's like someone made it up in. one town and the writer in the next town read it. I don't know what the reviewers mean half the time. I don't even care."

There wasn't so much anger as puzzlement in Dylan's combative manner as he spoke. The hostile reviews began this year when the 37-year-old singer-songwriter released his unwieldly, four-hour "Renaldo & Clara" movie. They continued with the arrival of the greatly underrated "Street Legal" album. Many of the negative notices complained about poor production on the record.

"People now listen to records on stereo sets worth 10 grand," Dylan said. "It costs them more to listen to the album than it does for people to record it. They listen to how it sounds rather than what it says.

"And those magazines. They write about the albums from skyscrapers, behind desks. They don't know what is in the hearts and minds of the people any more than they know what I'm thinking or what a subway conductor is thinking.

"It's not me who has turned into something else—it's a lot of those writers. They used to have some kind of rebellious spirit. They don't anymore. In the '60s, they didn't even know if they were reporters. They just wrote. Now, they've got top jobs. They don't listen the same way to the music."

What about the "mocking show-biz turns"? Is the lighter (slightly), more accessible mood meant to satirize other performers?

"I'm not trying to mock anything in this show," he replied. "We're not equipped to do that. We don't have any props. We're just up there playing my songs. That's all we've ever done.

"There are so many of these groups that get on stage these days with smoke bombs or people rising up on 12-foot shoes. I'm not into that. That's not my scene.

"I can still relate to a man or woman on stage who is singing a song that is telling me something—something I need to know. If that's not happening on a stage, I've got better things to do than sit in an arena someplace."

At the Kemper Arena that night, Dylan's stage crew played the same Hank Williams tape that it has used before the concert at all other tour stops. Williams, the writer of such country classics as "Your Cheatin' Heart" and "You Win Again," was one of Dylan's main influences.

Few people in the hall, however, recognized Williams' country-styled vocals. "I think it's Eddy Arnold," said one Dylan fan behind me. The guess wasn't even close. Arnold sings in a country-pop style, while Williams sings in a more traditional country vein. Another fan, however, was close. He thought the singer on the tape was Charley Pride, a current country singer whose style was patterned after Williams'.

In the dressing room at intermission, Dylan was amused at Williams being mistaken for Pride. Dylan, the most influential living American pop figure, has been accused in concert reviews of copying other artists to "catch up with the 70s."

Lighting a cigarette, he was quick to answer the charge: "I'm not trying to catch up to anything. People said I put a saxophone player in my band because Bruce Springsteen has one. I don't have anybody in my band copying anybody.

"But, as it turns out, Steve Douglas, who does play saxophone for me in the band, played on all of the Phil Spector records (in the '60s) and he was with Duane Eddy. Most of those saxophone riffs and runs you hear on other people's records now are coming directly from what Steve Douglas did. He was such a big influence."

Once reclusive, Dylan has opened up in recent years. That, too, has caused some criticism from reporters who once called him a hermit. When Dylan did numerous interviews to promote his "Renaldo & Clara" movie, he was accused of exploiting the press.

But the accessibility has not vanished. It shows in his willingness now to do occasional interviews and in his looser manner on stage. Once prone to vagueness in interviews, he is now quite straightforward. After the concert when he had to walk through the crowd because the tour bus had been parked in the wrong place, Dylan stopped—somewhat shyly—to sign a couple of autographs and shook hands with some of the fans.

"Bob has realized that he is going to be performing for a long time and he's trying to make some adjustments on stage," said one person close to the singer.

Dylan's show has changed somewhat since he kicked off the U.S. tour last summer at the Universal Amphitheater. When he returns Wednesday night to the Inglewood Forum and Friday night to the San Diego Sports Arena, we'll find—if the Kansas City show is any indication—a tighter, more focused presentation.

The Kemper audience, mostly in their late teens and early '20s, gave Dylan six standing ovations. Two of the songs from the new "Street Legal" album—a speeded up version of "Where Are You Tonight" and "Changing of the Guards"—were among the best-received numbers.

During the bus ride back to the hotel, Dylan asked about the crowd reaction. It's hard to tell, he said, from the stage some nights. Pleased by the report, he added: "Now, read the papers in the morning and I'll bet you they didn't like it."

As it turned out, the review in the morning Kansas City Times didn't resolve the bet. The review noted the 'slings and arrows flung' at the singer recently, but didn't offer a firm judgment on Dylan's performance.

One line did reinforce the tour entourage's suspicion of the press: "The old favorites in Dylan's musical repertoire seemed to stir the crowd most, particularly 'Like a Rolling Stone' and 'Lay, Lady, Lay.' Dylan and the band played 27 songs, but "Lay, Lady, Lay" wasn't one of them."

Did the barrage of criticism hurt?

"No," he snapped at first. "How can you take it seriously? I think they (the negative reviews) would hurt if I didn't see the audience response. They know what's going on. In fact, I've got to where I might even like the reviews. They sort of make me an underdog again. I don't like being everybody's favorite.

"People now think I got nothing but raves in the '60s, but you ought to dig out some of those old papers and you'll see it wasn't true. This is nothing new. The main thing is I believe in these tunes. That's why I'm still doing them.

"I can still get chills sometimes when I'm singing 'It's Alright, Ma'—the verse that starts, 'You lose yourself, you reappear/You suddenly find you got nothin' to fear... '

"The reason I'm changing the songs and doing them a new way is to get the power out of them. Every song I do up there means something to me. I'm not there just so people can relive their memories. I'm not out to bring back the '60s. They're over. I'm not nostalgic for those days at all."

2 December 1978
Unidentified Female Interviewer, Municipal Auditorium, Nashville, Tennessee

This interview was conducted at the Municipal Auditorium in Nashville by an unidentified female reporter. The interview tape is circulating among collectors but it is a frustrating 18-minute listen. Dylan's incessant guitar picking/strumming too close to the microphone drowns out the interviewer's soft voice making it nearly impossible, and downright irritating, to attempt to discern her questions. On the Tracks' scribe, Cyndi Bentley, spent hours of ear straining effort turning the jumble into a verifiable transcript that we feel is as accurate as possible to the original meaning.

Q: How do you feel about this tour so far?
BD: Well, it's an alright tour. It's been good. You mean the American one, the stateside tour. Ah, I feel good about it.
Q: Despite the reviews, are you going to continue on?
BD: Well, we haven't got bad reviews everywhere. You know, they single out the bad ones. Maybe one in every ten reviews is a real negative one. But that's all. It hasn't been extremely... I mean, extremely bad. If it were extremely bad I wouldn't be selling records and people wouldn't be showing up. So what it comes to is the audiences. They're gonna to know; they'll know if they like it or not. And I've always based my opinion on how I'm doing, on where they are. [He laughs].
Q: So what are you doing after the tour?
BD: We'll probably be touring again. I'll probably be working on some records and we'll go back on the road.
Q: It had read in another interview that you said that the sound you had in Blonde On Blonde was like the closest to the sound you hear inside you.
BD: Yeah.
Q: I wondered if you feel that you've heard that in any recent albums or any recent songs?
BD: I tried to do that on the Street Legal album but I heard the album on the radio and it doesn't have it, what I thought it did have, sound-wise.
Q: Is that surprising?
BD: Yeah. No... Yeah, it was surprising, but we did that album with a remote truck. And so I didn't find out until much later, after the record was even out, is that what they were getting in the truck, Wasn't what was happening in the room.
Q: How do you feel about that? Is there anything you can do?
BD: There is nothing you can do about it now.
Q: What about when you have something inside you, I mean do you know what it is inside you and you hear it.
BD: Yeah.
Q: What's the process to get it out – like you said this time when you thought this was there, and it wasn't.
BD: It's always a struggle, you know? It wasn't there for a variety of reasons. I hadn't become too familiar with the songs. Sometimes that's the case. I mean I would record a song... years ago I used to do the song live before you ever made a record, so it would evolve. Then I got into just taking the songs into the studio before I was too familiar with them and making the record, and as time went on it would evolve into something else. So I'm gonna try harder next time though to make a more, you know, accessible record.
Q: Do you do any new songs in concert now?

BD: Once in awhile we do some, yeah.
Q: How have they been responded to?
BD: Ah, fine.
Q: Will you be doing any tonight?
BD: We'll probably do one or two, maybe one.
Q: What is your favorite one?
BD: Well, I don't know if I'll record it. But I have a song called "Baby, Am I Your Stepchild?"
Q: Is that different from a lot of the songs on Street Legal?
BD: No. Umm, content-wise, it's not. It's a more simplified version of, ah, just a man talking to a woman, who is just not treating him properly.
Q: A lot of reviews have said you are more aware of the audience now than you were or let's say maybe you relate more openly to the audience. Do you agree with that?
BD: Well, I always did that. I always did that because I started out in clubs. I think the tour you might be referring to, where people say that – they refer to the last thing you did – they don't... That's the way they figure it's supposed to be. [Laughter] I've made so many records now, first of all, people should realize that the content of my songs is gonna be within a certain area, but they should also know by now that I'm still reaching for a certain sound, and I'm gonna do anything I can in order to make that sound happen. As far as... [Very long pause] I don't know... What was your question?
Q: About relating to the audience...
BD: As far as that, I think you are referring to the Bob Dylan/Band tour where there were no words spoken during that tour, except maybe a couple of thank you's and whatever, you know? That was an unusual tour. There wasn't much we could do on that tour, except play it. It was a highly acclaimed tour; artistically, I'm not sure what it was all about. I think it had a lot of notoriety because of what had happened before that – in terms of myself and The Band – before they were The Band. But as far as playing anything new, we didn't do any of that. We had a lot of sound problems on that tour also. The energy level was up so high that it was hard to relate to the people in the crowd.
Q: So you don't feel it that way at all then?
BD: About relating to the crowds? No, I'm always related to the crowd on one level or another but this is a show of songs. It's not really a show of too much rapping. I've always kept it there.
Q: One thing I wondered about a lot is, when you are creating, when you finish something, do you ever go through a kind of a cycle where there is an emptiness after you finish something...
BD: Yeah.
Q: ...an empty space... Now do you deal with that? Do you have to just keep working?
BD: Yeah, you just have to keep going beyond it and sooner or later that song, or whatever it is, gets a... See, when you do it all the time – I know myself, I can't speak for any other performer but I'm sure what I have to say is true for a lot of them – is you're never satisfied with what you've done. It's always something ahead of you which is, you know, where you are going, it's not where you have been. It's where you're going that matters and you're always concerned with that because you're always left alone with that, after whatever it is that you created is there out on the street. You know, that's fine but you can't live on your past credentials.
Q: So you think it's a never-ending cycle?
BD: I do. Well, once you set up your mind to be creative in that type of way...
Q: You said Bob Dylan wasn't actually in "Renaldo and Clara". I wondered – does that mean that Bob Dylan isn't in the poetry and the music you write?
BD: I am in there. I'm not consciously aware of Bob Dylan being in there. I am in there. It's a fine line between where I am and where I'm projecting and what I know about; what I'm familiar with; what I know to be the truth happening to – could happen to me, it could happen to anybody – what I know about that, whether I tend to make that personal or not. There really isn't any line. Or if there is a line it's a very fine line on what I tend to make personal of other people's situation. I can easily do that. I do that whenever I feel like it.

Q: As far as like the image that other people have of you, it's like they are interpreting you by what they see. Then are you trying to control what they see?

BD: Well, what they see of me is me, y'see I'm a live performer so that image of me is gonna be pretty... is gonna be pretty... The image they see – what they see is, what they get. Whereas, you go to a movie – the performer might do that take a hundred times. There are a lot of people behind the scenes. And when we are walking down the street, we see many people who give us faces that might not necessarily be what they are thinking. Everybody learns to make a face – if they are sad they put on a happy face. People get conditioned to doing that. With me now, you can't fool crowds night after night and that's the situation I wanna be in because that's the one thing that counts to me is live performing. I'm not interested in being a legend or having an image. All those – they don't give you nothing, you know? You can't go too long on that kind of thing. If I'm in legendary status, that only means I've passed through a lot of different phases... and I've survived it.

Q: Has there been for you a conflict between your inner-self and your outer-self that other people are making you out to be?

BD: No.

Q: Not at all? Before your motorcycle accident – that was related to a very wild period. I remember you said you had to step away to actually see what was happening. Now do you feel like you stay at one with your life, But then you need an existence to have insight, at the same time.

BD: You have to get back every once in a while and go where there isn't anybody, there's just you and yourself. I do that... just step back.

Q: Do you mean that actually physically or do you mean a kind of withdrawal into yourself?

BD: Well, I always was drawn into myself because I'm always thinking about something which you can't see. I might have a song in my head, or I might have something I'm concerned with.

Q: Do you ever feel a danger from ever being too close to yourself?

BD: Yeah, sure. Well, you know, you have to believe that it's coming from another source whatever you are doing. And ah, so when I feel that danger about myself – I'm just not recognizing that's it's not really me who's doing it, it's coming from another source.

Q: Seems like pain and loss seem to be a kind of an emotional status in some of this stuff. Why do you think that is?

BD: Pain and loss? Well, pain and loss are always with us, you know? We tend to believe something, and then we find out it's not true. It's gonna lead to pain and loss.

Q: So how do you deal with the separations in your own life? Everybody has different kinds of separations: from themselves, from people, from their art... Or does that happen to you?

BD: No. No, I don't separate myself from... from... from my music.

Q: You feel that's never a problem for you then...

BD: No.

Q: ...having to reconnect?

BD: To reconnect? You mean, with the inspiration that leads you to create music? No, I'm pretty much always there; walking in the same environment as where my music comes from.

Q: [With a smile in her voice] That must feel good.

BD: Well, there really is no other way, you know. You're either doing it, or you're not doing it.

Q: Why is it that every time you do something new then, you're put down? It seems like everybody wants to put Bob Dylan down.

BD: Well, people like to think that they, ah... [Long pause] I don't know, why that is. I'm sure it's only true in a certain sense, and it's not true in another sense. As far as music goes, a lot of people have played a lot of different kinds of music. [Pause] They put Ray Charles down when he did his country album. It didn't bother him too much.

Q: Well, it seems like people are like asking me why are you doing the tour? Or they are putting you down. [Nearly indignant] If you make money it's not good, or something.

BD: I don't know.

Q: [She's embarrassed herself now. She giggles and then mumbles.] I don't know.

BD: I don't know. You'll have to ask them...

Q: Do you do anything else besides being involved in music?

BD: No, I don't. Well, I do, but then again I don't. [long pause] I like to fix things. I like to work with tools.

Q: Do you ride motorcycles anymore?

BD: I have one. I don't ride it too often.

Q: What about friends? Do you have a lot friends?

BD: Naw, I got a few. I can count 'em on one of my hands.

Q: Do you live in California now? It that your home-base?

BD: Sort of, right now, it is home-base.

Q: Where will you be in the '80s?

BD: [He speaks without hesitation] In the '80s, I'll be on the road.

Q: Still? [She giggles, taken back by his humor and directness.] What do you think will happen when no one wants to pay to see Bob Dylan anymore?

BD: I guess, I'll have to play smaller halls. I don't know.

Q: [She again giggles at his devil-may-care attitude.] I have a close friend in Jacksonville who says there's a song of yours for every mood that he could possibly feel. I think that's kind of unique that an artist could span a whole spectrum of emotions.

BD: [Bored] Yeah.

Q: How do you feel, right before you go on stage?

BD: Oh, I'm getting used to it.

Q: [Interviewer realizes Dylan's increasingly distracted.] Is it hard to talk now?

BD: Well, now I'm starting to think about some songs... some things I'm gonna do, yeah.

Q: Oh, how long do we have before you "go on"?

BD: About five minutes, I think.

Q: Oh. okay. [She begins to tell him something-it sounds like she's beginning to explain that she could have asked many, many more questions if there'd only been more time – then she shuts off the tape recorder.]

Lynne Allen Interview, Atlanta, Georgia

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 215-223.

Lynne Allen's interview was conducted in the Omni Theatre in Atlanta. It first appeared in Trouser Press magazine No. 39 in June 1979 under the heading

INTERVIEW WITH AN ICON
Bob Dylan grants an audience

This does appear in tape form which should be regarded as a rough draft for the published article. Allen is fairly meticulous about using Dylan's quotes, almost ad verbatim and she adds in quotes from elsewhere, the section on Newport for example. She has edited out much of her own contribution to the discussion. On the tape an unidentified male acquaintance of Allen is to be heard asking a few questions of Dylan which are included here by Allen without any acknowledgement of this unknown man.

If I'd thought about it
I never would have done it
I guess I would 'a let it slide
If I'd 'a lived my life by what others were thinkin'
This heart inside me would 'a died
I was just too stubborn to ever be governed by enforced insanity
Someone had to reach for the risin' star
I guess it was up to me

Bob Dylan is a legend in his own time. Not a full-fledged commercial superstar, for he doesn't make platinum records nor sell out all of his live performances, Dylan is merely a legend, enigmatic and mysterious. Familiar, yet strange.

It has been said that Dylan is not half the myth he believes himself to be and that he himself is the myth-monger, selling us his every new phase while, like his descendant in style, David Bowie, he casually discards each old mask with the ease of an actor changing roles. He has also at various times been accused of having sold out, of being too removed, aloof, of not revealing enough, of being cold and calculating, allowing us to see only what he wishes and no more. No matter, in the final analysis he is what he has created.

If the '60s were his formative years, the '70s have seen Dylan subject to many changes in his life. From the laid-back family man of Nashville Skyline and New Morning, Dylan slowly turned and headed back into the more complex reaches of his mind, starting with Planet Waves, which signaled the return within, and following with Blood On The Tracks, which brought him even closer to his anima, his muse, who finally appeared to him as Isis on Desire. (In a dream-scape not unlike Robert Graves' White Goddess, who could be found "among pack ice or where the track had faded," Dylan united with his goddess after he "came to the pyramids all imbedded in ice.")

With Desire in the stores, Dylan took to the road with his own gypsy troupe. The Rolling Thunder Revue brought to mind the "Indiani Metropolitani", groups of young people who do street theatre in Italy. They toured the U.S. playing moderately sized halls, picking up and dropping different performers along the way. Renaldo and Clara, Dylan's mammoth and controversial movie, was filmed on the road with Rolling Thunder, during a tumultuous period in which his marriage reportedly took a turn for the worse and his life (along with his newly-built dream house) began to slide. Seemingly none the worse for wear and tear, Dylan embarked on the most extensive tour of his career early in 1978. Beginning in Japan, New Zealand and Australia, it finally wound up matters in the southeastern United States in December of last year.

The first time I saw Dylan was in Binghamton, New York, in September 1978. I had always admired him. How could you not? No matter how one views Dylan and/or his music, it's difficult to deny the charismatic mystique that has afforded him widespread recognition and critical acclaim. Personally, I had always responded favorably to whatever courses Dylan had chosen to take, so approaching him live, I was already biased in favor of the man.

I was shocked at his appearance. He seemed ragged and worn (which later proved to be deceptive. Make-up, heavy black around the eyes, cast strange shadows over his face under the lights). The music, though, was even more startling.

My initial reaction was thoroughly negative, to put it mildly. In comparison to what was then currently happening in rock, the music seemed, bluntly, quite lame. The new arrangements seemed clumsy and awkward, overriding the simplicity that had originally made the songs work. But as I listened closer it rang with a clear resonance. The sound in the hall was exceptional, and the musicians excellent.

This was certainly not, as many reviews and reviewers had suggested, "Las Vegas" nor was it disco. It was just Dylan, older, to be sure, scraggly and unkempt as always, even in his new black and white stage suit, his band playing behind him like a mini-orchestra in perfect synch.

I met Dylan a week later, at a typical record company bash held for him and his band after one of the Madison Square Garden shows. A friend introduced me to him and, sitting at an adjacent table, I had ample opportunity to observe him at close quarters. I sensed no animosity from him, no aggression nor defense; indeed, he seemed rather shy.

His expertise at deterring conversation from himself, at keeping the talk light and meaningless, was obvious. He chain smoked and drank red wine all night. He appeared drunk at times, slurring words and laughing a lot, but it could easily have been an act, a way of retaining his one-upmanship in any situation. Dylan, the enigmatic cynic, the infallible put-on artist remained in control.

Three months later, I caught up with the Bob Dylan tour once again, this time, down south in Birmingham, Alabama. Looking disheveled as ever, the Jack of Hearts had once again trumped those in his audience who had been led to believe press reports of his new "slick" image. The tour had almost reached its end and the band was much tighter than they had been earlier. The songs no longer felt stiff, they were flowing now, having settled into their new forms. Dylan spoke to the crowd a lot that night, introducing songs with brief stories or parables, breathing new life into songs 10, even 15 years old. He ended the show with 'Forever Young, ' which he dedicated to one of his children. "This is our last – look for us," he said, "We may be back. I'm not quite ready to be put out to pasture just yet!"

On the way out of town, I left a note for Dylan with the desk clerk of his hotel, saying that I wished to interview him, that I had no ulterior motive at all other than an interest and a desire to talk. I left a number for him to call and headed back home to Atlanta.

A week later, backstage at the Omni in Atlanta, an hour before going onstage, Bob Dylan sat alone in his dressing room, strumming an old Martin guitar that had yellowed with age, the wood around the pick-guard chipped from years of use. Dressed in a green flannel shirt, black leather pants and boots, his eyes hidden behind dark aviator shades, he was relaxed and friendly, the antithesis of the guarded creature which the media so often portrays him as.

His old black leather jacket lay crumpled up on one of the chairs, a small notebook peeked out of one of the pockets. What appeared to be chicken scratchings made their way across the open page. "I'm always writing something" he explained as he continued to pick a haunting blues melody on the guitar.

I mentioned to him that I had noticed a definite theme running through his more recent albums, culminating on Desire. He didn't seem too happy with the idea, though, and emphasized his disagreement with a forceful strum. "That album didn't have a concept. It didn't have that type of concept. Of course I wrote it with somebody else too, but I always kept it kinda on the track of where I thought it should be going. I can look back on it just like anybody else... but when that particular album was happening, I didn't know what was happening at the time. We tried it with a lot of different people in the studio, a lot of different types of sound and I even had back-up singers on that album for two or three days, a lot of percussion, a lot going on. But as it got down, I got more irritated with all this sound going on and eventually just settled on bass, drums and violin."

"That was new," he stressed. "I didn't take that out as far as I wanted to, I didn't have a chance to do that. I wanted to do more harmonica and violin together but we never got a chance to do that. But, yeah, all that time, those songs like Isis and all that – gee, I haven't done that for a long time – I used to do that song all the time..."

Desire, Dylan's collaboration with writer Jacques Levy was a deeply mystical statement, the violin capturing the free, gypsy spirit so inherent in the songs and later in the whole Rolling Thunder idea. "Yeah, it was that. It definitely was that. Oh you know, we did it all night long, into the morning. I never slept when I made that album, I couldn't sleep. I would have to listen to it again to really answer these questions in a coherent way."

"You've left it behind in a way," I said.

"No, I haven't left the songs behind. I never leave the songs behind. I might leave the arrangements and the mood behind, but the songs, I never leave them behind."

At Newport in 1965, he unleashed his new-found electricity on an unsuspecting audience. Or as he put it in Atlanta, when introducing Maggie's Farm: "I was invited to Newport in 1965. I had been invited there before and never caused too much fuss, but I was invited in '65 and I went and I played this particular song. Anyway, people booted me out of town, actually, for playing this particular tune and it was hard to believe that this song caused such a disturbance, but it did! It's called I Ain't Gonna Work on Maggie's Farm No More."
